"MY DEAR FRIENDS,—I am at home—in the warm bosom of my family, caressed and administered to by the beloved ones of my heart. It is good to be here. Thanks be to God, the giver of every good and perfect gift, whose tender mercies are over all, and without the notice of whose eye, even a sparrow may not fall to the ground, I have been preserved. After more than sixteen days of fierce conflict with head winds, adverse waves, and the innumerable hardships and perils of a spring voyage across the Atlantic, I am surrounded by the calm, soothing, and tranquillizing influence of home. You will be glad to know that I found my family all well. * * * You have heard, ere this, that an attempt was made to degrade me, by proscribing and placing me beyond the circle of my fellow passengers, during the voyage. This was done to conciliate the democratic Slaveholders on board, who would have felt degraded by my presence at the table with them; these men would have been glad to have owned me for their share, but they could not tolerate me as a free man. This proscription, though an early and at first a bitter foretaste of what then awaited me in this land, proved a blessing rather than a curse, since by compelling me to go into separate apartments, I was placed beyond the social influence of a set of persons, who proved to be a band of wild, uproarious, gambling tipplers, whose foul-mouthed utterances interposed an impassable gulf between us.

"The first few days of the voyage, I felt the degradation of my position, and a degree of loneliness. I was on a British steamer, a British flag waving over me; on her deck were a hundred and twenty passengers, not one of all of them had paid more for their passage than I had, yet while I was confined like a criminal to a certain part of the ship because of my colour, they enjoyed the privilege of going at large, and in the spacious saloon from which I was excluded. These superior privileges naturally enough induced in some a feeling of superiority over me, and made it somewhat improper to be seen near me; so while among men, children of one common Father, I was without society, I stood isolated and alone, with none to extend to me the hand of civility or pass a friendly smile in common, on the frowning waves of the deep; thus solitary and alone, my heart could dwell on the many beloved friends whose homes and hearts were ever open to me when I sojourned among you. * * *

"After the first few days of our voyage, my proscription and the cause of it became generally known, and was at once a topic of common conversation among the passengers. A few persons, either from curiosity or humanity, spoke to me in my loneliness, and extended to me the common civilities of the day; they were of the more respectable part of our number, and this continued during the voyage. Thus was the attempt to degrade me rendered unavailing. I landed at Boston on Tuesday night, the 20th April and a reception meeting was given me in Lynn, on Friday night, the 23d, and the coloured people of Boston intend giving me one on the 3d of May. Invitations are pressing in upon me from all quarters. I cannot attend one-half of the meetings that parties are anxious to get up for me. My old friends receive me gladly, and new ones flock around to encourage me in my work; still I see before me a life of toil and trial. The war with Mexico, undertaken and carried on for the infamous wicked purpose of extending and perpetuating the enslavement of my race, is becoming more and more popular every day, and such is the feeling here, that to denounce this war in the terms which its atrocious character merits, is at once to be branded as a traitor; but justice must be done, the truth must be told, the wicked must be exposed, freedom and righteousness must be vindicated, and with the help of the God of peace and the oppressed, I will not be silent. I am still strongly determined to devote myself to printing as well as speaking for my race. * * *

"In kind remembrance to all my friends,— Yours truly, &c., &c.

"FREDERICK DOUGLASS."

BIBLICAL INVESTIGATIONS.—NO. V.

The Precept to Noah—concluded.

The evils into which man, by the lapse of his great progenitor fell, are but inverted types of the good principles into which he was created. Thus Emulation became Envy—the beneficent desire to return good for good, a hateful spirit of retaliation, seeking to inflict evil for evil. Cain was impelled by the one, when he murdered Abel, and dreaded the action on himself of the other, when he feared that every one finding him should slay him. The existence, then, of a general propensity in mankind to take the life of a murderer, is no more evidence of its rightfulness than is its equally universal inclination to take the life of a fellow being, in open or secret warfare, for lesser and other offences.

Man's departure from the law of love to God, was quickly followed by his departure from the law of love to his brother man. The earlier fruits of this declension we are ignorant of, until the act of Cain made an event of too fearful portent not to be recorded. Over much that followed of corruption and violence and wrong, it has pleased Divine Providence to draw an impenetrable veil, until the fact is proclaimed that "God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually; and it repeated the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart. And God said unto Noah, the end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence through them; and behold I will destroy them with the earth."

In conjecturing the character of those evils which were so great, that, using the language of men, it grieved God at his heart that he had made man, we may well suppose that it embraced most, or all, of the evils which have any existence with mankind now: more, it is difficult to conceive of, though the extent may have been greater. Among them, probably, was Idolatry, with the pouring out of human blood to false gods; Cannibalism, with the drinking of the blood of living animals and men; insatiable Revenge, with its demand of "blood for blood"—each victim whetting its appetite, and forming its pretext for the seizure and destruction of a new one. And we may well also conclude that among those evils, Revenge made by far the greatest contribution to the mass of those acts of violence, for the doing of which the inhabitants of the earth, with the exception of those saved within the brief limits of the ark, were cut off by the waters of the flood.

It is reasonable to assume that the purpose of God's address to Noah and his sons on the reorganization of the world was, prominently, to prevent the recurrence of those scenes of desolation which had characterized its antediluvian history. To this end, as no doubt is reference also to the ceremonial use of animal blood, as a typical atonement for sin, a high, mystical sanctity was attached to this element and emblem of life, and its use as food, calculated to stimulate to acts of cruelty, strictly prohibited. To the same end both beasts and men were constituted the responsible guardians of human life, and made directly amenable to the Divine inquest for any violation of it; and in illustration of the heinous offence which the taking of this life involved, the following precept, according to the Jewish Hebrew copies of it, was presented to their regardful notice.

כִּי בְצֶלֶם אֱלֹהִים יֵשֵׁה אֶת הָאָדָם

The sixth letter, counting from the right to the left, agreeably to the order in which the Hebrew is written, being the particle he, signifying the, is not found in the Samaritan text, but its presence or omission is not essential to the sense. The absence of the eleventh letter s, aleph, from the copies used in the Septuagint translation, is the least supposable difference between them and other ancient copies of the precept, if we do not admit badeia to have been regarded by the Greek translators as a mere amplification. With a similar qualification, we are to infer the absence of badeia, wholly, from the Hebrew copies consulted by Jerome. But, however these disagreements may affect the precept as a rule of punishment by human agency, they have no influence in determining that construction of it, which it is the purpose of this essay to establish.

In the literal rendering of the precept above exhibited, we find no difference among translators, except as they assume beth to signify something else than in, and differ in the punctuation. There might be another point agitated as to whether the future of the verb to pour out was in Kal or Niphal; the same word in that tense alike representing the active or passive voice. With these exceptions we repeat the translation of the Latin interlinear in Bishop Walton's polyglot, offered in our last number, as being the universally accepted metaphor of the Hebrew precept in its amplest extent. It is undivided by points both here and in the original.

"Pouring out (or shedding) the blood of man in man blood of him [or his blood] will be poured out because in the image of God he has made man."

Before proceeding to the exhibition of any new views of this important sentence, we would offer some brief remarks having reference to former constructions of it.

Independent of the high critical authority of Calvin, Diadati and Le Clerc, for rejecting by, as the sense of beth in this precept, the table accompanying our last number is conclusive evidence that such a sense is the most remote, and the least probable that could be assigned to it. Did the question of its having that sense, against the higher, previous claims upon it, involve the mere taking of human property, I presume no juror would give it that construction; but were this sense as much the original and most evident one, as it is now the contrary, there would be found in it no real confirmation of Luther's, or our own protestant translation of the text. On the contrary, the strongest evidence of the utter fallaciousness of these versions, in respect to the designation of man as the agent for enforcing the rule, would be afforded by it; for the precept, taking the above literal rendering for our basis, and regarding the rule as one of punishment, would then read: Shedding the blood of man—by man—blood of him will be shed. It will be seen that to make the phrase an intelligible one, the greater pause must follow "by man," making the latter man the cause of the first effusion, and the subject of the second; but not the executioner of the penalty. The sentence forms a perfect whole; asking no addition to make it thoroughly clear, and rejecting any, as an uncalled for, human intrusion. This is superseded the imagined necessity of the assumed pronoun, placed at the commencement of these versions, and thus is left to providential means the enforcement of the decree. The surplusage removed, there would remain substantially what is expressed in the vulgate and other versions, and so more. Man shedding the blood of man, blood of him will be shed.

But I am dissatisfied with all these translations, and think my ground of objection a sufficient one. It is simply this—that when a law is given with a reason annexed, it must be construed in conformity with that reason; and this, I apprehend, is not the case with any of the constructions heretofore given.

The first essay to a translation of the precept which I have to offer, in view of this rule, is founded on the supposition that beth means on, or upon. This meaning is nearest in affinity to its primitive sense in, if we except with, of any other. According to our table beth is translated on, upon, and over, 253 times, to which might generally be added the instances in which it is rendered against. The more frequent expression of upon and over, is unquestionably by the particle sh of, which, in its turn, has the sense of in, still its expression by the particle beth, is not the less certain. These particles, according to the Hebrew Grammar of Gesenius, are "most nearly related." In the second verse of the address to Noah, they are each used twice, under circumstances of perfect equality, and rendered upon.

This near affinity of in to on, is not peculiar to the Hebrew language. Donnegan's Greek and English Lexicon represents the primitive sense of the Greek EN to be in, on, at; and, among the examples given, are, "in a city," "on horseback," "at a place." Ainsworth's Latin Dictionary gives to the English preposition in, the same Latin expression, and to the Latin in, among other definitions, it assigns the English sense of "upon," as "upon a place, upon a thing, upon a time prefixed." Webster's American Dictionary of the English Language derives in from the Greek and Latin prepositions above given, and remarks that "in, in many cases, is equivalent to on," adding—"this use of the word is frequent in the scriptures; as, 'let fowls multiply in the earth.'" In the German, an, on, and auf, on, or upon, is often used where we say in, as—on the sky, on the field.

In the scripture examples where the particle beth is used to denote the imputation of guilt, or the conferment of a benediction, we may suppose either that it has in the original the sense of on, or, that falling into our idiom, it takes to itself that form of expression, notwithstanding its Hebrew sense of in. We are accustomed in such cases to the phrase on, or upon, and would therefore feel it to be an inelegant, if not an inadequate expression; and yet as the idea is purely metaphorical, in, when familiar to us, would just as well convey it. We give a few examples in illustration of these remarks, rendering beth as in.

"When thou buiddest a new house, then thou shalt make a battlement to thy roof, that thou bring not blood in thy house, if any man fall from thence." Deut. 22: 8.

"Moreover all these curses shall come upon thee, וְכָל,—and they shall be in thee, for a sign, and for a wonder, and in thy seed forever." Deut. 28: 45, 46.

"The angel which redeemed me from all evil bless the lads; and let my name be named in them." Gen. 48: 16.

In these examples, beth in our English version is rendered upon; so also in the following instances, where blood is said to be upon persons to whose wrong-doing the necessity of its effusion is attributed. Leviticus 20: 9, 11, 12, 13, 16, 27.

On the supposition, then, that beth means upon in the precept before us, and in view of the responsibility which the previous verse imposes upon man generally, for the guardianship of the life of man in particular, it were reasonable to suppose that the guardian failing to be his brother's keeper, blood-guiltiness would attach to him. This conclusion would be in harmony with the assigned reason of the precept without indicating any necessity for the further effusion of blood. And as the text would then read—Pouring out blood of the man, upon man his blood will be poured out; because in the image of God he has made the man—so the inference would be clear that blood would be shed upon man as a class, whenever the blood of the individual man was shed.

While this translation far better suits the requirements of the motive for the precept, than does any of the preceding ones, and therefore is entitled to an abundant preference, I am not satisfied of the necessity of any departure from the letter of the rule, to make it a highly instructive admonition against the shedding of human blood.

If a translation of the precept, according to the usual sense of the letter, intelligently conveys such an admonition, I cannot conceive that we have the right to seek, in more remote senses, other translations of it. It is still more objectionable to effect this end by additions to the text of our own contrivance. To my mind, the precept recognises but two personages—the human being whose blood is being effused, and the Divine Being of whom man is the image. The question then presents itself—whose blood is that, the effusion of which is a consequence of the violence done to man's animal life? We reverently reply—His, of whom man is the type; and His, in that respect in which God has made man according to His image. We are to feel that the violence is as much done to the prototype as to the representative. Calvin was near, spiritually, to this rendering of the precept, when he remarked, as we noticed in our last number, that the "Divine Being doth here reveal the grounds of his care for the sacredness of human life, and [that] most sedulously should the doctrine of the passage be marked that no person can injure his neighbour but he injures God?"

We can hardly suppose that it will be contended that the pronoun must find its antecedent in some previous noun; and that, therefore, "of him," or "his," cannot refer to God. Such a rule would greatly embarrass translations from the Hebrew; which to some extent, like its writing wholly, as compared with ours, is an inverted language. In no language, however, though the noun may generally antecede its substitute, is it absolutely required to do so; of which, especially in poetry, we could cite numerous examples. That the precept is a poetical one, and is thus further distinguished from other parts of God's address to Noah and his sons, there can be little doubt, it having all the required parallelism of Hebrew poetry. I regard it as a stanza of four lines, or of two hi-membral ones; and giving it an English dress, in words as nearly literal as would allow it a metrical expression, I ask, would any one hesitate to consider Deity as the proper antecedent of the pronoun "His" in the second line of this version? If he does not, why should he hesitate so to consider Him in relation to the same pronoun in the original?

Where'er is shed man's vital blood,
In man, His blood will flow;
For, in His holy image, God
Made man His type below!

This appropriation of the pronoun is strengthened by the consideration that the Hebrew word an, eva, he, from which we derive the suffix y, nan, of him, or his, is often used to signify the Divine Being, independently of other designation, or, in the words of Bishop Lowth, "is often equivalent to the true and eternal God,<sup>1</sup> for which he cites Deut. 32: 39; 2 Kings 2: 14; Isaiah 43: 10, 13, and 48: 12; Jeremiah 14: 22, and especially Psalms 102: 27, where the original says sin transi, vate era—but thou art He!—

"Of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the work of thy hands. They shall perish, but thou shalt endure: yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment; as a vesture thou shalt change them, and they shall be changed: But thou art He, and thy years shall have no end!" Ps. 102: 25, 26, 27.

"The nameless He, whose nod is Nature's birth;
And Nature's shield, the shadow of His hand;
Her dissolution, His suspended smile;
The great First—Last!" YOUNG.

In conclusion of this investigation, I submit to the reader that the only safe construction we can give to the text is contained in the following literal rendering of it;—which offers an all-sufficient motive for the existence of the precept, in the now and important aspect in which it presents the offence of shedding the blood of man;—which avoids all questions touching the manner of punishing the offender, except as it necessarily intimates to man the use of death as a means;—which reconciles God's holy precept to his beneficent practice and example in the cases we have had before us;—and which makes harmonious the ancient copies of the precept, by rendering no longer important their different readings.

Shedding blood of the man—in man, blood of HIM will be shed—because in the image of GOD—HE made the man. ALEPH.

ALEPH.

REFLECTIONS ON THE USE OF SLAVE LABOUR PRODUCED: ADDRESSED TO THE MEMBERS OF THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

DEAR FRIENDS,—It is, I trust, by a measure of the love of the gospel which teaches, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them," that I take up my pen to address you on this subject. I would therefore entreat you to give my reflections an unprejudiced, candid and prayerful consideration; and I trust we shall be enabled to arrive together at the truth, when through. Our Society once stood foremost in opposition to Slavery, and we still profess to be opposed to it, as will be seen by reference to our 8th query,* viz: "Are friends careful to bear a testimony against Slavery?" which is answered annually in all our Monthly, Quarterly, and Yearly Meetings. Now let us come plainly to the query. Is our testimony against Slavery standing before the world in the light that it should be? Are we remembering that "so far as we are deficient in using our influence and authority to remedy this and other evils that abound, we become parties thereto in the divine sight?"† Are we exerting all our influence and authority to do away this great sin? Or have we lighted our candle, (or rather our forefathers for us,) and then, as it were, smothered it under a bushel?

When the world was in darkness on this subject, our Society laboured with its members to convince them of the iniquity of the system till it was made a disownable offence to hold slaves or hire them of their masters, and some of our worthy forefathers thought they could discern even in the midst of the gloom, that they were guilty of the sin, unless they endeavored to abstain from the use of the proceeds thereof. Amongst these John Woolman was conspicuous; so much so, that when he travelled amongst slaveholders, (many of whom were members of high standing in our Society,) he went on foot to show them an example of humility, and to avoid using their ungodly gains, and even then paid their house servants for their labour in attending him. What a noble example for Friends now-a-days! But where is this part of our testimony now? Is there not truth and justice in it? Was it all delusion in our ancient worthy friend? Let us see. We, as Friends, do not acknowledge the right of property in man, and we say every man has a right to his liberty—to the proceeds of his own labour—to his earnings: therefore, any person who takes a man's earnings from him without his consent, is a robber, and has no better than a robber's title thereto. And he who has no right to articles in his possession, can confer no right on another; for no one can give that which he has not, and if these articles should be sold and bought again, no one of the purchasers could have a better than a robber's title to confer upon another. Hence it appears that he who enforces the unrequited toil and receives the proceeds thereof, is robbing man of his liberty and his earnings, and the goods obtained thereby are plundered or prize goods, to which he has no better title than a highway or other robber has to his plunder. And those merchants who purchase them have no right to them, and we who purchase of them, are purchasing plundered goods, to which we can have no better title than a robber has to his booty, viz: superior force. Is this bearing a testimony against slavery? Is it not partaking in and supporting it? Suppose there were no consumers, how long would there be producers? If none would buy such plunder, would not slaveholders free their slaves, and pay them for their labour, and raise something they could sell? Hence, if there were no consumers of slave-labour produce, slavery would not exist. Suppose we were knowingly to purchase goods of a highway robber or night thief, would not we be guilty with him, and encourage him to continue his depredations? Just so with the Southern system of robbery. We are hiring the slaveholder to continue his plundering, and thereby forming one important link in the chain that binds down the Southern slave; without which the chain would be broken, and the system fall. We are a peculiar people, and have many peculiar testimonies to "bear." Let us compare this against Slavery, with some of our other Christian testimonies. That against drunkenness is carried so far, that we are required to be clear of importing, vending, distilling, and the unnecessary use of spirituous liquors; and many (I would gladly say all) are unwilling to sell our grain or fruit to be distilled, even if we should be offered a double price for it. Is our testimony against slavery carried thus far? If it were, would it not require us to deny ourselves of the fruits of oppression? In order to bear a faithful testimony against war, we not only forbid ourselves to train, but to give anything in lieu thereof, and by a late decision, we are not allowed to work the highway in lieu thereof, and some of us (I rejoice to say it) have suffered under imprisonment rather than countenance war by paying a master fine. Yea, and I would that there were more of those amongst us that would even suffer our luxuries to be fewer; our purses to become lighter, and our bodies to be less decorated, rather than countenance, support, and compromise with slavery. Now let us examine prize goods. What are prize goods? If I am not in error, they are those goods which are taken from an enemy in war, and our testimony against them is founded on their not belonging to those who are vending them, but to those of whom they were plundered by superior force, which cannot give right. Also it would be encouraging war and robbery to make use of the spoils thereof. And are not slave labour goods taken by the same unrighteous means—by superior power? Then they are virtually prize goods—the prize or spoil of the Southern despotic power, which is a system of continual war and plunder. The same as prize goods alluded to in our query, is the prize or spoil of a capture at sea. Should we not bear as faithful against one kind of prize goods as another? In order to bear a faithful testimony against a hireling ministry, we are forbidden to attend meetings and hear a paid preacher. And why? Because we are thereby giving him countenance. Very true. But are we not giving far more countenance to the slaveholder? Yea, even hiring him to his wickedness by paying him for the proceeds of his cruelty. Is teaching the gospel for filthy lucre's sake worse than trampling the gospel under foot for the same filthy lucre, and also twisting and torturing it, and calling it in to support the vilest system of iniquity, embracing oppression, robbery, adultery, and murder? Further, it is a disownable offence to attend the marriage of a member accomplished contrary to our discipline, because it is countenancing him in his breach of it. True again—but compare this with slavery, and are we not truly "straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel?" There are a great many other testimonies I might mention, but it is needless after what has been said. By our present discipline it is a disownable offence to hire slaves of their masters. Which would be the best, for us to go directly to the master and hire of him a slave to work for us and treat him kindly, work him moderately, and apply the proceeds of his labour to ourselves, or leave him with his master, who would treat him cruelly, and work him severely, and then go to the master and pay him for plundering the produce of the slave's labour from him? Is not the former the least inhuman? Yet it is a disownable offence, whilst the latter is scarcely thought of. Oh consistency! consistency! where art thou fled! Further, will slaveholders and others—will the world look upon us as bearing an honest and consistent testimony against slavery while we are using the proceeds? If not, our testimony is of no effect—is no testimony; as a man's precept amounts to nothing when counteracted by his example. Let us make one or two more comparisons, so as, if possible, to dispel the clouds that blind us. Suppose we had a slaveholder in the midst of us, that by hard driving, women whipping, and the numerous other evils of which the system is pregnant—could sell wheat, corn, and other produce, twenty, twenty-five, or even fifty per cent lower than his honest neighbours who pay their labourers, would we purchase of him rather than of them? Far from it. And is it any better to plunder in Georgia than here? Again, if we must have cotton, sugar, &c. grown by slaves, would it not be better for a company of Friends of Ohio, or perhaps several yearly meetings, to hire or purchase a parcel of slaves and secure a large tract of land in Texas or some other place, and send a superintendent and a number of overseers chosen out of our ministers and elders, or some other Friends of standing, who would treat the slaves humanely and plunder them of their earnings mercifully, than to trust them in the hands of tyrannical masters and brutal overseers who treat them inhumanly, disregard the sacred ties of marriage, and forbid them to read the Bible, &c.—would we not be adding to the cause of benevolence and humanity by so doing, and at the same time be bearing as faithful a testimony against slavery as by paying those brutal masters and overseers for plundering them? I am sorry to have to write this, but the truth must come, and cannot be suppressed always. Now I trust that we clearly see that it is morally and religiously wrong to use the produce of slavery, and that we cannot say that we bear a consistent or faithful testimony against slavery or prize goods, while we are in the habit of buying up the slaveholder's booty. Perhaps some will say we see it is supporting slavery, but it will do no good for us to quit using such goods, it is therefore not expedient now to quit, until we can see some good it will do. I would answer if it is wrong to make use of such goods, it is right that we should cease immediately. It is always expedient to do right. But for the sake of the credulous let us examine the expediency thereof. Suppose all who are opposed to slavery would abstain from the use of the polluted goods, would not a demand immediately be created for paid labour products? and so the slaveholder would see his interest would be to liberate his slaves and raise such produce? If all can do so much we can each of us do something—and if we do not use "our influence," we are accountable in the divine sight. Besides, by such a cross (for it would be a cross) the subject would be continually in our minds, and our prayers would ascend much more frequently in behalf of the oppressed. In short, we would be bearing an honest, true, and FEELING testimony. Some will say they cannot get along without the fruits of oppression. To such I will acknowledge, that we cannot live so cheaply, dress so finely, and make so splendid a show in the world; but this at least should not be the object of Friends particularly, when it must be done at the expense of conscience, as full purses, rich tables, and fine apparel are poor things at best, and extremely so when at the expense of a doubly guilty conscience. But I presume we will none of us claim that we cannot live without the aid of robbery and oppression, without exposing ourselves to more hardships and suffering than the helpless slave whom we plunder. If there are any such, to them I would say, read "American Slavery as it is," and then at least let not us Friends live by plunder, till we are in a more suffering condition than those of whom we plunder.

It may also be objected that we cannot keep entirely clear thereof. True, but because we have to get the soles of our shoes in the mud, shall we wade clear into the slough and mire? Neither can we keep altogether clear of war while we are paying taxes to the support of our country and voting for officers who take an oath to support the country by the force of arms, (which is, in fact, the support of our civil authority,) but that is no reason why we should pay fines or even work the roads in lieu of tithing. So with slavery. If we cannot keep entirely clear of the proceeds thereof, let us be careful to avoid at least the luxuries, such as rice, sugar, coffee, &c. And should we not avoid even the comforts, when we remember that the slaves have to suffer far more to produce them, than we would have to in order to do without them. Is it not the force of example and habit, that makes us cling so closely to these sin-stained goods, as the Scribes and Pharisees were wont to cling to their traditions, and thereby make the commandments of God of none effect? Let us individually examine the secret springs of our actions on this subject, and see if filthy lucre is not also more or less concerned therein—that love of money, which the apostle saith is the root of all evil, and which appears to be devouring the vitals of our once highly favored society.

Now dear friends, in conclusion, let me again entreat you to give this subject that candid, grateful and unprejudiced consideration which its importance demands. With desires that the Lord will deal mercifully, not only with the down-trodden slaves and their cruel oppressors, but also with us who, with more light, are supporting the system—

I remain,

Truly and affectionately,

Your well-wishing friend,

For the Non-Slaveholder.

REMARKS ON SLAVEHOLDING AS PRACTISED BY EARLY FRIENDS.

"If early Friends held slaves, without being apparently conscious of its impropriety, why should modern slaveholders be charged with iniquity in practising it?"

This question, I believe, has embarrassed the minds of many Friends, particularly the younger part of Society, and is entitled to consideration. In relation to it I answer as follows:

First. The concerned and consistent part of Society never held slaves in the sense and manner in which it is now practised in the slaveholding States.

Secondly. A large number of ancient Friends never held slaves.

Thirdly. The remainder, who constituted the only real slaveholders among Friends, cannot be adduced in favour of the slavery argument, as they were lamentably degenerate in other respects.

Fourthly. In extenuation of the more consistent part of Society who held slaves, it may be remarked, that the iniquitous manner in which they were abstracted from their native country was carefully concealed, by misrepresentations made to remove scruples from those who otherwise might refuse to purchase them.

In relation to the first proposition it may be remarked, that there were numerous convictions among the slaveholders in the West India Islands at a very early period. It appears they immediately commenced practising upon the great leading principles of our Society. Regarding their slaves as human beings, equally with themselves the objects of Divine regard, they took them to meetings, and also appointed religious meetings among them. It is worthy of remembrance, that the first persecution endured by Friends in Barbadoes, was for this faithful discharge of their duty to the human beings under their care.

No doubt there were many other such Friends in these then colonies, whose names and whose humane deportment have together passed from human record: but this class may be fairly represented by such characters as Warner Mifflin, his father, — Mifflin, Dorcas Lilley, Samuel Nottingham, and other kindred spirits.

When Warner Mifflin, then a young man, called in his slaves to furnish them with evidences of their manumission, one of them affectingly expostulated with him thus: "Mr. Mifflin, why do you wish to emancipate me? I now enjoy all the freedom I ask. I work only when I am able, and when I am sick my kind mistress waits upon me herself."

Dorcas Lilley was a native of one of the West India Islands. Speaking of her two or three female slaves, she says: "I performed for them such services as they were not able to do for themselves; and in return, they performed such more laborious acts as I was incapable of. We lived as one family, and I loved them as my own children."

Samuel Nottingham and wife, of Barbadoes, manumitted a large number of slaves, and also conveyed to them an extensive plantation for their support.

A paragraph in the Autobiography of Warner Mifflin evinces that many ancient Friends held slaves by a very different tenure from that by which they are held at the present day. He says: "About this time I was appointed on a committee to labour with the members of our society who held slaves, in order for the conviction of their understandings, of the inconsistency of the practice with Christianity; which labours were so far blest, that in a little time most of our members liberated their slaves." I am willing to inquire what would be the probable effects of similar labours on the slaveholding members of any other society at the present day!

The subject of human slavery had so earnestly engaged the attention of early Friends, that in the year 1696, only about fifteen years after the settlement of Pennsylvania by Wm. Penn, it became a Yearly Meeting concern, which resulted in advising Friends to guard against the future importation of slaves, and to be particularly attentive to those then in their power. Such advice could not have issued from a pro-slavery Yearly Meeting; and it gives plain evidence that the great fundamental principles, "to do to others as we would have them do to us," was influencing an important portion of the leading members of that Yearly Meeting.

In the year 1715, the same Yearly Meeting renewed and confirmed the advice issued in 1696. In the year 1737 it issued another address, from which the following is an extract:

"And you, dear friends, who, by inheritance, have slaves born in your families, we beseech you to consider them as souls committed to your trust, whom the Lord will require at your hands; and let it be your constant care to watch over them for good, instructing them in the fear of the Lord. * * * * * And so train them up, that if you should come to behold their unhappy situation in the same light that many worthy men who are at rest have done, and as many of your brethren now do, and should think it your duty to set them free, they may be the more capable of making a right use of their liberty."

In the year 1730, Elihu Coleman, of Nantucket, published a treatise on the injustice and inconsistency of importing and holding slaves. Between the years 1680 and 1700, Thomas Burling was in the practice of introducing the subject annually into the Yearly Meeting on Long Island.

In the year 1688 the Friends of Germantown Meeting, Pennsylvania, addressed a memorial to the Yearly Meeting against the buying and keeping of negroes.

The following is an extract from the Records of Nantucket Monthly Meeting:

26th day of y<sup>e</sup> 9th mo., 1716.

"An epistle from the last Quarterly Meeting was read in this; and y<sup>e</sup> matter refer'd to this meeting, viz.: whether it is agreeable to truth for Friends to purchase slaves, and keep them term of life, was considered, and the sense and judgment of this meeting is; that it is not agreeable to truth for Friends to purchase slaves and hold them term of life."

From the tenor of this minute it would appear, that the Monthly Meeting was unanimous; and also, that the Quarterly Meeting had previously been exercised on the same account. Additional testimony might be adduced to show the exercise and concern, even at a very early period, of the consistent part of society on account of this unrighteous practice.

A review of the history of slavery, as practised in our society, and also a review of the exercises of Friends, both as individuals and in meeting capacities, are sufficient evidences that there never was a time when many of the concerned part of Society were not exercised on account of this iniquitous practice. And I would affectionately invite the attention of the younger part of Society more especially, to the foregoing exposition of the state of slavery, as practised by Friends, and compare its merciful condition with the following unmerciful enactments found in many of the statute books of the slaveholding States:—Against learning slaves to read,—against manumitting them, unless sent out of the State,—authorizing the maiming or killing a suspected fugitive, if he refuses to surrender himself to his pursuers,—imprisoning a free coloured man on suspicion, and selling him into slavery to pay jail fees,—disallowing the sanctity of the marriage covenant,—disallowing the testimony of any number of coloured persons in a court of justice against the misdemeanor of a white man, however atrocious it may be,—also, the practice of slaveholders selling their own children into slavery, and rearing children for market, as other farmers do the brutes of the field.

I think the foregoing evidences will sustain, to a considerable extent, my first proposition,—that the concerned and consistent part of society never did hold slaves in the sense and manner in which slavery is practised in the present day, nor as it was practised by other people generally.

2d Proposition. In support of this, John Woolman, in a letter to Nantucket Friends, remarks in commendation, that they had few or no slaves. Friends were very numerous there. When Samuel Fothergill visited them in 1757, they numbered fifteen hundred; whether children were included was not stated. J. Woolman's letter was written about twenty years afterwards. J. Woolman, on another occasion, alludes to a large body of Friends in Cape Creek Monthly Meeting, North Carolina who had few or no slaves.

In a review of his travels through the Colonies about the year 1752, S. Fothergill frequently alludes to the state of our society in connection with the subject of slavery. He speaks of its deteriorating influence on Friends in Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina. And although there is no doubt many slaves were held in Pennsylvania by members, still, from the manner of his speaking of Friends there, I cannot avoid the conclusion that there were many whose hands were clear of the guilt of human slavery. He writes: "I cannot but hope in that province, (Pennsylvania,) particularly in the City of Philadelphia, it may be said, Truth prospers; and there is a prospect that the succeeding generation may excel the last."

As to the probable proportion of non-slaveholding Friends in the Colonies at the time to which we are alluding, history is silent; but the few incidents that have, as it were, accidentally descended to us, are sufficient to warrant the conclusion, that in every Yearly Meeting then established there were living witnesses that were faithful in the support of our testimony against oppression; some few testifying orally or by publications, but the far greater number, no doubt, by the effective influence of private example.

3d Proposition. That class that constituted the real slaveholders among Friends, being imbued with the spirit of oppression, cannot be adduced in support of the slavery argument, as they were lamentably degenerate in other respects. S. Fothergill, in 1756, says:

"Maryland is poor; the gain of oppression, the price of blood is upon that province; I mean their purchasing and keeping in slavery, negroes—the ruin of true religion the world over, wherever it prevails. Friends there are greatly decreased in numbers. * * * I know not more than two ministers in the province on whom is the heavenly stamp visible, and they are neither negro-keepers nor priest-payers. This very much describes also the state of Virginia; only I think I may add, the visitation of Divine truth seems more effectually renewed in various parts of this province than the former, and a spring of living ministry to edification."

"There are a great many Friends in North Carolina, contiguous to Virginia, some truly valuable Friends, but few;—they have been a lively people, but negro purchasing comes more and more in use among them, and the pure life of religion will for ever proportionably decay."

"Long Island contains a great body of Friends, some truly valuable, but the more aged have not walked as bright examples; the leaders of the people have caused them to err. I visited this Island four times, and left it at last with a pained heart, to which the want of a hopeful prospect of things being better greatly contributed."

The degeneracy of Friends on Long Island, at that time, is not expressly attributed to the influence of slavery. But it may be remarked, that there were few parts of the country where slavery took a firmer hold than on Long Island; and Friends fell into the practice and continued it till a very late period. It was not made a disownable offence till about 1776, only about eight years anterior to the establishment of a similar discipline in North Carolina, and was interdicted mostly by the influence of the younger members.

John Woolman, in alluding to the influence of slavery on the minds of Friends, says that where it has got in among them, a spirit of fierceness appears to prevail.

A valuable ancient Friend, speaking of the low state of Society in those early times, says, within his recollection it was no uncommon thing to see Friends of good standing mounted on their horses at vendues and other public places, and pushing them to their utmost exertion, on trial of their speed as pacers; and other Friends, occupying responsible stations in Society, looking on, and enjoying the sport, without any apparent consciousness of its impropriety. But the fact that such degenerate practices were found among portions of Society is no evidence of their propriety; and by parity of reasoning, the existence of slavery during the period to which I have alluded, is no evidence that it then was or that it now is under any circumstances justifiable in the Divine sight.

We may, therefore, I think, safely arrive at the conclusion, that the real slaveholders among Friends—those few who held slaves as they are held by religious professors of the present day,—were lamentably degenerate in other respects, and their example, therefore, affords no apology for modern slavery. This class would neither manumit their slaves in accordance with the dictates of truth in their own minds, nor yield to the religious labours of those Friends who were concerned on account of this unrighteous practice, but subjected themselves to disownment, rather than be just to their fellow men and faithful to their God. And though there was a considerable number in the aggregate disowned, still, the fact that the main body of Friends voluntarily emancipated their negroes, even before there was any discipline on the subject, is a strong evidence that oppression and cruelty did not generally prevail among them.

Admitting that a large number of Friends in America did, at one time, hold slaves, the question presents, what was the operating cause that induced or procured their emancipation? I trust it was nothing less than a voluntary obedience to the manifestation of Divine truth upon the mind; for at that time there was no discipline against it. As our society revived from the degeneracy into which it had lapsed, and became faithful in other respects, so it simultaneously cleared itself from this stain upon its holy profession; and as the Divine Being manifested his disapprobation of the unrighteous practice to our early, faithful Friends, we have no reason to doubt the same disapprobation would have been manifested to every slaveholder in America, if they had been equally faithful to previous intimations of duty, and equally solicitous to know the mind of truth, and to obey it.

4th Proposition. As it is admitted that some valuable Friends did hold slaves, what can be said in extenuation of their practice? I answer, that at that time great pains were taken by slave importers to induce the inhabitants to believe that the purchasing of African negroes was part of a pure system of benevolence; that such negroes were war captives, who would have been massacred in conformity to the barbarous custom of their country, were it not that these humane slave-dealers kindly interfered and rescued them from destruction. These misrepresentations, no doubt, had an influence in reconciling Friends to the purchasing of negroes; but I am induced to believe that the greater part of this class of Friends inherited their slaves, or came into Society by conviction while in possession of them, and did not immediately perceive, that however humane their own treatment might be, still, their example was a countenance and support to others of an opposite character, and constituted a portion of the great system or framework of human oppression: and although such Friends, at least for a time, were deficient in that perspicacious view, for which Friends were subsequently distinguished, still, it must be admitted, that slavery, as practised by them, was divested of its most odious features, and so essentially mitigated as to exist more in name than in reality. These Friends, in the language of the Philadelphia Address, appeared to consider themselves as stewards, for the proper discharge of whose duties they were to give an account. The readiness with which they emancipated their slaves, entirely disallows the imputation that the guilt of oppression and cruelty rested upon them. When we read of Warner Mifflin's father having manumitted one hundred slaves, valued probably at not less than fifteen thousand dollars, and many other similar noble examples, not from compulsion, but because it was sinful in the Divine sight, I think we may rest assured that the good seed in them was approaching towards a state of maturity. We will not, therefore, deny that a few concerned Friends held slaves; but we deny that they ever held them otherwise than in the spirit of kindness; and as far as the light of history discovers, they held them but temporarily. There were extenuating circumstances then, to which I have alluded, and which do not now exist.

I think, therefore, we have substantial evidences to support my first proposition, that the concerned part of Society never held slaves in the manner in which slavery is now practised; but on the other hand, if their example were followed by modern slaveholders, the evils of slavery would not only be essentially mitigated immediately, but the entire practice would be speedily abolished.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

SOUTH DARTMOUTH, 4th mo. 17th, 1847.

To William Lloyd Garrison.

Highly Esteemed Friend:—Though others may strenuously deny the right, justice, utility, and practicability of a thorough reform in our religious, political, and commercial intercourse, yet I am quite sure that thou wilt ever be the firm supporter of any and every reformation, provided thou art convinced that it has for its fundamental and ultimate object, the eventual downfall of tyrants, the best good of the human family, the moral and spiritual elevation of man.

To whatever has a tendency to make man more consistent in his acts as a Christian, a philanthropist and a benefactor, thou, being fully apprised of the same, wilt speedily give thy countenance. Having promised this much, I now shall examine some of the arguments adduced for and against the use of slave-labour products. In the first place, then, permit me to allude to a paragraph which appeared in an article on the "Products of Slave Labour," last month in the Liberator.

In speaking of using cotton, sugar and rice, thou informest us that "these are all good—the gifts of a beneficent Creator;" and thou then draws the inference that "they may be innocently used by those who abhor oppression, who are earnestly endeavoring to overthrow it, and who maintain that the laborer is worthy of his hire, and innocently by no other persons." Now I presume that no one in the possession of rationality will pretend to doubt that cotton is cotton, sugar is sugar, and rice is rice, though, in my opinion, every highly intelligent and strictly consistent abolitionist will question his rectitude of conduct, when he knowingly joins hands with the tyrannical slaveholder by voluntarily consenting to purchase the productions of the unpaid toil of the poor degraded slave. It is evident that all the productions which the earth affords being made subservient to his convenience and happiness by proper use, man may innocently partake of, provided they are not "the price of blood;" the products of oppression. If by any act of mine, which I foresee and can obviate, I cause my brother man to be, either directly or indirectly, injured in person or property, most surely I cannot be considered blameless in the sight of my Heavenly Father and of man. This self-evident truth being admitted, let us for a moment examine the relation which the consumer sustains to the producer. Now whatever has a tendency to cripple the energies of the producer, is felt directly by the consumer, and vice versa. Consequently we cannot destroy the interests of the one class, without usually exterminating those of the other also. The question then assumes this appearance, viz. Shall the interests of the slaveholder, who claims to be the producer, be sustained, or shall the interests of the slave, who is the real producer, be secured? If the interests of the slaveholder be not sustained, will he and the slave starve, and will the non-growing cotton, sugar and rice States be deprived of these simple necessities? As it relates to the slaveholder, I think that he would certainly be reduced to comparatively indigent circumstances, and his present wealth, "in chattels personal," would be of little or no value to him, inasmuch as there would be no way for him to obtain ready money, if the consumer should cease to purchase those staples which have been produced by the extorted and unrequited toil of those whom he now rules with a rod of iron. As it pertains to the condition of the slave, I think it must appear evident, on a moment's reflection, that his condition would be changed for the better; his circumstances would be greatly improved, from the fact that he would be deprived of none of the comforts which he now enjoys; but he would retain all the resources which he now possesses, and also, in a great measure, be freed from that terrible pressure of unremitted toil to which he is now subjected by the mercenary spirit of his cruel task-masters.

Can the non-slaveholding States be supplied with cotton, sugar and rice, independent of slave labour? I answer in the affirmative. There are at present many persons, both in the Society of Friends, and among other denominations, who are supplied with these articles independent of slave labour. Now as abstainers increase in number, the demand for free labour produce will be greater. Consequently there will be a greater effort on the part of the producer to supply the demand; and the direct result would be this, that all the free negroes in the slave states would receive employment, and there would be many plantations conducted wholly by freemen. One slaveholder after another, seeing that there was a decreasing demand for his slave labour productions, would, as a matter of interest and policy, liberate his slaves and hire them to labour on his plantations. At present, owing to the imperfections of existing operations, these articles cost the consumer a trifle more than the slave grown productions, but those convinced of the necessity of abstaining from slave labour productions, will not hesitate to pay the difference. But would the slaveholder be injured in person on account of the penury to which he might possibly be subjected? Most certainly not, inasmuch as he would have simple justice meted out to him. Would he be injured in property? By no means, as it would appear that he has been a usurper, and actually possessed no property—there being no such recognition in the Divine Will as tenure of man by man. We have already shown that the condition of the slave would be incomparably better. Now what valid argument can he, who purchases of the slave's master, or his agent, the products of the slave's unpaid toil, the proceeds of oppression, "the price of blood," adduce in support of this practice? Will he pretend that he can do it knowingly, and yet "innocently"? Will he make a wardrobe of this "price of blood," and warm and comfort himself with it? Will he satisfy his appetite with those products which bleeding humanity has brought to the shambles? I care not if he is the Presiding Elder of the Sanhedrim; his exalted station and merited position only make him the more responsible for his acts. I repudiate the doctrine that the priests can do those acts, and be blameless, which are morally unlawful for the laity to do. We see no valid reason why the abolitionists may "innocently" partake of slave labour productions, while at the same time those cannot who are not abolitionists. I think that the abolitionists are not quite ready to construe that portion of the scripture, viz.: "the laborer is worthy of his hire," to mean, that the slaves of the South may "innocently" contribute to the support of the abolitionists of the North. I do not wish to be understood to declare that I consider slave labour productions contaminated; but, on the contrary, I am of the opinion that slave labour productions in themselves, abstractly considered, are as free from contamination as free labour productions are. So, in my opinion, money, in itself considered abstractly, cannot be contaminated. The contamination and sin lie in the responsibility which we take upon ourselves, when we knowingly purchase slave labour productions, and, also, know the direct result of such purchase. The money which the Doctors Chalmers, Cunningham and Candlish received from the slaveholders was no more contaminated than the same sum would have been, provided the editor of the Liberator should have received it in lieu of his paper; and it is highly probable that these doctors carried to Scotland some of the identical money which William L. Garrison, myself and others have exchanged for slave labour productions. But the manner in which these hypocritical doctors received the money, also the fact of whom they received it, knowing, as they well did, that it was "the price of blood," the spoils of woe and misery, together with the fact, that in receiving it, they were well aware that they were joining hands with oppressors, constitute their heinous sin in the sight of high Heaven and of man. If it be conceded that abolitionists can "innocently" purchase and use slave labour productions, which I do not admit, then it must follow, as a necessary sequence, that they may purchase these productions either after they have been transmitted through several hands, or directly purchase them from the slaveholder, as, in either case, the direct result of such purchase is to sustain the slaveholder in his nefarious business. Now if the slaveholder sees meet to give the money which he receives from the abolitionists to Doctors Chalmers, Cunningham and Candlish, for the purpose of enabling them to build a Free Church, I think the abolitionist who declares it to be right, just, and innocent for him to traffic with the slaveholder, to purchase and use his ill-gotten goods, should be the last person to find fault with these doctors for receiving of the slaveholder, as a free gift, the identical money which the abolitionists "innocently," and of course justly, paid him, inasmuch as this traffic is voluntary on the part of the abolitionist, there being no urgent necessity, such as hunger, starvation, or even deprivation of cotton, sugar and rice, to compel the American abolitionist to purchase these slave-produced articles. Perhaps there may be an objection urged against my position, that the money which these Scottish doctors received from the slaveholders, was comparatively of little or no importance; but that the pernicious influence which they exerted in consenting to receive the money was of the most alarming character. Now, if this objection is valid as urged against these sci-diant divines, it certainly must be valid as urged against those abolitionists who consent voluntarily to purchase slave labour productions, and even consent, in particular cases, to purchase slaves.

Using the argument of the objector, I would say, that the money which the slaveholders receive of the abolitionists is comparatively of little or no importance; but the truly pernicious influence which these abolitionists exert in consenting voluntarily to traffic with slaveholders, to purchase their fraudulently obtained goods and chattels personal, is, according to the validity of the argument of the objector, of the most alarming character. I am aware that very many of the slave-produced articles are so inextricably interlocked with free labour manufactures, that it would be quite impossible to detect and separate them. Still there are very many articles which we can for a certainty detect: and we are commanded to do those things which we discover to be plain and imperative, not those things which are mystical and uncertain. There are hundreds of bales of free labour cotton annually produced in the slave States; and with the concentrated and united action of the abolitionists, there might be such inducements offered to the free yeomanry of the South, that thousands of bales of free labour cotton would be produced. We will suppose that in all the states of the Union, there are 100,000 abolitionists; now the cultivation of cotton, sugar and rice which these would annually need, would employ at least 30,000 slaves. I would inquire what philanthropic abolitionist there is, who would not make some exertion and sacrifice, both of time and treasure, to relieve or lighten the burden of these 30,000 of our fellow beings, by "earnestly endeavoring" to obtain free labour cotton, sugar and rice? We are told that it is impossible to receive these articles even divested of slave labour. We answer such an untruthful assertion by saying that it is quite possible to obtain said articles, from the well known fact, that many abstainers do, at the present time, receive them divested of slave labour. But suppose we could receive them only by, and through, the unrequited toil of the slave. Is the editor of the Liberator prepared to declare that he himself, who was first in many particulars, and is now foremost in pleading the wrongs of 3,000,000 of God's degraded children, would purchase these articles of the mercenary merchant, who is but the indirect agent of the man-stealing, woman-whipping, and cradle-robbing Southerner? I have supposed that "no union with slaveholders," most emphatically meant "no union with slaveholders," to which doctrine I fully subscribe. But it appears by thy remarks that abolitionists, at least, may have commercial union with them, and be blameless, or that they may "innocently" purchase and use "the price of blood" quod seduct they "are earnestly endeavoring to overthrow oppression." Now, in my opinion, the advancing of such doctrine as this, is one step in advance of the gross inconsistency of the hypocritical Jews; for, notwithstanding they very willingly consented to give "pieces of silver," to secure the seizure of Jesus, yet, when it was returned to them, they seemed to have some conscience about the use of it. Whereas a sterling abolitionist may consent to give "pieces of money or silver," in lieu for "the price of blood," and yet can have no compunctions of conscience relative to the act, but may "innocently use" it. God forbid that the abolitionists of America, and Wm. L. Garrison in particular, should subscribe to the doctrine that the products, obtained by the extorted toil of bleeding humanity, can be, knowingly and yet "innocently," purchased and used by them or him. Thou makes the assertion that "it is, perhaps, somewhat singular that this zeal for total abstinence from slave grown productions, is almost exclusively confined to the Society of Friends;" again, thou asserts in thy passing notice to Lea W. Gause, that the "non-abstainers (abstainers, I suppose thou meant,) were chiefly Friends," and adds that "its peculiarity is worthy of interrogation as to how it happens." Thou closes thy first article by saying that thou hast "too many practical measures to carry forward, to be willing to have thy own attention or desirous that the attention of others should be diverted to one of, at least, such doubtful and inferior character."

Now I think that such language as the preceding, at best, is very singular, and I shall put no construction upon it, but shall simply say in passing, that the doctrines which Jesus of Nazareth and the Apostles promulgated, appeared, perhaps, "somewhat singular" to the Jewish doctors and wise men of the East; and they no doubt considered that they were too busily engaged in "carrying forward too many practical measures to suffer their attention to be diverted" to a command "of at least such doubtful and inferior character," as "cease to do evil, and learn to do well," that is, cease to uphold slavery by abstaining from the "use" of slave labour productions, and learn to do well by earnestly endeavoring to persuade others to abstain.

There have been a thousand "singular" things which have transpired in past time, and perhaps no little thing is more "singular" and worthy of notice than that William L. Garrison should consent to seize upon the grammatical errors of one individual, and accuse the Society in general of the same, when he well knows that Friends, as writers and authors, are as grammatically correct as himself. Being a constant reader of the Liberator, and an ardent admirer of the usual clear mindedness of its editor; also, being wholly unaware of possessing a more fastidious mind than most men, I am free to assert, that it would have been much more congenial to my feelings, and, in my opinion, in better consonance with the truly capacious mind of William Lloyd Garrison, if he had either positively refused to reply to our friend Lea W. Gause, or else had endeavored to show him in a false position in sentiment if possible, rather than to have attacked his grammatical errors, and then, through him, to have irrelevantly made the Society of Friends a target at which to hurl the grammatical errors of some of its members. All of which I most respectfully submit, and desire thee to publish in the Liberator as soon as convenient. Also, I submit an extract from Virgil, which I consider to be a just representation of weeping and wailing humanity in the southern prison house of bondage, which may truly be compared to the Shades of Erebus; and we unto those who do not do every thing in their power, however trifling it may be, to open the gates and batter down the walls of oppression, to the end that the oppressed may go free.

*"Continuo audite voces, vagitus et ingens,
Infantum que animas lentes in limine praece:
Quos dulcis vita exsortes, et ab ubere raptos
Abstulit atra dies, et funera mersit acerbo."*

Very respectfully and sincerely,
Thy Friend,

WM. HENRY HENRY.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

"Is not this the fast that I have chosen, to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke?"—Isaiah lvi. 6.

On this passage Adam Clarke, whose commentary is, doubtless, held in high repute among the Methodists in the South, as well as elsewhere, has the following note:

"How can any nation pretend to fast or worship God at all, or dare to profess that they believe in the existence of such a Being, while they carry on what is called the slave trade; and traffic in the souls and bodies of men! O ye most flagitious of knaves, and worst of hypocrites, cast off at once the mask of religion; and deepen not your endless perdition by professing the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ while ye continue in this traffic!"

CONVERSATIONAL REMARK OF DR. JOHNSON, IN 1766.—"To omit for a year, or for a day, the most efficacious method of advancing Christianity, in compliance with any purposes that terminate on this side of the grave, is a crime of which I know not that the world has yet had an example, except in the practice of the planters of America, a race of mortals, whom, I suppose, no other man wishes to resemble."

Dr. Johnson, being asked by Boswell why he left off drinking wine, replied, "Why, Sir, because it is so much better for a man to be sure that he is never to be intoxicated—never to lose the power over himself." It is interesting to mark this adoption, at so early a date, of a conclusion at which Temperance Societies slowly arrived; by a man, too, who, though possessed of a strong mind, had also strong appetites. On another occasion he remarked, "I now no more think of drinking wine than a horse does. The wine upon the table is no more for me than for the dog that is under the table."

In entire kindness I would commend the sentiment to the readers of the Non-Slaveholder. There is certain safety from drunkenness in total abstinence from all that can intoxicate. All the pleasures of appetite are nothing, when balanced against even the slightest risk of becoming a drunkard. And when we reflect that the drunkard can never reform, or the reformed inebriate remain so, except by keeping out of his mouth that which will renew his appetite, is not a strong incitement presented to the Christian philanthropist, to act out, for the general benefit, the apostle's noble principle, "Wherefore if meat cause my brother to offend, I will eat no meat while the world standeth, lest I cause my brother to offend?"

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, NINTH MONTH 1, 1847.

REFLECTIONS ON THE USE OF SLAVE LABOUR PRODUCE.—The communication bearing this title in our present number, was sent by the writer, accompanied by the information that it appeared in a western paper, about three years since, with the exception of some alterations made upon it, which are included in its present form. He suggests that most of the ideas expressed in it have already appeared in the Non-Slaveholder, in some form or other, and he therefore wholly submits the article to our disposal, as to its publication, partially or entire. We are glad to receive it, and cheerfully give it its fullest insertion. The duty of disusing the products of violence ought to be an accepted truism with all the followers of a peaceful Messiah; and yet, as in respect to other Christian truths, equally clear, which have to be pressed upon the often-unwilling attention of those who should be their instant and grateful receivers, so in respect to this—"precept must be upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little, and there a little;"—until "by the foolishness of preaching," men are brought to a heartfelt conviction and reception of the truth.

We think our friend has well illustrated his subject, and presented it in some new lights—not only inviting the attention of those to whom his reflections are particularly addressed, but of all others who desire to know the truth, and are willing to be obedient to it.

SLAVEHOLDING IN THE SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.—We think our esteemed friend, to whom we are indebted for the remarks in this month's journal on the subject of slaveholding as practised by early Friends, has given us an accurate, and to the Society of Friends a very honourable, statement of the circumstances which belong to it. The practice of slaveholding was, obviously, not a prevailing one among those who were to be regarded as consistent members of this religious society. On the contrary, there were but few of that character in it who did hold slaves, and they quickly yielded to the concern of their better informed friends, and to the insinuating sense of right, which has never tolerated slaveholding when its character has come to be justly appreciated. The more numerous of its slaveholding members were inconsistent with the principles of the Society in other respects. Those of them who yielded to the entreaties of the body, gave probable evidence in doing so of their improved general condition; and those who suffered disownment, of their general departure from a Christian life and conversation—"they went out from us, but they were not of us."

Considering the pains taken by interested persons to spread the idea that the slave-trade was a means of saving the lives of the subjects of it, by rescuing them from a death which, as prisoners of war, would have otherwise been their fate, it is remarkable that Friends were not betrayed, by this commonly accredited suggestion, into a greater purchase and use of slaves than appears to have been their case. To the extent that such slaves were held by Friends, there is no doubt that their treatment, in general, was kind and moral, and that pains were taken to educate them in Christian truths. But they rightly judged that no kindness to the slave could justify the connection of slave and master, and they, therefore, in respect to their own members, wisely severed it.

During this slaveholding period, Friends generally had but little external connection with slavery. The farmer usually raised all the products necessary to him for food and clothing. A few pounds of West India sugar, where the maple tree or bee-hive did not furnish an equivalent or substitute, and a very few pounds of coffee, when he indulged in that luxury, formed his annual demand for those products, and all that he usually bought, in which was the hand of the slave. The townsman was undoubtedly a larger debtor to the slave's toil, in sugar, rice, coffee, and—shall we add?—tobacco, but his chief articles of clothing were of silk, wool and flax, which were the products of free toil. The inroads of luxury, first fingering the town, then the country, has since brought coffee and sugar into very general use, instead of a merely occasional, and very limited use, and superseded home-spun productions by imported fabrics, of which slave cotton, rendered easy of application to manufactures by the invention of Arkwright, forms an important element. Out of these changes has grown up a vast commerce in the productions of slave labour; and in this commerce, and in the use of these productions, Friends, in good standing in the church, are at this day large participants.

We can now very readily see that if when Friends perceived the evil of slaveholding, and sought to avoid an accountability for any participation in it, they had done so, not by substituting free for slave labour, but by encouraging their neighbours to hold slaves, instead of holding slaves themselves, by buying from these neighbours the products of the labour of their slaves, to the same amount of slave productions they had before used, their moral condition would not have been a whit improved; but in the degree that this buying from their neighbours would have occasioned severer exactions of labour than they would have required themselves from their own slaves, it would have been deteriorated; whilst the sum of human slavery would have been undiminished, and its inflictions of wrong increased. Would we concede to Friends so proceeding a character for piety, humanity, intelligence, or even sincerity?

In this view, the question often presents itself to our minds—which is the better moral position, that of slaveholding Friends contributing in the small degree which these did to the existence of slavery, but holding chiefly under their own parental guardianship the slaves toiling for their comfort, or that of modern Friends, professedly non-slaveholding, who cause slavery to exist by their use of its products to a far greater rateable amount than did the former, and with attending cruelties, beyond their control, occasioning a constant and vast exhaustion of human life?

THE SLAVE POWER IN THE FREE STATES.—We gave in our last number a brief statement of the unlawful removal, as a slave, of a coloured woman from the Falls, or Village of Niagara, made free by the voluntary act of her claimant in bringing her into the State of New York, and of injuries done to the persons and estates of other coloured individuals, who interfered, or were suspected to have interfered, in her behalf. We gave also a report of the case of the Brazilian slaves, delivered, on a hearing before Judge Daly, under a writ of habeas corpus, to their claimant, Captain da Costa, on the plea that such delivery was demanded by the "obvious meaning and intent" of the provisions of our treaty with Brazil, though by the statute law of New York the individuals were free: this decision, in effect, remanding them into slavery. We adduced these facts, and might have presented many others equally flagrant, as going to show that on the side of the oppressors of this stripped and abused people, there was power;—a power reaching far beyond the territorial limits within which slavery can constitutionally exist as a legal institution.

Much of this power resides in the influence of the pecuniary and commercial interchanges which are constantly taking place between the slaveholding and non-slaveholding divisions of our country, and between foreign slaveholding countries and the free portions of our own, making it the personal interest of the (nominal) non-slaveholder to sustain slavery, either generally, or in some particular relation directly affecting his individual comfort. The interchanges which take place between these divisions of our own country, many of them consisting of very small advantages, but all of them important in the estimation of the persons receiving them, may be termed the commercial bond, in contradistinction to the political union which connects these States. To the extent that this bond would remain, were the parchment torn into a thousand atoms on which the union is inscribed, would its influence and effects remain in unimpaired vigour.

It was in subjection to the vast power of which this influence is creative, that the house of Lewis Tappan, of New York, was rifled some years since, and its contents burned in the streets of that emporium—that the eloquent Thompson was driven from the commercial hotel, at which he first took lodgings on his arrival in our country, and was subsequently hunted through it, and from it, as a beast of prey—that a mob of "gentlemen of property and standing," paraded William Lloyd Garrison through the streets of Boston with a halter round his neck—that a large assemblage of "respectable" Philadelphians, with a competent municipality to have suppressed far greater outbreaks, gave a tacit assent to the act of a few desperadoes by whom that beautiful edifice, the Pennsylvania Hall, was burned to the ground—and that wrongs without number, or remedy, have been done in the free States, against the friends of freedom, and in favour of slavery. Time would fail to enumerate them.

Of the existence of this power the slaveholder is well aware, when, fully knowing that no slave breathing the air of the free States with consent of his master, can be longer legally held as a slave, he yet brings his slave into our midst. He believes that the gold he scatters in the cars—at the hotels—on his way northward—at the watering places—at other places of fashionable resort—and on his return—will ensure him humble friends and retainers to an amount sufficient to render him all the advice and co-operation necessary to the conveyance of his slave back into bondage, and to his defiance of the law in doing so;—and he is rarely disappointed. The interest which the slaveholder thus establishes does not cease with ensuring to him the delivery of his present victim, but extends to the maintenance for the locality of a non-interfering and anti-abolition character, that his presence may be invited for another year. These views explain the occurrence at Niagara, both as respects the wrong publicly done to the abducted woman, and the subsequent violence perpetrated on her sympathizing friends. Will they explain why no injury was inflicted upon white inhabitants of the place?

The foreign slaveholder confides in the existence of this power, when he makes his slaves a part of the crew which conveys to us the luxuries of his climate, and adds to the wealth of our own, more than to any conception he has of the strength of his legal rights. He knows that a claim of property in man is against the principles of our free institutions, but he trusts to the boon which he brings with him, as a security for our overlooking the condition of the men bearing it to us; and he is not therefore disappointed when, in the sequel of any brief conflict between might and right, he finds that commercial interests over-ride natural, moral, and statute right!

This result we have in the Brazilian slave case, in which the Judge applying the provisions in the Treaty with Brazil relating to deserters, to the case of the two men, da Costa and da Rocha, who were pursuing a legal course for the recovery of their liberty, considered that the fact of their forming a part of the ship's crew, whether with or without their consent, was a sufficient evidence of "the right of the master to detain them," and thus a sufficient reason for remanding them to his custody! Can we believe that, in a community duly appreciating the paramount right of a man to himself, yet allowing as rigid a construction of the terms of the treaty as would be consistent with that appreciation, no judicial power would be allowed to enquire back of the ship's roll, whether the name of any person entered upon it, found itself there by fraud? If we do, then we admit that there exists in the treaty a provision which would prevent one of our own countrymen from asking to be discharged from the service of a Brazilian vessel on account of having been kidnapped into it; or, he escaping from the service, would make it to "be the duty of the judicial tribunal in such a case, upon the proper application, to deliver him up" without regard to such a plea. Does such a provision exist? Is it constitutional?

Since the decision by Judge Daly, an effort was made to bring up the case of the slaves, with some new points in it, before Judge Edmonds, under a second writ of habeas corpus, but, after some proceedings before him, it was finally tried, on agreement of the parties, by Judge Edwards. The Judge considering the new points as not substantially varying the case, and holding that he had no right to go behind the decision of Judge Daly, even for the correction of irregularities in the proceedings before him, returned the men to the custody of the Captain, where Judge Daly's decree had left them.

The decision of Judge Edwards does not at all meet the following points made in behalf of the slaves by their worthy and intelligent counsel, John Jay:

"The proceeding before Judge Daly was not between the same parties or privies, but a matter inter alios acta, between the relator, John Invernoss, and the Captain, with which the Africans had nothing to do. It was a proceeding instituted without their privity or consent, and by which they are in no way bound. The relator was to them a stranger, the counsel unknown and unauthorized; ignorant of the language, they had no understanding of the matter."

"A decision is not res adjudicata, unless the parties to be affected by it have had an opportunity of being fairly heard, and the decision is made upon due deliberation by the Judge. These Africans, in the former proceeding, were denied a hearing. The order of the Court was based upon an admission on the record made without their authority, knowledge, or assent, and the truth of which they positively deny."

If the points here taken are correct, where is the justice which has been meted out to these men, and what is the boasted right of the writ of habeas corpus, where the men are not allowed to be heard through counsel of their own appointment?

Without meaning to attach the least disrespect to the honorable judges whose decisions we have referred to, we must be allowed to believe they were not guided by the golden rule they would wish applied to their own cases were they the subjects of the adjudication. They participated, probably, in the general apprehension which existed in the great commercial metropolis, that a new cause of irritation would arise out of the case to increase the difficulties already subsisting between the Brazilian empire and this government, and they may have desired to avoid the doing of any act which would augment the danger of a rupture between the two countries, and, thus, of a suspension of the large commerce now existing between them. We read in the event the lesson with which we commenced, that in the pecuniary and commercial interchanges of the free states with slave holding communities, far transcending in influence all political confederacies, the power of slavery in regulating and controlling the former, chiefly exists. It is the province of a wise philanthropy to seek means for the diminishing of these interchanges.

THE BRAZILIAN SLAVES—THEIR ESCAPE!—One of the suggestions made by the counsel of these men to Judge Edwards, for their discharge from the custody of Captain da Costa, was, that he had "threatened when he got them out of port to flog them until they were fit for nothing but to be thrown overboard, and that they never should see Rio again." The severe character of the Captain, shown in the fact of his having, upon the return of the men to him under Judge Daly's decree, put them in irons, and subjected them otherwise to a rigorous imprisonment, in punishment of their offence of seeking a legal remedy; which was all he could well do in port; made it probable that this threat was to be carried out when they got to sea. As Judge Edwards saw no remedy under the writ of habeas corpus against "any threatened violence," his decision turned the men over to such a catastrophe, should it ensue. We are, therefore, especially glad to learn that the slaves escaped from this menaced and dreaded doom, as well as from slavery itself, by some agency, as yet unexplained, which, on the night of the 5th ultimo, effected their liberation. We are reminded by this mysterious event of the following beautiful lines of Longfellow:—

"Paul and Silas in their prison,
Sung of Christ, the Lord arisen,
And an earthquake's arm of might,
Broke their dungeon gates at night."
"But alas! what holy angel Brings the slave this glad evangel?"

And what earthquake's arm of might Breaks his dungeon gates at night!"

To these slaves came the bright messenger of a glorious, though lesser evangel, opening to them their prison doors and bidding them BE FREE!

We take from the National Anti-Slavery Standard and of the 12th ultimo, the following particulars relating to Judge Edwards's decision, and the subsequent proceedings in the case, including the escape of the prisoners.

On Thursday last, the decision of Judge Edwards, in this case, was given, by which the slaves were remanded to the custody of the Captain of the Lembraen. In his opinion, Judge Edwards declared that the question presented to him under the new writ of habeas corpus was already res adjudicata, and that he was precluded from going into any investigation of the facts in the case; and that no new facts were set forth which authorized any interference on his part. The Judge relied as a precedent upon the Barry case, in which the Court of Errors decided that the principle of res adjudicata was applicable to a proceeding under habeas corpus.

Immediately on the decision of Judge Edwards, Messrs. White and Jay asked that the Judge would order the Sheriff to hold the slaves till they had an opportunity of bringing the case before the Supreme Court, for final adjudication. This he declined to do, declaring that he had not the authority. A new writ of habeas corpus was therefore procured at once from Judge Oakley, but a hearing could not be had till Monday morning.

The fear now was, that, as the slaves were legally in the custody of the Captain, they would be placed beyond the reach of any writ whatever. Efforts were made to procure a pledge from the Captain or his counsel that the Africans should be permitted to remain in the custody of the jailor, but without success. The Captain, however, was willing to sell them at a reduced price, and in consideration of the state of the market here, generously consented to take $300 each for them, affirming that they would be worth $500 each in Brazil. It was thought possible by some of the friends of the slaves, that the requisite sum might be raised. In the meanwhile the men were left in the Eldridge street prison, in the custody of the jailor, though no pledge was given that they should remain there.

On Sunday night, however, they were safe in their cells when the keeper retired to rest. In the morning they were not to be found, though the keys of the keeper remained where he had put them the night before, on his table.

Their disappearance remains still a mystery to the public. The Captain and his party evidently know nothing about it, and are exceedingly angry at their escape. But their friends, on the other hand, have no anxiety as to their safety.

Such was the aspect of affairs when a hearing was to be had on Monday, on the new writ before Judge Oakley. It was postponed to Tuesday, when statements were made by the counsel for both parties, and various affidavits were read. Mr. Jay expressed his gratification at the escape of the slaves, and considered it perfectly justifiable, as they were held in jail simply on the order of the Captain, and not by any legal warrant; he declared, that so far as he was concerned, there was no private understanding between the parties as to the slaves being permitted to remain in the Eldridge street prison, but that on the contrary, Mr. Purroy refused to give such a pledge. He, however, further declared that the escape was entirely without his connivance. Mr. Purroy acknowledged that Mr. Jay was entirely exculpated, but endeavoured to show that there was an understanding between himself and Elias Smith, who has been active in this case, touching the continuance of the slaves in the Eldridge street prison, till it could be ascertained whether money enough could be raised to effect their purchase. Mr. Smith was not present to make any statement in his own behalf. The Judge remarked that there had been a breach of faith somewhere, and intimated that the matter might come before the Grand Jury. Precisely what the Grand Jury can have to do with this matter we do not see. The most that can be made out of it is, that the men have deserted, and some one has helped them to do so. The last, at least, is no crime. Whatever breach of faith there may have been between private parties, we know not. But that, we take it, whatever judgment the public may pass upon it, is not a question over which the Grand Jury have cognizance.

SELECTIONS.

GLORY OF MASSACHUSETTS.

We are indebted to the "Practical Christian" for the following eloquent extracts, which are from the conclusion of the "Tenth Annual Report of the Secretary of the Board of Education" for Massachusetts, Horace Mann.

While we admire the whole extract as the production of an enlightened and gifted mind, our attention was particularly arrested by his severe rebuke of that misgiving system, by which many of our States, more blessed by far with the riches of nature than Massachusetts, are kept at so great a distance behind her in all that constitutes true greatness. It is not necessary to say that we refer to the paragraph beginning with the words, "Does she live by the toil of a race of serfs and vassals?"

"Massachusetts is parental in her government. More and more, as year after year rolls by, she seeks to substitute prevention for remedy, and rewards for penalties. She strives to make industry the antidote to poverty, and to counterwork the progress of vice and crime by the diffusion of knowledge and the culture of virtuous principles. She seeks not only to mitigate those great physical and mental calamities of which mankind are the sad inheritors, but also to avert those infinitely greater moral calamities which form the disastrous heritage of depraved passions. Hence it has long been her policy to endow or to aid asylums for the cure of disease. She snecors and maintains all the poor within her borders, whatever may have been the land of their nativity. She founds and supports hospitals for restoring reason to the insane; and even for those violators of the law whom she is obliged to sequester from society, she provides daily instruction and the ministrations of the gospel, at the public charge. To those who, in the order of nature and providence, have been bereft of the noble faculties of hearing and of speech, she teaches a new language, and opens their imprisoned minds and hearts to conversation with men and to communion with God; and it hardly transcends the literal truth to say, that she gives sight to the blind. For the remnants of those aboriginal tribes who, for so many ages, roamed over this land, without cultivating its soil or elevating themselves in the scale of being, her annual bounty provides good schools; and when the equal, natural and constitutional rights of Africa were thought to be invaded, she armed her courts of judicature with power to punish the aggressors. The public highway is not more open and free for every man in the community, than is the public school-house for every child; and each parent feels that a free education is as secure a part of the birthright of his offspring, as Heaven's bounties of light and air. The State not only commands that the means of education shall be provided for all, but she denounces penalties against all individuals, and all towns and cities, however populous or powerful they may be, that shall presume to stand between her bounty and its recipients. In her righteous code, the interception of knowledge is a crime; and if parents are unable to supply their children with books, she becomes a parent and supplies them.

"The policy of the State promotes not only secular but religious instruction; yet in such a way, as leaves to every individual the right of private judgment and the sacred freedom of conscience.

"Public sentiment exceeds and excels the law. Annually, vast sums are given for eleemosynary and charitable purposes;—to promote the cause of temperance, to send the gospel to the heathen; and to diffuse the doctrines of peace, which are the doctrines of the Prince of Peace.

"Whence come her means to give, with each returning year, more than a million of dollars to public education; more than another million to religion; and more than a third to ameliorate and succor the afflicted and the ignorant at home, and to bless, in distant lands, those who sit in the region and shadow of death? How does she support her poor, maintain her public ways, and contribute such vast sums for purposes of internal improvement, besides maintaining her immense commercial transactions with every zone in the world?

"Has she a vast domain? Her whole territory would not make a court yard of respectable dimensions to stand in front of many of the states and territories belonging to the Union.

"Does she draw revenues from conquered provinces or subjugated realms? She conquers nothing, she subdues nothing, but the great elemental forces of nature, which God gives freely, whenever and wherever they are asked for in the language of genius and science; and in regard to which no profusion or prodigality to one can diminish the bounty always ready for others.

"Does she live by the toil of a race of serfs and vassals whom she holds in personal and hereditary bondage,—by one comprehensive and sovereign act of violence seizing upon both body and soul at once, and superseding the thousand acts of plunder which make up the life of a common robber? Every man who treads her sacred soil is free; all are free alike; and within her borders, for any purpose connected with human slavery, iron will not be welded into a fetter.

"Has she rich mines of the precious metals? In all her coffers, there is not a drachm of silver or of gold which has not been obtained by the sweat of her brow or the vigor of her brain.

"Has she magazines of mineral wealth imbedded in the earth, or are her soil and climate so spontaneously exuberant that she reaps luxuriant harvests from uncultivated fields? Alas! the orator has barbed his satire, by declaring her only natural productions to be granite and ice? Whence, then, I again ask, comes her wealth?

"One copious, exhaustless fountain, supplies all this abundance. It is education,—the intellectual, moral, and religious education of the people. Having no other mines to work, Massachusetts has mined into the human intellect, and from its limitless resources, she has won more sustaining and enduring prosperity and happiness, than if she had been founded on a stratification of silver and gold, reaching deeper down than geology has yet penetrated. From her high religious convictions, she has learned that great lesson,—to set a value upon time. Regarding the faculties as the gift of God, she has felt bound both to use and to improve them. Mingling skill and intelligence with the daily occupations of life, she has made labour honourable; and, as a necessary consequence, idleness is disgraceful. Knowledge has been the ambition of her sons, and she has revered and venerated the purity and chastity of her matrons and her daughters. At the hearthstone, at the family table, and at the family altar,—on all those occasions where the structure of the youthful character is builded up, these sentiments of love for knowledge and of reverence for maidenly virtue have been builded in; and there they stand, so wrought and mingled with the fibres of being, that none but God can tell which is nature and which is education; which we owe primarily to the grace of Heaven, and which to the co-operating wisdom of the institutions of men. Verily, verily, not as we ought, have we obeyed the laws of Jehovah, or imitated the divine example of the Saviour; and yet, for such imperfect obedience and distant imitation as we have rendered, God has showered down manna from the heavens, and opened a rock whence flow living waters to gladden every thirsty place. He who studies the present or the historic character of Massachusetts, will see,—and he who studies it most profoundly will see most clearly,—that whatever of abundance, of intelligence, or of integrity, whatever of character at home or of renown abroad, she may possess—all has been evolved from the enlightened, and at least partially Christianized mind, not of a few, but of the great masses of her people. They are not the result of outward riches or art brought around it, or laminated over it, but of an awakened inward force, working energetically outwardly, and fashioning the most intractable circumstances to the dominion of its own desires and resolves; and this force has been awakened and its impotent energies replenished; more than from all things else, by her Common Schools.

"From her earliest colonial history, the policy of Massachusetts has been to develop the minds of all her people, and to imbue them with the principles of duty. To do this work most effectually, she has begun it with the young. If she would continue to mount higher and higher towards the summit of prosperity, she must continue the means by which her present elevation has been gained. In doing this, she will not only exercise the noblest prerogative of government, but will co-operate with the Almighty in one of his sublimest works.

"The Greek rhetorician, Longinus, quotes from the Mosiac account of the creation what he calls the sublimest passage ever uttered: 'God said, Let there be light, and there was light.' From the centre of black immensity effulgence burst forth. Above, beneath, on every side, its radiance streamed out, silent, yet making each spot in the vast concave brighter than the line which the lightning pencils upon the midnight cloud. Darkness fled, as the swift beams spread onward and outward, in an unending circumfusion of splendour. Onward and outward, still they move to this day, glorifying through wider and wider space, the infinite Author from whose power and beneficence they sprang. But not only in the beginning, when God created the heavens and the earth, did he say, 'Let there be light.' Whenever a human soul is born into the world, its Creator stands over it, and again pronounces the same sublime words, 'Let there be light.'

"Magnificent, indeed, was the material creation; when, suddenly blazing forth, in mid-space, the new-born sun dispelled the darkness of the ancient night. But infinitely more magnificent is it, when the human soul rays forth its subtler and swifter beams;—when the light of the senses irradiates all outward things, revealing the beauty of their colours and the exquisite symmetry of their proportions and forms; when the light of reason penetrates to their invisible properties and laws, and displays all those hidden relations that make up all the sciences; when the light of conscience illumines the moral world, separating truth from error, and virtue from vice. The light of the newly-kindled sun, indeed, was glorious. It struck upon all the planets, and waked into existence their myriad capacities of life and joy. As it rebounded from them, and showed their vast orbs all wheeling, circle beyond circle, in their stupendous courses, the sons of God shouted for joy. That light sped onward, beyond Sirius, beyond the Pole-star, beyond Orion and the Pleiades, and is still speeding onward into the abysses of space. But the light of the human soul flies swifter than the light of the sun, and outlines its meridian blaze. It can not only embrace the sun of our system, but all suns and galaxies of suns; ay! the soul is capable of knowing and of enjoying Him who created the suns themselves; and when these starry luars that now glorify the firmament shall wax dim, and fade away like a wasted taper, the light of the soul shall still remain; nor time, nor cloud, nor any power, but its own perversity, shall ever quench its brightness. Again I would say, that whenever a human soul is born into the world, God stands over it, and pronounces the same sublime fiat, 'Let there be light;' and may the time soon come when all human governments shall co-operate with the divine government in carrying this benediction and baptism into fulfilment."

From the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.
OLD TEMPERANCE.

We are indebted to a Scottish newspaper for the following extract from a speech of Lord Chesterfield, delivered in the House of Lords in 1763, on the "Gin act."

"Luxury, my lords, is to be taxed, but vice prohibited, let the difficulties in executing the law be what they will—would you lay a tax upon a breach of the ten commandments? Would not such a tax be wicked and scandalous? because it would imply an indulgence to all those who could pay the tax. Vice, my lords, is not properly to be taxed, but suppressed, and heavy taxes are sometimes the only means by which the suppression can be obtained. Luxury, my lords, or the excess of that which is only pernicious by its excess, may be very properly taxed, that such excess though not strictly unlawful, may be made more difficult. But the use of those things which are simply hurtful in their own nature, and in every degree, is to be prohibited. None, my lords, ever heard in any nation, of a tax upon theft or adultery, because a tax implies a license granted for the use of that which is taxed to all who shall be willing to pay it.

Drunkenness, my lords, is universal, and in all circumstances an evil, and therefore ought not to be taxed but punished.

The noble lord, [he went on to remark,] has been kindly pleased to inform us, that the trade of distilling is very extensive; that it employs great numbers, and that they have arrived at exquisite skill, and therefore—note well the consequence—the trade of distilling is not to be discouraged. Once more, my lords, allow me to wonder at the different conceptions of different understandings. It appears to me, that since the spirits which distillers produce are allowed to enfeeble the limbs, and vitiate the blood, to pervert the heart, and obscure the intellect, that the number of distillers should be no argument in their favour; for I never heard that a law against theft was repealed or delayed because thieves were numerous. It appears to me, my lords, that if so formidable a body are confederated against the virtue or the lives of their fellow citizens, it is time to put an end to the havoc, and to interpose, while it is yet in our power, to stop destruction. So little, my lords, am I affected with the merits of the wonderful skill which the distillers are said to have attained, that it is, in my opinion, no facility of great use to mankind, to prepare palatable poisons; nor shall I ever contribute my interest for the reprieve of a murderer, because he has by long practice obtained great dexterity in his trade. If their liquors are so delicious that the people are tempted to their own ruin, let us at length, my lords, secure them from this fatal draught, by burning the vials that contain them. Let us crush at once these artists in slaughter, who have reconciled their countrymen to sickness and to ruin, and spread over the pit-falls of debauchery such habits as cannot be resisted. I am very far, my lords, from thinking that there are this year any peculiar reasons for tolerating murder—nor can I conceive why the manufactory should be held sacred now, if it is to be destroyed hereafter."

"THEY HEARD HIS VOICE."

A scene of novel and peculiar interest occurred at the May meeting of the New York Historical Society. A learned paper upon the ancient trails and territorial boundaries of the far-famed Iroquois, had enlisted the attention of the members so deeply, that the usual hour for adjournment was nearly forgotten. When the reader at length closed his dissertation, a member of the society rose and stated that there was a veritable Iroquois of the full blood present; and, notwithstanding the lateness of the hour, the society would perhaps be gratified to hear any remarks he might be willing to offer upon the paper just read. The President, the Hon. Luther Bradish, warmly welcomed the suggestion, and an Indian, with all the characteristics of his race strongly printed upon his frontispiece, glided from under the shadow of the bookcases and planted himself upon the floor. The Red-man smiled and bowed with graceful self-possession at the round of applause which greeted him; and then with remarkable address he touched upon point after point of the discourse which had just been read, in language at once choice and forcible, and delivered with just that degree of hesitation which would characterize a speaker who was translating his thoughts. At last he came to a sentence in which his white predecessor upon the floor, had said, "The Iroquois had left no monuments." His response to this was a most animated burst of eloquence; and from that moment, his speech, having a direct purpose, became one of the most touching and dignified appeals we ever listened to; invoking the society to interpose between those who survived of his people, and the influences which were at work to expel them from the remnant of their ancient possessions in this State. He said:—

The honourable gentleman has told you that the Iroquois have no monuments. Did he not previously prove that the land of Gano-no-o, or "the Empire State," as you love to call it, was once laced by our trails from Albany to Buffalo—trails that we had trod for centuries—trails worn so deep by the feet of the Iroquois, that they became your own roads of travel as your possessions gradually eat into those of my people. Your roads still traverse those same lines of communication, and bind one part of "the Long House" to another. The land of Gano-no-o—the Empire State—then, is our monument! and we wish its soil to rest above our bones when we shall be no more. We shall not long occupy much room in living; we shall occupy still less when we are gone; a single tree of the thousands which sheltered our forefathers—one old elm under which the representatives of the tribes were wont to meet—will cover us all; but we would have our bodies twined in death among its roots, on the very soil whence it grew! perhaps it will last the longer from being fertilized with their decay.

The deep and respectful silence with which these words were listened to, was broken the next moment by a peal of laughter from the audience, at some grotesque touches of irony; while mingled with sarcasm and eloquent invective on the next instant called out an involuntary murmur of plaudits, as the Iroquois speaker, proclaiming himself "a native American," commended his white brethren for their alacrity in helping "the Pole, the Greek, and the inhabitants of the British Islands," and recorded his approval of philanthropy generally, provided the original owners of the soil they lived on were not excluded from its wide embrace. He thought it well, too, that the books of white men might occasionally allow, that an Indian had some feeling for his parent or his son, for the wife of his bosom, and for the land of his birth. His gesticulations in this part of his speech were singularly characteristic, and added much to its effect. Turning then to the President, he said:—

"I have been told that the first object of this society is to preserve the history of the State of New York. You, all of you, know, that alike in its wars and its treaties the Iroquois, long before the Revolution, formed a part of that history; that they were then one in council with you, and were taught to believe themselves one in interest. In your last war with England, your red brother—your elder brother—still came up to help you, as of old, on the Canada frontier! Have we, the first holders of this prosperous region, no longer a share in your history? Glad were your forefathers to sit down upon the threshold of the "Long House;" rich, did they then hold themselves, in getting the mere sweepings from its door. Had our forefathers spurned you from it when the French were thundering at the opposite end, to get a passage through and drive you into the sea, whatever has been the fate of other Indians the Iroquois might still have been a nation; and I—I—instead of pleading here for the privilege of lingering within your borders—I—I might have had—a country!"

As the Iroquois thus spoke, his dark features were compressed from strong internal agitation; a big tear gathered in his eye long before he reached the close of the sentence; but slowly uttering what he said, he held it suspended there with such resolute firmness that it did not fall, while his eye became glazed with the gathering emotion which words alone could not relieve. We never witnessed a stronger sensation in any assemblage; and we rejoice for the honour of the Historical Society, that it instantly took order, as the first step, for preserving the remains of the Iroquois in this State, to raise a sum of money to bring back the remnant of the families expatriated last summer; one-half of whom have already perished in the swamps of Missouri. It would indeed seem like the very mockery of the true interests of humanity; for an institution of learning to give its best energies to "the Old Mortality" business of deciphering inscriptions on the graves of nations, and turn a deaf ear to the last chapter of their living history, now enacting before their very eyes.

The name of this eloquent Iroquois orator is WAO-WA-WANA-ONK, or "They heard his voice!"

UNMERCIFULNESS OF MAN.

It is strange that unmercifulness should be a characteristic sin of man. Among devils who received no mercy it were less out of place. But man is the child and protégé of Mercy. He lives and enjoys his probation unmolested by thunderbolts, and storms of wrath rolled back, and caverns of despair closed, and the hushed curses of the Law. The rain and dew and sunshine of Heaven are descending upon his fields. The birds are piping their sweet notes as they might have done in Eden, and all nature, not veiled in sackcloth, but clad in multiform glory, waits upon him like a sister. Above all, man lives in the light of glorious and glad revelations, of evangelic and joyful tidings, of living streams of salvation, and of ministering angels, and of voices from the sky, owning him as a younger brother that wandered, but in the far-off land of prodigality found mercy, through the cross, and through that blood that flowed freely as rain drops from the bosom of Jesus—in the midst of these he stands a monument of mercy, himself unmerciful!!! Yes, and too often, with one hand on the New Testament and the other on his brother's throat, no argument nor art avails to persuade him that in that brother's bosom may beat a heart of higher aspirations, of better purposes, of purer affections than his own.—Chr. Rev. Mag.

POETRY.

POEMS BY GOODWIN BARNBY.—The following productions of this new and talented writer, if we rightly estimate their poetical character and moral tendencies, cannot fail to be acceptable to our readers. The correspondent who has obligingly furnished us with them, thus writes in relation to their author:

"Of his history I have learned little; so little indeed, as not even to know whether the name he bears be assumed or real. He contributes to the People's Journal of England—a paper especially devoted to the elevation of the labouring classes of society—and writes such words as are fitly spoken to the souls of those whose warm hopeful natures in the cause of human progress long for some expression of their faith which they have not themselves attained to—

He writes such good thoughts natural, as if he always thought them—
And has sympathies so ready, open-free, like bird on branch,
Just as ready to fly east as west, which ever way he sought them,
In the birchen wood a chirrup, or a cock-crow in the grange.

He is one of those modern men, who, from the rotting down of the rusk wild literature of former ages, are growing a sea of fruit and wayward verdure, that is well fitted to nurture into vigour the homely yet truthful and exalting virtues. He speaks no word in commendation of the many guises of gold, and broad-cloth, and high bearing, under which pride has ever sought to win to herself the plaudits of the few or many. He tells no tale of Grecian beauty or Roman daring. He altogether passes by as of little moment the blood-dashed laurels that still in the great hall of the world nod in a green old age over the effigy of some long-since-departed grim old warrior. He eulogizes no man-conqueror for his knightly courtesy and prowess. His hopes are in the future rather than the past. He is no smiling varlet to huzza for that patriotism which, if borne out to its legitimate extent, would make earth—instead of a garden of beauty, well fitted to nurture on its bosom a band of brothers made up of men of all nations, characters and languages—a very wilderness for savages and wild beasts to wander in, and howl out upon the winds their wrath and yonare. He loves no man because he is noble, and despises none because he is mean. But in all men he recognizes the elements of good—those germs of God's spirit—which, if duly cultivated, by His blessing will grow up into beauty and nobleness, far surpassing aught that we are wont to realize upon earth. He teaches in his verse the doctrine of overcoming evil by good—of the pulling down of the strong-holds of wickedness by the preaching and doing of the truth—of the mounting up from the heights which our predecessors have won to new excellencies—of the being in the body among men in their utmost distress, loneliness and sin, and yet in spirit high above them, and by pure-hearted love winning them up to the highest glory."

MOVE ON.

All the stars in heaven are moving,
Ever round the bright spheres roving;
Twinkling, beaming, raying, shining,
Blackest night with darkness lining;
Aye revolving through the years,
Playing music of the spheres;
Like the Eastern Star of old,
Moving toward the shepherd's fold,
Where the wise men—grace to them!—
Found the Babe of Beth'lehem.
God is in each moving star;
God drives on the pleiad car;
Let his will on earth be done
As in Heaven the stars move on—
Move on! Keep moving!
Progress is the law of loving.

All the waves of the sea are flowing,
As the winds of heaven are blowing;
With a gentle beaklike quiver
Flows the streamlet to the river;
With a stronger wavel commotion
Flows the river to the ocean;
While seas' billows evermore
Flow and gain upon the shore—

Wave on wave in bright spray leaping—
Like endeavors never sleeping;
While the pool which moveth never,
Grows a stagnant bog for ever—
White-gilled die its tenant fench,
Green its water, foul its stench,
Wildering marsh-fires o'er it run,
While straight flows the river on—
Move on! Keep moving!
Progress is the law of loving.

Thus within the skies and ocean
Life is married unto motion;
Stars revolve, and rivers flow,
And earth! what said Galileo?
When in dungeon damply lying,
Faint and tortured, hardly dying,
Yet for truth, with honest pride,
Yet, it moves! it moves! he cried.
And the world? its life is motion,
As with stars and as with ocean.
It is moving, it is growing,
All its tides are onward flowing;
The hand is moving to the loaf,
The eye is moving to the roof,
The mind is moving to the book,
The soul lives in a moving look,
The hand is moving from the sword,
The heart is moving toward the Lord:
Move on! Keep moving!
Progress is the law of loving.

GIVE ME THE HAND.

Give me the hand that is warm, kind and ready;
Give me the clasp that is calm, true and steady;
Give me the hand that never will deceive me—
Give me its grasp that I aye may believe thee.
Soft is the palm of the delicate woman;
Hard is the hand of the rough sturdy yeoman;
Soft palm or hard hand, it matters not—never!
Give me the grasp that is friendly for ever.

Give me the hand that is true as a brother;
Give me the hand that has harm'd not another;
Give me the hand that has never foreswore it;
Give me the grasp that I aye may adore it.
Lovely the palm of that fair blue-vein'd maiden!
Horny the hand of the workman o'erladen!
Lovely or ugly, it matters not—never!
Give me the grasp that is friendly for ever.

Give me the grasp that is honest and hearty,
Free as the breeze and unshackled by party;
Let friendship give me the grasps that become her,
Close as the twine of the vines of the summer.
Give me the hand that is true as a brother;
Give me the hand that has wronged not another.
Soft palm or hard hand, it matters not—never!
Give me the grasp that is friendly for ever.

MINE AND OURS.

Mine is the little band, poor and weak,
Ours are the thousand arms, mountains to break;
Mine is the atom of clay for the grave,
Ours is the earth, with hill, valley and wave;
Mine will vanish like corpse in the sod,
Ours will arise to the heaven of God!

Mine is the secret prayer, breathed low and lone,
Ours is the anthem of conquering tone;
Mine is the little flower nurtured in dearth,
Ours are the blossoming Edens of earth;
Mine will vanish like corpse in the sod,
Ours will arise to the heaven of God!

Mine is the brain that but gleams like the spark,
Ours are the thoughts like stars lighting the dark;
Mine is the heart that beats fearfully hurl'd,
Ours are the heart-throbs that gladden the world;
Mine will vanish like corpse in the sod,
Ours will arise to the heaven of God!

Mine is the hermit-life, lone in its hours,
Ours are humanity's loves, thoughts, and powers;
Mine, scarcely mine, is this frame, doom'd to fall,
Ours is our God, common Parent of all!
Mine will vanish like corpse in the sod,
Ours will arise to the heaven of God!

UP AND DOWN.

Up! is the merry lark floating to sing
Its matins of joy to the sun of spring;
Down! is the bird of night, winging to peer
For the mice in the barn-hole, dun and drear;
Up! is the beamy sun shining to give
Their verdure and hues to all flowers that live;
Down! is the gaping mine, lone, dark and cold,
Where the children of Mammon starve for gold;
Down! is the coward that shrinketh to die;
Up! is the hero that looketh on high.

Up! is the calm of the clear blue sky;
Far o'er the mountain-tops raising the eye;
Down! is the mist of the cultureless clod,
Stooping the gaze to the sepulchre sod;
Up! is the watchman who tells of the night,
When beam the streaks of morn' ruddy and bright;
Down! is the sluggard who keepeth his bed,
When morning's dews are all sprinkled and shed;
Down! is the coward who slumbers a slave;
Up! is the hero—the watchful and brave.

Up! is the patriot who raises mankind;
Up! is the poet—the eye of the blind;
Down! is the tyrant who maketh the slave;
Down! is the traitor—the door of the grave;
Up! is the high heaven of prophets of old—
The home of the saints, the meek and the bold;
Down! is the hell of the bigot and vile—
The place of the bad with the Judas smile;
Down! are the tyrant, the bigot, and slave;
Up! are the loving, the free, and the brave!

EPIGRAM.

The following terse and timely epigram appears in the Portsmouth (N. H.) Journal. It is from the pen of James Kennard, jun., a young invalid, who has been confined to his room and bed for nearly ten years, and who for a considerable part of the time has been unable to bear the light of day. He retains, however, all the cheerfulness and vivacity of health, and from time to time dictates or writes the thoughts of a clear, vigorous mind, on prominent topics and passing events. We have never seen a better answer to the attempt to brand as treason the honest and conscientious disapproval of a disgraceful and wicked war.

WHO IS THE TRAITOR?

Who deserves the burning curses
Heaped upon the traitor's head?

"He who renders aid and comfort
To the enemy," 'tis said.

Who, then, is the greatest traitor
On this vast terrestrial ball?

He who renders aid and comfort
To the Enemy of All.

Questions with respect to Rice, Tobacco, Cotton, Cane
Sugar and Hemp.

1. What number of pounds, avoirdupois, prepared for a market, is regarded as an average crop per acre?

2. How many hands are necessary to the cultivation of a given quantity of land, say one hundred acres, and for putting the production into a merchantable form?

3. Are women and children employed, and in what proportions?

4. Where such full and other hands are not constantly necessary either to the cultivation and preparation of the articles for a market, or to the requisite care of the grounds and buildings assigned to such culture and preparation, to what other available industry, and in what proportion of their time is the recess from the main business applied?

5. To what extent is animal and mechanical power used?

6. How many acres are supposed to be in cultivation applied to the above productions in each State, and what intervention of other crops does the cultivation require.

In connection with the pounds of sugar per acre, please name the quantity, in gallons, of molasses
also produced.

Question with respect to maple sugar.

How many persons are ordinarily necessary, and how much time is occupied in obtaining and converting the fluid of the maple tree into a given quantity of sugar and molasses—stating in pounds the sugar, and in gallons the molasses procured?

Answer of Hon. Joshua R. Giddings, of Ohio.

HALL OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 18, 1843.

Sir,—I have some experience in the manufacture of maple sugar. Like many other matters, it is difficult to fix upon the amount of labour necessary to manufacture a given quantity. The state of the weather during the winter, the length of time which the trees have been used, the convenience of fuel, the arrangement of the boiling furnaces, and many other considerations enter into the computation.

Taking all matters into consideration, I am of opinion that the average labour with us is about four days of a man and a yoke of oxen for the manufacture of each hundred pounds, or a corresponding quantity of molasses.

With great respect, your obe't serv't,

Hon. John Edwards.

J. R. GIDDINGS.

Answer of Hon. Thomas Butler King, of Georgia.
Rick.

Two and a half barrels per acre are regarded as a good average crop.

Four acres planted and cultivated to the hand, may be about an average. This would give ten barrels per hand per annum.

It is not usual to cultivate other crops in connection with rice. Potatoes are cultivated, but not to any extent. The entire year is occupied in preparing the land, cultivating the crop, and preparing it for market.

Answer of Hon. Mark A. Cooper, of Georgia.
COTTON IN GEORGIA.

1. Average crop prepared for market, per acre, one hundred pounds.

2. Number of hands required to cultivate one hundred acres and preparing the product for market, who will also cultivate a proportion of corn, wheat, potatoes, &c., ten.

3. Women, boys and girls work at it—a healthy woman, without a child, counts as a hand—two boys or girls twelve years old count as one, if smart and active.

4. The cultivation of cotton, with the associated crops of grain, occupies the whole time.

5. The hands employed: about three horses and a yoke of oxen, constitute the animal power. The cotton gin and running gear, worth one hundred dollars, constitute the machinery. To these, add four common spinning wheels and cards, and one loom, all worth fifteen dollars.

6. It is impossible to say with certainty the number of acres planted in Georgia. An estimate may be formed from these data—The crop is about two hundred and fifty thousand bales, averaging four hundred pounds each, equal to one hundred million pounds, which, at one hundred pounds per acre, would require one million acres.

Answer of Hon. W. O. Goode, of Virginia.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 2, 1843.

DEAR SIR,—In reply to the interrogatories to which you request my attention, I have the honour to state, that I regard six hundred pounds of tobacco a fair average crop per acre; each hand or laborer will cultivate from two to two and a half acres in tobacco, in addition to the lands appropriated to the production of bread stuffs and provisions and supplies for the support of the estate.

The most efficient of the women and children, over twelve years old, usually mingle in the culture of the crop; and in all bad weather, and in all cases of delicate health, they find employment in handling the tobacco in the houses after it has left the field, or in the "domestic manufacture" of coarse fabrics for their own consumption.

Horses or mules are used in proportion of one horse or mule for two or three laborers, varying according to the size of the estate—and there is generally a team of oxen for removing the plant from the field to the houses. Mechanical power is used only for packing the plant into casks for sale.

The number of acres appropriated to the culture of tobacco in the several States, may be ascertained with some degree of accuracy by reference to statistical tables prepared by order of government. Lands recently conquered from the forest are appropriated to the production of this staple;

but, as they would furnish an inadequate supply on account of the limited quantity of acres, other lands are thus applied, receiving heavy coverings of manure. The crop is usually followed by wheat, for which it furnishes the best possible preparation. The wheat is usually followed by clover or other grass; and in the third or fourth year the land is ready for tobacco. Some planters alternate only with tobacco and wheat, in which cases the application of manure is very heavy, unless the soil be uncommonly fertile. Tobacco has been generally regarded as a great exhauster; but this opinion is now drawn into question by some judicious and scientific planters.

These answers are applicable to the region of the Roanoke, where I reside, and where my experience has been acquired, and my observations made.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully,

Your obedient servant,

W. O. GOODE, of Virginia.

Hon. J. Edwards, of Pa.

Answer of Hon. Judge Moore, of Louisiana.

Answers to queries relative to cultivation of Sugar:

1. About one thousand pounds.

2. A grown hand will cultivate four to five acres of cane, and from five to six of corn and other products for provision and forage.

3. Women are employed in about an equal number with men. Children are not, except during the rolling season. Those above ten years of age, are on some plantations employed to drive the horses in grinding. The hands cannot be employed in any other available industry except as above stated; and in the care of the horses and oxen necessary to carry on the plantation. There is very little or no recess.

5. For a plantation making one hundred hogsheads of sugar, about twenty-five horses and fifteen or twenty oxen will be required where the mill is worked by horse power. The mills and apparatus for grinding and boiling sugar on a plantation making the like number of hogsheads, will cost about one thousand dollars—exclusive of the buildings, which are made to cost from one to ten thousand dollars.

6. About one hundred thousand acres in cane, and probably about one hundred and fifty thousand acres in corn and other products therewith. Cane is generally planted on fresh or renovated land, and suffered to grow one or two seasons from the roots of the first year. The land must then be rested one or two years. It is usually planted in corn and peas, the latter acting as a manure and renovator of the land.

Supplemental to answer 5:

Steam power is employed to a very considerable extent in the manufacture of sugar, for grinding and for corn mills. I suppose that one half the sugar made in Louisiana is by steam power.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

When an evil becomes general, it attracts far less attention than though it was not so much so, and is often by many deemed for that reason alone as a thing of necessity. How otherwise, than from this fact, can we account for the great lapse of years that slavery has been practised in the United States, with no more examination into its character and tendencies commensurate to the atrocity of the system.

Had slaveholding at the time of the framing and adopting of the Constitution of the United States been of ten times less extent than it then was, do we suppose that instrument, (professedly based upon the principles of liberty, justice, equal rights, and self-government,) would have been tortured into one by which a certain class of its subjects might legally retain and claim property in the persons of a certain other class? No! But was this provision a less violation of the principle of justice, because of the multitude of its victims, or the large numbers that might deem themselves accommodated thereby? Surely not—and had the subject of slavery claimed at that time the consideration which its importance demanded, it must have been seen that its entertainment would be hostile to every principle of morality and Christianity, and would diffuse its deadly poison into all the civil and religious institutions embraced in the compact.

The evil proved too general. The appropriate consideration was not given to the subject—hence the claim and protection of property in man by a fellow-man, became the law of the land.

Did a succeeding generation take warning by these gross transactions? No. True, since that time some have come forth and nobly advocated the cause of the oppressed like men and Christians, here and there in different parts of the country, while slavery has been sowing its evils broadcast—but the small number of those thus engaged shews how little attention the public has bestowed upon the subject of slavery in learning its true character and influences.

Now could it be possible that an evil of this character and magnitude, should have existed in a professedly Christian, free, civilized country like this, and elicited so little attention, had it not become of so general a character, as that many of those who should have been conspicuous in labour for the abolishment of slavery, have fallen victims to its foggy, paralyzing influences, by which an unwillingness has been wrought, even to investigate the subject, as though slaveholding was an incurable evil? And this same cause operates powerfully to prevent abstinence from slave labour products, though it ought to stimulate to greater labour and faithfulness the more widely extended the evil.

Now suppose these slave labour products, entered into a very few articles of merchandize that are offered for sale in the free States—and but a small number of inhabitants of these States had any inducement for dealing in or using such products, would there be that reluctance that now so much prevails against a candid and impartial examination, how far the consumer of slave labour products is accessory to the holding of slaves? I presume not, though the principle is the same, whether our markets be supplied in a greater or less degree by this kind of products. The use of such products by those professedly opposed to slavery, is not the less inconsistent and unjust because of general practice. If the attention is once turned to the subject, it requires but a small amount of discernment to see that he who purchases slave labour products, though by the hand of a second or third person, makes a practical acknowledgment of the slaveholder's right to sell, and the right of property in his slave, as much so as he who purchases a slave of the kidnapper endorses the right of the kidnapper to sell and to kidnap slaves; and it would be clearly seen that the purchase of such products confers no moral right to these products, any more than the purchase of a slave confers right of property in the slave.

These are self-evident truths. Why is it so? Few men are bad enough to steal and rob according to law; but how many, who are professedly opposed to slavery, will, without necessity, purchase directly or indirectly of him who has no right to sell, any more than the highway robber has to sell his stolen goods.

Now he who knowingly should purchase such stolen goods would be justly deemed a party with the thief. In view of these facts, I would ask the consumer of slave labour products, (who has only paid the master for them,) what better title he has to them in justice than if he had stolen them from the slaves? Common sense dictates that where no moral right exists to sell, none can be had to purchase; hence all such purchases must be spurious in point of moral justice.

Is it not surprising, that in this enlightened age these transactions should exist to the extent they do; and still more surprising, the little attention that is given to the subject of being consistently practical in bearing a testimony against slavery, as though furnishing the inducement to the holding of slaves was no sin?

How shall we answer for these things to our Divine Master, who by a manifestation of his own good spirit is requiring of us, "to do to others as we would that others should do to us?" Will it be of any avail before the tribunal bar of divine justice, to say that others have done the same; that our practice has been sanctioned by the law of the land, and by long and general custom? None of these things could satisfy the consciences of our early Friends that they might settle down at ease, because the evils they were given to see were general, legal, or of long standing. Once convinced by the light of truth shining upon their own hearts that men ought not, and that Christians could not fight, they boldly and valiantly, at the peril of liberty and life, withdrew from all participation in warlike preparations, regardless of consequences, and thus bore an uncompromising testimony against war and its attendant evils, before a king and people that ruled with the bloody sword. Here we see what sacrifices had to be made, what hardness endured by these Friends in their testimony against the scourge of war and other popular evils—which compared with those sacrifices required to be made for bearing a faithful testimony against slavery, sink these to a mere nothing. But how admirably these early reformers succeeded; the work prospered in their hands by the power of the Highest, and they became as a light in the world, powerful instruments in turning men from "darkness to light, from error to truth, and from the power of sin and Satan to the power of God."

These things ought to stimulate the votaries of virtue every where, never to shrink from labour, because of the magnitude of the reform desired, or the amount of sacrifice required for its accomplishment, if it be what morality and Christianity demands; for He that could preserve Daniel in the lion's den, and soften the heart of Pharaoh by which he was willing to let Israel go, can soften the Pharaoh-hearts of this day by the instrumentality of few or many, by which they also will consent to let the bondman go free. But if there was just occasion to a people formerly not to "partake of the sins of Babylon, lest they should partake of her plagues"—then who can expect to share in the sins of slavery and not also share in its plagues?

Is it a time to close our eyes lest we should see?—nay verily. If we intend to be truly honest and just, and desire to be approved in the divine sight, can we do less than to look into our own practice, and see whether it is in favour or against the poor down trodden bondman "whose blood cries from the ground." #### EXERCISE OF THE RIGHT OF SUFFRAGE.

As we approach the period in which officers are to be elected to fill the various stations required by our system of civil government, our attention is brought to a consideration of the views which should influence a voter, anxious to promote the cause of truth and righteousness, in exercising his elective franchise. I hold that the men we vote for, if they are elected, are our especial delegates, and that the acts which they do, are not only ours, legally, but that so far as we are capable of knowing what they will be, when they involve questions of right or wrong, they are done at our moral accountability. Matters merely financial or expedient, we may refer to the wisdom of our representatives, relying on their superior intelligence, and better means of ascertaining what is proper, for a right decision of them, and not caring to anticipate what that decision may be; but not so with subjects involving moral principles which we hold to be fundamental. In reference to these, we are bound to know what are the sentiments of those we vote for—so far especially as those principles would be involved in some decision which they would probably be called upon to make in the office for which they have our suffrage. It is clear to my mind, that if we cannot on principle vote directly for war measures, we cannot in principle vote for men who will vote for such measures on a contingency likely to arise. Not less clear is it that we cannot vote for a slaveholder, or the advocate of slavery, to any office where his vote may probably be given against the destruction of that system of wrong and outrage—his vote in that event being ours, and involving us in the culpability of sustaining the iniquitous system.

I am aware that these views are condemnatory of much of the political activity which many of the friends of peace and human rights have heretofore displayed in behalf of the better, or rather the less injurious party; but as their activity has usually resulted, even when successful, in the defeat of its purpose—witness the election of Harrison and Tyler, the latter of whom laid the firm basis for the Texas annexation—I cannot but hope that the lesson they have read in the past, will be instructive for the future. What an absurdity to vote into office men whose predilections are in favor of war and slavery, and then to expect them to carry out our views in relation to these evils!

In the present party divisions of the country, I do not see how persons opposed to war or slavery can allow their sympathies to go so far forth in favour of either of the two great parties, as to vote generally with either; each of these parties, in its Southern connection, being in alliance with slavery, and each ardently aiding in the work of destruction going on against Mexico—the one holding their work of devastation to be originally and constantly wrong, but seeking by vigorous additions to the horrible amount of it to bring it to a speedy issue; the other professing to believe it right, and, more logically, seeking, by as ardent means, to bring it to as early a conclusion; each seeing in that conclusion a probable concession of territory to the slave power, and each striving to make of the brilliant events of the war, and possibly of its final issue, political capital for the next presidential campaign. We have already in one of the successful Generals, a southerner, and large slaveholder, a nominee for the presidency, in whose favor the votes of the friends of peace and human rights will probably be solicited. In suggesting the possibility that such a request will be accorded, we knew that we hazard the response—"Is thy servant a dog that he shall do this great thing?"

But it may be said, in answer to my theory of voting, that if we vote at all, we must vote with one of the great parties to make our vote effective, and that if we are to suffer evils, whichever party is successful, we may at least choose the lesser, and so vote for the party which is doing the lesser evil. In the sense in which effective is here used, we can only vote effectively when we vote with the majority—which overlooks the moral influence which a vote, rightly given, carries with it, even in a small minority. In respect to the lesser evil, we may possibly, in some cases, have the right of choice which is suggested, when it affects ourselves only, but not when it affects others. If the lesser evil be to do an act of wrongful violence to a single person, not himself choosing it, and the greater evil be to do the same act to fifty persons, not themselves choosing it, that choice is not allowed us. We have no more moral right to do the wrong to one than we have to one hundred, and therefore cannot select an agent to do it for us. Such an agent we emphatically appoint when we choose him for that end.

We can then only vote for men to do right actions. If we cannot find such as will do so according to our views of right, among the candidates of the parties, we must seek for them from without the parties, amongst those of like sentiments with ourselves, or, wholly abstain from voting, according to our views, as to which will be the better course for holding up the light of our principles to the observation of the world.

EXPANSION OF SLAVE TERRITORY.

Is it not strange that a people who are perpetually boasting of their Anglo-Saxon origin, and consequent superiority over other races of men, of their greater proficiency in the arts which minister to the wants of the human family, of their advancement in civilization above others, should yet labour with so much assiduity to plant, propagate and extend the boundaries of another people, whom they affect to despise as so far inferior to them, as to be fit only for a state of servitude? For who does not know that the time will certainly come, when it will be impossible for the white man to continue his iron rule over the rapidly increasing numbers of the descendants of Africa? When that time shall arrive, and the African shall assert his right to rule, where he constitutes the majority, the influence of the Anglo-Saxon race shall no longer prevail, to the extent of the territory thus occupied by the African. The further, then, the race of the latter shall be planted and extended in his servile condition, the greater will be his territorial limits when he shall become master of the soil. If, then, as he so proudly asserts, the Anglo-Saxon is to be the reformer of the world, and especially destined to occupy and rule the Western continent, why should he calmly fold his arms and see another people pre-occupy the field—nay, assist with all his energies to put as much as possible this antagonistic race (as he esteems it) in possession of the promise of future generations? And who are the men that act thus inconsistently, traitorous to their race, digging the graves of their posterity, throughout the whole Southern region of North America?—A few thousand slaveholders! An inconsiderable minority of the people of the United States. Persuaded, as many of them are, that slavery is opposed to the growth and prosperity of the Union, they yet seek not only to sustain the system within its present territorial limits, but to spread its baleful, blasting shade over every inch of ground where they can possibly plant its root. Blinded by their imagined present pecuniary interests, they quite overlook or disregard the far greater and infinitely more important interests of posterity.

Is it not fair, therefore—is it not just—that the great majority of the free and liberty loving people of the United States, who do not despise labour, but esteem it as a blessing to themselves and their offspring, should interpose their arm of power, yet potent to act, and forbid the further extension of the area of slavery? ## THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, TENTH MONTH 1, 1847.

FRIENDS' PHILADELPHIA FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION.—A half year's meeting of this body was held at Clarkson Hall on the evening of Sixth day, the 13th ult. The meeting was unusually small, owing, as was believed, to a very partial notice of it, but to the attendants it was one of progress and encouragement. The reading of the minutes of the managers was commenced—exhibiting an interesting view of its correspondence and other labours, from their beginning in the spring of 1845, during the greater part of that year, when the further reading was postponed to the next meeting. To examine the Treasurer's accounts and to produce to that meeting the names of persons suitable for officers, committees were appointed. After which, various subjects were discussed relating to the best means of advancing the purposes of the Society. The Association then adjourned—its members edified and refreshed by the interview. Several who travelled many miles to be there, thought they were well paid for their trouble.

SLAVERY ON THE HIGH SEAS.—It is well known, that a considerable traffic in slaves has long been prosecuted between the northern slaveholding States and those further south, and that no trivial portion of this traffic is effected by sea. A few years only have passed since the people of the United States were called to witness a controversy between the officers of the federal government and those of Great Britain, on account of sundry American vessels, engaged in the transportation of slaves, having been thrown by various contingencies into some of the insular dominions of the latter power, and the slaves in consequence discharged. In one case it was broadly intimated, by the republican minister, that the practice of giving, by British authority, their liberty to such American slaves as might be thrown on their islands, must greatly endanger the pacific relations of the two governments. These cases, however, were accommodated without requiring the citizens of this free and liberty-loving republic to decide whether they would incur the expense, and hazard the consequences of a contest with the British nation, to secure, not merely the uninterrupted traffic in slaves upon the high seas between the different ports of the United States—for with that trade there was no interference—but the delivery to their claimants of such slaves as might be cast by stress of weather or other means upon any of their islands in the vicinity of our coast.

The government of the United States was the first to stamp upon the African slave trade the stigma of piracy, and to prescribe for those who should be found on board of American vessels engaged in that traffic, the punishment of death. Yet if we inquire what is the essence of the crime for which this last punitive provision is made, we shall probably find very little in the African commerce which is not necessarily attendant, though possibly in a lower degree, upon the traffic in question between the States. It is an assertion which was frequently repeated by the advocates of the African slave trade, that the negroes imported were slaves in their own country; and that their transportation to the Western World was merely an exchange of one slavery for another. That they were generally held as slaves in Africa before they were sold to the importers is unquestionably true; for whether they are kidnappers, taken prisoners in war, or condemned for real or imputed crimes, by the tribunals of the country, or held in hereditary slavery, they are certainly deprived of their liberty before they are placed in the hold of the slave ship. The traders in African slaves may therefore assert, with as much truth as the conductors of the internal traffic, that they merely transfer their living cargoes from one slavery to another. But as it is fully understood that a large majority of the slaves, imported from Africa, are reduced into slavery by violence or fraud, for the purpose of supplying the slavers with victims, the latter are justly considered as participants in the crime of reducing free persons into slavery;

Now let us inquire whether the traders in slaves between the different States, when they prosecute the traffic by sea, are not guilty of this identical offence.

Slavery, as far as its legal condition is concerned, is a mere municipal regulation founded upon and limited to the range of the territorial laws. This is directly asserted in the judgment of the Supreme Court in the case of Prigg vs. the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. (See Peters' Reports.) Of course a slave passing out of the jurisdiction of the State where he is held, ceases to be a slave unless there is some law in force in the State or place to which he has removed, by which his slavery is supported. It is not necessary that a law should exist declaring him free; the absence of a law declaring him a slave is sufficient. Slavery, said Judge Mansfield in the case of Somerset, (Loft's Reports), is so odious, that nothing can be allowed to support it but positive law. And this declaration was made before the revolution. The Judges of the Supreme Court admit, at least by implication, that if the Article of the Constitution, (Art. 4, Sec. 2,) respecting fugitives from labour, had not been inserted in that instrument, the right of masters to reclaim their fugitive slaves would not have existed. That provision, says Justice Wayne, confers upon the owner of a fugitive slave the right.

From the principles laid down it evidently follows, that a slave removing by the knowledge and consent of his master out of the jurisdiction of a slaveholding State, into a place where no law existed to make him a slave, becomes immediately free; and if restrained of his freedom is held merely by force and not by law. When a cargo of slaves is carried from one of the ports in a slave State, to the high seas, the slavery which is founded upon and limited to the range of the territorial laws, ceases as a matter of course. The quondam slaves are subject to no law but that of nations, or those of the United States. Now we apprehend the laws of the Union may be searched in vain for any provision to perpetuate the slavery of negroes or persons of colour, who are removed by the act of their owners beyond the jurisdiction of the particular States.

The Article of the Constitution which authorizes the recovery of fugitives from labour, does not recognise slavery as existing under the laws of the Union; it treats it as existing under the local laws; and in case of escape, not of removal by compulsion of their masters, they may be reclaimed. In other words, the slavery which, if this article had not been adopted, must have been limited to the range of the territorial laws, is extended, under particular and defined circumstances, to all parts of the Union. The law of congress, which was intended to give efficiency to this constitutional provision, is limited, as the constitutional article is, to the case of persons escaping from the jurisdiction of the local law.

When the negroes on board of the Creole, rose upon those by whom they were held, they were simply repelling force by force, not violating the law. If in the effort to repress this attempt to recover their freedom, any of the slaves had been killed, a slaveholding jury would hardly have pronounced the homicide wilful murder. Could any jury, with greater regard to justice or law, decide that the negroes were guilty of murder, if they destroyed a life in their conflict for the recovery of their natural rights? It would be a question which would not occupy our courts very long in deciding, whether, in case the captives on board an American slaver on the high seas should make a successful insurrection, and in the conflict cause the death of part of the crew, those captives could be indicted and punished for murder. And what essential difference is there between such a case and that of the Creole? If our voice could be heard, we should certainly advise the victims of this cruel traffic, whether African or American, to submit to their lot, however cruel and unjust, rather than recover their freedom at the expense of human life; but we would also admonish our white compatriots to avoid placing themselves in a situation wherein their lives were out of the protection of law. If, on the high seas, the only law by which the victims of this commerce are restrained, is the law of the strongest, it is not easily seen upon what principle those who engage in it can object to the operation of this law, even though its decision should not be in their favour. In any State of the Union, or on board of an American vessel on the high seas, an attempt to reduce a freeman to slavery by violence, if accompanied by the slaughter of the intended victim, would undoubtedly be construed as murder. By what appellation shall we then designate a homicide occasioned by an effort to suppress an insurrection for the recovery of freedom unlawfully withheld on the ocean? And would it be possible to prosecute a trade in slaves from one American port to another, without manifesting a determination to destroy the life of any victim of the traffic, who could not otherwise be restrained from regaining his freedom? It may be asserted in general, that the moral turpitude of an act, is in the intention rather than in the action itself. The man who deliberately determines and prepares for the commission of murder, is certainly, in a moral point of view, little less criminal than the man who actually perpetrates it. We may then seriously inquire, whether those who engage in the traffic in slaves, and go armed with pistols and clubs to repress all attempts for the recovery of freedom, do, or do not place themselves on the same moral platform with the actual unlawful homicide? And if on the ocean, beyond the jurisdiction of a slave State, any reputed slave attempts the recovery of his freedom, and receives a mortal wound from one who is forcibly restraining him, in what light would the law, properly construed, regard the action?

WAR IN MEXICO—THE WILMOT PROVISION.—The progress of the war in Mexico, attended by successive victories on the part of the United States over a people contending for their homes and firesides, but less skilled in military tactics, and less supplied with means of warfare than their northern invaders, has at length brought the capital of that empire into substantial, if not formal, occupation of this Republic. In the battle decisive of this long looked for event, five thousand Mexicans under the command of Generals Valencia and Santa Anna, and twelve hundred of our own countrymen, under command of Gen. Scott, are said to have fallen, victims to the wretched spirit of aggrandizement which instigated the war, and to the false ambition and patriotism which has prosecuted it to this result. This battle, which took place on the 20th of the 8th month last, was followed by a suspension of arms, at the prayer of the Mexicans, who desired a further opportunity of considering the terms of peace which the United States had proffered them, and which called for a large concession of Mexican territory to the latter. That Mexico, prostrated to the dust by her successive catastrophes, will agree to this dismemberment of her empire, there can now be but little doubt. That the territory acquired, on which no slave can now lawfully breathe, will be desecrated to the dominion of the Slave power, there can be as little doubt, unless, indeed, the freemen of the North shall demand, in terms not to be misunderstood by their representatives in Congress, that the Wilmot proviso shall be enacted.

*Touching the consummation of this desirable measure, we feel no reliance on either of the great parties which now, on issues which have no relation to Slavery, nearly divide our country.

They are each in alliance with the South, and would each prefer any measure, hostile as it might be to freedom, to the destruction of their party integrity. We already see this in the drawing off of many of the papers, of both the parties, from the support of the Wilmot proviso, each fearing the effect, which such support may induce, of driving their Southern adherents to the opposite side. Such a provision, says one, will be a proper enough measure when the territory is acquired, but why distract our party with it before the appropriate time?—"The Wilmot proviso," says another, "was offered by a Pennsylvania Loco Foco, and sustained by the vote of the Loco Focos in Congress and our Legislature."—"The mass of the Whigs have never recognized the Wilmot proviso as unconditionally, or primarily, the issue—the first great issue to be met by the Whigs is that in relation to the needless acquisition of territory. No MEXICAN TERRITORY. Let this be the issue. Let this be the motto inscribed on the Whig banner, and victory is certain!"

That Mexican territory, if acquired by treaty, will come into the Union by Whig votes, as well as Democratic ones, is just as certain as that Texas so came into it. It is idle to believe that the fruits of a war which already has cost the nation a hundred million of dollars, will be rejected as utterly worthless by the northern portion of our country, much less the southern. It is only by the Wilmot proviso, forthwith adopted, that safety to our nation against the encroachments of slavery can be ensured. Let the people demand it, irrespective of party, and our country may yet be saved.

"FRIENDS' REVIEW."—We have before us the first number of a paper bearing this title, edited by Enoch Lewis. It is a large octavo of 16 pages, and is intended to be issued weekly, being designed, as its name would imply, to subserve particularly the interests of the Society of Friends, though its field of operation will embrace subjects interesting also to the general reader. The Editor in his prospectus well remarks:—

"The period in which we live, compared with any that has preceded it, may be emphatically denominated a reading age. Literary productions of every description, from the ponderous volume to the ephemeral sheet, are issuing from the press in rapid succession. If, when the literature of the day, in comparison with that of ours, must have been as a rivulet, contrasted with the Nile or the Ganges, the wisest of men could declare, that of making many books there was no end, and much study is a weariness of the flesh, we may safely conclude that the floating literature of our time is sufficient to overwhelm the strongest intellect, and set at defiance the most indefatigable industry. Yet amidst this inundation of books, there is much to be found which is truly valuable, and, when judiciously selected, well worthy of attention, particularly from those who are in the early and middle periods of life. It is not to be expected or desired that the youth, either in or out of our religious Society, should grow up in ignorance of the events which are transpiring around them, or of the improvements in morals, in science, or the arts, which the ingenuity of our contemporaries are bringing into view. To preserve a tolerable acquaintance with the events of our time, as they arise, recourse must be had to the periodicals of the day. It is therefore an object of rational desire, that these should be purged of everything which is likely to corrupt the principles, or deteriorate the moral sensibilities of their readers."

To make this separation, is prominently an object of the Review; other purposes also are presented:

"It is designed to defend and uphold the great principles, both in theory and practice, which the Society of Friends, from their rise to the present time, have professed and maintained. But in defending the doctrines of the Society, it is intended to avoid, as far as practicable, all controversial discussions, more particularly on questions which lead to no important practical result. Believing, as he [the Editor] assuredly does, that the doctrines promulgated by our primitive Friends, are the doctrines of the Gospel, and that the great truths which they promulgated, are fixed and immutable, no countenance will be given, in this paper, to any thing which might have tendency to unsettle them."

"Though it is not intended that the paper shall be devoted to any single object of discussion or enquiry, yet there are some great moral questions, in the examination of which, Friends have taken a leading and prominent part. To subjects of that character, the columns of this paper will be freely opened. Among the evils which disgrace our age and nation, and retard the progress of civilization, there are none of greater magnitude than the twin progeny of barbarous ages, Slavery and War. The Editor is aware that on the former of these subjects no inconsiderable excitement prevails; that much diversity of opinion appears among the advocates of freedom, as to the mode by which the acknowledged evils of slavery may be most quickly and effectually redressed; and that this diversity has led to discussions in which the zeal of the combatants is sometimes more conspicuous than their clarity; yet this does not in his mind furnish a satisfactory reason why the subject should be excluded from his paper."

"As we have various indications of a growing conviction on the minds of many, who are not of our religious Society, of the folly as well as the wickedness of war, it will be one object with the editor to bring into the view of his readers such facts illustrative of this subject as may fall under his notice. If any important movement, of a national character, indicating an advance in this righteous cause, should be observed, the readers of this paper will be duly apprised of it."

"The rapid advances in science and art which a few of the past years have exhibited, render it certain that further developments of a similar character will be made. It is intended to bestow sufficient attention upon subjects of that nature, to keep the readers of this paper apprised of the most important discoveries, as far as they would be interesting to the general reader."

To the capacity of the editor for carrying out the purposes he contemplates, our testimony is unnecessary. No man is better or more advantageously known within the Society of Friends, than is Enoch Lewis; and no one knowing him will doubt that the ability he will bring with him to the task, will, when the discussion of principles is involved, be exerted in that spirit of kindness which will leave behind it no sting but the conviction of the truth he demonstrates.

The paper before us contains two articles of especial value; one, a review of the Memoir of the Life of Elizabeth Fry, the other, a Testimony of the Two Months Meeting of Congregies, France, concerning Louis Antoine Majolier, and is diversified by other interesting articles, among them Whittier's "Barclay of Ury."

It has been objected to this paper that it is uncalled for by any requirements of the Society of Friends, which are unsupplied by the periodical which has long and very advantageously existed within its limits. To the merits of "The Friend" we accord a cheerful testimony, but we do not presume its respected conductors claim for it the reputation of containing all the literary and moral information necessary to the Society. If it furnished the entire, with the solitary exception that on the great topic for which we are month to the dumb, it was inflexibly silent, that exception would be in itself a sufficient reason for the establishment of another paper. For both journals there is open a wide arena of usefulness, which each can occupy without crossing the path of the other, and which, each occupying to the full extent of its limits, will still leave something to be done by others for the instruction and edification of the Society and the World.

the Burlington Gazette, has done us the kindness to send us the remarks of the same amiable reviewer on the second volume of that work. We have given a ready insertion to each division of this review, not more as a just tribute to the character of the excellent individual it portrays, than as evidencing the brotherly feeling which unites all who call in sincerity on the name of the Lord Jesus. We love to contemplate the workings of this expansive feeling.

BUNYAN'S PILGRIM, AND HAWTHORNE'S RAIL ROAD.—The journeyings of a Christian from the wilderness of this world to the Celestial City, are so admirably described by John Bunyan in his fine allegory of "the Pilgrim's Progress," as to have made it one of the most ingenious, interesting, and popular works in our language. Time has taken nothing from the vividness of its colourings; and in its very quaintness there is a richness which modern art could not well supply. Dr. Johnson highly commends the work as one of great original genius, and reckons it among the very few books which every reader wishes had been longer. Augustus Montague Toplady speaks of it as "the finest allegorical book extant: describing every stage of a believer's experience, from conversion to glorification, in the most artless simplicity of language; yet peculiarly rich with spiritual unction, and glowing with the most vivid, just, and well conducted machinery throughout." "It is, in short," says he, "a master piece of piety and genius; and will, we doubt not, be of standing use to the people of God, so long as the sun and moon endure." "The allegory," says James Grainger, "is admirably carried on, and the characters justly drawn and uniformly supported." Lord Kames remarks of it, "The Pilgrim's Progress and Robinson Crusoe, great favorites of the vulgar, are composed in a style enlivened, like that of Homer, by a proper mixture of the dramatic and narrative;" and Dr. Franklin says—"Honest John Bunyan is the first I know of, who has mingled narrative and dialogue together; a mode of writing very engaging to the reader, who, in the most interesting passages, finds himself admitted, as it were, into the company, and present at the conversation."

We present these views of this admirable work that the few of our readers who have not yet had the pleasure of reading it, may be reminded of an enjoyment yet at their command. Its perusal seems almost necessary to the full appreciation of the article, bearing the title of "the Celestial Rail Road," which appears in our present number. The ingenious superstructure which Hawthorne describes, is apparently over the same tract, with occasional short cuts for reducing the distance, which poor "Christian" travelled, but with its morasses filled up, and its mountains of difficulties reduced to pleasant, unobstructing plains. Such a Rail Road has been long a desideratum in the world. We feel ourselves indebted to the author for his description of it, as also for his account of how it ends. We can readily fancy the self-complacency with which the traveller whisks onward in the easy and rapidly moving car, with no ungracious company within to annoy his taste, and, probably, with no Jim-Crow car without to arrest his speed; and we can well imagine his feelings when he nears the desired city! We think "the Celestial Rail Road" is destined to go down to distant time in company with "the Pilgrim's Progress," amplified, it may be, in its details, to make it commensurate with the other, but with not the less enduring fame to its original projector.

IMPORTANT ABOLITION MOVEMENT.—The Journal of Commerce says:—"Letters received here by the Caledonia, from unquestionable sources, announce that, on the 28th of July last, the King of Denmark issued a decree declaring that all persons who should thereafter be born in his dominions should be born free, and that all persons in servitude in his dominions on the 28th of July last, and remaining so on the 28th of July, 1859, shall then be absolutely free, without compensation to the owners."

In the negotiation with the colonists which preceded the issuing of this decree, he offered them the alternative of three years with a compensation of $60 per head for each slave, or twelve years without any compensation, and they chose the latter.

Denmark has three small islands in the West Indies, viz. St. Croix, St. Thomas, and St. John's. St. Croix contains about 30,000 slaves. St. Thomas and St. John, perhaps 5,000 more.

THE LIFE OF WILLIAM ALLEN.

SECOND PART.

A few weeks since we prepared a short notice of the first volume of this remarkable and delightful biography. The second volume of the American edition has not yet appeared, but by the kindness of an esteemed friend we have been permitted to finish the work in the London edition. The interest which the early part excited, so far from being diminished, only increases as we go forward. The same extraordinary narratives of well-doing and active philanthropy occur on every page—and the same radiant consistency of lofty purpose shines throughout the whole. We are still in the same delightful companionship. The placid face of Wilberforce still beams upon us;—we still hear the cheerful voice of Thomas Clarkson, although grown gray in doing good;—we occasionally get a glimpse of the plain coat of Josiah Forster, and the meek face of Elizabeth Fry,—and the venerated form of our townsman, now bending under the weight of years, and "leaning on his staff," still moves before us. Thus beautifully does William Allen announce the arrival of his fellow-laborer in England, in 1831.

"After a short time spent in conversation, my dear wife and some of the family being present, a feeling of solemnity prevailed, and Stephen Grellet knelt down and returned thanks, that the covering of divine love under which we had separated eleven years ago, was mercifully extended over us on our meeting again."

In company with Mr. Grellet, he paid several visits to the continent, with the view of interesting the men of rank and influence in their various enterprises of religion and benevolence. Among other countries they visited Spain, where their plain dress excited a great sensation, but they were everywhere received with the highest respect. An interview with the King was granted to them. They were ushered into an apartment in the middle of which the King and Queen were standing, the Queen holding the hand of the little Princess, "a nice, lively child, who seemed much diverted at seeing" the strangers. There were no officers in attendance, and the opportunity was improved for a short conversation with the royal pair on religious topics. This was received kindly by the King, and they "took a respectful leave, under a precious feeling of the support of their Divine Master." While in Spain, they also prepared a report to the government of all their researches in the prisons, and the various public institutions, with various practical suggestions for their improvement.

While reading this biography, we have been impressed with nothing more strikingly than with the perfect equanimity and constancy of holy purpose, which seems to pervade the whole current of Allen's thoughts and actions. He is never lifted above it by the allurements of splendid and refined society, nor turned from it by any "fear of man," or the dread of any obstacle. The palace and the hovel are alike to him. When in Austria, he visits the celebrated prince Esterhazy; he is escorted through magnificent saloons by liveried attendants; he is received with the highest respect; and then sent home in the private carriage of a man who rules over eight hundred thousand peasants. All this never disturbs, or elates him. When he reaches his lodgings he simply records in his diary—"In the night, and this day, my mind has been turned to the Lord with humble mental prayer that He would be with me;" and afterwards he says, "I had a precious quiet time in my own chamber this evening." Such is the perfect peace of a man whose mind, rising above the vanities of earth, is stayed on the arm of Jehovah.

The account of his wife's death, which occurred in 1835, is extremely touching. We could not read it without tears. "Dear E— and L— came to me," he says, "in ray study, and we sat together in silence, and sweet unity of spirit. I thought that we might each adopt the language—'My heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord.' About nine o'clock we proceeded to Winchmore Hill, where the remains of my beloved wife were to be deposited. Though under great depression, my mind was preserved in calmness. There was a covering of solemnity in the meeting, and at the ground my dear daughter-in-law spoke sweetly. I have nothing more now to desire, but to be enabled to fill up the measure of my duties and sufferings, and that through infinite mercy, and the merits of my dear Redeemer, I also may receive a peaceful dismissal, and rejoin her blessed spirit, to unite in praising and magnifying Him that sitteth on the throne, and the Lamb, forever and ever."

But we have no space for further extracts;—did we copy all that we admire, we should have to transcribe well nigh the whole book. It must be read for itself—for every page is teeming with the record of noble deeds, told with exceeding dignity and simplicity. There is no ostentatious parade of Pharisaical humility; and no fulsome eulogy expended on what is, after all, its own best eulogy. The biographers have discharged their duty well, leaving the man as far as possible to describe himself. The record of his death struck us with peculiar beauty and impressiveness. They describe it in a few simple words, with no interjections or ejaculations of their own, to disturb the solemn effect which the narrative, itself produces.

They tell us that on the 16th of October, 1843, he was seized with a violent illness. For two months he lingered, yet in full possession of his mental powers. The book of God was daily read to him, and he received great comfort from the letters of Stephen Grellet and Joseph John Gurney. No murmur escaped his lips. He sank into a deep sleep "on the 30th of Twelfth month," and this deepened, and deepened, until his redeemed spirit was gently released, and passed, without a groan, to the presence of his God.

Noble William Allen! We bid thee a sad, and mournful farewell! Under thy plain Quaker garb, did beat a hearty, quick with the loftiest instincts of humanity—tender and gentle as a lamb, but inflexible in its fealty to truth, to freedom, and to holiness. Thou didst wear no shield or sword—but yet didst war against wrong and oppression with a heroism as earnest as ever throbbed beneath a corslet. Thou wert brave with a courage that "feared no evil tidings," and honest with an integrity that knew no stain. Right faithful wert thou to the true interests of suffering humanity! When the ear of the victim of oppression heard thee, then it blessed thee; and when the eye saw thee, it beamed with grateful gladness. The blessing of many who were ready to perish came upon thee, and thou didst cause the mourner's heart to sing for joy. There was no need, to thee, of stars and coronets, and titles of nobility, for thou didst belong to the most ancient of orders—the high order of MANHOOD!

Thy sublime pilgrimage of benevolence is ended—

—“and thou henceforth shalt have a good man's rest,
A saint's felicity: Thy warm heart doth find Repose at length, great Friend of human-kind!”

THE CELESTIAL RAILROAD.

BY NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE.

Not a great while ago, passing through the gate of dreams, I visited that region of the earth in which lies the famous city of Destruction. It interested me much to learn, that, by the public spirit of some of the inhabitants, a railroad has recently been established between this populous and flourishing town, and the Celestial City. Having a little time upon my hands, I resolved to gratify a liberal curiosity by making a trip thither. Accordingly, one fine morning, after paying my bill at the hotel, and directing the porter to stow my luggage behind a coach, I took my seat in the vehicle, and set out for the Station-house. It was my good fortune to enjoy the company of a gentleman—one Mr. Smooth-it-away—who, though he had never actually visited the Celestial City, yet seemed as well acquainted with its laws, customs, policy, and statistics, as with those of the city of Destruction, of which he was a native townsman. Being, moreover, a director of the railroad corporation, and one of its largest stockholders, he had it in his power to give me all desirable information respecting that praiseworthy enterprise.

Our coach rattled out of the city, and, at a short distance from its outskirts, passed over a bridge of elegant construction, but somewhat too slight, as I imagined, to sustain any considerable weight. On both sides lay an extensive quagmire, which could not have been more disagreeable to sight or smell, had all the kennels of the earth emptied their pollution there.

"This," remarked Mr. Smooth-it-away, "is the famous Slough of Despond—a disgrace to all the neighborhood; and the greater, that it might so easily be converted into firm ground."

"I have understood," said I, "that efforts have been made for that purpose, from time immemorial. Bunyan mentions that about twenty thousand cartloads of wholesome instructions had been thrown in here, without effect."

"Very probably!—and what effect could be anticipated from such unsubstantial stuff?" cried Mr. Smooth-it-away. "You observe this convenient bridge. We obtained a sufficient foundation for it, by throwing into the Slough some editions of books of morality, volumes of French philosophy and German rationalism, tracts, sermons, and essays of modern clergymen, extracts from Plato, Confucius, and various Hindoo sages, together with a few ingenious commentaries upon texts of Scripture—all of which, by some scientific process, have been converted into a mass like granite. The whole bog might be filled up with similar matter."

It really seemed to me, however, that the bridge vibrated and heaved up and down, in a very formidable manner; and, spite of Mr. Smooth-it-away's testimony to the solidity of its foundation, I should be loth to cross it in a crowded omnibus; especially, if each passenger were encumbered with as heavy luggage as that gentleman and myself. Nevertheless we got over without accident, and soon found ourselves at the Station-house. This very neat and spacious edifice is erected on the site of the little Wicket-Gate, which formerly, as all old pilgrims will recollect, stood directly across the highway, and by its inconvenient narrowness, was a great obstruction to the traveller of liberal mind and expansive stomach. The reader of John Bunyan will be glad to know, that Christian's old friend Evangelist, who was accustomed to supply each pilgrim with a mystic roll, now presides at the ticket-office. Some malicious persons, it is true, deny the identity of this reputable character with the Evangelist of old times, and even pretend to bring competent evidence of an imposture. Without involving myself in the dispute, I shall merely observe, that, so far as my experience goes, the square pieces of pasteboard, now delivered to passengers, are much more convenient and useful along the road, than the antique roll of parchment. Whether they will be as readily received at the gate of the Celestial City, I decline giving an opinion.

A large number of passengers were already at the Station-house, awaiting the departure of the cars. By the aspect and demeanor of these persons, it was easy to judge that the feelings of the community had undergone a very favorable change, in reference to the celestial pilgrimage. It would have done Bunyan's heart good to see it. Instead of a lonely and ragged man, with a huge burthen on his back, plodding along sorrowfully on foot, while the whole city hooted after him, here were parties of the first gentry and most respectable people in the neighborhood, setting forth towards the Celestial City, as cheerfully as if the pilgrimage were merely a summer tour. Among the gentlemen were characters of deserved eminence, magistrates, politicians, and men of wealth, by whose example religion could not but be greatly recommended to their meaner brethren. In the ladies' apartment, too, I rejoiced to distinguish some of those flowers of fashionable society, who are so well fitted to adorn the most elevated circles of the Celestial City. There was much pleasant conversation about the news of the day, topics of business, politics, or the lighter matters of amusement; while religion, though indubitably the main thing at heart, was thrown tastefully into the back-ground. Even an infidel would have heard little or nothing to shock his sensibility.

One great convenience of the new method of going on pilgrimage, I must not forget to mention. Our enormous burthens, instead of being carried on our shoulders, as had been the custom of old, were all snugly deposited in the baggage-car, and, as I was assured, would be delivered to their respective owners at the journey's end. Another thing likewise, the benevolent reader will be delighted to understand. It may be remembered that there was an ancient feud between Prince Beelzebub and the keeper of the Wicket-Gate, and that the adherents of the former distinguished personage were accustomed to shoot deadly arrows at honest pilgrims, while knocking at the door. This dispute, much to the credit as well of the illustrious potentate above mentioned, as of the worthy and enlightened Directors of the railroad, has been pacifically arranged, on the principle of mutual compromise. The Prince's subjects are now pretty numerously employed about the Station-house, some in taking care of the baggage, others in collecting fuel, feeding the engines, and such congenial occupations; and I can conscientiously affirm, that persons more attentive to their business, more willing to accommodate, or more generally agreeable to the passengers, are not to be found on any railroad; every good heart must surely exult at so satisfactory an arrangement of an immemorial difficulty.

"Where is Mr. Great-heart?" inquired I. "Beyond a doubt, the Directors have engaged that famous old champion to be chief conductor on the railroad?"

"Why, no," said Mr. Smooth-it-away, with a dry cough. "He was offered the situation of brakeman; but, to tell you the truth, our friend Great-heart has grown preposterously stiff and narrow, in his old age. He has so often guided pilgrims over the road, on foot, that he considers it a sin to travel in any other fashion. Besides, the old fellow had entered so heartily into the ancient feud with Prince Beelzebub, that he would have been perpetually at blows or ill language with some of the prince's subjects, and thus have embroiled us anew. So, on the whole, we were not sorry when honest Great-heart went off to the Celestial City in a huff, and left us at liberty to choose a more suitable and accommodating man. Yonder comes the conductor of the train. You will probably recognise him at once."

The engine at this moment took its station in advance of the cars, looking, I must confess, much more like a sort of mechanical demon that would hurry us to the infernal regions, than a laudable contrivance for smoothing our way to the Celestial City. On its top sat a personage almost enveloped in smoke and flame, which—not to startle the reader—appeared to gush from his own mouth and stomach, as well as from the engine's brazen abdomen.

"Do my eyes deceive me?" cried I. "What on earth is this! A living creature!—if so, he is own brother to the engine that he rides upon!"

"Poh, poh, you are obtuse!" said Mr. Smooth-it-away, with a hearty laugh. "Don't you know Apollyon, Christian's old enemy, with whom he fought so fierce a battle in the valley of Humiliation? He was the very fellow to manage the engine; and so we have reconciled him to the custom of going on pilgrimage, and engaged him as chief conductor."

"Bravo, bravo!" exclaimed I, with irrepressible enthusiasm. "this shows the liberality of the age; this proves, if anything can, that all musty prejudices are in a fair way to be obliterated. And how will Christian rejoice to hear of this happy transformation of his old antagonist! I promise myself great pleasure in informing him of it, when we reach the Celestial City."

The passengers being all comfortably seated, we now rattled away merrily, accomplishing a greater distance in ten minutes than Christian probably trodged over in a day. It was laughable while we glanced along, as it were, at the tail of a thunderbolt, to observe two dusty foot-travellers, in the old pilgrim guise, with cockleshell and staff, their mystic rolls of parchment in their hands, and their intolerable burthens on their backs. The preposterous obstinacy of these honest people, in persisting to groan and stumble along the difficult pathway, rather than take advantage of modern improvements, excited great mirth among our wiser brotherhood. We greeted the two pilgrims with many pleasant gibes and a roar of laughter; whereupon, they gazed at us with such woeful and absurdly compassionate visages, that our merriment grew ten-fold more obstreperous. Apollyon, also, entered heartily into the fun, and contrived to flit the smoke and flame of the engine, or of his own breath, into their faces, and envelope them in an atmosphere of scalding steam. These little practical jokes amused us mightily, and doubtless afforded the pilgrims the gratification of considering themselves martyrs.

At some distance from the railroad, Mr. Smooth-it-away pointed to a large, antique edifice, which, he observed, was a tavern of long standing, and had formerly been a noted stopping-place for pilgrims. In Bunyan's road-book it is mentioned as the Interpreter's House.

"I have long had a curiosity to visit that old mansion," remarked I.

"It is not one of our stations, as you perceive," said my companion. "The keeper was violently opposed to the railroad; and well he might be, the track left his house of entertainment on one side, and thus was pretty certain to deprive him of all his reputable customers. But the foot path still passes his door; and the old gentleman now and then receives a call from some simple traveller, and entertains him with fare as old-fashioned as himself."

Before our talk on this subject came to a conclusion, we were rushing by the place where Christian's burthen fell from his shoulders, at the sight of the Cross. This served as a theme for Mr. Smooth-it-away, Mr. Live-for-the-world, Mr. Hide-sin-in-the-heart, Mr. Scaly-conscience, and a knot of gentlemen from the town of Shun-repentance, to descant upon the inestimable advantages resulting from the safety of our baggage. Myself, and all the passengers, indeed, joined with great unanimity in this view of the matter; for our burthens were rich in many things esteemed precious throughout the world; and, especially, we each of us possessed a great variety of favorite Habits, which we trusted would not be out of fashion, even in the polite circles of the Celestial City. It would have been a sad spectacle to see such an assortment of valuable articles tumbling into the sepulchre. Thus pleasantly conversing on the favorable circumstances of our position, as compared with those of past pilgrims, and of narrow-minded ones at the present day, we soon found ourselves at the foot of the Hill Difficulty. Through the very heart of this rocky mountain a tunnel has been constructed, of most admirable architecture, with a lofty arch and spacious double-track; so that, unless the earth and rocks should chance to crumble down, it will remain an eternal monument of the builder's skill and enterprise. It is a great though incidental advantage, that the materials from the heart of the Hill Difficulty have been employed in filling up the Valley of Humiliation; thus obviating the necessity of descending into that disagreeable and unwholesome hollow.

"This is a wonderful improvement, indeed," said I. "Yet I should have been glad of an opportunity to visit the Palace Beautiful, and be introduced to the charming young ladies—Miss Prudence, Miss Piety, Miss Charity and the rest—who have the kindness to entertain pilgrims there."

"Young ladies!" cried Mr. Smooth-it-away, as soon as he could speak for laughing. "And charming young ladies! Why, my dear fellow, they are old maids, every soul of them—prim, starch, dry, and angular—and not one of them, I will venture to say, has altered so much as the fashion of her gown, since the days of Christian's pilgrimage."

"Ah, well," said I, much comforted, "then I can very readily dispense with their acquaintance."

"The respectable Apollyon was now putting on the steam at a prodigious rate; anxious, perhaps, to get rid of the unpleasant reminiscences connected with the spot where he had so disastrously encountered Christian. Consulting Mr. Bunyan's road-book, I perceived that we must now be within a few miles of the Valley of the Shadow of Death; into which doleful region, at our present speed, we should plunge much sooner than seemed at all desirable. In truth, I expected nothing better than to find myself in the ditch on one side, or the quag on the other. But, on communicating my apprehensions to Mr. Smooth-it-away, he assured me that the difficulties of this passage, even in its worst condition, had been vastly exaggerated, and that, in its present state of improvement, I might consider myself as safe as on any railroad in Christendom.

Even while we were speaking, the train shot into the entrance of this dreaded Valley. Though I plead guilty to some foolish palpitations of the heart, during our headlong rush over the causeway here constructed, yet it were unjust to withhold the highest encomiums on the boldness of its original conception, and the ingenuity of those who executed it. It was gratifying, likewise, to observe how much care had been taken to dispel the everlasting gloom, and supply the defect of cheerful sunshine; not a ray of which has ever penetrated among these awful shadows. For this purpose, the inflammable gas, which exudes plentifully from the soil, is collected by means of pipes, and thence communicated to a quadruple row of lamps, along the whole extent of the passage. Thus a radiance has been created, even out of the fiery and sulphurous curse that rests for ever upon the Valley; a radiance hurtful, however, to the eyes, and somewhat bewildering, as I discovered by the changes which it wrought in the visages of my companions. In this respect, as compared with natural daylight, there is the same difference as between truth and falsehood; but if the reader have ever travelled through the dark Valley, he will have learned to be thankful for any light that he could get; if not from the sky above, then from the blasted soil beneath. Such was the red brilliancy of these lamps, that they appeared to build walls of fire on both sides of the track, between which we held our course at lightning speed, while a reverberating thunder filled the Valley with its echoes. Had the engine run off the track—a catastrophe, it is whispered, by no means unprecedented—the bottomless pit, if there be any such place, would undoubtedly have received us. Just as some dismal fooleries of this nature had made my heart quake, there came a tremendous shriek careering along the Valley, as if a thousand devils had burst their lungs to utter it, but which proved to be merely the whistle of the engine, on arriving at a stopping-place.

The spot, where we had now paused, is the same that our friend Bunyan—a truthful man, but infected with many fantastic notions—has designated, in terms plainer than I like to repeat, as the mouth of the infernal region. This, however, must be a mistake; inasmuch as Mr. Smooth-it-away, while we remained in the smoky and lurid cavern, took occasion to prove that Tophet has not even a metaphorical existence. The place, he assured us, is no other than the crater of a half-extinct volcano, in which the Directors had caused forges to be set up, for the manufacture of railroad iron. Hence, also, is obtained a plentiful supply of fuel for the use of the engines. Whoever had gazed into the dismal obscurity of the broad cavern-mouth, whence ever and anon there darted huge tongues of dusky flame,—and had seen the strange, half-shaped monsters, and visions of faces horribly grotesque, into which the smoke seemed to breathe itself,—and had heard the awful murmurs, and shrieks, and deep shuddering whispers of the blast, sometimes forming itself into words almost articulate,—would have seized upon Mr. Smooth-it-away's comfortable explanation as greedily as we did. The inhabitants of the cavern, moreover, were unlovely personages, dark, smoke-begrimed, generally deformed, with mis-shapen feet, and a glow of dusky redness in their eyes; as if their hearts had caught fire, and were blazing out of the upper windows. It struck me as a peculiarity, that the laborers at the forge, and those who brought fuel to the engine, when they began to draw short breath, positively emitted smoke from their mouth and nostrils.

Among the idlers about the train, most of whom were puffing cigars which they had lighted at the flame of the crater, I was perplexed to notice several who, to my certain knowledge, had heretofore set forth by railroad for the Celestial City. They looked dark, wild, and smoky, with a singular resemblance, indeed, to the native inhabitants; like whom, also, they had a disagreeable propensity to ill-natured gibes and sneers, the habit of which had wrought a settled contortion of their visages. Having been on speaking terms with one of these persons—an indolent, good-for-nothing fellow, who went by the name of Take-it-easy—I called to him, and inquired what was his business there.

"Did you not start," said I, "for the Celestial City?"

"That's a fact," said Mr. Take-it-easy, carelessly puffing some smoke in my eyes. "But I heard such bad accounts, that I never took pains to climb the hill, on which the city stands. No business doing—no fun going on—nothing to drink, and no smoking allowed—and a thrumming of church-music from morning till night! I would not stay in such a place, if they offered me house-room and living free."

"But, my good Mr. Take-it-easy," cried I, "why take up your residence here, of all places in the world?"

"Oh," said the loafer, with a grin, "it is very warm hereabouts, and I meet with plenty of old acquaintances, and altogether the place suits me. I hope to see you back again, some day soon. A pleasant journey to you!"

While he was speaking, the bell of the engine rang, and we dashed away, after dropping a few passengers, but receiving no new ones. Rattling onward through the Valley, we were dazzled with the fiercely gleaming gas-lamps, as before. But sometimes, in the dark, of intense brightness, grim faces, that bore the aspect and expression of individual sins, or evil passions, seemed to thrust themselves through the veil of light, glaring upon us, and stretching forth a great dusky hand, as if to impede our progress. I almost thought, that they were my own sins that appalled me there. These were freaks of imagination—nothing more, certainly,—mere delusions, which I ought to be heartily ashamed of—but, all through the Dark Valley, I was tormented, and pestered, and dolefully bewildered, with the same kind of waking dreams. The mephitic gases of that region intoxicate the brain. As the light of natural day, however, began to struggle with the glow of the lanterns, these vain imaginations lost their vividness, and finally vanished with the first ray of sunshine that greeted our escape from the Valley of the Shadow of Death. Ere we had gone a mile beyond it, I could well nigh have taken my oath, that this whole gloomy passage was a dream.

At the end of the Valley, as John Bunyan mentions, is a cavern, where, in his days, dwelt two cruel giants, Pope and Pagan, who had strewn the ground about their residence with the bones of slaughtered pilgrims. These vile old froglo-dytes are no longer there; but into their deserted cave another terrible giant has thrust himself, and makes it his business to seize upon honest travellers, and fat them for his table with plentiful meals of smoke, mist, moonshine, raw potatoes, and saw-dust. He is a German by birth, and is called Giant Transcendentalist; but as to his form, his features, his substance, and his nature generally, it is the chief peculiarity of this huge miscreant, that neither he for himself, nor anybody for him, has ever been able to describe them. As we rushed by the cavern's mouth, we caught a hasty glimpse of him, looking somewhat like an ill-proportioned figure, but considerably more like a heap of fog and duskiness. He shouted after us, but in so strange a phraseology, that we knew not what he meant, nor whether to be encouraged or affrighted.

It was late in the day, when the train thundered into the ancient city of Vanity, where Vanity Fair is still at the height of prosperity, and exhibits an epitome of whatever is brilliant, gay, and fascinating, beneath the sun. As I purposed to make a considerable stay here, it gratified me to learn that there is no longer the want of harmony between the townspeople and pilgrims, which impelled the former to such lamentably mistaken measures as the persecution of Christian, and the fiery martyrdom of Faithful. On the contrary, as the new railroad brings with it great trade and a constant influx of strangers, the lord of Vanity Fair is its chief patron, and the capitalists of the city are among the largest stockholders. Many passengers stop to take their pleasure or make their profit in the Fair, instead of going onward to the Celestial City. Indeed, such are the charms of the place, that people often affirm it to be the true and only heaven; stoutly contending that there is no other, that those who seek further are mere dreamers, and that, if the fabled brightness of the Celestial City lay but a bare mile beyond the gates of Vanity, they would not be fools enough to go thither. Without subscribing to these, perhaps, exaggerated encomiums, I can truly say, that my abode in the city was mainly agreeable, and my intercourse with the inhabitants productive of much amusement and instruction.

Being naturally of a serious turn, my attention was directed to the solid advantages derivable from a residence here, rather than to the effervescent pleasures which are the grand object with too many visitants. The Christian reader, if he have had no accounts of the city later than Bunyan's time, will be surprised to hear that almost every street has its church, and that the reverend clergy are nowhere held in higher respect than at Vanity Fair. And well do they deserve such honorable estimation; for the maxims of wisdom and virtue which fall from their lips, come from as deep a spiritual source, and tend to as lofty a religious aim, as those of the wisest philosophers of old. In justification of this high praise, I need only mention the names of the Rev. Mr. Shallow-deep; the Rev. Mr. Stumble-at-Truth; that fine old clerical character, the Rev. Mr. This-to-day, who expects shortly to resign his pulpit to the Rev. Mr. That-to-morrow; together with the Rev. Mr. Bewilderment; the Rev. Mr. Clog-the-spirit; and, last and greatest, the Rev. Dr. Wind-of-doctrine. The labours of these eminent divines are aided by those of innumerable lecturers, who diffuse such a various profundity, on all subjects of human or celestial science, that any man may acquire an omnigenous erudition, without the trouble of even learning to read. Thus literature is etherealized by assuming for its medium the human voice; and knowledge, depositing all its heavier particles—except, doubtless, its gold—becomes exhaled into a sound, which forthwith steals into the ever-open ear of the community. These ingenious methods constitute a sort of machinery, by which thought and study are done to every person's hand, without his putting himself to the slightest inconvenience in the matter. There is another species of machine for the wholesale manufacture of individual morality. This excellent result is effected by societies for all manner of virtuous purposes; with which a man has merely to connect himself, throwing, as it were, his quota of virtue into the common stock; and the president and directors will take care that the aggregate amount be well applied. All these, and other wonderful improvements in ethics, religion, and literature, being made plain to my comprehension by the ingenious Mr. Smooth-it-away, inspired me with a vast admiration of Vanity Fair.

It would fill a volume in an age of pamphlets, were I to record all my observations in this great capital of human business and pleasure. There was an unlimited range of society—the powerful, the wise, the witty, and the famous in every walk of life—princes, presidents, poets, generals, artists, actors, and philanthropists, all making their own market at the Fair, and deeming no price too exorbitant for such commodities as hit their fancy. It was well worth one's while, even if he had no idea of buying or selling, to loiter through the bazaars, and observe the various sorts of traffic that were going forward.

Some of the purchasers, I thought, made very foolish bargains. For instance, a young man, having inherited a splendid fortune, laid out a considerable portion of it in the purchase of diseases, and finally spent all the rest for a heavy lot of repentance and a suit of rags. A very pretty girl bartered a heart as clear as crystal, and which seemed her most valuable possession, for another jewel of the same kind, but so worn and defaced as to be utterly worthless. In one shop, there were a great many crowns of laurel and myrtle, which soldiers, authors, statesmen, and various other people, pressed eagerly to buy; some purchased these paltry wreaths with their lives; others by a toilsome servitude of years; and many sacrificed whatever was most valuable, yet finally slunk away without the crown. There was a sort of stock or scrip, called Conscience, which seemed to be in great demand, and would purchase almost anything. Indeed, few rich commodities were to be obtained without paying a heavy sum in this particular stock, as a man's business was seldom very lucrative, unless he knew precisely when and how to throw his hoard of Conscience into the market. Yet as this stock was the only thing of permanent value, whoever parted with it was sure to find himself a loser, in the long run. Several of the speculations were of a questionable character. Occasionally, a member of Congress recruited his pocket by the sale of his constituents; and I was assured that public officers have often sold their country at very moderate prices. Thousands sold their happiness for a whim. Gilded chains were in great demand, and purchased with almost any sacrifice. In truth, those who desired, according to the old adage, to sell anything valuable for a song, might find customers all over the Fair; and there were innumerable messes of pottage, piping hot, for such as chose to buy them with their birth-rights. A few articles, however, could not be found genuine at Vanity Fair. If a customer wished to renew his stock of youth, the dealers offered him a set of false teeth and an auburn wig; if he demanded peace of mind, they recommended opium or a brandy-bottle.

Tracts of land and golden mansions, situate in the Celestial City, were often exchanged, at very disadvantageous rates, for a few years' lease of small, dismal, inconvenient tenements in Vanity Fair. Prince Beelzebub himself took great interest in this sort of traffic, and sometimes condescended to meddle with smaller matters. I once had the pleasure to see him bargaining with a miser for his soul, which, after much ingenious skirmishing on both sides, his Highness succeeded in obtaining at about the value of sixpence. The prince remarked, with a smile, that he was a loser by the bargain.

Day after day, as I walked the streets of Vanity, my manners and deportment became more and more like those of the inhabitants. The place began to seem like home; the idea of pursuing my travels to the Celestial City was almost oblierated from my mind. I was reminded of it, however, by the sight of the same pair of simple pilgrims at whom we had laughed so heartily, when Apollyon puffed smoke and steam into their faces, at the commencement of our journey. There they stood amid the densest bustle of Vanity—the dealers offering them their purple, and fine linen, and jewels; the men of wit and humor gibing at them; a pair of buxom ladies ogling them askance; while the benevolent Mr. Smooth-it-away whispered some of his wisdom at their elbows, and pointed to a newly-erected temple; but there were these worthy simpletons, making the scene look wild and monstrous, merely by their sturdy repudiation of all part in its business or pleasures.

One of them—his name was Stick-to-the-right—perceived in my face, I suppose, a species of sympathy and almost admiration, which, to my own great surprise, I could not help feeling for this pragmatic couple. It prompted him to address me.

"Sir," inquired he, with a sad, yet mild and kindly voice, "do you call yourself a pilgrim?"

"Yes," I replied, "my right to that appellation is indubitable. I am merely a sojourner here in Vanity Fair, being bound to the Celestial City by the new railroad."

"Alas, friend," rejoined Mr. Stick-to-the-right, "I do assure you, and beseech you to receive the truth of my words, that that whole concern is a bubble. You may travel on it all your lifetime, were you to live thousands of years, and yet never get beyond the limits of Vanity Fair! Yea; though you should deem yourself entering the gates of the Blessed City, it will be nothing but a miserable delusion."

"The Lord of the Celestial City," began the other pilgrim, whose name was Mr. Go-the-old-way, "has refused, and will ever refuse, to grant an act of incorporation for this railroad; and unless that be obtained, no passenger can ever hope to enter his dominions. Wherefore, every man who buys a ticket, must lay his account with losing the purchase-money—which is the value of his own soul."

"Poh, nonsense!" said Mr. Smooth-it-away, taking my arm and leading me off, "these fellows ought to be indicted for a libel. If the law stood as it once did in Vanity Fair, we should see them grinning through the iron bars of the prison window."

This incident made a considerable impression on my mind, and contributed with other circumstances to indispose me to a permanent residence in the city of Vanity; although, of course, I was not simple enough to give up my original plan of gliding along easily and commodiously by railroad. Still I grew anxious to be gone. There was one strange thing that troubled me; amid the occupations or amusements of the fair, nothing was more common than for a person—whether at a feast, theatre, or church, or trafficking for wealth and honors, or whatever he might be doing, and however unseasonable the interruption—suddenly to vanish like a soap-bubble, and be never more seen of his fellows; and so accustomed were the latter to such little accidents, that they went on with their business, as quietly as if nothing had happened. But it was otherwise with me.

Finally, after a pretty long residence at the Fair, I resumed my journey towards the Celestial City, still with Mr. Smooth-it-away at my side. At a short distance beyond the suburbs of Vanity, we passed the ancient silver mine, of which Demas was the first discoverer, and which is now wrought to great advantage, supplying nearly all the coined currency of the world. A little further onward was the spot where Lot's wife had stood for ages, under the semblance of a pillar of salt. Curious travellers have carried it away piecemeal. Had all regrets been punished as rigorously as this poor dame's were, my yearning for the relinquished delights of Vanity Fair might have produced a similar change in my own corporeal substance, and left me a warning to future pilgrims.

The next remarkable object was a large edifice, constructed of moss-grown stone, but in a modern and airy style of architecture. The engine came to a pause in its vicinity with the usual tremendous shriek.

"This was formerly the castle of the redoubted giant Despair," observed Mr. Smooth-it-away; "but, since his death, Mr. Flimsy-faith has repaired it, and now keeps an excellent house of entertainment here. It is one of our stopping places."

"It seems but slightly put together," remarked I, looking at the frail, yet ponderous walls. "I do not envy Mr. Flimsy-faith his habitation. Some day it will thunder down upon the heads of the occupants."

"We shall escape, at all events," said Mr. Smooth-it-away; "for Apollyon is putting on the steam again."

The road now plunged into a gorge of the Delectable Mountains, and traversed the field where, in former ages, the blind men wandered and stumbled among the tombs. One of these ancient stones had been thrust across the track, by some malicious person, and gave the train of cars a terrible jolt. Far up the rugged side of a mountain, I perceived a rusty iron door, half overgrown with bushes and creeping plants, but with smoke issuing from its crevices.

"Is that," inquired I, "the very door in the hillside, which the shepherds assured Christian was a by-way to Hell?"

"That was a joke on the part of the shepherds," said Mr. Smooth-it-away, with a smile.

"It is neither more nor less than the door of a cavern, which they use as a smoke-house for the preparation of mutton hams."

My recollections of the journey are now, for a little space, dim and confused, inasmuch as a singular drowsiness here overcame me, owing to the fact that we were passing over the enchanted ground, the air of which encourages a disposition to sleep. I awoke, however, as soon as we crossed the borders of the pleasant land of Beulah. All the passengers were rubbing their eyes, comparing watches, and congratulating one another on the prospect of arriving so seasonably at the journey's end. The sweet breezes of this happy clime came refreshingly to our nostrils; we beheld the glimmering gush of silver fountains, over-hung by trees of beautiful foliage and delicious fruit, which were propagated by grafts from the celestial gardens. Once, as we dashed onward like a hurricane, there was a flutter of wings, and the bright appearance of an angel in the air, speeding forth on some heavenly mission. The engine now announced the close vicinity of the final Station House, by one last and horrible scream, in which there seemed to be distinguishable every kind of wailing and woe, and bitter fierceness of wrath, all mixed up with the wild laughter of a devil or a madman. Throughout our journey, at every stopping place, Apollyon had exercised his ingenuity in screwing the most abominable sounds out of the whistle of the steam engine; but, in this closing effort he outdid himself, and created an infernal uproar, which, besides disturbing the peaceful inhabitants of Beulah, must have sent its discord even through the celestial gates.

While the horrid clamor was still ringing in our ears, we heard an exulting strain, as if a thousand instruments of music, with height, and depth, and sweetness in their tones, at once tender and triumphant, were struck in unison, to greet the approach of some illustrious hero, who had fought the good fight and won a glorious victory, and was come to lay aside his battered arms for ever. Looking to ascertain what might be the occasion of this glad harmony, I perceived, on alighting from the cars, that a multitude of shining ones had assembled on the other side of the river, to welcome two poor pilgrims, who were just emerging from its depths. They were the same whom Apollyon and ourselves had persecuted with taunts and gibes, and scalding steam, at the commencement of our journey—the same whose unworldly aspect and impressive words had stirred my conscience, amid the wild revellers of Vanity Fair.

"How amazingly well those men have got on!" cried I to Mr. Smooth-it-away. "I wish we were secure of as good a reception."

"Never fear—never fear!" answered my friend. "Come—make haste; the ferry-boat will be off directly; and in three minutes you will be on the other side of the river. No doubt you will find coaches to carry you up to the city gates."

A steam ferry-boat, the last improvement on this important route, lay at the riverside, puffing, snorting, and emitting all those other disagreeable utterances, which betoken the departure to be immediate. I hurried on board with the rest of the passengers, most of whom were in great perturbation; some bawling out for their baggage; some tearing their hair and exclaiming that the boat would explode or sink; some already pale with the heaving of the stream; some gazing affrighted at the ugly aspect of the steersman; and some still dizzy with the slumberous influences of the Enchanted Ground. Looking back to the shore, I was amazed to discern Mr. Smooth-it-away waving his hand in token of farewell!

"Don't you go over to the Celestial City?" exclaimed I.

"Oh, no!" answered he with a queer smile, and that same disagreeable contortion of visage which I had remarked in the inhabitants of the Dark Valley, "Oh, no!" I have come thus far only for the sake of your pleasant company. Good bye! We shall meet again."

And then did my excellent friend, Mr. Smooth-it-away, laugh outright; in the midst of which cachinnation, a smoke-wreath issued from his mouth and nostrils, while a twinkle of livid flame darted out of either eye, proving indubitably that his heart was all of a red blaze. The impudent fiend! To deny the existence of Tophet, when he felt its fiery tortures raging within his breast! I rushed to the side of the boat, intending to fling myself on shore. But the wheels, as they began their revolutions, threw a dash of spray over me, so cold—so deadly cold, with the chill that will never leave these waters, until Death be drowned in his own river—that, with a shiver and a heart-quake, I awoke. Thank heaven, it was a Dream!

THE PRODUCING POWER.

The deafness of slave labour is admitted every where.

What we see before us, the experience of the whole South, must convince every reflecting man, that no people can thrive, or be prosperous, who rely upon the produce of this labour. The complaint comes, not from one quarter, but from all, where this is the case, of loss of population, of decreasing wealth, of waning cities and towns, and a diminished power.

It is the muscles of man, well and intelligently directed, which build up all human greatness. When this is done, nothing can subdue his power. Poverty of purse is but a stimulus to exertion; poverty of soil only a guaranty of his progress. What was New England but a cold, bleak, sterile region, rude and rock-girt, uninviting to the eye, and unhelpful every way to the laborer? Yet the men who planted it, and who made it, had a motive to labour and to live,—and the spring thus given, made them defy every obstacle, and overcome every difficulty, as they dug up their barren and rocky soil, and, by hard toil, made it the garden spot, almost, of the world.

There is a chapter yet to be written on the causes which give to human labour its greatest power. Writers talk familiarly and positively about high and low wages, and seem to think, as they rise or fall, so will human industry prosper or languish. This may be true in part; but it is far from being the whole truth. The master-mechanic at Pittsburgh thrives when paying to his employed the highest wages—while the master-mechanic in Sheffield, England, engaged in the same business, has hard work to get along, giving his laborers the very lowest prices. Why this difference? The Englishman, as regards capital and legislation has the advantage, and, is in the instance to which we refer, freer from close competition—whence then, the success of the American? Simply, as we reason, in this—that our countryman, having a place in society, feels the motives which impel men most strongly to action, and, therefore, works harder, and produces more, and realizes happier results, every way, from his toil.

We are apt to think, that we could accomplish what we pleased, if want were knocking at our door, or some strong necessity stared us in the face. This may be so at particular times, and in particular places. But that which alone can make labour sweet, which clothes it with cheerfulness, and enables it to advance the individual, and swell the wealth of the State, which produces health and happiness, virtue and vigor, as it subdues the wilderness and subjugates the elements,—is, the consciousness on the part of every one who toils, that he is free to build up his own fortune, free to live and enjoy life, free to do whatever may add to his stability and growth. Give an individual anywhere this motive, let him know, as he sweats over anvil, or work bench, or in the fields under a burning sun, that the home near by is to be happy, and wife and little ones blessed through his efforts, and that therefore he himself is to be recognized as a MAN, and he will be one, if difficulties and perils, thick and black as imagination can conceive, were to begirt him round.

How conclusively does the experiment made by Mr. McDonough, a large planter living opposite the City of New Orleans sustain what we say. He bought, some twenty years ago, one hundred and fifty negroes. He selected them in Virginia, not with reference to mental quickness, or their moral training, but simply with regard to their physical strength. Taking them home, he told them "You may gain your freedom in fourteen years if you will, pay for yourselves, leave me enough to supply your places with others, and have a sufficient sum left to establish you in Liberia. This is my plan; (we shall give it in detail hereafter) if you accept it, the contract is made." They accepted. And what followed? McDonough's slaves were the wonder of the New Orleans public. Nobody worked like them. None could compete with them. They were up early and late; labour appeared to them like pastime; it was goodly and glorious employment, and, had it not been for this, for their laughing, hearty, whole souled cheerfulness, (so close and steadily did they work) their master would have been denounced as hard and cruel. But these slaves had a motive to toil thus; that motive gave them a spring, and life, and energy, and steadiness, which enabled them to learn anything, to endure every thing, to surpass every labourer near them.

Suppose now, freeing Kentucky from human servitude, and from every active cause which stamps labour with disrepute, we could inspire our people with a like industry, and impart to them the motives which every artisan should feel—what could we not accomplish for the happiness and well-being of the Commonwealth! Think you, under these circumstances, that the coal imbedded in our hills, the iron ore so thickly set in our soil, and the rock which girds our water courses, would lie, as they now do, in heavy unshapen masses, wholly useless to any of us? Think you, with the water power, and the raw material at hand, we should be, under these circumstances, dependent upon a distant people for our supplies! Why, like Connecticut, our State then would be a stirring work shop—every man busy, and all turning their business to good account—with schools in every neighborhood, and a web of rail-ways uniting all neighborhoods, the people demanding, and the legislature promptly doing whatever the public good really demanded.

Say not, reader, that all this is fancy work. It may be made sober reality, and, by getting rid of prejudice, and exerting yourself, you may help to make it so. Turn, if you doubt us, to the following table, (we put our estimates very low) and, as we go on, make your calculations, and see, if we err in what we have said above, or in the closer reasoning which figures present. We have only to apply the law of increase of Ohio to obtain one result we would prove. Thus:

In 1840, Kentucky had white males over 10 years,	186,000
In 1840, Kentucky had free coloured,	2,300
Of adult slaves, male and female,	111,629
Equal to, say	55,313
	243,613
Producing $30 each per annum,	$7,308,390
But if Kentucky had increased with Ohio, she would have had in 1840, of adult males,	890,000
Of adult females,	890,000
	1,780,000
Males, producing each $30 per annum	$53,400,000
Females " " $10 "	8,900,000
	$62,300,000

What a contrast! What a dead annual loss! With Slavery we have only a little over seven millions; under Freedom, we should have had over thirty-five millions, as our yearly income! And then, as we now are, we have all the withering, crushing influences of human servitude, dishonoring labour, and degrading the laborer, depressing the poor, and puffing up the rich—while, with liberty, we should have started every energy and quickened every impulse, and made strong and buoyant every talent which imparts vigor to industry, power to talent, and influence to character!

We appeal, then, to generous planters who would live for true and noble ends. We beseech non-slaveholders who would do something for themselves, and their posterity, we implore mothers who would rear their offspring under the best influences, we entreat our young men whose bosoms heave with the love of Liberty as a wild impulse, or swell with it as a fresh and living principle, we invoke the clergy who recognize in every bruised nature the image of the Living God—to stand forth in the cause, and in this, our Commonwealth, speak truly, speak earnestly, speak fearlessly, for EMANCIPATION.—We labour in vain, if we labour not for that. Nothing will stamp the State with greatness, give to every citizen in it the opportunity to prosper and grow, or imbed in the heart of the people that fervent, patriotic, religious spirit, which, never content with good gained, would use it bravely to win a yet higher and wider good, nothing, except freedom. For our sake, for our children's sake, for the common good now and hereafter, let us have it, let us bless all with it!—Louisville Examiner.

THE EMANCIPATED SLAVES OF JAMAICA.

The results of Emancipation, as given by Mr. Renshaw and Mr. Hovey, missionaries among the freed people of Jamaica, are truly encouraging.

The object of their visit to this country is to obtain assistance to enable them to go on in their missionary labors. The following sketch of some remarks of Mr. Renshaw in one of our city churches, as reported in the Traveller, will be found interesting.

The present coloured population of Jamaica is about 400,000—the white residents of the island numbering only about 50,000. The coloured population for the most part consists of the slaves who were emancipated by the British act of August, 1838; the remainder—the browns, as they are called—being the offspring of the concubinage which so universally existed previous to emancipation.

Mr. Renshaw explained satisfactorily, one or two facts connected with the business of Jamaica, from which inferences have been drawn unfavourable to the change which has taken place in the condition of the working population. There had been a falling off, for instance, of about 25,000 hogsheads of sugar, in the exports from the island. The inference, drawn from this fact, that the negroes had become more indolent under a state of freedom, was not founded in truth. The negroes had now many more wants than when they were in their degraded condition as slaves. They now used sugar themselves largely. Allowing them fifteen pounds a head annually, more than they formerly used, it would more than make good the deficiency in the exports. The decrease in the value of plantation property, too, had been adduced as an argument against the condition of freedom in a pecuniary point of view. This decrease, however, was clearly accounted for by the change in the policy of England in reference to the products of its colonies, from that of protection which amounted to a prohibition, to free trade which gave the sugar of Jamaica no preference in the English market.

Since emancipation, the legislation of the colony had entirely changed, as regards the coloured population. Many of the same gentlemen were still in the government, it was true, but they were now as kind and considerate towards the negroes, as they once were necessarily cruel. An improved system of prison discipline has been adopted; a lunatic asylum had been established, at an expense of $100,000; abundant provision had been made for enlightened medical attendance upon the laboring people; public schools had been established; a general interest, in fine, was manifested in the welfare of the laboring population, and all public measures looked to the amelioration of their condition.

A great change—and an entirely spontaneous one—had also taken place in the morals and manners of the white population. Prior to emancipation, marriage was virtually prohibited by the customs of society, and concubinage was universal. Intemperance and other vices generally prevailed. Now public sentiment regarded marriage as honorable; concubinage had to a great extent disappeared; and the principles and practice of temperance were commonly cherished. The prejudice against colour had been almost entirely removed. The brown class, once proscribed, now took a position in society. They were found in all public stations, both in the legislative and judicial branches of the government. There was in fact no distinction as to complexion, and no bar on that account to the social reciprocities and amenities of life.

The change in the condition of the negroes had been very great—so much so, that it had operated as a hindrance to their advancement. They had so rapidly progressed from a state of absolute servitude and degradation, to that of a comfortable peasantry, that they had imbibed some of the vices of wealth and were becoming covetous. Although their present condition was only an approximation towards the condition of the free colored people in the United States, yet in regard to diet, clothing, dwellings, all the comforts of civilized life, there had been a vast improvement upon the frightful condition—both moral and physical—in which emancipation found them.

At the time of the emancipation, such was the mental degradation of the negroes, that they seemed almost to have lost the power of thought.

They manifested, however, great enthusiasm of gratitude towards God, and towards the missionaries as instruments of their redemption from slavery. They literally came and laid down their first earnings at the feet of the missionaries, with apostolic simplicity; and a hundred thousand dollars at least were given in this way for the erection of houses of worship and schools. There had, however, been a reaction of feeling, as might have been anticipated. The enthusiasm had passed away, or had ceased to have an operative influence.—Emancipator.

EXTRACT FROM C. SUMNER'S LECTURE ON WHITE SLAVERY IN THE BARBARY STATES.

And yet we would not judge with harshness an Algerine slave-owner. He has been reared in a region of slavery—he has learned to regard Christians, "guilty of a skin not colored as his own," as lawful prey,—and has found sanctions for his conduct in the injunctions of the Koran, in the custom of his country, and in the instinctive dictates of an imagined self-interest. It is, then, the "peculiar institution" which we are aroused to execrate, rather than the Algerine slave-masters, who glory in its influence, and

"so perfect is their misery,
Not once perceive their foul disfigurement,
But boast themselves more comely than before."

But there is reason to believe that the sufferings of the white slave were not often greater than is the natural incident of slavery. There is an important authority which presents this point in an interesting light. It is that of General Eaton, who was for some time consul of the United States at Tunis, and whose name is not without interest from the bold expedition against Deme. In a letter to his wife, dated at Tunis, April 6th, 1799, and written amidst opportunities of observation such as few have enjoyed, he briefly describes the condition of this unhappy class, illustrating it by a comparison less flattering to our country than to Barbary. "Many of the Christian slaves," he says, "have died of grief, and the others linger out a life less tolerable than death. Alas! remorse seizes my whole soul, when I reflect that this is, indeed, a copy of the very barbarity which my eyes have seen in my own native country. And yet we boast of freedom and national justice. How frequently have I seen in the Southern States of our own country weeping mothers leading guiltless infants to the sales with as deep anguish as if they led them to the slaughter, and yet felt my bosom tranquil in the view of these aggressions upon defenceless humanity! But when I see the same enormities practised upon beings whose complexion and blood claim kinship with my own, I curse the perpetrators and weep over the wretched victims of their rapacity. Indeed, truth and justice demand from me the confession, that the Christian slaves among the barbarians of Africa are treated with more humanity than the African slaves among the professing Christians of civilized America; and yet here sensibility bleeds at every pore for the wretches whom fate has doomed to slavery."

Such testimony would seem to furnish a standard or measure of comparison, by which to determine the character of White Slavery in the Barbary States. But there are other considerations and authorities. One of these is the influence of the religion of these barbarians. Travellers remark the generally kind treatment bestowed by Mahometans upon slaves. The lash rarely, if ever, lacerates the back of the female; the knife or branding-iron is not employed upon any human being to mark him as the property of his fellow man. Nor is the slave doomed, as in other countries, where the Christian religion is professed, to unconditional and perpetual service, without prospect of redemption. Hope, the last friend of misfortune, may brighten his captivity. He is not walled up by inhuman institutions so as to be inaccessible to freedom. "And unto such of your slaves," says the Koran, in words worthy of adoption in the legislation of Christian countries, "as desire a written instrument, allowing them to redeem themselves on paying a certain sum, write one, if ye know good in them, and give them of the riches of God, which he hath given you." Thus from the Koran, which ordains slavery, come lessons of benignity to the slave; and one of the most touching stories in Mahometanism is of the generosity of Ali, the companion of Mahomet, who, after fasting for three days, gave his whole provision to a captive not more famished than himself.

WAR AND GLORY.

The following excellent satire on war and glory, is said to have been written by Dr. Johnson:

An old vulture was sitting on a naked prominence, with her young about her, whom she was instructing in the arts of a vulture's life, and preparing by her last lecture, for their final dismission to the mountains and the skies.

"My children," said the old vulture, "you will the less want my instructions because you have had my practice before your eyes; you have seen me snatch from the farm the household fowl, you have seen me seize the leveret in the bush, and the kid in the pasture; you know how to fix your talons, and how to balance your flight when you are laden with your prey. But you remember the taste of more delicious food—I have often regaled you with the flesh of man."

"Tell us," said the young vultures, "where man may be found, and how he may be known; his flesh is surely the natural food of the vulture; why have you never brought a man in your talons to the nest?"

"He is too bulky," said the mother; "when we find a man we can only tear away his flesh, and leave his bones upon the ground."

"Since man is so big," said the young ones, "how do you kill him? You are afraid of the wolf and the bear; by what power are vultures superior to man? Is man more defenceless than a sheep?"

"We have not the strength of man," returned the mother, "and I am sometimes in doubt whether we have the subtilty; and the vulture would seldom feed upon his flesh, had not nature, that devoted him to our uses, infused into him a strange ferocity, which I never observed in any other being that feeds upon the earth. Two herds of men will often meet and shake the earth with noise, and fill the air with fire. When you hear noise, and see fire, with flashes along the ground, hasten to the place with your swiftest wing, for men are surely destroying one another; you will then find the ground smoking with blood and covered with carcasses, of which many are dismembered and mangled, for the convenience of the vulture."

"But when men have killed their prey," said the pupil, "why do they not eat it? When the wolf has killed a sheep, he suffers not the vulture to touch it till he is satisfied himself. Is not man another kind of wolf?"

"Man," said the mother, "is the only beast who kills that which he does not devour, and this quality makes him so much a benefactor to our species."

"If men kill our prey, and lay it in our way," said the young one, "what need shall we have of labouring for ourselves?"

"Because man will, sometimes," replied the mother, "remain for a long time quiet in his den. The old vultures will tell you when you are to watch his motions. When you see men in great numbers moving close together, like a flock of storks, you may conclude that they are hunting, and that you will soon revel in human blood."

"But still," said the young one, "I would gladly know the reason of this mutual slaughter; I could never kill what I could not eat."

"My child," said the mother, "this is a question which I cannot answer, though I am reckoned the most subtle bird of the mountain. When I was young, I used frequently to visit theerie of an old vulture, who dwelt upon the Carpathian rocks; he had made many observations; he knew the places that afforded prey, around his habitation, as far in every direction as the strongest wing can fly between the rising and setting of the summer sun; he had fed, year after year, on the entrails of men. His opinion was, that men had only the appearance of animal life, being really vegetables, with a power of motion; and that as the boughs of an oak are dashed together by the storm, that swine may fatten on the falling acorns, so men are, by some unaccountable power, driven one against another till they lose their motion, that vultures may be fed. Others think they have observed something of a contrivance and policy among these mischievous beings: and those that hover more closely around them, pretend that there is in every herd, one that gives directions to the rest, and seems to be more eminently delighted with a wide carnage. What it is that entitles him to such pre-eminence we know not; he is seldom the biggest or the swiftest, but he shows by his eagerness and diligence, that he is, more than any of the others—a friend to the vultures."

POETRY.

[The position of the late Silas Wright as a distinguished politician, and a leader in the Democratic party, would have given him no claims to the particular notice of this journal; but the part he took in rallying the democracy of New York to the support of the Wilnot proviso, and the influence he exerted elsewhere in its behalf, and was going on constantly and fearlessly to exert within the utmost sphere of his extended popularity, presented him to our view in a new aspect—that of the ardent and inflexible friend of human liberty—that of the true lover of his species. It was in this view of him, that words cannot express our grief for the loss of such a man at such a time. The friend of man stood appalled when the tidings of the sudden removal of this noble champion of freedom reached him, but he rallied—weeping for the departed—under the feelings which inspired the following expressive lines.

LINES

Written on hearing of the Death of Silas Wright, of New York.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

As they who, tossing midst the storm at night,
While turning shoreward, where a beacon shone,
Meet the wall'd blackness of the heaven alone,
So, on the turbulent waves of party tossed,
In gloom and tempest men have seen thy light
Quenched in the darkness. At thy hour of noon,
While life was pleasant to thy undimmed sight,
And, day by day, within thy spirit grew
A holier hope than young Ambition knew,
As through thy rural quiet, not in vain,
Pierced the sharp thrill of Freedom's cry of pain,
Man of the millions, thou art lost too soon!
Portents from which the bravest stand aghast—
The birth throes of a Future, strange and vast,
Alarm the land; yet thou, so wise and strong,
Suddenly summoned to the burial bed,
Lapped in its slumbers deep and ever long,
Hear'st not the tumult surging overhead?
Who now shall rally Freedom's scattering host?
Who wear the mantle of the leader lost?
Who stay the march of slavery? He, whose voice Hath called thee from thy task-field, shall not lack Yet bolder champions, to beat bravely back
The wrong which, through His poor ones, reaches Him:
Yet firmer bands shall Freedom's torch-lights trim,
And wave them high across the abyssal black,
Till bound, dumb millions there shall see them and rejoice.

APOLOGY

For not furnishing some Poetry requested for this Journal.

When the last day of autumn closes
All vegetative life reposes,
So, now when winter's snows have spread
Their hoary influence o'er my head,
The metric line enervate flows,
And warns me, too, to take repose.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

"Whoso gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own."

VOL. II.] PHILADELPHIA, ELEVENTH MONTH, 1847. [NO. 11.

COMMUNICATIONS.

To the Editors of the Non-Slaveholder.

I was glad to see in your number for last month the remarks of your correspondent PARR, on the subject of the exercise of the right of suffrage. I have long felt the danger which the conscientious opponents of War and Slavery incur, of brooking their testimony when they cast their votes in favour of the candidates of either of the great parties of the nation without first inquiring what are the sentiments of the particular individuals they vote for, touching these important subjects. Differing, as these parties may do, as to the policy of this or that war at its inception, but not differing as to its vigorous prosecution when commenced, neither is to be regarded as a peace party; and composed as they both are of southern and northern adherents, neither is to be regarded as an anti-slavery party. Looking at the votes of our representatives in Congress on measures connected with the carrying on of the war with Mexico, we cannot well discern which are whig, and which democratic, by the list of ayes and noes, so emulous do the respective voters appear to be, to give, to even a mistrusted executive, all the support in men and money judged necessary to the active and glorious conduction of this wicked and bloody enterprise. Taking into view that the war is one of conquest, having for its end, as contemplated by its projectors, an extension of slavery into dominions now free; and seeing that it has been found impracticable yet to rally either of the great parties to the adoption of the principle of the non-extension of slavery, we must regard each party, whilst composed of its present elements, as being, if not pro-slavery, at least ready to betray the cause of freedom, whenever the preservation of the party shall demand it; which will ever be when the interests of its southern adherents shall so require. In the past we see the future. It is, however, a conceded fact, that among the whig representatives are a few persons indisposed to afford supplies for the prosecution of this atrocious war, and that among the individuals composing both the parties are large numbers, seriously awakened to the duty of taking decided ground against the further encroachments of the slave power. The heavings of this sentiment are felt and seen in all the recent political gatherings of the people; the leaders in each party seeking their tranquillization by new and feigned issues—those of the whig party by the issue of "no more territory," instead of "no more slavery"—which they well know will be but a rope of sand with which to bind their southern adherents, though it may be dust in the eyes of their northern friends. Are these uprisings of a sound feeling to be thus suppressed? Or, will they result in one of the parties taking the noble ground of "No more slavery," thus severing themselves from the south, as they needs must with that motto, but bringing to their support all the real opponents of slavery in whatever party north? Or, will they end in the breaking up of the old landmarks of party, many of which are scarcely traceable for any present practical purpose, and in the substitution for whig and democrat of a peace-loving, liberty-promoting party? For one of the two last issues we devoutly hope; and for its promotion suggest to each conscientious voter the adoption of the following resolves which, inflexibly observed, will certainly bring it about—if there exists in the nation north, the amount of conscience we suppose.

I will vote for no man to any civil office who will not bring the weight of his influence, and his vote, when that will apply, to the instant, pacific conclusion of the present iniquitous war!

I will vote for no man to any civil office who will not give the weight of his influence, and his vote, too, when he can, conscientiously, constantly and energetically to the rendering impossible any further extension of slavery!

So says and resolves, your friend and brother,
WESLEY.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

It has been clearly seen by many that are opposed to slavery, that the kindest masters are giving far greater aid and security to the perpetuity of the slave system than the most tyrannical and cruel. The first, by departing in some degree, in his treatment of the slave, from the original principle and tenor by which he is held, that "might is right," mingles justice with injustice, kindness with unkindness, benevolence with covetousness, humanity with inhumanity, and thus kindles up and brings into action these moral and Christian virtues in the slave; so that between the master and his slave a strong and mutual attachment is sometimes formed. This presents slavery under false colours, as a wolf in sheep's clothing, and tends powerfully to mislead the superficial observer and the public mind, in their conclusions respecting the demerits and barbarity of the system. While the latter, the more inhuman, acting upon the original principle, that man may institute a right of property in his fellow-man, ceases in a great degree in his treatment to exercise those offices of regard, of kindness, of sympathy, and respect due to a human being, thus perfecting in the character and disposition of the slave, practically, the demoralization and degradation proposed to be inflicted by the law of the land, that declares him to be a chattel personal to all intents and purposes. Here the principle established by law being carried out, slavery is exhibited in its true light, clothed with its legitimate fruits and natural results. Was this its universal exhibition to public view, would not even the deaf hear its cries, the blind see its deformity, the doubtful be confirmed of its atrocity; and all who were not entirely insensible to the voice of justice and humanity feel themselves compelled to proclaim its cruelty and exceeding sinfulness? Then would be more speedily verified in the nation the declaration of the prophet, proclaimed to a hard hearted people, when he said, "Thine iniquities shall reprove thee, and thy backsliding shall correct thee."

These facts speak volumes. They certainly impart a deep and important lesson of instruction and reproof to many of us, who are dealing in and using the products of the slave's unrequited toil, thus furnishing the inducement for holding slaves; for, as we have observed, many are misled in their estimation of the true character of slavery, through the influence of some of the less arbitrary masters, aided by the power of custom; so it is no less true that as large numbers, who are opposed to slavery, are misled in their conclusions (I will not say investigations, for they make none,) respecting the injustice and inconsistency of the use of slave labour products through the influence (aided by the power of custom) of such, that are in good repute for their justice, benevolence and piety, who are freely trafficking in and consuming the products of slavery. These are too often looked upon as having such a regard for the principles of morality and Christianity, in other respects, though in the free use of these blood-stained products, that they will not and do not violate these principles. Thus, I verily believe, hundreds and thousands are contenting themselves in the consumption of these products because they see a multitude of others, whom they have many reasons to esteem, doing the like, thus too easily adopting a pernicious practice, (a practice, without which, slavery would not exist,) from its general approval by the wise and good, without investigating such acts upon their own merits, or rather demerits, and certain tendencies in upholding slavery and its consequent evils. Then, if these things be true, how awful the responsibility that attaches to those possessing influence, those endowed with enquiring minds, that have seen, and do see, that this paying the master for the slave's labour is to all intents becoming a party with the slaveholder, and therefore a sacrificing the plainest principle of justice and right to that of interest or convenience.

How serious, I say, is the obligation that such influence be rightly directed; for influence may, and often does, outstrip in importance, in sustaining slavery, the effect produced by the individual amount of produce consumed, or dollars and cents amassed, by such unjustifiable transactions. It is clear to my mind, that should all such who at this day are convinced of the inhumanity of slavery, and who are proclaiming its iniquities, cease as far as practicable from the consumption of its products, it would put forth an influence in behalf of the emancipation of the slave, never yet known in this country; it would awaken inquiry into the nature, character and consequences of the slave system, and who were its chief supporters, that would spread from family to family, from town to town, from city to city, and from sea to sea, which must and would result in the speedy and entire extinction of the abhorrent system.

Who that believes that the Most High is just, and that he weighs the actions of men without partiality with the most skilful hand, can flatter himself that he is not found wanting in the divine sight, if daily by his practice he is (without necessity) strengthening the arm of the acknowledged oppressor.

WAR OFFENSIVE IN THE DIVINE SIGHT.

"And David said to Solomon, My Son, as for me, it was in my mind to build a house unto the name of the Lord my God; but the word of the Lord came to me, saying, Thou hast shed blood abundantly, and hast made great wars; thou shalt not build a house unto my name, because thou hast shed much blood upon the earth in my sight."—1 Chronicles xxi. 7 and 8.

On this passage, and on one in 2d Samuel, Adam Clarke has some remarks which are interesting as coming from a person of undoubted talent, erudition and piety, and a minister of a Society which is not, as a body, committed against war.

"Heathens, Jews, and Christians, have all agreed that soldiers of any kind should have nothing to do with divine offices. Shedding of human blood but ill comports with the benevolence of God or the Spirit of the Gospel. AETAS, overpowered by his enemies, while fighting for his parents, his family, and his country, and finding further resistance hopeless, endeavours to carry off his aged father, his wife, young son, and his household gods; but as he was just come from slaughter, he would not even handle these objects of superstition, but confided them to his father, whom he took on his shoulders and carried out of the burning city of Troy.

"Our country's gods, our relics, and the bands,
Hold you, my father, in your guiltless hands:
In me 'tis impious holy things to bear,
Red as I am with slaughter, new from war;
Till, in some living stream, I cleanse the guilt
Of dire debate, and blood in battle spilt."

Dryden.

"It is worthy of remark how seldom God employs a soldier in any spiritual work; just for the same reason as that given to David; and yet there have been several eminently pious men in the army who have laboured for the conversion of sinners. I knew a remarkable instance of this. I was acquainted with Mr. John Haine, a well known preacher among the people called Methodists. He was a soldier in the Queen's eighth regiment of dragoons, in Flanders, in the years 1739-46. He had his horse shot under him at the battle of Fontenoy, May 11th, 1745; and was in the hottest fire of the enemy for above seven hours; he preached among his fellow soldiers frequently, and under the immediate patronage of his royal highness the Duke of Cumberland, commander in chief; and was the means of converting and reforming many hundreds of the soldiers. He was a man of amazing courage and resolution, and of inflexible loyalty. One having expressed wonder how he could reconcile killing men with preaching the gospel of the Grace and Peace of Christ, he answered, I never killed a man. How can you tell that? Were you not in several battles? 'Yes; but I am confident I never killed or wounded a man.' How was this? Did you not do your duty? 'Yes, with all my might; but when in battle, either my horse jumped aside, or was wounded, or was killed; or my carbine missed fire; and I could never draw the blood of an enemy.' And would you have done it if you could? 'Yes, I would have slain the whole French army had it been in my power; I fought in a good cause, for a good king, and for my country; and though I struck in order to cut, and hack, and hew on every side, I could kill no man.' This is the substance of his answers to the above questions; and we see from it a remarkable interfering Providence; God had appointed this man to build a spiritual house in the British army in Flanders; and would not permit him to shed the blood of his fellow creatures."

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, ELEVENTH MONTH, 1847.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING.—The letter of an esteemed correspondent, a member of Indiana Yearly Meeting, furnishes us with several valuable particulars relating to the proceedings of that body, at its recent annual assemblage. We derive from it the information that, at this "very large and interesting meeting," the subjects of war and slavery, including the use of the productions of slave labour, and the voting for slaveholders and military men into civil government, were, at various stages of the meeting, feelingly brought into view by several concerned Friends. The clerk entered upon the minutes, in general terms, that the subjects of war and slavery had claimed the consideration of the meeting.

Our correspondent gives it as his "own opinion, that three-fourths of those present would have been willing to pledge themselves never to vote for another slaveholder; and perhaps all, if Henry Clay's name was never heard in connection with the Presidency."

The epistles of several of the other Yearly Meetings, brought the attention of this to the subject of slavery, generally: that from New York, especially, to the disuse of the products of the system.

The attendance of Lindley Murray Hoag, from New England Yearly Meeting, and his remarks in the concluding sitting of this, "commending Friends for their labours in the cause of the oppressed, and recommending each to seek for the right ability in whatever branch of the subject he may feel himself called to labour," as also the general interest which his religious public services excited, is adverted to in terms of high approval by our informant. The intention of this Friend to embark in a free-labour store in the city of New York, with a capital of three thousand dollars, furnished him for that purpose, was freely spoken of by himself, and, in the opinion of our correspondent, will have a good effect in drawing the fuller attention of Friends to the free labour concern.

We derive encouragement from the circumstances here recited, to a perseverance in our allotted path of duty, whatever that, from time to time, may be found to be. We hope others may be cheered by them to a like continuance in well doing. The progress of Truth is gradual, but ever onward, if those who are its heralds are faithful to its manifestations.

THE SLAVE PRODUCE QUESTION.—We had occasion during the past year to notice, in terms of just and high approval, the work entitled "Christian Non-Resistance," by Adin Ballou of Massachusetts; and have several times since added value to our pages by quotations from it. The indications it affords of the moral and intellectual worth of its author, give importance and influence to any thing else he may have to say on that or other topics. The suggestions of this writer on the abstinence question, though they denote only a state of enquiry, have not failed, therefore, to arrest our attention. In "the Practical Christian," of which he is the editor, is the following notice of a letter from Charles Cadwallader of this vicinity, in which he partially discusses this subject, and to which we append some remarks of our own. Our friend, we believe, has here collected the materials, apparently adverse to, on which he will hereafter base some of the strongest arguments in favour of avoiding the use of the productions of Slavery.

Abstinence from Slave-grown Produce.—In another column will be found a communication from Charles Cadwallader, calling our attention, and that of the Hopedale Community, to the question of duty in respect to the consumption of slave-grown productions. He refers us to our

Declaration of acknowledged duties, and invites us to consider whether we are not aiding and abetting slavery and the slave-trade by purchasing for our use the various articles of slave production. It is very surprising to our Pennsylvania friends, and those generally who are scrupulously conscientious against the use of slave-grown produce, that so many of the New England Abolitionists remain comparatively indifferent to this matter (1). It seems to them that we are partaking in the sin of slaveholders by purchasing and consuming the articles they unrighteously force their slaves to produce, and that we are strangely blind not to see it. On our part we sincerely respect their scruples of conscience, and above all their fidelity to those scruples, and yet have been unable to perceive, with our degree of intellectual and moral light, the forcible reasons, or to feel the moral convictions they do against using the produce in question. This may be owing to obtuseness of judgment, or obliquity of moral sentiment, and therefore we are admonished to examine the subject, and to search ourselves more thoroughly, that we may be sure of our duty in the matter. Nothing is more common than for men, in the main intelligent and conscientious, to overlook or disregard the nicer applications of their acknowledged moral obligations. It is astonishing how blind and mistaken good men sometimes are with respect to particular duties. Considering these things, we welcome friend Cadwallader's communication, and desire with open convictions to state our views of the subject he presents. We think we may venture to say that the members of the Hopedale Community would generally abandon the use of slave-grown produce, if they should be rationally convinced it was their duty. We are now sufficiently convinced that it would be sinful in us to unite with slaveholders religiously, politically or socially; i. e. in church, in state, in community, or in marriage (2). We are also convinced that it would be sinful in us to sell anything to them, or buy anything of them peculiarly belonging to the system or state of slavery as such; i. e. any article which would not be equally proper and useful in a state of freedom as in a state of slavery (3). We are furthermore fully convinced that it would be sinful in us to trade or hold any intercourse, however innocent in itself, with slaveholders, the express condition or legitimate tendency of which, under the circumstances, should be to render us dumb on the subject of slavery, or to indispose us to testify against it (4). If we could not trade with slaveholders in articles suitable to a state of freedom, or could not preach, or teach school, or practice medicine, or publish books and papers for them without being obliged to be silent concerning the sin of slavery, or to wink at the wickedness of it, we should be bound to keep utterly aloof from all such dealings and intercourse with them. This duty is founded on a principle of universal application—viz: that we are never to compromise with obvious evil doing (5). That there is a vast deal of mercantile and other intercourse with slaveholders which is maintained by a sacrifice of principle, for the sake of temporal advantage, is lamentably true. Men and women from the North every year seek their fortune at the South, consenting to be gagged for the time on the subject of slavery, or insensibly yielding to the expediency of smoothing down their testimony against it. We can see that this is sinful—that it is even basely sinful.

Now if it can be shown that the ordinary use of cotton, rice, molasses, sugar, wheat, flour, Indian corn, &c., by persons who on that account feel under no restraint, or temptation to refrain from a manly testimony against slavery, is also sinful, we shall feel bound to abstain therefrom at once and forever (6). These articles are all good in themselves. Nature originated them for the use of man. She shines upon and moistens, expands and matures them even when their planting and growth are attended by the lash-driven slave. Does the wrong indicated on the slave, who aids their growth and preparation, so vitiate them that whatever consumes them necessarily becomes implicated in the sin of the slaveholder? We do not yet see this to be a rational conclusion. The consumers of whom we are now speaking had no participation in stealing the slave from his native land. They have no participation in holding him a slave—none in justifying the master—none in withholding rebuke for the wrong done by him (7). They use these articles of sustenance and comfort just as they would do, if they had been grown only by freemen—without the least consciousness of any occasion or temptation to favour slaveholding on account of what they thus eat and wear. How then do they sin? Certainly not in their consciousness of wrong, nor in their intentions.—Wherein consists their wrong? It is said they are partakers of stolen goods, and are therefore as bad as the thief. Is God a partaker with the man-thief because he gives him cotton-seed, earth, sunshine and rain, without which the slave would be of no use to him (8)? And may not we consume what God helps wicked men produce, when the thing produced is in itself good (9)? No, say our brethren, if you do you are joined in guilt with the man-stealer, the slave-trader, the slave-holder, and the slave-driver. You receive and reward them for stolen goods. But the goods are not stolen goods, in the proper sense of terms (10). Is a bushel of wheat to be considered stolen goods because a man raised it by the help of a stolen horse? If so every article produced by instruments unjustly acquired or used becomes contaminated. If I purchase a stolen horse, knowing it to have been stolen, I am guilty with the original thief. But suppose the original thief uses that stolen horse to raise a field of corn, of which I buy five bushels for a laudable use in my family, am I then guilty (11)? Or does the sin lie in trading with the thief at all? Or does it lie in affording him means of sustaining himself and family? If so, the principle carried out would forbid us to trade with a known sinner at all, even in a thing in itself innocent (12). Or is this the point—that knowing a man to be a horse-thief, and to be a justifier of horse-theft in general, and also to be raising produce with stolen horses only, I should certainly be an abettor of his sin, if, in addition to a faithful rebuke, I did not refuse to make use of the articles raised by such means (13)? It is narrowed down then to this,—that I could not buy and consume the productions of such a man without giving a moral sanction to his deliberate and systematic theft (14). If this be a correct view of the case, it would of course apply to the man-thief with inconceivably greater force. But if we may take this course with the slaveholder, ought we not to take it with all other sinners? Or can we fix such limits to it as to demonstrate that the principle is of just and rational application to easily conceived cases? We invite friend Cadwallader to write again and define the nature and extent of the principle involved in the duty he urges.

REMARKS.

(1.) The comparative indifference of our New England friends to the duty of abstinence is probably owing to the greater commercial influences operating upon them. Within the range of our own observation, the citizens of our trading communities are the last to receive the doctrine calling for the non-use of the products of Slavery, whilst they are the first to be willing to throw upon the mere automaton, called the slaveholder, the whole guilt of a system which lives, and breathes, and has its being in the external demand for its coerced products. We need not say that "all New England," is a vast trading community, seeking gain with an avidity which may possibly lead it to overlook the nicer and unprofitable distinctions of a pure morality. If the suggestion is without foundation we should be glad to know it.

(2.) If it be sinful to unite with slaveholders, religiously, politically, or socially, of which our friend Ballou is sufficiently convinced, it must be because we give to slavery, in doing so, our moral, or physical support, or both. The religious connection is wholly of the first character; the political and social may be of both kinds, or either. Of both kinds, and in the highest degree, is that countenance given to the slaveholder, and that support to his system, which buys of him the products of his wrong-doing, and feeds the motive for its further perpetration. Of what avail will it be that we repel him from our side in the temple of God, when we fellowship him in the temple of Mammon in the very wrong for which we expel him from the other. Will he most regard the anathema against his practice, or the action—denying the anathema—which sustains his practice?

(3.) If it be sinful to sell anything to the slaveholder, or to buy anything of him which peculiarly belongs to the system or state of slavery as such, is it more clearly sinful to sell him shackles for the slave, than it is to give him the motive for purchasing those shackles? This we do when we buy the products of the system. And what can more emphatically belong to the system than the products, the procuring of which is its end and purpose? If, by the explanation, we are to understand that the moral inhibition relates only to articles not proper to a state of freedom, what does it amount to? And, as a moral axiom, how will it apply to the use of goods feloniously obtained, which, without such felony, are proper to be used by honest men? Will the fitness of the article to common use, sanction its use, when obtained by such means?

(4.) If it be sinful to hold any intercourse with slaveholders, the tendency of which is to make us dumb on the subject of slavery, how much less sinful is it to stultify our eloquence, and make our testimony powerless, by showing to the slaveholder that, whilst we theoretically oppose slavery, we are its practical supporters?

(5.) If we are bound to keep ourselves utterly aloof from all dealings and intercourse with slaveholders, which would oblige us to be silent concerning the sin of slavery, does not the same rule require us to keep aloof from all intercourse with him which will impair our ability to speak of slavery with the most convincing effect? If it be a rule of universal application that we may never compromise with wrong, what is our tacit agreement with the slaveholder to be considered, that we will buy his goods just as fast as he can whip and torture his slaves into their production?

(6.) The ordinary use of cotton and other products of slavery is certainly sinful, when such use is the procuring cause of slavery. "The articles are good in themselves. Nature originated them for the use of man," subject to those moral restrictions which Nature's God imposed on man in regard to their use. We cannot rightfully use them if they come to us by a violation of His laws. The articles incur no violation in their nature by their wrongful cultivation, for, if instead of killing by inches the slaves engaged in the sugar plantations, they were to be killed outright, in the design of irrigating the soil with their blood, and fertilizing it with their flesh and bones, the physical condition of the plant would probably be improved; but what would be the moral deteriorated state of him that would use it? Who does not perceive he would take upon himself a deep accountability both for the murder of these men and any repetition of the offence.

(7.) Have the consumers no part, indeed, in stealing the slave from his native land?—no participation in holding him a slave?—none in justifying the master?—none in withholding rebuke for the wrong done by him, when slavery solely exists to supply the demands of the consumer? Is their support of slavery less, because these are articles of sustenance and comfort, which they should have sought from purer channels? Is it less, because they use them just as freely as if they had been grown by freemen? Is it less, because they have no consciousness of intending to favour slavery, though they know that but for them it would instantly cease?

(8.) God no more gives the man-thief, as such, cotton seed, earth, sunshine and rain, than he gives him the slave. His gifts to man are ever in view of their right application; and he who perverts them to wrong ends, robs God in doing so, and must account to him for the perversion. But though the beams of Heaven shine upon the robber without making God a participant, our relation to God, through his law given to us, makes us guilty of the robber's offence, if we hold but a candle to the offender.

(9.) What God, by his natural laws, enables wicked men to produce, we may or may not use, according to the attending circumstances. We may not use them when such use countenances wrong-doing, and gives encouragement to the wrong-doer in his career of evil.

(10.) Self ownership includes the right of a man to the products of his labour. In reducing a man to slavery, the products of his labour are just as much stolen as he himself is stolen. Their wrongful acquisition is the robbery which the slaveholder purposes to relieve when he steals the man; and the taking of the person is merely subsidiary to it. The term "stolen goods," is therefore appropriate to the products of labour thus obtained.

(11.) We would hold the products of the labour of a stolen horse, to be stolen products, inhibited to the use of an honest man, though in a much inferior degree than would be the use of the products of the labour of his stolen master. If the wheat, literally, is not stolen, the products of the labour which are in the wheat are stolen, and you cannot therefore, morally, take to your use the results of the cultivation. Such use cannot be, without an implied confederacy with "the original thief," and therefore cannot be "laudable." But if there is no guilt in buying such products, there can be none in purchasing the stolen horse, as, in principle, they alike countenance and are promotive of horse stealing.

(12.) The sin in buying these products consists in encouraging the thief, and in mixing in with the theft. You may afford him other means of supporting himself and family than doing that, and so far as you can avoid encouraging him in his wrong-doing, you may trade with him in things not involved in the theft, without reproach.

(13.) If knowing a man to be a horse-thief, and the justifier of horse-theft in general, and also to be raising produce with stolen horses, we should unquestionably be an abettor of his sin, whether with or without the idle formality of a rebuke. Did we not refuse to make use of the articles raised by such means. The morality which would consent to use such articles would be, at best, a horse-thief morality. The conscience which, unconscious of wrong, could use such products, must be of the lowest grade of susceptibility.

(14.) We thank our brother for the broad platform he has given us on which to fight the battle of the slave. No man can buy and consume the productions of a systematized cultivation of the earth by stolen horses, without giving a moral sanction to the deliberately organized theft, and being himself a partaker in it, and thus in its guilt. The principle must apply to all really parallel, conceivable cases, and among them, chiefest and foremost, and "with immeasurably greater force," to the productions of a systematized cultivation of the earth by stolen men.

RHODE ISLAND ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.—In passing recently through the city of Providence, we had the opportunity of sitting a single morning with the Anti-Slavery friends there convened in annual convention. It was cheering to observe the animated countenances of those assembled in behalf of the slave, and to hear the honest denunciations of the speakers against the vile system which makes of man such a degraded being; but we felt that when they brought their denunciations to bear against religious societies supposed to favour the system, they were dealing with edge tools, wounding often their truest friends in those societies, and driving back many others, in degree friendly, who were coming, in early time, to their aid and succour. We have heard of detachments of the same army meeting in the dark, and entering into deadly conflict with each other. So it should not be with the friends of the slave, but so, we believe, it often is. There is enough battling to be done with his positive enemies, and there should be a truce, at least, to all waste of ammunition upon persons and things not decidedly opposed to the abolition movement. We are aware that among the clergy, and among the laity, in various religious societies, are absolute defenders of the slave system, men who throw themselves in the way of the abolition car, and must be rode over; but it is them personally, not the churches of which they are unworthy teachers and members, who are to be so treated. In relation to those church establishments in which may abound much of godly piety, much of holy beneficence, much of ardent love for the slave whilst their opposites may exist also, let us rather cherish the kind feeling which led good old Abraham thus to expostulate with the Lord when he sent his messengers to destroy the cities of the plain—"Wilt thou also destroy the righteous with the wicked? Peradventure there be fifty righteous within the city: wilt thou also destroy and not spare the place for the fifty righteous that are therein? That be far from thee to do after this manner, to slay the righteous with the wicked; and that the righteous should be as the wicked: that be far from thee. Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?"

We as much repudiate the idea that, in the principles which associate these churches, there is any hostility to the slave, as we do that in the motives of the men who thus denounce the churches, is a sinister design to overturn Christianity, of which they are often wrongfully accused. We give each suggestion to the ill-wind. Still we would carefully eschew any course of action which might lead the world to believe that the pleader for the slave was infidel to the truths of the Gospel, and a denier of that religious fellowship into which its spirit calls us. If it be necessary to expose the professor, let us be especially regardful not to cast a seeming reproach upon the profession he unworthily represents. In this way we will soonest achieve the slave's redemption—drawing all good men, by cords of love, into the effort for its accomplishment—and at the same time best subserve the moral and religious good of man in that and all other respects. The article we have transferred to our columns from the National Era, on the subject of the Clergy and Reform, we think is written in this spirit.

FREE PRODUCE MOVEMENTS IN GREAT BRITAIN.—We called the attention of our readers, in the 8th month last, to the plan of Dr. Lang for introducing the cotton cultivation into Australia—on the feasibility of which he was about to publish a book and deliver lectures in Glasgow. We derive from the Manchester Guardian the following further and only account, of his movements in the case, which has since reached us:

"Cotton Cultivation in Australia.—We lately called attention to an interesting statement made by the Rev. Dr. Lang to the Manchester Chamber of Commerce, on the extraordinary capabilities for the growth of cotton of that extensive tract of land in Northeastern Australia, called Cooksland, and which, according to his prediction, is destined to become the future cotton field of Great Britain. The prospectus has now appeared of a company, which Dr. Lang proposes to form, for the encouragement and promotion of the growth of cotton and other tropical produce in that territory, by means of European free labour. The prospect is one which bids fair to be not only highly successful as a mere money speculation, but may be productive of the most important advantages to Lancashire as the great centre of the cotton manufacture. It is only a short period since Australia began to compete with foreign countries in the English wool market, and already she furnishes nearly one-fourth of all the wool imported into Great Britain. In 1835 our imports of sheep and lambs' wool from Germany and Australia were as follows: Germany, 23,798,186 lbs.; Australia, 4,210,301 lbs. So rapid was the progress of our Australian colonies, however, that in 1842 our imports from those two countries had undergone the following alterations: Germany, 15,613,269 lbs.; Australia, 12,959,671 lbs. If we could only succeed in stimulating the production of cotton wool at the same rate, we might look forward with confidence to the period when Manchester would feel as indifferent with regard to the probable amount of the cotton crop of the United States, as we now do, in ordinary years, to the produce of her grain harvest?"

We were glad to observe in the Providence Journal of the 15th ultimo, the following notice of the India cultivation, as also of the important movement above referred to. It is well to inform our countrymen of the efforts which a demand for the productions of free labour is inducing in the world:

"The attention of the manufacturing and commercial classes of England has long been directed to some new and independent source of supply for the great staple of English manufacture. The experiments which have been made of cultivating cotton in India have been generally regarded as failures, but the failures have arisen not so much from any intrinsic difficulty as from external causes which are readily explained, and, it is believed by those best acquainted with them, readily removed. The great difficulty in India has been that of transportation, which is so slow and imperfect and expensive as to render it almost impossible to get a crop to the seaboard, and when it reaches the port of exportation, it has been subjected, in addition to the delays and the waste, to a deterioration in quality from the dust of the road and the miserable mode of conveyance. It is proposed to remedy these evils by the construction of railroads, to which the country is well adapted. Should this plan be adopted, the cotton of India would soon be felt as the rival of our own in the English market. All the other difficulties in the matter would disappear, when the principal one, that of transportation, was removed. This is a work of time and of capital, but if the people of England are once convinced of its practicability, they will not long hesitate to undertake it. And in spite of all the present difficulties of cultivation and transportation, the cotton received from India is constantly increasing in quantity and improving in quality, and from the last accounts it appears that the East India Company have taken hold of the matter in earnest. If this be the case, the experiment will not fail for want of a fair trial.

"Latterly a movement has been made towards introducing the cultivation of cotton in Australia, and the English papers contain articles upon the subject, all speaking in terms of encouragement and showing plainly that the project is a favorite one."

WAR IN MEXICO.—The readiness of Mexico to submit to a dismemberment of her empire was over-rated in our last number. We were not, indeed, then aware of the extent of the surrender demanded of her—amounting, as now appears, to six hundred and ninety-six thousand square miles, or nearly half her entire territory, and being a greater extent of country than that embraced by the whole of the free states and organized territory of these United States. The rejection by the Mexicans, of this demand, was done in a manner both temperate and dignified, as the official documents show.

We were premature also in supposing that the battle which preceded the armistice was decisive of the substantial occupation of the Mexican capital by the forces of the United States. That event was only accomplished by another desperate and bloody struggle, following the rejection by the Mexicans of the proffered terms of peace, and the consequent rupture of the armistice. The flag of the Union now floats scornfully over the halls of the Montezumas, but with no cessation of the war, though with a change, probably, by the Mexicans, in the manner of opposing and annoying their invaders.

We take the following statement of the loss of lives already incurred in the present war, compared with that in the war of Independence, from the New York correspondent of the Philadelphia Inquirer.

"Will it be believed that the American loss in killed and wounded in the war with Mexico is one half as great as that in the protracted Revolutionary struggle with Great Britain, which lasted seven years? Such is the fact, and here is the proof, deduced from authentic sources:

This is a tremendous loss, when we take into consideration the short time that has elapsed since the breaking out of hostilities. At a rough estimate we might set down five thousand more, who perished from fatigue, from the fire of guerillas, yellow fever, &c. &c. which, added to the other, would make the loss on our side nearly ten thousand in the course of fifteen months. Such is the result of war!"

PROPOSED ANNEXATION OF CUBA.—There are strong indications that a serious attempt is contemplated by the pro-slavery party in this country, to induce the Federal Government to purchase the island of Cuba from Spain. Not content with the annexation of Texas, and the prospect of adding other large portions of Mexico to the slave territory, the rapacity of the slavholders seems to increase. It is represented that the people of Cuba are anxious for annexation to the United States. One of the New York papers, in an atrocious article, represents that England is on the point of acquiring Cuba—that there is a near probability of a war with England—that such a war, "in a clearly national quarrel, would be welcomed by all the stirring blood of the Republic," and that "any attempt" by England to acquire Cuba "would just furnish the clearly national ground of quarrel, which would unite the people of the United States in opposition to her project." This trick of exciting a jealousy against England, was played with no little success in promoting the annexation of Texas, and the design of again introducing it is sufficiently obvious. The subject is one of great importance, and demands the vigilant and unflinching opposition of all who desire the restoration and preservation of peace, and the abolition of slavery.

MEETING IN LONDON IN FAVOUR OF FREE PRODUCE.—We have much pleasure in transcribing from the London Friend, of the past month, the subjoined account of a meeting held at the Anti-Slavery office, London, and are none the less gratified at the part taken by our co-editor in its proceedings.

Among the individuals attending the meeting, were Josiah Forster, George Stacey, Joseph Sturge, George W. Alexander, Robert Alsop, Jr., Richard Barrett, Alexander Brockway, Joseph Cooper, Samuel Fox, Charles Gilpin, John H. Hinton, Edward Marsh, George Neighbour, Henry Sterry, and Charles Tylor—names intimately associated with the Anti-Slavery enterprise, and other works of benevolence.

We await daily the return of our editorial associate from his brief foreign visit, in the hope that to his consciousness of having in various ways, during his absence, promoted a testimony near to the best and purest affections of his heart, will be added renovated health and spirits for a career of future usefulness at home.

"Disuse of Slave Produce.—Meeting of Friends in London.—Many of our readers have, we believe, met with Samuel Rhoads of Blockley, near Philadelphia, who has recently paid a visit to this country. He is well known to the friends of the Anti-Slavery cause, as a strenuous advocate of the oppressed Africans, and especially as a promoter of that simple but powerful means of bringing slavery to an end, the disuse of all its productions. It will be interesting to our friends in the country to hear that whilst S. R. was in London, a special meeting was called on the 17th of last month at the Anti-Slavery Office, Broad street, to discuss the present position of the Anti-Slavery movement, but chiefly in relation to the means just spoken of.

Joseph Sturge having been called to the chair, Samuel Rhoads proceeded to make a statement of what has been done in regard to this subject in the United States, and of the actual and probable results of those efforts. The American Free Produce Association has been in existence about nine years; that which Friends of Philadelphia have formed amongst themselves is of about two years' standing. These associations, each with a small capital, have been able to manufacture a large quantity of free cotton goods, some descriptions of which they can now sell of equal quality, and at the same price, as other manufacturers. A Friend in Philadelphia has opened a general store in which all kinds of articles grown in the slave states may be purchased, the production of free-labour. The cotton made use of is not imported, but is an article of home production. In the southern states, but especially in Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia, there are many small cultivators who employ no slave-labour on their farms. Some of these are not in a condition to purchase or hire slaves, but there are others who refuse to do so on principle. When the Philadelphia Association became desirous to purchase cotton, they despatched an agent into Mississippi with instructions to make his purchases only from these free estates. Accordingly, two years ago, he passed through several of the northern counties of Mississippi, and found no difficulty in buying as much cotton, untainted by the touch of slavery, as the Association required. On first going into the state, he was in some fear on account of the well-known hostility of the planters to Anti-Slavery efforts of all kinds. But in this case, there was nothing for them to lay hold of. The agent gave no lectures, held no meetings, disseminated no publications; he did not even seem anxious to converse on the dreaded topic: he came amongst them only in the way of trade; and although a prejudice was attempted to be raised against him in the places he was about to visit, it was of no avail, because, as is generally the custom in the purchase of cotton, he carried money in his hand. A great sensation, nevertheless, was occasioned by this novel way of selecting the goods he was in quest of. The knowledge that the people of the north were beginning to purchase cotton exclusively of those who keep no slaves, because they were no longer easy to clothe themselves with the productions of forced and unrequited labour, was calculated to give a greater blow to the system, than the whole array of tracts, meetings and lectures. At least such is the opinion of Friends in Philadelphia; and it must be borne in mind, that in the present state of feeling in the south, other means of reaching the minds of the slaveholders are almost, if not entirely, excluded. As an illustration of this, it may be mentioned that in many of the states, even an Anti-Slavery newspaper cannot be taken: the postmasters having strict injunctions not to suffer any publication of the kind to be delivered. Last autumn, the fact that a preference was given in the northern states, by a portion of the inhabitants, to free-grown cotton, having become generally known through several districts in Mississippi and Tennessee, and also that a merchant in Memphis, on the Mississippi, had received and forwarded such goods to Philadelphia, nearly all the cotton of this description was taken by the growers to him for sale. The Association of Friends in Philadelphia is again about to send one or two well-qualified persons into several of the southern states, to ascertain, as far as practicable, the quantity of cotton cultivated by free-labourers exclusively, in each county they may visit, with a view of making arrangements by which manufacturers in this country may obtain a supply of the raw material sufficient for any amount of demand. The business of the Association is rapidly increasing; and in sugar as well as cotton their custom seems likely to be very extensive.

A similar Association has lately been formed at New York, as we have already noticed in giving an account of the last Yearly Meeting. A capital having been subscribed, a general store of free goods is soon to be opened; and it will be not a little interesting to our readers to hear, that Lindley Murray Hoag is likely to occupy the office of store-keeper.

After Samuel Rhoads had concluded his interesting information on this subject, an earnest conversation ensued, which turned upon the relative importance of the disuse of slave-produce as a weapon against slavery, the practicability of such disuse, and the prospect of any effort to bring it about being seconded by the benevolent public in this country. With regard to its practicability, it was admitted that in the articles of sugar, rice and coffee, no sufficient obstacle exists to a consistent preference for the free over the slave-labour production. With cotton the case is rather different, but free calicoes and other manufactured articles in small quantities have found a ready market; and it is only requisite to have a fair demand, and merchants, manufacturers and shopkeepers will be found ready to supply it. But so long as those who ought to befriend the slave are so indifferent, as not even to make the inquiry from what part of the globe the necessities and luxuries which they use are imported, or so careless as to make no account of being fed, clothed and adorned, by the toil of their oppressed and enslaved fellow-creatures, it cannot be expected that the channel will be opened on behalf of the few, who nobly carry their principles into daily and personal practice.

It is to be feared that the Anti-Slavery feeling of the country has diminished rather than increased of late years; one cause is perhaps to be found in the absence of a definite object with which to incorporate itself. Great excitement and deep interest have frequently been produced at public meetings on recent occasions, but the excitement has rapidly died away, and has been followed by very little, if any, practical result. But if, as was suggested by our friend Samuel Rhoads, the duty of withholding our personal support from the system of slavery, by refusing to partake of its fruits, were brought home to every man's bosom, both as required for the sake of Christian consistency, and as a powerful direct means of effecting the abolition of slavery; our sympathies would no longer run to waste, but would be perpetually exercised in a wholesome and practical direction.

And this brings us to the remaining branch of the question, the importance of such abstinence in the Anti-Slavery action of the people of England. That it is a means of great importance was allowed by all who were present. The moral force of consistency, and the increasing prominence given by slaveholders to the argument derived from an opposite course of conduct, engaged much of the meeting's attention. Abolitionists are constantly met, whilst conversing with men of the Southern States, with the unanswerable rebuke that they are the actual supporters of the system; that so long as northern merchants, and northern manufacturers and northern consumers continue to uphold them in the employment of slaves, they have no right to ask that they themselves shall do away with slavery. Not long since, John G. Whittier took up to Washington, for presentation, a petition against the incorporation of Texas as a slave state, signed by 70,000 inhabitants of New England; he confessed, however, that he was put to silence by this home argument of the slavery men, the argument of moral inconsistency.

After a pretty full deliberation on the various points which have been mentioned, the meeting agreed to recommend to the Anti-Slavery Committee, as a most important branch of its operations, more earnestly and assiduously to promote the general disuse of slave-produce. It was felt and acknowledged, that this simple course, in which every one is competent to take a part, has been too much overlooked by the friends of the slave in this country; and it appeared to be the earnest desire of those who were present to adopt this means individually and in their families, so far, at least, as circumstances will permit, and to induce others to maintain a similar testimony.

Those who attended the meeting were almost all members of our Society, several of them belonging to the Anti-Slavery Committee. The meeting lasted about three hours.

From an editorial of The Friend, relating to the above subject, we select the following further remarks:

"We again invite the attention of our readers to a great practical question—the disuse of the products of slave-labour. We refer them with pleasure to the report of a meeting held in London, during last month, in which the question was discussed with much unanimity and feeling. The meeting was small, but we are not without hope that it may exercise an important influence on the future operations of the Anti-Slavery Society, and especially that its effects, together with the result of our friend Samuel Rhoads' visit to other parts of the country, may be quickly and extensively seen among the members of our own community. We believe that abstinence from slave produce may safely be called a testimony, and, looking at the way in which it originated in the mind of that faithful disciple, John Woolman, and the conscientious manner in which he continued all his life long to carry it into his daily conduct, perhaps it may, without bestowing undue honour upon him as an instrument in the Lord's hand, not improperly be designated as John Woolman's testimony. The Friends who were present at the meeting, separated with a conviction that they had not done what they might have done towards maintaining this standard, and that to give a distinct and consistent preference to the productions of free labour, in all cases in which it is possible to be done, is a means well adapted, both on the ground of moral consistency, and for the decisive blow which it must inflict on the stronghold of slavery, to effect the great end the friends of the cause have at heart.

That the slaveholders themselves regard such a course in both these characters, may perhaps be deduced from what is related of the deliberations of the meeting; at all events, such are the sentiments of one of their number, a member of Congress, and a man of extensive observation, who has recorded his opinions in one of the American newspapers. In this letter, Isaac E. Morse asks, 'Who does the carrying trade for the south; the millions of bales of cotton; the hundreds of thousands of hogsheads of tobacco, of sugar, of rice; besides the retail price of all this produce in English and American manufactures; besides the profits which you make in the manufacture of the cotton of the south? Why

New England derives more profit from supplying the slave-states with the commerce of her soil, than the slave-states do themselves. I have no reliable statistics about me, but I do not hesitate to assert, that the revenues received in New England from the product of slave-grown articles, is greater than the value of the articles themselves.

* * * One word more and I have done. If our northern brethren are so conscientious, and they are willing to invoke all these calamities on our happy country to effect their end; if they are sincere and honest, let me say this to them: There is a very easy way to get rid of Slavery in the United States without interfering with us, without doing one single thing that the nicest cavalier could censure, and which I believe in sober seriousness will effect your object as certainly as day succeeds to night, and which, though it may entail ruin and distress upon a large portion of your fellow-citizens, they have no right to object to or complain of—'TOUCH NOT, TASTE NOT, HANDLE NOT,' ONE SINGLE PRODUCT OF SLAVE-LABOUR.'"

RETURNS OF SAMUEL RHOADS.—Since our editorial respecting the London Meeting was prepared, we have had the pleasure to give a hearty welcome to our colleague, who arrived at New York in the ship Prince Albert, from London, on the 23d ultimo—we hope with our best wishes for him realized.

SELECTIONS.

CULTURE OF COTTON IN BRITISH INDIA.

Since the promulgation of a law for the complete abolition of slavery in British India, we have watched with much interest the measures of the government, having for their object the encouragement of the cotton culture in that vast and fertile region, teeming as it does with inhabitants, and possessing a climate so well adapted to the growth of cotton on a large and economical scale. The repeated accounts of the failure of experiments in cotton growing there, has made it an object of interest to inquire into the causes of disappointment. By the kindness of a friend, we are in possession of a number and supplement of "the Economist," published in London, giving a detailed "report of a commission appointed by the Government of Bombay, to inquire into the causes of the decline in the growth and exportation of cotton wool," and also "to suggest such remedial measures as might, in their opinion, be applied to it with advantage." The Economist says:—

"There never was a period when such a report was invested, from a number of causes, with so much interest, or demanded from the British public a more patient attention. High political policy, the interests of humanity, the success of our rapidly extending commercial intercourse with our territories in the East—for whose prosperity and welfare we have rendered ourselves in a great measure responsible—and the employment of our home population—whether we refer to the materials on which their labour is to be used, or the means of disposing of their products—all present irresistible considerations which give an overwhelming interest and importance to the subject of this report.

"When we consider that British Dominion in India extends over a territory fluctuating between, if it cannot be admitted virtually to comprehend, an expanse of surface varying from 553,000 to 1,380,000 square miles, with a population alternating between the extremes of 83,000,000 and 134,000,000 of human souls,—and 'reaching from within six degrees of the equinoctial line to the thirty-fifth degree of northern latitude,—we have before us some data for estimating the political and moral responsibility which we have assumed in acquiring those possessions. We must take it as a principle admitted, that, under whatever circumstances our power and influence in India were first acquired, the improved state of public opinion, and the more enlightened modern political considerations with regard to mere territorial possessions, would not justify our retaining them, unless we could show that the interests of religion and humanity, or the material prosperity and happiness of the human race, were thereby advanced. The mere possession of an extended territory, or of political power, would not justify, in the opinion of modern times, the variety of serious sacrifices that we are called upon to make from day to day, in order to retain our Eastern empire. We must show—and this has, in all modern writings of any reputation, been attempted to be done—that in extending or retaining our influence in India, the social and material interests of the masses of population whom we undertake to govern, are thereby advanced; and that in a way consistent with the true interests of our people at home. There have been no means discovered as yet whereby all these great aims can be so peacefully and so successfully accomplished as by commercial intercourse. By it—when conducted on free and enlightened principle—benefits are reciprocated, and intercourse is induced, which more than any other influences yet tried, tend to destroy those prejudices and antipathies which present obstacles in the path of civilization.

"In order, however, that commerce should be permanent, and that it should extend its influences over our Indian possessions; it is absolutely needful that it shall be successful—that it shall offer sufficient inducements to both parties to carry it on for the sake of the advantages it affords to each. The whole tendency, moreover, of commercial intercourse, when interrupted by no insuperable barrier, arising either from natural difficulties or fiscal restrictions, is, to extend its influences and advantages. Looking to our Indian empire, we cannot but be struck with the singular facilities which—in climate, soil, and population—it presents to the commerce of Great Britain. At first sight, it seems to offer every thing that could be devised, in order to induce to a commercial intercourse almost without limit. There is scarcely one important article of tropical produce which is consumed in this country, either as the raw material of our manufactures, or as an article of daily use, for the production of which, India is not as well, or better, adapted than any other country; while its dense and industrious population would seem to offer an illimitable demand for our manufactures. Nor are there opposed to these natural and flattering elements of commerce any fiscal restrictions to counteract their beneficial results. Indian produce has long entered into consumption in the home markets on the most favourable terms; while, in the introduction of British manufactures into India a very moderate duty is imposed. Yet, notwithstanding all these advantages, it is a notorious fact, deducible alike from the tendency which the supply of some of the most important articles of Indian produce show to fall off, and from the stagnant, or rather declining, state of the export of our manufactures to those markets—and, perhaps, still more so, from the extremely unprofitable and unsatisfactory result which has attended both the export and import trade with India for some time past,—that there exist some great and serious impediments to the realization of the just and fair hopes entertained with regard to our Indian trade.

"One of the most important indigenous productions of India is cotton wool; and of which, more than any other, the home market has of late required largely increased supplies, in order to sustain our manufacturing industry. But at the same time, when the demand is greatest the supply is least. The crop in the United States has been deficient in quantity in two succeeding years, and, judging from the accounts which are now received, is likely to be little better during the coming season. Unfortunately, our supplies from India have, during the same time, fallen off, even in a greater proportion. The official accounts of our imports show that the cotton received from India was, in 1844	88,639,776 lbs.

1846	34,510,143

"That so rapid a decline in one of the chief articles of the trade of India, should excite, in the minds of those engaged in it, the greatest apprehension, and that the special attention of the Government should be directed to so important a subject is only what might have been expected."

But to the report itself. Under the head of statistics, the character of the information is so varied and extensive, that we can find room for but a very small part of it. The period from which the returns take their commencement, is the year 1834, in the early part of which the trading privileges of the East India Company ceased, and from which time the course of the trade in cotton, as in every other commodity, has been left free to the operation of the ordinary considerations by which commerce in general is commonly governed.

From the statements given, it appears,

"As respects Bombay,—That the year of the largest export was, in regard to quantity, 1843-4; and to value, 1841-42.

"That the year of the smallest export was, in regard to quantity as well as value, 1834-35.

"That the years 1844-45 and 1845-46 were in both respects much below the average of the three preceding years.

"That the first eight months of the current year, 1846-47, is proportionately much lower than any year immediately preceding it.

"That the decline in quantity has been accompanied for seven years by a gradually increasing decline in value.

"As respects Calcutta,—That the export of 1845-46 has fallen very short of that of any preceding year throughout the series, as well in quantity as in value.

"As respects Madras,—That the export of 1845-46 was below that of any year, in both particulars, since 1837-38, when the value of the export was nearly as great, though the quantity was less.

"As respects Tuticorin,—(a port of recent resort for shipment).—That the export of 1845-46 was less in value than that of 1844-45 by nearly 60 per cent., and though somewhat more than that of 1842-43 and 1843-44, was less than that of 1841-42.

"As respects the whole of India.—That the export of 1845-46 was less in quantity than the export of any year since 1840-41 inclusive, and much less in value than the export of any year in the whole series, and about 25 per cent. less than the average value.

"It does not admit of being questioned, therefore, that the export cotton trade of each presidency, as well as of the whole of India, had been declining gradually, when the representation, which led to this inquiry, was addressed to Government, nor that it had then arrived at a lower point, in respect both of quantity and value, than had been known for some years past."

If we take the port of Bombay, which is by far the most important, the export of cotton in 1846 was less by nearly sixteen per cent. than the average of the whole period, and less by 33 per cent. than the average of the last six years; the decline representing 127,036 bales, weighing 420,807 cwt. from the supposed average export of 484,427 bales weighing each 3 cwt. 1 qr. 7 lb., the effect of which decline upon the various interests in the port, connected with, or depending upon the cotton trade, may be stated thus: Less had been expended within the year,

In cooly and boat hire, by	$66,667
In hemp and gummies and the freight of the latter	40,000
Screwing and packing charges,	80,000
In freight at £3 per ton to England, and 15 rupees per candy to China,	533,333
In insurances,	60,000
Total	$780,000

And besides the sums of direct expenditure lost to the port in the last year, by the decline in the cotton trade, 2,400,000 dollars less was employed in the trade of the port.

In relation to the "causes of the decline in the cotton trade," the report represents that, "the proximate cause of the very marked decline which has been thus shown to have taken place in this most important branch of the commerce of Bombay, has been the gradual diminution of that fair and reasonable mercantile profit, the expectation of which supplies the inducements to engage in the trade, or rather it has been a daily increasing apprehension founded on experience of continued inability on the part of purchasers at the markets to which our cotton is shipped, to take it off at prices that will leave the shipowner a moderate freight or the merchant a compensating exchange.

From the statements given it is seen that

"Western India has depended almost entirely upon the two distinct and separate quarters of the world, Great Britain and China, for the sale of its cotton, and in nearly equal proportions. In both of these quarters, too, has the decline in the value of the cotton proceeded at a rapid pace, and from the same cause, the inability of the India cotton to compete with the production of the United States.

"As regards the markets in Great Britain, the circumstances under which the two descriptions of cotton, East Indian and American, meet with each other, are those of pure and unfettered competition. All kinds of cotton are imported into the United Kingdom from any part of the world whatsoever, free from the burthens of customs duty or impost of any kind, and the cotton of India has given way to that of America for manufacturing purposes, as well as for continental export, solely in consequence of the gradually increasing ability of the importer from America to undersell the importers from India, and supply the manufacturer, whether in Lancashire or in Germany, with a better article at a cheaper price.

"In the markets of China, on the other hand, competition is again the cause of the decline in value of East India cotton. We meet not, it is true, the production of America, in its natural state, to any great extent, though American cotton has been sold at a profit in the Canton market, but we encounter the competition of yarns and goods manufactured from the very same cotton which has already driven us out of the field in Europe, and at a rate of cost which the Chinese manufacturer of similar yarns and goods from the cotton of India can never expect to emulate.

"As in both quarters, therefore, we have lost the sale of our cotton under the operation of one and the same cause; that free and unrestricted competition which has enabled the American exporter to supplant us with his raw material in the one quarter, and the representative of that same material in the other, and as it is evident that no efforts of the Indian government or Indian public can exercise any direct influence over the course of events in the home or China markets, so it is manifest that we must look for circumstances referable to this country alone, by the proper regulation or modification of which we may entertain the hope of being able to secure our cotton trade from the state of decline into which it has been shown to have been for some time falling.

"When the representations which led to this inquiry were made to Government, the cotton trade had fallen to a lower ebb than had been known for some years past. In the course of a month or two, however, it began to revive, and it is now in a state of great activity, under the influence of one and the same cause operating upon the markets both in China and the United Kingdom, viz., the two consecutive years of production of the raw material in the United States less than adequate for the consumption of the world. A continuance of this state of things cannot reasonably be depended upon; the high prices of the present time will stimulate production in America; sooner or later, this year, perhaps, or the next, the supply will again equal the consumption, and we shall then witness in this country a recurrence of that same state of inactivity and decline which has caused the present inquiry. In the mean time the remedy is indicated by the course of events through which the trade is now passing.

"Those who are conversant with the cotton trade of Bombay, are aware of the healthy action produced upon our markets by the comparatively small advance in the prices paid at Liverpool in August and September last; an advance which was quite sufficient to leave considerable profit to the exporter, with some benefit to the cotton trader also. We may suppose that advance to have been 4d per lb. upon a price of 3½d, or 15 per cent.; or in other words, that the exporter from India found in the advanced price he obtained at Liverpool a compensating difference between what he had paid for, and what he had obtained for his cotton. This difference, at least, it must be our object to attempt to secure, and as it is evident that no influence or efforts exercised in India can affect the prices of Lancashire, so it is apparent, that the only effectual way by which we can attain the same end, namely, add 15 per cent. to the difference between the cost and the sale price, is by reducing the first cost here in a corresponding degree, 'inasmuch as rents and profits depend even more upon the quantity produced, and the cost of production, than upon the price at which the produce is sold.'

"This brings us to the third head of our subject, viz.:

"The suggestion of remedial measures of a reasonable and practical nature for Rescuing the Cotton Trade of Western India from the state of decline into which it has been falling."

Under this head the report is very elaborate. From its great length we must content ourselves with giving a mere outline sketch of the measures recommended. This we shall do chiefly in the language of the report. They state, "that the system pursued in the chief agricultural districts of [Western] India for generations past is as well adapted to the circumstances of the country and of the climate as can reasonably be expected; that the land is made to yield as large an annual increase as it is capable of doing, unassisted by the chemical, mechanical, and other scientific appliances which have contributed so much within these last few years to swell the annual increase of the highly tilled districts of the United Kingdom. With respect to the purely agricultural part of the question, therefore, we are not in a position to put forward any specific recommendation for reducing the cost of raising cotton.

"We would, however, beg to remark, that we believe the experiments undertaken by order of Government, both by the American planters and others, has established some important facts regarding the productive powers of different species of the cotton plant, and in one instance, at least, have introduced into general use among the native cultivators of a district in the southern Mahratta country, the New Orleans cotton plant, which experience shows to be a great improvement on any previously cultivated in that province.

"In the process of cleaning the cotton, also, we believe Mr. Mercer's efforts have been very successful, and we see much reason to hope that the saw gin, as altered by him, to suit the Indian varieties of cotton, may soon entirely supersede the tedious methods of cleaning now in use, and do as much to cheapen the production of Indian cotton, as the original discovery of the machine did for the American.

"The customs duties on cotton were collected, until a very late period, either at the subordinate ports on the first shipment of the cotton by sea to Bombay, or on importation into Bombay, if brought from the ports of an independent or foreign state; and the duty thus collected was afterwards refunded as drawback on the re-exportation of the same cotton to an European port. This system, which was not only cumbersome in itself, but oppressive to the fair trader, from the opportunities it afforded the dishonest dealer for the practice of evasion and fraud, whereby the former was exposed to an undue competition in the China market, whilst the public revenue also suffered, was put a stop to by the passing of act 2 of 1846, in consequence of the representations addressed to Government by the mercantile interests of this presidency, and from that time the duty has been for the most part collected on the shipment of the cotton from the Bombay custom-house, the only exemption being in favour of cotton shipped to Europe as before, the trade with China and every other quarter to which our cotton is sent, being left as of old, to bear the burthen of this heavy tax.

"The duty in question amounts to 9 annas per Indian maund, or  $12\frac{1}{4}$  annas per cwt., or 5 rupees, 5 annas, and 9 pice per candy, and was fixed at that rate by the customs committee at Calcutta, some twelve years ago, with the view, as we understand, of its representing an ad valorem duty of 3 per cent.

"The prices of cotton, however, have been gradually declining throughout India from the time when that rate of duty was determined, whilst the amount of duty itself has remained fixed and stationary, and thus this singular anomaly still marks the commercial policy of the Government of this country, that by far its most important agricultural production, the largest exportable produce of the soil, in its natural and unmanufactured state, is taxed the more heavily, in proportion to its value, as its circumstances and prospects become worse. The export duty levied upon cotton, forms, we believe, at this present time, almost an unique instance of the manufactured produce of the soil being still burthened, in times of the greatest depression and difficulty, with so enormous an impost as 7 to 10 per cent on its market value.

"The removal of this duty would afford great relief to the shipper to the Canton market, and we most earnestly recommend, for the consideration of the authorities, upon whose decision in the matter the question rests, the entire abolition of this impost in the case of all cotton exported on British bottoms. As the law now stands, cotton exported on a vessel not entitled to the privileges of the British flag, is subjected to the payment of double duty; a charge equivalent, as far as it concerns their earnings in the way of freight, to a difference of 3 to 5½ rupees per candy (or 20s to 22s per ton,) between the current rate to China, and the rate at which a shipper could afford to send his cotton forward under a foreign flag.

"Looking back at the rates of freight at which cotton has been shipped to China for some years past, the admission of foreign flags to the advantages of the carrying trade in cotton, between the ports of India and those of China, would not be attended, in our opinion, with sufficiently compensating benefits to British trade in general, to warrant our recommending so great a concession; for, independent of other considerations particularly affecting the interests of what is termed the country shipping of India, the American trade with China is chiefly one of export from that country to the United States, and the experience of the present system even assures us that the Americans would make it worth their while to call here on their way to China, and carry on a cotton cargo, at rates of freight that would soon leave that branch of the carrying trade almost entirely in their hands.

"It only remains for us to state the result of our inquiries as to the extent to which the cost of the cotton is enhanced by the Government land assessment.

"In considering this branch of the subject, we were struck, at the outset of our inquiries, by the difficulty of instituting any comparison between countries differing so widely in all circumstances affecting their fiscal and social condition, as the rival cotton-producing districts of India and America.

"In America, the most productive cotton lands are those which have not been many years reclaimed from the forest; and this circumstance, added to the abundance of rich unoccupied land in the neighbouring provinces, and the peculiarity of the laws of inheritance, renders it probable that many years must elapse before any class can exist, owning the land and deriving a rent from it, but not directly concerned in its cultivation.

"In India, on the contrary, we find a state of things which, sooner or later, must follow wherever the produce of the land continues for a length of time more than sufficient to repay the interest of the capital, and the wages of the labour employed in its cultivation. The land is tilled by one class, who pay to another, as lords of the soil, a rent, derived from a difference between the whole value of the produce and the sum necessary to reimburse the cultivator for the labour and capital employed in cultivation.

"In other words, the comparison has to be instituted between an old country, where the land generally pays a rent, and a new country, where rents are, and for some years will probably continue to be, generally unknown.

"It is obvious, that when two countries so circumstanced compete in the production of any article, supposing all other circumstances to remain the same in both, the country where a rent must be paid will not be able to produce the article profitably, at such low prices as the country where the best of land may be had without paying any rent at all.

"Practically, the inequality is to a great extent corrected by the high rates of wages and scarcity of capital incidental to a new country; still, it must not be forgotten that among the advantages America possesses, as compared with India, must be reckoned her immunity from any thing analogous to our Indian land assessment."

The commissioners suggest "that no reasonable ground of complaint would remain against Government, as enhancing, by its fiscal regulations, the cost of cotton, if the land assessment were restricted within the limits of a fair rent."

"We would lay the greatest stress on the necessity of such restriction, whenever the present land assessment exceeds the limit above specified, because we do not find any such measure enumerated among those which are considered practicable or desirable by some of the highest authorities whose published opinions are on record; while we feel convinced that, in point of importance as regards a more extended production of cotton, the revision of assessment, and its reduction where excessive, must be ranked with the improvement of roads, and the introduction of speedier and cheaper means of clearing the cotton.

"We would observe that we cannot conent with the opinion which the collector of Surat seems to entertain, that it is a matter of indifference whether lands capable of producing cotton are cultivated with cotton or with less valuable grain crops, or that it is a proof of the satisfactory condition of the assessment, when the cultivator is content with a grain crop, and the land is not actually thrown out of cultivation.

"In every well populated province, the local consumption of grain will take off the produce of a large proportion of the arable land, and the over assessment must be most severe before this outlet for such produce can be seriously contracted. But it cannot be inferred from this, that it is a matter of indifference to Government whether a rich province produces valuable exportable crops, or merely those required to supply the first necessities of the inhabitants. The numerous sources of indirect gain to an Imperial Government, in the former case, are too obvious to require pointing out, and the example of Ireland would suffice to show that, even to a private landlord, high rents do not in the long run compensate for the disadvantages of having to do with a tenantry who, from good land, produce nothing which requires capital or skill, and rest content when they have supplied themselves with the mere necessities of life.

"There can be no doubt that the system is a most vicious one; but it is easier to see its evils, than point out a remedy in an independent state.

"Another item of great importance in the calculation of the cost of the cotton of Western India, remains now to be considered—namely, the expense of conveying it from the various districts of its production to Bombay, as the port of shipment.

"We find, with respect to the cost of bringing cotton to Bombay by sea, whether from the ports of Guzerat to the northward, or those of the Concan and Canara to the southward, that the ordinary rates of freight on native craft are sufficiently low, excepting occasionally towards the close of the fair season, as to preclude the possibility of any reduction of practical utility being effected under this head. 3 rupees per candy of 7 cwt., appears to be about the average rate throughout the season from Broach, Tankaria, Bunder, and Compta—a rate which, if we suppose every candy of cotton to be carried 250 miles by sea, will be found not to exceed  $\frac{1}{4}$  to  $\frac{1}{3}$  of a penny per ton per mile, and not more, we understand, than would be incurred on sending the same cotton a similar distance coastwise in the United Kingdom, or say between London and Hull, where the navigation is not closed for one-third of the year, as it is in this country.

"Neither do we learn that the cost of cotton grown in the maritime districts of Guzerat is much enhanced by the expense of conveying it to the ports from whence it is shipped to Bombay; and were it not so, we are informed, that the nature of the soil of those districts, and the deficiency of all suitable material for the construction of roads, would present almost insuperable obstacles to the establishment of such a system of road communication as would practically serve the object in view. A good deal of cotton, however, passes through Guzerat on its way down to the coast from the native states in the vicinity, when prices are sufficiently high to repay the expense of the conveyance of it; and we do not doubt that easier access to the coast, or rather into the districts bordering upon the sea, would increase our supplies from that quarter, by enabling the dealers to sell it upon cheaper terms than are found at present to remunerate them.

"With respect, however, to Malwa, Vengorla, Compta, and the other ports to the southward of Bombay, from which the produce of the extensive cotton districts of the Southern Mahratta country is sent up to Bombay, the case will be found to be very different. And it cannot admit of a doubt, that the completion and efficient maintenance of two good lines of trunk roads from the chief cotton marts of the interior, to as many well selected shipping ports north and south of Goa respectively, so as to diminish in each case the distance of land carriage as much as possible, would be followed immediately by a greater diminution in the cost of cotton, and a corresponding increase in the quantity forwarded to Bombay for sale. Mr. Blane, the collector of Canara, in writing to the committee, under date the 17th October, observed,—

"It seems desirable that you should be made acquainted with the fact, that, since the year 1836, the Government of Madras has been using considerable exertions to improve the land communication between the coast in this district, and the inland districts of Dharwar, Bellary, &c., from which the supply of cotton is received; and it is believed that the facility which has been thus afforded for the transport of the cotton, has had considerable influence in increasing the exports. Previously to the year above referred to, the roads and glaucs from Upper into Lower Canara were scarcely passable for loaded cattle; the road from Compta (the great entrepot of cotton on the coast) to Dharwar has now been made easy for laden bullocks, and will shortly be rendered practicable for carts, throughout its whole distance of about 110 miles."

"The enormous pressure of the land carriage, however, upon the cost of cotton of Western India, is felt more particularly in the instance of those descriptions which are produced so cheaply in the fertile districts of Central India, as still to find their way down to Bombay in spite of it. We learn from page 9 of Mr. Chapman's able report on the "Present cost of carriage" on this side of India, printed by the Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company, that the mean of the highest and lowest rates of charge incurred by Messrs C. H. Fenwick and Co., extensive purchasers of cotton at Khamgaum, in the course of six years, on sending cotton down as far only as Kuseylee Bunder, was as much as 6 rupees per load of 250 lbs. weight; and we are informed by parties here, of practical experience in the trade, that as the means of conveyance are most in demand at the season of the year when forage and water are scarce, and the rates are highest, an average allowance of fully 7 rupees per load should be made for the cost of bringing the cotton that distance. Seven rupees per load are equal to about 22 rupees per candy; and when to this are added the expense of bringing the cotton into Bombay from Kuseylee, whether by land or by water, the loss of time occupied in the transit of the cotton from Khamgaum, the deterioration it undergoes in respect of quality, from exposure to the weather, the dust of the road, and the sweating of the animals, and other drawbacks incidental to the system of conveyance, the actual expense incurred in the transit of the cotton can be hardly less on the average of the year than 33

rupees per candy, or one penny per lb. upon an article, of which the first cost in the market of Khamgaum did not probably exceed 50 rupees, or three half pence per pound.

"The extension and improvement of the present high roads of communication into the interior, over the Tull and Bhore Ghauts, and the construction of tanks and reservoirs of water at the various halting places on those roads, where the need of them is now more particularly experienced, would no doubt tend to facilitate the communication, and reduce, in some measure, the present very heavy cost of transport. That such relief, however, would be but partial, is shown by the difficulty which is now experienced, in providing adequate conveyances for the abundant cotton crop of 1846, in consequence of the failure of the Monsoon of 1845.

"As perfect independence of the difficulties, in respect to conveyance, which the vicissitudes of seasons interpose in this country, is the great object to be attained, so the system of railway communication just put forth by the Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company, appears to us to furnish the only feasible means for insuring permanent immunity to our inland cotton trade from the uncertainties to which it is subjected under the present state of things. We have seen that an importer of cotton into Bombay from Khamgaum, (the great mart of Western Berar,) must be prepared to sustain a charge of upwards of 30 rupees for the carriage and custody of every candy that he sends down. The railway in question will approach the very districts from which the cotton is supplied, and deliver it in Bombay, as proposed by Mr. Chapman, at the rate of 22d per ton per mile, or 12 rupees per candy, being at the least 18 rupees per candy, or more than a halfpenny per lb. less than what must now be paid; and this, too, in the course of as few days as it now takes months to accomplish. The mere pecuniary saving, however, of so much per mile, or so much per candy on the transit, is not the only consideration to be taken into account. The transfer of the animal labour from off the road to Bombay to the supply of the grand entrepots on the line of railway from the local marts, the substitution of perfect certainty for the utmost uncertainty, of speed and regularity for constant disappointment and vexatious delay, of confidence in the execution of an order where no confidence whatever can now be placed, of facility of remittance and independence of the capricious vicissitudes of a native bazaar, would soon attract to Bombay the produce of the extensive cotton districts in Central India, which are now in a great measure inaccessible to the ports on the coast, and enable the merchant in Bombay to supply the Liverpool market at a rate of cost that would allow him to compete fairly with the planter of the United States.

"While on this branch of our subject we would beg to refer to several suggestions, which will be found more specially detailed in the Appendix; for the improving the means of shipment at some of the chief ports where cotton is shipped for Bombay. The want of good piers, and the usual mechanical contrivances for hoisting the bales into boats, has an injurious tendency in enhancing the cost of transport, and frequently deteriorating the quality of the cotton, when it has to be conveyed over a mud shore to the boat. We would, therefore, beg the particular attention of Government to the suggestions contained in Mr. Davies' letter, for piers of boats at Broach and Tankaria; in Mr. Stewart's letter, for a pier at Randier, and an extension of that at Surat; and in the letter from Mr. Shaw, the collector of Dharwar, for the improvement at the ports of Vingorda and Compta.

"We would beg to suggest that the Madras Government should be informed of the importance attached by this Government to the improvement of the last mentioned port.

"The cost of cotton does not undergo much enhancement susceptible of reduction after its arrival in Bombay. The charge for pressing cotton has been considerably reduced within the last two years, and measures are being taken also to economise as much as possible the expense of landing and storing it.

"Having thus inquired to the full extent, that our time and the means at our disposal have permitted us to do, into the important subject referred for our examination and report, it merely remains for us now to recapitulate the results in a few words.

"We have shown, as it appears to us—

"First. That the export cotton trade had undergone a great decline, both in quantity and value, and was in a very depressed state when the Government was appealed to on the subject.

"Secondly. That the cause of that decline has been the inability of the exporter from this country to compete with the cheaper produce of the United States in the markets of Europe, and the representatives of that cheaper produce in the form of yarns and goods in the markets of China.

"Thirdly. That the only means, by which this supercession of the cotton of India in those markets can be obviated, are by reducing its first cost here, and that this end is to be attained,

1st. By the entire abolition of the onerous customs duties levied on the export of our manufactured cotton.

2nd. By a revision of the land assessment in the collectorates of Surat, Broach, and Candesh.

3rd. By permanently improving the communications between the Southern Mahratta country and the ports of the sea coast.

4th. By the introduction of a system of railway communication between Bombay and the interior, as proposed by the Great Indian Peninsular Railway Company, and thus opening up the fertile districts of Berar and the Deccan to the sea.

"We submit these recommendations for the consideration of the Honourable the Governor in Council and the higher authorities, upon whose decision the use they may be put to will depend, under a full and sure conviction upon our minds that the future welfare of the cotton trade of India will be determined by the course that may be pursued with respect to them; and that their adoption, to the full extent recommended, will render the markets at home independent of supplies from other parts of the world, by enabling the exporter from India to compete, on terms of equality, with the importer into Liverpool from the Western hemisphere.

"We have the honour to be, sir, your most obedient servants.

THE CLERGY AND REFORM.

The Christian World, a Unitarian paper published in Boston, contains, in its number for the 31st ultimo, a well-written article under this head, from the pen of T. W. Higginson, the Unitarian minister of Newburyport, Mass. The writer takes the ground, that, considering the position occupied by the clergy, their own high claims, their constant and regular access to the people, the power which they really exercise through the religious feeling, and their ability to awaken the hopes and fears which brighten or shadow, like sunshine and cloud, the human spirit in view of the life to come, they have deserved the censure cast upon them by the friends of Liberty and Peace, at the present day—that they are, as a class, unworthy of their vocation, unequal to the need of the times, and unfaithful to their professed commission from God. Taking up the argument of those who arraign them, the writer says:

"Your claims are such, your position is such, as to give us rightfully an immense demand on you, which you have as yet scarcely begun to fulfil—and concerning which, when we sometimes call you to account, you put us off with the assurance that we ask too much, and no man can be expected to fulfil it. We wait anxiously to see how this insolency is to end. The burden of proof lies always with the clergy. They are liable to be called on every instant to justify their own existence. Carlyle truly said—The one question in regard to any organized clerical order is, Does this clergy lead and teach this people or not? If not, its doom is sealed."

We have long been satisfied that the clergy, as a class, must abate much of their pretensions, or retaining them, be, in fact, what these pretensions require on their part. We would gladly see them all that has ever been claimed for them, by their most devoted adherents. We would rejoice to see realized in them the wish of Gregory VII. that "Every Pope should be a saint." But human nature is fallible. The lore of theological schools, the laying on of hands, consecration solemnities, and ecclesiastical associations, cannot make the selfish benevolent, the sensualist a spiritulist, the coward brave, or the hypocrite true. We have never felt, for ourselves, the surprise which some of the ardent advocates of philanthropic objects have manifested, in view of the position of the great body of the clergy in respect to those "weightier matters of the law" of Christianity. We have been accustomed to judge all men by one standard. In our view, the preacher is but a poor, weak, erring man; and so in his own eyes, if he be really worthy of the name of a servant of the Highest, must be seen also. It is a significant fact, that the bitterest denouncers of the priesthood are those who have formerly been blind worshippers of the order. Their "Come-outer" reaction is the petty spite of idolaters, breaking their idols because they have at last found out that wood and stone, carved ever so grotesquely, or robed ever so quaintly, remain necessarily wood and stone still.

Too much is asked of the clerical profession, as a necessary consequence of what is claimed for it. Hence, when one of its number is detected in some glaring immorality, the poor wretch is hunted down without mercy, as if there could be no excuse for his delinquency, being holy by virtue of his station, and ex officio beyond temptation. Alas! have we yet to learn that the snares of the Tempter are spread in all paths—that they are often concealed under the guise of the kinder feelings of our nature—that he who is regarded, in popular estimation, as above and beyond common liability to error, and who is consequently relied upon with the strongest confidence, by the young, the enthusiastic, the confident, of both sexes, needs, of all men, self-distrust and humility, and the daily repetition of the prayer, Lead us not into temptation."

The bold manner in which Abolitionists have at times arraigned the clergy, for their conservative course in respect to slavery, has, we doubt not, added to their number men who are not unwilling to find a justification of hostility to the order in its antagonism to reform, while, on the other hand, it has repelled a still larger number, who have not yet learned to distinguish an honest and faithful rebuke of time-servers and blasphemous perverters of the oracles of God, from an attack upon Christianity and its institutions. If it be true, as has been asserted, that bad men are taking advantage of the position of the clergy on the slave question, to ridicule their pretensions, and bring them into general disrepute, the blame rests mainly with themselves. Men professing to believe in a God who sanctions and institutes war and slavery, resorting to the Bible to justify sanguinary and cruel laws, and taking, as by instinct, the side of the strong against the weak, and of the rich against the poor, or, what is essentially the same, holding in Christian fellowship those who do all this, have no right to expect the confidence and esteem of the people. In this nineteenth century, such cannot hope to remain "at ease in Zion." Were the world no longer lying in wickedness—no slave lifting his chained hands to heaven—no cry of the poor, bound to the dust by wealth and power, rising in wail and protest—were the fire of the distillery quenched, fraud divorced from traffic, labour reaping its due reward—were there, in short, no practical evils and wrongs to be abolished and redressed—it might be a very pleasant and profitable amusement to descend week after week upon obsolete creeds, or parade the ceremonials and trappings of a formal worship. But that millennial state seems yet far distant. There is work to be done—earnest, faithful, strong men, are needed to do it. The people are waiting for their spiritual guides to take the lead in its performance—to go before them into the great field of duty, waiting with ill-suppressed impatience.

"Up, leaders! upon the winds are flung
The banners of the faithful, and erect
Beneath their folds the hosts of God's elect Stand in their strength. Be ye their ranks among."

THE MEXICAN WAR.

What earthly interest can be dearer to any American heart, than American liberty? When we remember the manifold blessings which it has conferred on us, which it may confer on our children, and our children's children, when we remember the sacrifices which it cost, and the imminent perils through which it has reached us, we must prize it beyond all our other blessings.

American liberty should be doubly dear to the Christian. Not that it is the greatest of his blessings, but because it is at once the offspring and the protector of his religion. It gives freedom, not only to his body, but to his mind, and to his conscience. And it allows him to labour without molestation, to promote that form of religion which he believes to be of God. There is no inquisition, no spiritual court, no state religion to watch with jealous eye, every movement of the free spirit of man, but every one may labour to promote the kingdom of God upon earth in that way which he judges to be most in accordance with the Scriptures.

As Christians, we all believe that the liberties in which we rejoice, are founded on justice, intelligence, morality and piety,—the love of God and the love of man. To the same liberty all the human race are entitled. It is not the liberty to do wrong, not the liberty to oppress, not the liberty to enrich ourselves at the expense of others, not the liberty which sanctions lust of power, or of wealth, or dominion, but liberty to be good and to do good, liberty to serve one another in love, liberty to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with God, liberty to promote the love of knowledge, and of holiness, and the enjoyment of the same liberty among others; liberty to be as happy, and to make others as happy as the conditions of our existence in this world will allow. This is what we mean by American liberty, secured to us by our excellent form of government, the product of the wisdom, the high moral and religious principle, and the self-denying sacrifices of our illustrious forefathers.

Whatever, therefore, threatens this, our best earthly inheritance, this medium of so many spiritual blessings, may well excite our alarm. And it is plain that whatever blunts the sense of justice among the people, whatever tends to destroy the feeling of charity and benevolence, whatever hinders the progress of pure religion among the people or among any other people by our means, must be attended with danger to American liberty. Whatever discourages industry and sobriety, whatever inflames the passions, or promotes the love of power, or of wealth, is corrupting the fountains of our freedom.

With what feelings must those who entertain these views, look on the present war with which our government is engaged with a neighbouring power? Was that war commenced, and has it been carried on, in accordance with the doctrines and principles of American freedom, rather we would ask, in accordance with the principles of our holy religion? It is time that the attention of Christians in our land was more seriously turned to this war. Is it not fraught with great danger to the best interests of the people of this country? We ask these questions, not to cast blame on any man, or party, nor from any party motive, for we have no such motives, but in view of the solemn truths to which we have before adverted. What American, who loves his country or his God, who loves liberty, or religion, or justice, or morality, does not see that the present is a most fearful crisis? Never before has our country been presented in such an attitude before the civilized world, and before high heaven. Never before were the armies of the free republic of the United States seen afflicting the people of another nation for the misconduct of their rulers; when in reality they have no rulers. Never before were our armies seen spreading desolation, capturing towns and cities, and occupying them by an armed force, and piling up heaps of slain. And what is it for? Are our liberties threatened? Does a powerful nation threaten to invade us? What provocation have we received, that we should visit any portion of our brethren of the human family with such calamities?

These are questions for the Christians of this professedly Christian nation to ponder seriously, and prayerfully. Whatever may be our views of the wrongs we, as a nation, are inflicting on the Mexicans, we are inflicting a greater wrong upon ourselves.

SPASMODIC EFFORTS—THE CAUSE.

Every now and then, there are, in South Carolina and Georgia, what may be termed spasmodic efforts in behalf of manufactures.

We remember well, in Columbia, when wealthy politicians and rich professional men determined "that we must be a manufacturing people, and that nothing else could save us from utter poverty." Consequently the Saluda Company was established, and the great iron works of Spartanburg bought up. But the fever-fit soon passed away; failure followed nearly all those forced efforts; and people continued the old business of raising more cotton to buy more negroes.

The Columbia Telescope and Charleston Mercury are urging the people now to turn their attention to manufactures. "Time was," says the latter paper, "when South Carolina flour, manufactured at Camden, was considered superior to any in the Union, commanding, not only in our market, but in the West Indies and South America, higher prices than any other with which it was brought into competition." Time was! That is a significant phrase. Time was; but it is so no longer. We remember well the old Carter Mills where this "Camden Flour" was made; but then the North West was a wilderness, and our sister city, Cincinnati, a village. Whereas now the one is a mighty land, and the other a great city, sending out alone its three hundred thousand barrels of flour, while old South Carolina only manufactured a little over one-sixth of this amount.

Alabama, too, seconds lastly the action of the Telescope and Mercury. "Let us have manufactures," it says: "we have the water-power, and the raw material. Take a bale of cotton at 500 lbs. and costing eight cents the pound, and see our advantages."

Difference, . . . . . 8 30

Here is a difference in favor of the Alabama manufacturer of over twenty per cent. and why is not this advantage turned to good account? Why do not the Carolinians and Alabamians work up their own cotton? Alabama had, in 1840, fourteen cotton manufacturing establishments;

South Carolina, fifteen; Georgia, nineteen; employing in all, sixty thousand four hundred and forty-six spindles, while the number in little Rhode Island, alone, was two hundred and nine, working five hundred and eighteen thousand, eight hundred and seventeen spindles!

The fact cannot be concealed. It is FREE LABOR which makes the difference. Mobile is retrograding; Charleston is retrograding; rail roads neither help them on, nor build them up; for slavery drives away their own white laborers, and keeps out free Northern artisans; and with all their advantages, these States are sinking, sinking in power and prosperity every day. Nor will any spasmodic effort save them. They will have to go to the root of the evil, and dig up slavery as the upas tree which blasts and withers up whatever comes within its reach, and plant in its stead the goodly tree of liberty, ere labor will flourish in their soil, and a healthy prosperity bless it, and the people who sustain it.

The reader may suppose we exaggerate. Not a bit! We know the land of which we speak; the people, their habits and condition; and comparatively speaking, there is not in either Mobile or Charleston, nor in large portions of Alabama or South Carolina, any thing like a class of free laborers. The editor of the Kentucky Yeoman has been paying the latter State a visit. Hear what he says of Charleston, the commercial capital of one of these States:

"But the most striking feature of the market, and that which will probably more surely arrest the attention of a stranger, and mark the character of society, than anything else, was the total absence of whites from this scene of plenty and beauty. I did not notice one white vender in the market. All were blacks. The butchers, the fishermen, the producers, and the salesmen, and with the exception of a straggling white, met now and then, the purchasers too were slaves—not mulattoes, but almost invariably black—'black as the ace of spades.' A passenger-acquaintance remarked, if he did not know he was in an American city, the illusion there presented would lead him to suppose himself in a nation of the Ethiopian race. In fact, blacks do every thing here, nearly. They are mechanics, agriculturists, and domestic tradesmen."

"The ladies and gentlemen appear to live within doors, or else drive leisurely about in carriages, drawn by beautiful horses. But few are seen in the streets. Upon the whole, I consider Charleston a very remarkable city, and well worthy of being visited on account of its attractiveness." Talk of prosperity under this state of things!

Tell us that city or country can flourish when labor is thus degraded! Pretend that society can be vigorous and healthful when the white laborer's arm is palsied, and the free mechanic exiled, by the ruinous competition of the slave! It involves an utter impossibility.

INTELLIGENCE.

An esteemed friend has kindly furnished us with sundry interesting statistics which he has gleaned from reliable sources. They are to our purpose, and we accordingly give place to them, and shall thank our friend for the continuance of such favours.

There was imported into the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, from their colonial possessions in the East Indies, for the year ending August 25th, 1847, viz:

Sugar, 2,313,726 cwt.; Molasses, 50,418 cwt.; Rum, 837,937 gals.; Coffee, 20,547,466 lbs.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

Note.—2,313,726 cwt., of sugar, are equal to 259,137,312 lbs. or equal in quantity to 259,137 hhds. of Louisiana sugar. The Philada. Public Ledger, of Sept. 14th, contains a statement of the annual crops of sugar raised in Louisiana from 1828 to 1846, in which the crop of the latter year is put down at 140,000 hhds., and the greatest crop ever raised there, (which was in 1844,) at 200,000 hhds. So it appears that after supplying the home consumption, the British East Indies exported more sugar to the mother country by 59,137 hhds. than was ever raised in Louisiana in any one year, and 119,137 hhds. more than the same year's crop of the latter country.

Shipped from Barbadoes up to August 23d, 1847:—Sugar 30,595 hhds., 1669 tierces, 1996 bls.; Arrow Root 661 packages; Ginger 331 packages; Cotton 346 bales; Gourds 559; Molasses 4,681 puncheons, 238 hhds. 43 bls.

A few engagements of breadstuffs are making at New York, for Liverpool, but the quantity is moderate. Grain is taken at 6d. and Flour 18d. Cotton is 4d. Some Cotton was shipped to Hamburg a 1/2c, and Sugar at 30s.

The Sugar crop of Louisiana, it is said, affords most flattering promise, and should the weather continue favourable, and the cane escape the blighting effects of an early frost, there is good reason to expect that the product of this important staple will exceed that of any previous year since the introduction of its cultivation. The following is a statement of the crops for a series of years by which it will be seen that the product is subject to remarkable fluctuations:

Crop 1846, 140,000 hhds.	Crop 1837, 65,000 hhds.
" 1845, 186,650 "	" 1836, 70,000 "
" 1844, 200,000 "	" 1835, 30,000 "
" 1843, 100,000 "	" 1834, 100,000 "
" 1842, 140,000 "	" 1833, 75,000 "
" 1841, 90,000 "	" 1832, 70,000 "
" 1840, 87,000 "	" 1829, 48,000 "
" 1839, 115,000 "	" 1828, 80,000 "
" 1838, 70,000 "

The market, for some months past, has been exceedingly heavy, and closes with a stock in the State of Louisiana, on the 1st inst., estimated at about 4000 hhds.

COTTON CULTIVATION IN TURKEY.—The recent attempts to cultivate cotton in Turkey have succeeded equal to the expectation of those who attempted it. Dr. Davis, at the solicitation of the Turkish Government, left South Carolina some time ago to test the practicability of successfully raising cotton in that country. After making the proper inquiry as to the seasons, examining the tables of the weather kept by the Rev. Mr. Dwight, missionary, the character and capacity of the people, Dr. Davis selected a body of land near San Stephano for a model farm; not that it was the best suited for cotton, but because it was near the Sultan's cotton factory, and convenient for his inspection. He commenced planting on the 22d of April, and finished the 25th of May. The cotton came up badly; indeed, the first importation of seed was damaged, and, with the exception of about five acres, none of it came up. When the second lot arrived, he re-planted. This all came up well, grew well, bloomed well, and is now full of bolls, and he thinks the hundred acres planted, promise to make one hundred bales of three hundred weight each. There was no frost till January last year, and this is usually the case. The cotton was planted five feet in the rows, and eighteen inches apart, on a level with the ground, anticipating the effects of dry weather. The cotton planters from America, who have been here, pronounce the crop equal to that grown on any of our American soils, and the doctor thinks better than Carolina crops. The Carolina negroes think it bears heavier than at home, and the doctor is sure of it. The doctor has ten young men, five Turks, four Armenians, and one Greek, whom he instructs in English geology, chemistry, natural philosophy, &c., who are to be assistants in his school hereafter.

THE COTTON CROP.—A correspondent of the New Orleans National, under date of Alexandria, (La.) Sept. 27th, says:—"With regard to the crops, I would say, that it will not, in my opinion, be what is usually called a fair one. The rains in the early part of July injured the early crop very materially, and the worm has cut off the late crop. I think that two-thirds of the crop will be made by a few planters in Rapides, but a large majority will not average more than half a crop. With this statement, on which you may rely, you can make your own conclusions."

A correspondent of the Montgomery (Ala.) Journal, from Henry County, writes as follows:

"Cotton in this region promises to be very small: few planters getting more than from 100 to 176 lbs. to the acre. As written you before by Mr. T., the caterpillar has struck some of our plantations, but the majority are too poor to have any injury done them. We have had from ten days to two weeks of good weather for gathering. Corn promises well in bulk, but the grain is light and chaffy. In short, the season has been too bad, and the hurricane, boll-worm, lice, wet weather, and 'all the ills cotton is liable to,' have worked so hard against it, there is a small chance of having more than half crops."

POETRY.

TO THOSE I LOVE.

Oh, turn ye not displeased away, though I should sometimes seem

Too much to press upon your ear, an oft-repeated theme;

The story of the negro's wrongs is heavy at my heart,

And can I choose but wish from you a sympathising part?

I turn to you to share my joy,—to soothe me in my grief—

In wayward sadness from your smiles, I seek a sweet relief:

And shall I keep this burning wish to see the slave set free,

Lock'd darkly in my secret heart, unshared and silently?

I cannot know that all the chords, which give their magic tone

Like Memnon's harp, in music out, 'neath sonshine smiles alone,

Are torn by savage hands away from woman's bleeding breast,

And with their sweetness on my soul, my feelings keep repress'd!

If I had been a friendless thing—if I had never known,

How swell the fountains of the heart beneath affection's tone;

I might have, careless, seen the leaf torn rudely from its stem,

But clinging as I do to you, can I but feel for them?

I could not brook to list the sad sweet music of a bird,

Though it were sweeter melody than ever ear hath heard,

If cruel hands had quenched its light, that in the plaintive song,

It might the breathing memory of other days prolong.

And can I give my lip to taste the life-bought luxuries, wrong

From those on whom a darker sight of anguish has been flung,

Or silently and selfishly enjoy my better lot,

While those whom God hath bade me love, are wretched and forgot?

Oh no!—so blame me not, sweet friends, though I should sometimes seem

Too much to press upon your ear an oft-repeated theme;

The story of the negro's wrongs hath won me from my rest,

And I must strive to wake for him an interest in your breast.

ANTI-SLAVERY PRACTICE VERSUS ANTI-SLAVERY PROFESSION.

A great deal is said and written against slavery, which is well enough, so far as it goes. But while the life and practice of those who thus write and speak, are a standing contradiction of their preaching, they ought not to be disappointed if those on whose ears their "words fully spoken" are intended to fall, should wait to see fruits which will show that the speakers and writers are really in earnest, and do themselves believe their own exhortations.

What says the champion of anti-slavery principles? Men and brethren, these things ought not so to be. It was never intended that man should be the property of man—he bought and sold like sheep and oxen, tasked and worked at the will and bidding of his fellow—and the proceeds of his labour all claimed and wrested from him, the mere bones and rags of the meat and clothing which he has earned, thrown back to him for his share of his toil. Does not the Declaration of the Independence of the United States assert that "all men are created free and equal?" See? What right, then, has one man to hold another in bondage, robbing him of his earnings, and what is more, of his liberty! It is preposterous! contrary to the plainest rules of justice!

"I would not have a slave to till my ground,
To carry me, to fan me while I sleep,
And tremble when I wake, for all the wealth
That sinews bought and sold have ever earned,
No; dear as freedom is, and in my heart's
Just estimation prized above all prices,
I had much rather be myself the slave,
And wear the bonds, than fasten them on him."

"Then fasten them on him?" And yet, it is thought to be quite allowable for good anti-slavery men and women to hold out the inducement and motive for slavery, by appropriating to their use, those products of the slave's toil, for which, and by which, he is held in bonds. This is anti-slavery profession. But how does it square with the true spirit and ground of anti-slavery principles? Why am I opposed to slavery, but because it is a system of injustice, of cruelty, at variance with my apprehension of the laws of God. It is not doing unto others as we would they should do unto us. With what consistency or propriety, then, can I declaim against slavery as an evil, an iniquity, while I clothe it with muscle and sinew, and continue to breathe into it that breath of life, without which (in the aggregate) it cannot exist? None at all. Such a course is empty anti-slavery profession, valueless and totally unavailable, as to any moral or physical effect it can have in abolishing the system.

Widely different is the course and effect of consistent anti-slavery practice. Seeing and knowing that

"Whoso gives the motive, makes]
His brother's sin his own,"

the consistent opposer of slavery dares not freely partake of the fruits of the extorted and unrequited labour of the slave, deeming it but the mockery of truth and justice to build up this giant evil with one hand, while he is pretending to pull it down with the other. He would feel ashamed to rebuke the slaveholder to his face, to word, and then at a little distance turn round and extend the means by which he is able to continue the wrong; yes, even deriving from the acts of his condemner, the countenance and support without which, he might not be willing to go on. What his own conscience informs him, is disallowed by the law of righteousness. The practical opposer of slavery believes it his duty to practice what he preaches. He does not discriminate in the teachings of truth, between the duty which he feels to declare openly that he believes slavery to be wrong, and the practice, in his daily life, of abstinence from its support. He thinks that when the light of truth is clear enough to manifest a thing to be wrong, it is sufficiently clear to show him that he must not partake in the wrong. He reads in the conduct of the blessed martyrs, that they did not feel that even great sufferings might be shrunk from or evaded by omitting to support their principles by a consistent practice. Nay, even in the life and death of the holy Jesus, our Saviour and Redeemer, they learn the lesson of self-denial, "If this cup may not pass away from me except I drink it, thy will be done!" T.

I find it difficult to obtain book muslin handkerchiefs of the finer quality, free from the objection which increasingly prevails among philanthropists.

Allow me to suggest to those who may be able to act on the suggestion, that a very desirable article made of flax and hemp, and called Kenting or Lawn, was formerly imported from England. My remaining handkerchiefs of this material are valued and thought worthy of more careful mending, than would be afforded to the usual fabrics.

If the manufacture is discontinued, could it not be advantageously resumed?

ASSOCIATED ACTION.

ADDRESS OF THE COMMITTEE OF THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY TO THE FRIENDS OF THE ANTI-SLAVERY CAUSE ON THE DISUSE OF SLAVE-LABOUR PRODUCE.

The system of slavery, whether viewed in its origin, its incidents, or its results, is now generally admitted to be not only an enormous crime against man, but an act of daring impiety against God; and, therefore, every legitimate means should be used to secure its universal abolition.

The slavery of modern times, we speak of that which exists among professedly Christian and civilized nations, had its origin in the slave-trade, and is, in one form or other, fed and sustained by it at the present hour. The Spanish Colonies and Brazil derive their supplies of new slaves direct from the Coast of Africa, whilst the southern sections of the United States depend for their's, in a considerable degree, on the slave-rearing States, where the victims of oppression are as regularly bred for sale as cattle are for the markets. In the one case, we have the foreign African slave-trade, with all the horrors of the capture and the middle passage; in the other, the internal or domestic slave-trade, with all its loath-some and atrocious incidents; and in both, an epitome of all the crimes that can darken or debase the character of man.

It is a melancholy and standing fact, that, with very few exceptions, all the slaves, upwards of seven millions in number, now held in bondage in the New World, are either the immediate victims, or the descendants of former victims of the slave-trade. They are the sad remnant of that mighty host which have been stolen from Africa, and doomed by the wickedness of their fellow-men, to hopeless captivity, unrequited toil, and premature death.

It is unnecessary that we should dwell on the essential unrighteousness and hateful cruelty of slavery; or depict its fearful results either on the slave or his oppressor: it is sufficient to say, that it is full of "deadly evil to both." It is, therefore, against slavery, rather than the slave-trade, which has now become its adjunct, that our most strenuous efforts should be directed, for so long as slavery exists, there is no reasonable prospect of the annihilation of the slave-trade, and of extinguishing the sale and barter of human beings.

While slavery existed in the British Colonies, or the territorial dependencies of the empire, we had the power of overcoming it through the constituted authorities of the realm. Our efforts to enlighten the public mind, and to move the legislature, were, under the divine blessing, crowned with success, and that dreadful evil has disappeared. But we could not use the same means with the foreign states, and were limited to moral suasion, the adoption of fiscal regulations in favour of free labour, and the disuse of slave-produce. It has pleased the Imperial Legislature to enact laws which admit the free importation of slave-grown produce into the British market for home consumption, and very shortly the duties will be equalized, so that the last restriction upon it will cease to exist, and the produce of piracy, rapine, and murder will be elevated to the same dignity with that of free labour, honestly obtained and fairly remunerated. We deeply regret this; but we fear that Government will not retrace its steps; there remains, therefore, only two modes of action left, that of moral suasion, and the disuse of slave-produce.

It is extremely satisfactory to know, that the means to which the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society have resorted to promote the abolition of slavery by foreign states, have been followed by a large measure of success. Already Sweden and Denmark have decided the question of freedom, and the slaves in their colonies are now in course of being emancipated. France is prepared, we trust, shortly to follow the example, and Holland cannot hesitate much longer to give liberty to her slaves. Nor is this all: Tunis has listened to the voice of humanity and justice, and her noble prince has destroyed the last vestiges of slavery and the slave-trade, throughout her coast. Turkey has abolished her slave-markets. Rajpootana has terminated her slave system, and Lahore has declared her bondmen shall be free. To this we may add, that many noble minds and generous hearts in Spain, Portugal, Brazil, and the Spanish Colonies, sympathise with us in our struggles for the freedom of the whole human race. We shall, therefore, persevere in the use of those moral and pacific means which have hitherto been so remarkably blessed. One means, however, has been, we fear, much overlooked. We allude to the disuse of slave-labour produce; a weapon which all, more or less, can use with great effect. To this we invite serious attention.

The rule of the Society, adopted in 1839, is "to recommend the use of free-grown produce, as far as practicable, in preference to slave-grown." The qualification, "as far as practicable," is added, because of the necessity of the case, for it is, perhaps, impossible, under existing circumstances, wholly to avoid all contact with the produce of slave-labour; yet we hold it to be a duty wherever there is liberty of choice, or a substitute for slave-produce can be found, to avoid it; and we earnestly recommend this view of the subject, and a corresponding practice, to the immediate and serious consideration, and adoption of every friend of humanity throughout the country.

If the demand for slaves is now the sole cause of the slave-trade and its accumulated crimes, the demand for slave-produce is the prolific source, the main prop and stay of slavery, with all its terrible and revolting circumstances and awful responsibilities. It requires no powers of reasoning to demonstrate that if this demand were to cease; if the righteous indignation felt against slavery led to the general disuse of its produce; and if compassion for the slave produce its legitimate fruit in a resolute determination thus practically to discountenance the sin we profess to condemn and execrate, it would soon be abandoned. It is the market for slave produce which gives energy and extension to the system of slavery. Unhappily, in our own country, that demand has greatly increased, since the last alteration in the sugar duties, and the result has been, that a vast stimulus has been given to the slave-trade; that slave property has greatly augmented in value; and that the progress of emancipation has been greatly impeded thereby. Such being the fact, the question is simple and the answer obvious, with regard to our duty—we must abstain from the use of slave-produce.

It may be said that isolated efforts of the kind recommended can do little towards the removal of the giant evil of slavery. We admit it, but the question of individual duty remains the same. Every one who uses slave-grown produce when it is in his power either to do without it or choose that which is free, does in reality sustain the system of slavery; whereas, on the other hand, every one who abstains from it not only bears his protest against the iniquity of enslaving man, but attacks it in its most vulnerable point.

But however weak the effort may be in the first instance, yet, if it be based on a right principle, others will engage in it; the units will become hundreds, and the hundreds thousands, and their abstinence will not fail to make a decided impression on the market for slave-produce. If the abolitionists of this country—and who is not an abolitionist?—would ally themselves to this branch of anti-slavery effort, the consequences would be not less surprising than beneficial, for we may be assured that no slave-holder would add to his stock of slaves under a decaying demand for his productions. Hence, among the first consequences of abstinence from their use would be, that a smaller number of ships would be freighted for the slave-trade—fewer wars would be waged in Africa to obtain slaves—and a less number of victims would be destroyed, and, as the public conscience became awakened, the demand would gradually decrease, until slavery would become unprofitable—a burden and a yoke too heavy to be borne.

To those who sincerely desire to act in conformity with the rule of this Society, there can be no difficulty in their doing so. A large proportion of the sugars, coffees, rice, cocoa, and other tropical productions, brought to the British market, is the result of free-labour. To distinguish them from the produce of the Spanish colonies, Brazil, and the United States, is not difficult. Any respectable tradesman would be able to supply the above-mentioned articles, without being tempted to deceive. In the article of cotton goods, the case is somewhat different, though it is hoped that the exertions which are now being made will issue in an abundant supply of the raw material, free from the taint of slavery, so that the choice in this respect will be as easy as it now is in reference to sugar, coffee, and rice. But were the difficulties of obtaining free-labour goods greater than they really are, the idea that by the non-use of those of an opposite character, you were sub-serving the great interests of humanity, would more than compensate for any amount of self-denial which the sacrifice might involve.

"Be not ye partakers of other men's sin," is an injunction of the Sacred Scriptures, which we think peculiarly appropriate to the subject we have ventured to submit to your consideration. The slaveholder first robs his fellow-man of his liberty, and then plunders him of the reward of his toil. That is his sin; but do we not participate in it when we purchase of him the fruits of that toil? We think that every rightly constituted mind must answer, yes! An eminent American writer, the late Dr. Channing, speaking of the Cuban slave-trade and slavery observes, "We do much to sustain this system of horror and blood. The Cuban slave trade is carried on in vessels built especially for this use in American ports. These vessels often sail under the American flag, and are aided by American merchantmen, and, as is feared, by American capital. And this is not all; the sugar, in producing which so many of our fellow-creatures perish miserably, is shipped in great quantities to this country. We are the consumers who stimulate by our demands this infernal cruelty. And, knowing this, shall we become accessories to the murder of our brethren, by continuing to use the fruit of the hard-earned toil which destroys them? The sugar of Cuba comes to us drenched with human blood. So we ought to see it, and turn from it with loathing. The guilt which produces it ought to be put down by the spontaneous, instinctive horror of the civilized world."

These remarks are as applicable to Great Britain, as to the United States. Let us turn from slave produce "with loathing," and the millions who now suffer as slaves will bless us.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, TWELFTH MONTH, 1847.

THE SLAVE PRODUCE QUESTION.—In our last number were presented to our readers some suggestions on this subject, by the respected author of "Christian Non-Resistance," followed by our remarks upon them. We are since indebted to our friend Ballou, for a copy of the Practical Christian, containing his farther observations on that question, induced by a second letter to him from his Philadelphia correspondent. The state of our friend's mind does not appear to us now, to be one of inquiry, so much as we before supposed it. We still believe he has been led into the collection of materials on which he could well base an unanswerable argument against the use of the products of the slave's unjustly exacted toil, and which, we trust, will be yet required at his hands, by fidelity to the pure principles of Christian ethics, of which, in their application to the duty of Non-Resistance, he has been the luminous expositor. The sentiment that "the Christian Non-Resistant, cannot consistently do any act, either in person or by proxy; nor abet or encourage any act in others; nor demand, petition for, request, advise or approve the doing of any act—which would inflict, thereon to inflict, or necessarily cause to be inflicted any absolute personal injury," cannot long co-exist with the sentiment that all these forms of action, which are substantially comprised in the single act which gives support to the slave system—that of demanding its products—may be consistently exerted by the anti-slavery Christian in thus causing to be inevitably inflicted the greatest possible amount of absolute personal injury of which we can readily have any conception. One of these sentiments must yield eventual obedience to the other. Relying on the truthfulness of this view, and not desiring to withhold from our readers a single objection to the doctrine which denies to the Christian the use of the products of any act of violence, we proceed to give in their full extent the observations referred to, with such annotations of our own as the occasion may require and our space permit.

"SLAVE-LABOUR PRODUCE."

"Editor's reply to Chas. Cadwallader.

"Respected Friend: Your last was welcome to our columns. We desire to understand this subject thoroughly,—to know what can be said against the use of slave produce, and to present fairly the arguments of the other side. The point to be established on your side is, that the use of articles produced by slave labour is per se a violation of moral principle—a sin against God and humanity, as truly as slaveholding itself. If this can be demonstrated, we shall yield at once, and will abstain from the use of such produce thenceforth and forever. (1) We are, however, somewhat surprised to see that you shrink from this high moral ground, and rest your case partly on the basis of expediency. You say, "If we were so situated that those productions were absolutely necessary to support animal life and comfort, I am not prepared to deny the lawfulness of the act." Would you say this of slaveholding, or slave-trading, or man-stealing? Would you admit the bare possibility that such sins ever could be absolutely necessary to support "animal life and comfort"? Or if thus necessary, that a man would not be bound in duty to suffer the destitution of such "comfort," and even the loss of "animal life" itself, rather than commit either of these sins? This is the only impregnable moral position for you to take. Any thing short of this would be a ground of mere carnal expedi-

ency, on which the saving of "animal life and comfort" would justify the most monstrous wrongs. It is true, you admit that, in this matter of using slave produce, there is no such necessity. But of this you will have to leave every man to judge for himself; the result of which will be, that thousands may in their own honest judgment make use of these products. To them they will be absolutely necessary to support "animal life and comfort"—or, if not bare animal life, at least "comfort." (2) Again you say—renounce the use of slave produce "and the system must be abandoned, for the simple reason that the foundation, and the only one upon which the system of slavery is or can be built, has been removed?" i. e. the pecuniary profits of it. Is it true that pecuniary gain is the only foundation of slaveholding? Then slavery can never be peaceably abolished but by your method. Nor by that method until it shall have been almost universally adopted. For a few to adopt it, without a prospect that the multitude will concur in their measure, amounts to little or nothing. But if the thing could be rendered universal, or nearly so, the slaveholders would undoubtedly be necessitated to abandon their system. (3)

"To make the case plain, let it be supposed that our friend Cadwallader is constituted the sole representative of the non-slaveholding world, with full power to purchase or refuse the entire mass of slave produce; i. e. with full power to sustain slavery by taking its productions, or annihilate it by refusing them. The slaveholders appear before him and offer their goods for sale. He is now lord of the market. They must sell to him, or not sell at all. He says to them, "I cannot purchase your goods, for that would be to partake in your sin of slaveholding, and to sustain by pecuniary encouragement the system of slavery. To disfellowship and rebuke your slaveholding—to abstain conscientiously from all religious, political and intermarriage communion with you—to exert my utmost moral influence upon you in every other respect, will never induce you to renounce your darling iniquity. So long as you can acquire and subsist on its pecuniary profits, you will adhere to it. The only foundation on which it rests is pecuniary gain. I shall therefore take it away at once and forever. You shall never sell or exchange one cent's worth of your slave produce again till you have emancipated all your slaves. Abandon slavery, or sink to poverty and starvation!" (4)

"Is this your ground, my respected friend? Have you no expectation that slavery will be abandoned till the slaveholders are reduced to this alternative? Is this moral suasion consistently carried out? Is this an exemplification of the Christian law and spirit? Did Christ work by such motives, and make such appeals? Are such motives adapted to the moral nature of man? Is this a truly divine method of putting away the sins of the world? May we rightfully reduce all wicked men to such a necessity? If we could, no doubt they would surrender promptly. (5)

"But we must be permitted to entertain some doubts as to the divine origin of such expedients; especially with the fact in view, that bad as well as good men can resort to them with equal success. We must be permitted to demand better evidence than has yet come under our consideration, before we can feel morally obliged to abstain from slave produce on the ground of necessitating the abolition of slavery by withholding its pecuniary profits. We are by no means convinced that pecuniary gain is the "only" foundation on which "slavery is or can be built." We believe that some hold slaves from this motive, others from pride and lust of dominion over man, others for the sake of political power, others from love of personal ease and exemption from what are deemed vulgar labours, others for household and domestic convenience, others for the gratification of the lust of sexual licentiousness, and yet others from mere conformity to custom, fashion and respectability. These several classes of slaveholders cling with tenacity to the system, and are not to be weaned from it by any pecuniary privation likely to be enforced on them by abstinence from the use of slave productions. If such abstinence be really a duty, it must be so purely on moral grounds; not as an expedient for compelling the slaveholders into emancipation, but as a conscientious expression of utter abhorrence and disfellowship. Now we admit that this is an imperative duty, if the use of slave productions is per se sinful, as truly as slaveholding. Therefore let this be demonstrated. If it cannot be, then abstinence from the produce of slave labour involves only an inferior question of expediency. It is not enough to show that the purchase of an article, in itself useful and allowable, puts money in the pockets of the slaveholders. Buying an article proper for human use and paying a man the fair market value of it is not necessarily aiding and abetting him in any thing sinful. To do this with an intention to aid him in committing such deeds, or in a manner to signify indifference to his iniquitous conduct, would be aiding and abetting him therein. But if the article bought and paid for be one which it is right for him to sell, and right for me to buy—which I buy without intending to aid him in any thing sinful, and without his understanding that I either approve, or am indifferent to his wickedness, the mere fact that I increase his pecuniary gain is not aiding, abetting, or approving him in any thing sinful, within the proper meaning of those terms. "But does he not draw pecuniary means from you?" Yes. "If he could not acquire those means, could he command the facilities for committing his evil deeds?" Perhaps not. Neither could he, if God should withhold from him the bread of life, or the requisite physical strength. Yet God gives him these and numberless other blessings. Is it any worse for man to buy and pay him for a good thing, than it is for God to give him that without which he could not hold a slave, or inflict a single wrong? But God does not aid, abet or approve him in any thing sinful. He gives him life, and breath and all things, knowing that he will pervert them to most unholy purposes. Does this render God a partaker of his sins? No; unless He bestows these gifts with the intention to aid and abet him, or as a mark of his approval, or without reproving him for his sin; neither of which He has ever done. Nor may man do it, whether he pay for value received, or bestow a gift. (6)

"But it will be said—the slaveholder has no right to sell the productions of his slaves, and therefore we have no more right to buy them than we have to buy the slaves themselves." Let us see. Here is a slaveholder who has a hoghead of sugar, a bale of cotton, and a quantity of rice. These articles have been produced by the aid of slave labor, under his general direction. His slaves are stolen property—entirely so. He had no right to buy them, he has no right to sell them, he has no right to hold them in bondage; nor has any man a right to buy them of him. But is this just as true of the sugar, the cotton and the rice, which he has forced them to assist in producing? Not just as true. Why? Because these articles are partly the gift of God to him and the slaves in common, and partly his own production, in so far as he has done any thing necessary to their production by actual labor, or general care and responsibility. His proper portion of them, as God's gift, together with the portion to which he is justly entitled as a joint producer and care-taker of them, entitle him to be considered a joint-proprietor of them, with at least a joint right to sell them. It is granted that he has only this joint-right of proprietorship and sale. The rest is usurpation and oppression. Is not this true in a degree of nearly all the articles sold and bought throughout the civilized world? Is it not true of money itself? And may we never consume goods, or use money acquired by usurpation and oppression? And if the usurper and oppressor acquires gain by selling to us that to which he has justly only a partial right, are we who purchase of him his abettors and approvers? I grant we are, if we do not bear an out-spoken, consistent, and unequivocal testimony against his usurpation and oppression. But are we if we do bear such a testimony? Stolen property we may not buy at all. But may we not buy property partly accumulated by means of stolen property—when it is impossible in the nature of things to do justice to the oppressed by paying them their just portion of the purchase-money—and when the only thing we can do for them is to proclaim their wrongs, and endeavor to place them in a condition to enjoy their rights? When Jesus proposed to take refreshments at the table of Zaccheus, where he must eat of a bounty partly extorted by injustice from others, did he aid, abet and approve such injustice. No; for he went thither as the reprover of all such sins. A conclusive proof of this is found in the fact that Zaccheus resolved to restore four-fold to any one he might have wronged—and then to give the half of his goods to the poor. Does a faithful abolitionist aid, abet and approve slaveholding when he wears a cotton shirt, writes on a sheet of cotton paper, or trades at all in articles of slave produce? Or can no one be a faithful abolitionist who uses slave productions? Our worthy friend would seem to imply that for a man to wash his hands entirely of all religious, political, matrimonial and social fellowship with slaveholders amounts to nothing, if he is a consumer of slave produce. This may be true, if it be true, as he affirms, that pecuniary profit is the only foundation on which the system of slavery rests. But we have expressed our dissent from his conclusion; believing that there are thousands of slave-owners who know that they are pecuniarily the poorer for holding them—yet will not relinquish their grasp on them for any pecuniary consideration. But if the whole non-slaveholding world considered it entirely sinful and abhorrent to unite with slaveholders in the church, in the state, in matrimony, and in select society, nintenths of the latter would speedily abandon slavery, and the other tenth would have no means of preventing the property from taking a speedy leave of their premises. But now slaveholding is treated as innocent, allowable, and even commendable. Slaveholders are great men in the church, great men in the state, great men in matrimonial connections, and great men in select society. Those who consider them otherwise are so few and far between, that they are deemed fanatics, knaves or fools, worthy of a hempen cord, or a coat of tar and feathers—especially if caught where slaveholders prevail. (7)

"You introduce as analogous the Temperance cause, and ask how we should regard a man who denounced the distiller as extremely guilty, while at the same time he freely drank his liquors. We should certainly consider him very inconsistent, and unequivocally an anti-temperance man. Why then do we not consider every professed abolitionist, who consumes slave produce, equally inconsistent, and unequivocally pro-slavery? Because the two cases are not parallel. The distiller converts wholesome food into slow poison. It is a sin to drink that poison, and therefore it is a sin to manufacture it to drink. It is not a sin to manufacture or use it for certain other and useful purpose. Now the man who denounces the distiller for turning wholesome food into a slow poison, to be used as such, yet drinks the poison and encourages others to do so, stands clearly self-condemned. But the slaveholder uses his slaves wrongfully to produce cotton, rice, sugar and flour, which are good things. It is no sin per se to produce or to use these good things—though it is a horrible wrong for the slaveholder to force his fellow creatures to assist in producing them against their will, and without just compensation for their services. The end is good, but the means bad. The abolitionist, who honestly denounces the wrong means used by the slaveholder, may consume the good things produced, provided only that he come into possession of them without abating his testimony against the slaveholder's sin. But the man who drinks rum commits the sin per se, to which the distiller is accessory before the fact. The abolitionist consumes good things, proper in themselves to be used, though in part wrongfully produced. It is per se right to consume such things, and can only be wrong to consume them without a faithful testimony against the wicked means in part used by the slaveholder for their production. But as the true abolitionist bears this living and faithful testimony, he consumes them innocently. The mere fact that he has paid the slaveholder the market value of them, that he has exchanged good things with him for good things, does not implicate him in the slaveholder's guilt. So the two cases are not at all parallel. (8)

"You think, respected friend, that we 'struck the nail on the head' in putting the case of the horse-thief, who systematically pursues his wickedness, and by means of his stolen horses raises produce for public consumption. To buy or consume grain produced by a man, known to thrive by such crimes, you consider giving a moral sanction to his wickedness. So it would be, if done without a distinct, unequivocal, uncompromising disfellowship and testimony against his crimes. But suppose a man lived in a country in which horse-stealing was generally held to be innocent and allowable; in which horse-thieves were numerous and respectable; where they had exclusive privileges under the national constitution; where they held the highest offices in the government, legislative, judicial and executive; where they took eminent rank in the church, so much so as to be Doctors of Divinity, prelates, &c.; where they commonly married into the first families of the land; where they occupied the high places of literature; and were counted in the most honorable select societies of every description; and where it was a mortal offence to denounce and disfellowship them. Suppose all this, and suppose a scattered and despised handful of anti-horse-thieves in that country should raise the question among themselves whether this popular system of horse-theft was not founded wholly on love of money, and whether a refusal to consume their marketable produce was not the most efficient method of abolishing their nefarious system? Now in such a country, under such circumstances, would it be a moral sanction of horse-stealing for anti-horse-thieves, who jeopardized their reputation, their personal quietude in society, and some of them their very lives, by exposing, denouncing and testifying against the horse-thieves, who would neither buy the stolen horses, nor help catch them when they ran away, nor assist in breaking them down when they became unmanageable, nor take office with the thieves, nor vote for them to hold office, nor swear to support their pro-horse-stealing constitution, nor acknowledge the thieves to be Christians, nor intermarry with them, nor sit in select societies with them nor even buy their corn and potatoes, flax and hemp, without reproving them for their wrongs—would it then be a moral sanction of their systematic horse-theft, for such persons, under such circumstances, to consume food and clothing produced by the said horse-thieves? If so, much more is it a moral sanction of slaveholding for the people of Hopedale Community to consume the produce of slave labor. Otherwise, we may not be guilty in this matter. (9)

"Now, friend Cadwallader, we have given the views hitherto entertained by us on the subject. We do not threaten to adhere to them against better views on the other side. On the contrary, we desire to be enlightened—to go for truth and righteousness, however different from our old opinions and practices. But we do not want to be converted without clear and substantial reasons—such as we may confidently render to others. We do not want to adopt new conclusions involving important practical duties, without thoroughly understanding their principles, grounds and reasons. We want to know whether pure moral principle—a principle of universal application—lies at the foundation of your doctrine on this subject; or whether, after all, expediency is its real basis. We do not doubt the perfect sincerity and conscientiousness of our Free Produce friends; but we would be sure that their consciences are as rational as they are scrupulous on this point. If so, we desire to be numbered with them. We have seen people so extremely rational, that they had scarcely any room left for conscience; also people whose consciences were so acute, tender and scrupulous, that reason was crowded aside as an impertinent meddler with sacred things: We want to see whole men—humane, religious, moral and rational, in all things. In such there will be self-consistency and harmony. Be not discouraged by what may seem our dulness of apprehension, or our stubbornness of opposition to what you deem right; but present the merits of your cause again in all their force, ever confident that Truth is great and must finally prevail." (10)

REMARKS.

(1.) We hold our brother to the terms of his agreement, to renounce the use of slave produce now and forever, in virtue of the negative duties of doing nothing which would be an incentive to another's performing an evil act; of using nothing feloniously obtained; and of doing, through another, nothing which he would be morally inhibited from doing himself. It is a sin per se, against God and Humanity, to hold out an inducement to another to commit a wicked action—"Woe unto him that giveth his neighbour drink, that putteth thy bottle to him, and maketh him drunken also." No bottle is more intoxicating to the sinner than that which gives him the motive for sinning: none more potent to the slaveholder than a demand for his unjustly extorted goods. It is a sin per se, to use, knowingly, goods procured by felonious means. This sin the slaveholder commits when he appropriates to his use the products of the slave's toil. It is a sin in itself, though one of the series of wrongs, each of which is a sin, which the slaveholder commits from the first stealing of the man down to this, its fruition. This sin is then common to all conscious users of the products of the slave's labour. It is a sin per se, against God and Humanity, to use another as the instrument of obtaining that which we are aware we could not by the same means innocently obtain ourselves. We commit this sin when we make the slaveholder our agent for robbing the slave of his rightful ownership in the products of his toil, by buying those products, as fast as we have occasion for such goods, just as much as we make the horse thief our agent when we buy his stolen horses, as fast as we have occasion for horses; or the general robber our agent when we buy his purloined goods. In this aspect the sin of using the products of slavery is not merely, "a sin as truly as is slaveholding itself," but it is, also, the very sin of slaveholding.

(2.) The exception suggested by our friend Cadwallader, to the general law of morality touching the use of goods feloniously obtained, is not stated with the precision we should have desired, or which he probably intended. The exception should have been limited to the use of goods essential, under circumstances surrounding the user and not at his control, to the preservation of human life. It may be represented by the case of a person cast upon an island occupied by freebooters, in which all the food and clothing obtainable are the products of robbery. Two questions now present themselves. First, Is he guilty of the crime of participancy in the wrong by which these goods are obtained, in using them, so long as he cannot escape from his present thralldom? Second, Is he guiltless, when having the power to escape, he does not choose to embrace it, but continues in that use? Whether the answer to the first be negative or affirmative, and based or not on "a ground of mere carnal expediency," there can be but one answer to the second, and that resting on the basis of unmixed, imperishable truth. We pass over wholly the remarks of our friend Balfou, on what we consider a misapprehension of the views of his correspondent, though possibly justified by their literal expression. Mere animal comfort is certainly no reason for doing wrong, and no argument for not doing right.*

(3.) That the system of slavery must be aban-

* For speculations on a correlative question, whether a man in extreme want of food or clothing may resort to the unlawful taking of things necessary to the support of nature, without crime, we refer to the great law writers, Grotius and Puffendorf, who took the affirmative; maintaining that in such case the community of goods, by a kind of tacit concession of society, was revived, and to Blackstone, who considered the excuse a dubious one as "men's properties would be under a strange insecurity, if liable to be invaded according to the wants of others," the latter being the judges. We are not to infer from their discussion of this subject, that these eminent civilians considered the moral obligation of honesty to rest upon mere expediency.

doned if the use of its products is renounced, is one of the simplest of truisms. Its existence is clearly dependant on the advantages derived or supposed to be derived by the slaveholder, from the application of the labour of his slaves to the production of articles, chiefly agricultural, intended for a market. This fact is so universally accepted as to throw on the party denying it, the burden of proving the negative. What other motive than is presented in this fact, can be offered sufficient to account for the holding in slavery in this western hemisphere of seven millions of men, women and children, visibly occupied in the culture of the earth, in acts auxiliary to it, or in preparation for such culture? What other motive but one of returning gain could sustain the vast expenditure of the system? What other motive can account for the importation of 300,000 slaves into the Island of Cuba, between the years 1821 and 1840, and of an annual importation of 100,000 to 130,000, into the ports of Brazil antecedent to 1841? What other motive can account for the great increase in the illicit African slave-trade, since the repeal of the British discriminating duties on slave grown sugars? What other motive will explain the great preponderancy of males in such importations? What other motive would issue in a result exhibiting such a vast yearly mortality as the annals of slavery present? "Is it true," says our friend, "that pecuniary gain is the only foundation of slaveholding? then slavery can never be peaceably abolished but by your method." We think the affirmative of the question clear, and the inference following it a reasonable one. Why may we not then adopt the method, and that instantly, in reference to the measure of slavery with which we are connected, or which we can overcome and are therefore accountable for? Will we achieve nothing unless we liberate all the slaves? Is it nothing to release from slavery a single individual now suffering under its galling yoke and torturing lash, to supply the wants of some six or eight professing abolitionists? Is it nothing to give to one free labourer the impulse to supply the future wants of these? Would it be nothing for the 200,000 professing abolitionists, to verify their pretensions to the name, and exhibit their principles in the light of their practice to the world, by ransoming unnecessary the servitude of some 20 or 30,000 slaves, who now toil for them, and bringing into counter-action the labours of a similar number of freemen? Away then with the idea that we must wait till the millions flow into the one instantaneous, overwhelming, astounding effort. The 200,000 would draw the millions after them by a new attraction, not now felt—the attraction of Consistency! Even the units have no excuse for not coming to the work—

What if the little rain should say,
"So small a drop as I,
Can ne'er refresh those thirsty fields;
I'll tarry in the sky!"

What if a shining beam of noon
Should in its fountain stay,
Because its feeble light alone
Cannot create a day!

Doth not each rain drop help to form,
The cool refreshing shower?
And every ray of light to warm
And beautify the flower?

(4.) It is a fair suggestion to suppose that there is but one consumer of slave produce in the world, and thence to deduce what is moral duty as to purchasing or refusing to purchase these products. In the first place then, he is not bound to buy, even if the products were unexceptionable. If he buys them, such as they are, he brings upon himself the guilt of sustaining the whole system, to the perpetuation of which such buying is necessary. He says then, "I don't buy. I can morally have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness;" and instantly the shackles of the slave fall! Is this non-action force? Is it any more force than that we exert when we tell the pirate we won't buy his blood stained goods? If it be force, how do we characterize that influence which he would have exerted against the oppressed and in favour of the oppressor, had he committed the positive act of buying these products? The act which refuses to buy these goods, is, indeed, an act which goes directly to the point. It disfellowships the offenders in the very offence of robbing the slave, not in matters extraneous to it, which may be good also. It says, with no circumlocution, to the offender, "Abandon slavery?" but it does not add, "or sink to poverty and starvation." It is compatible with wishing him all enjoyments which are derivable from a life of righteousness. More we would not rightfully desire for ourselves or him. What does the similar act say, which refuses to buy of the pirate the fruits of his piracy? Abandon your evil life, and bring us goods which an honest man can purchase!

(5.) We have often put to the users of the productions of slavery the question,—If you were the only users of these productions would you not feel extremely guilty in continuing a system of such stupendous iniquity, by giving it your custom? And we have uniformly received an emphatic affirmative for our answer. We have then said—if your guilt would be thus great, limited to a few, would it be diminished by an addition to your numbers? Is there a pro rata distribution of crime, until by repeated division it ceases to have a palpable existence? and we have received various answers. The suggestion now comes to us for the first time, that there would be guilt, not in upholding the system, but in withdrawing support from it. We have not so read the precepts of Christ; or construed the prayer he has left us, "Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil," as authorizing us to tempt others to evil doing, and to join them in its perpetration.

(6.) We can see no reason for considering the simple duty of ceasing to do evil as an expedient, or for doubting the fact that bad as well as good men may successfully practice it. The probability of their doing so is another question. All the coercion, separate from the encouragement of free labour, which we claim to exert upon slavery by abstinence, is the negative one which the carrying out of this duty will impose upon the system. It is no more coercion in principle, than is the withdrawing ourselves from religious fellowship with the slaveholder. All the suggested motives for slavery, other than the pecuniary advantages accruing to the slaveholder from the labour of his slaves, are but out-shoots from this, its great root, which they may nourish but cannot sustain. Even its horrible concubinage is made contributory to it. For a further exemplification of these views, we refer to articles in our first volume, entitled "Slavery abolished by abstinence from its products," "British Abstinence," "The existence of Slavery dependant on a commerce in its productions," to articles in this number, and to both volumes generally. We claim abstinence as a duty independent of the results which we see will follow it, just as we claim honesty to be a duty, independent of the proof that it is the best policy. We have proved the duty by demonstrating that its opposite is per se sinful, and have before shewn that buying an article in itself useful, but procured by immoral means, and known to us to be so procured, is an immoral buying, irrespective of a guilty intention. It is no offence to put money into the pocket of the slaveholder, or to shower down upon him acts of beneficence, but we may not fellowship him in his act of injustice, which we do when we buy his products. The argument that God gives the slaveholder facilities by which he holds the slave, as much justifies the slaveholding, as it does the slave-produce using. "God does not aid man in any thing sinful," and therefore when "he gives him life, and breath, and all things," he does it in view of his applying them to holy purposes. He has additionally given him moral laws, which are intended to restrain him from any perversion of his bounties. Those laws deny him the right of being in any way accessory to sin.

(7.) That the slaveholder has any right to sell the products of the slave's toils, on the plea of a joint ownership, is scarcely debateable. It is wholly an assumption to consider the gift of God in these products, as being in any respect to the non-labouring, wrong-doing and usurping party. By the natural law, the products of labour belong to him in the sweat of whose face they are produced; and the slave is no party to the social law; but surrendering this point, and allowing additionally all the claims to remuneration for supervisory care which may be asserted for the slaveholder, what right does joint-ownership, and especially a compulsory joint-ownership, give to the slaveholder to sell the slave's part? If we throw a bushel of corn into another man's heap, does it give us the right to sell the whole without his consent? If we so sell it, do we not perpetrate as clear a theft upon the owner, as if we had seized the pile without that addition? The obvious deductions we need not apply. Parallel wrongs, if they exist elsewhere, are no justification of this great wrong to the slave; and parallel practices, if they exist elsewhere, are no justification of our participancy in the support of this system of fraud and violence. We have before shown that to use the products of this system is to support it by the most efficient means in our power. Whatever permits this use is not an outright, consistent, unequivocal testimony against this heinous usurpation and oppression. No proclamation of the wrongs of the slave, no other endeavour to place him in a condition to enjoy his rights, will be an equitable satisfaction for the counter-influence we exert to his injury when we use the products of his coercion. The remaining portions of the paragraph under review, with one exception, have been either met by what we have already said, or relate to means of abolishing slavery which we do not oppose. The table of Zacchæus, at which our Lord sat, is represented to have been spread with refreshments, "partly extorted by injustice." We take exception to this statement, and aver our belief that if the tables of abolitionists were as conscientiously spread, none of the products of violence and wrong now there, to the great prejudice of the cause they advocate, would be found upon them.

8.) To render the valuable lesson of consistency, read to us in the progress of the temperance enterprise, availing in the anti-slavery cause, it is not necessary that both reforms should be alike in all particulars. To have attempted the abolition of the distilleries by expostulation with the proprietors on the evils of distillation, without an attempt also to reduce the consumption of the distilled products which gives the motive for the existence of the distilleries, is a folly which the wise temperance builders avoided, but which we commit, in seeking the abolition of slavery by expostulation with the slaveholders, whilst we pay no attention to a reduction of the consumption of the products of slavery, which gives the motive for its existence. There is even an analogy in apparently opposite circumstances. The produce of distillation is physically deleterious to the user, not to the producer: of slavery to the producer, and not to the user. There exists between these usings, the distinction of suicide and murder, but they are both homicide. The one heaps self-invited misery on the sufferer; the other inflicts it on unconscious, guiltless victims. What is duty in the first case, becomes, then, yet higher duty in the second. This higher duty is expressed in the following apostolic declaration—"Wherefore if men make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest it make my brother to offend." While, then, the direct effect of the using of slave productions is to occasion slavery, there can be no adequate protest, no living and faithful testimony which will make innocent their consumption. The mere fact that the user pays the slaveholder for them the market value, or exchanges good things with him for good things, giving him additionally an abundance of salutary admonition touching the wicked means pursued in the production of the things he buys, will not save him from a just implication in the slaveholder's guilt.

(9.) The nail surely was struck on the head when the different phases under which the using of articles produced by the labour of stolen horses were brought into view. The user of those articles justified, in being so, the precedent sins of stealing the horses and using them, and invited a repetition of those offences. Who then can doubt his moral implication in the horse-thief's guilt, both retrospective and future. No testimony, however distinct, unequivocal and uncompromising, of distellowship with the horse-thief's crime, short of the penitential confession of his own, as a confederate, will avail to remove the stain of guilt written upon his conscience by being that user. Declarations of the guilt of him he patronizes in, and incites to its commission, but adds to his own. Like the bloodstain on Bluebeard's key, there it is, ineradicable by any human contrivance, and only brightened by the effort for its dislodgement. Get up a community chiefly consisting of horse-thieves, systematically engaged in the cultivation, by stolen horses, of corn, potatoes, flax and hemp; give them wealth, eminence, power—peculiar institutions, civil, political, religious,—limitless facilities for stealing horses—modes for their quick recovery when their rightful owners seek to rescue them, and all appliances proper to the conducting of their nefarious business; then place a sane and truly honest man in their midst, and ask him to accept their corn and potatoes, and flax and hemp, raised by the labour of their stolen horses, with the privilege of saving his conscience by all manner of protest which the subtlest casuistry could devise, and he would find in all this array of power, and pomp, and circumstance, but added inducements to spurn from him the proffered guilty boon. Now we can readily perceive that in this community there may be some persons not themselves stealers of horses, nor working with stolen horses, who shall become convinced that such stealing and using is a sin of a heinous character, and shall set about to organize an anti-horse-thief society, and shall jeopardize their reputation, personal quietude, and even their lives, by exposing, denouncing, and testifying against the horse thieves, but still continuing, from some idea of convenience, though with facilities of their own not making it necessary, to buy and use the corn and other articles raised by the horse-thieves by means of their stolen horses. Being asked what is the moral position of these men, we must answer—it is one of hopeful progress, but they have not yet attained the stature of honest men: doubtless, when full grown, the system, now feeling their sturdy blows, will crumble beneath their gigantic power.

(10.) There is a point in this matter of the using of slave produce which our respected brother has not adverted to, and which we think it our place to call his attention to. It is the suffering of the slave, through the invasion of those rights to himself and to the products of his labour, which we have claimed for him. In this consideration we, however, present him not as a being having rights, but as one having feelings—A MAN AND BROTHER. Read, in this relation, the article "Duty of Abstinence," at page 2, in our first volume. We see him divested of life, limb, health, intellect, happiness, and all these offered up in bloody profusion at that altar of Mammon which the user of the products of the slave's labour builds up, and incessantly renovates, in the heart of the tyrant master; and we ask the user, if there is no chord of human sympathy in his inmost soul, no ray of inslaming light, telling him that this is wrong, and he wrong in his connection with it?

We are done. We have honestly given our views on this subject, and we leave them to operate on the reason and consciences of others. Our appeal is to all their means of intelligence. "Ever ready to give an answer to any man that asketh us, a reason of the hope that is in us"—and to hear him in reply—we yet confess, with our brother, that we do not want to adopt new conclusions but upon full convictions of their truth. Such new conclusions would be to us painfully to descend from our present exalted views of man's proper dignity, and to make us feel that he was, indeed, a being unintended for the practice of a high, virtuous consistency!

EFFECTS OF THE CONSUMPTION OF SLAVE-GROWN PRODUCTS IN GREAT BRITAIN ON SLAVERY AND THE SLAVE-TRADE IN CUBA AND BRAZIL.—"Every month brings fresh intelligence from the coast of Africa," says the London Anti-Slavery Reporter, 11th month 1st, "of the increased activity of the slave-trade. It is reported to be five times more active than last year, in consequence of the increased demand for the produce of Cuba and Brazil."

The squadrons of armed cruisers on the African coast have failed to put down the dreadful traffic; and it now appears that negotiations have been opened between the governments of France and England, with the view of modifying their late treaty for the suppression of the slave-trade. "The modification sought," says the Courier Français, "is the diminution of the number of vessels of the English and French squadrons whose crews are decimated by sickness, and, at the same time, the adoption of efficacious and direct measures against the Sovereigns of the Coast of Africa, who are known for openly carrying on the trade." We believe, with the Editor of the Reporter, that this mode of suppression, and all others of a like nature, will fail of their intended object; and that so long as slavery exists, there is no reasonable prospect of the annihilation of the slave-trade and of extinguishing the sale and barter of human beings.

A letter addressed to Lord John Russell, Prime Minister, appeared in the London "Times" of 10th month 27th, and will be found in our pages this month. What a dreadful picture does it present of the effects of purchasing and consuming the products of slavery! Well might Dr. Channing exclaim—"The sugar of Cuba comes to us drenched with human blood; so we ought to see it, and turn from it with loathing." Very pertinent, too, is the enquiry made by the writer of this letter in reference to the attempts to put down the African slave-trade by armed squadrons, while a supply of "cheap sugar" is procured through the labour of its victims:—"Will it not be too flagrant an absurdity to pretend to wrest the tool from the hand of the cultivator on whom you depend for your supplies, and who cannot raise them without it?"

ADDRESS OF THE LONDON ANTI-SLAVERY COMMITTEE ON THE DISEASE OF SLAVE PRODUCE.—When it was proposed in the British Parliament last year to reduce the duties on slave-grown sugar, and thus allow its introduction into Great Britain, a strong protest against the measure was presented, as our readers may recollect, to the Government by many friends of the slave. They believed the effect of the measure would be a greatly increased consumption of sugar, and that, consequently, the system of slavery would be strengthened and the slave-trade proportionally stimulated.

After the act for the reduction of the duties had been passed, we endeavoured to impress upon our English friends the truth, that the anticipated augmentation of the demand for slave-grown sugar would result simply from individual consumption of the article; and we urged the importance of refusing to receive into their houses what they had themselves declared could not be admitted into the kingdom without a violation of high moral considerations.

We have great pleasure in presenting to our readers the Address on the second page of our present number. It fully recognizes the duty of abolitionists to adopt this individual abstinence, and justly asserts that, if they would ally themselves to this branch of anti-slavery effort, the consequences would be not less surprising than beneficial.

If it be true, as the committee declares, and as abundant evidence proves, that the result of an increased demand for slave-produce has been "that a vast stimulus has been given to the slave-trade; that slave property has greatly augmented in value, and that the progress of emancipation has been greatly impeded thereby," we do not see how the conclusion can be avoided, that we must either abstain from the use and consumption of that produce, or acknowledge ourselves the direct supporters and abettors of slavery and the slave-trade. We entertain an encouraging hope that the efforts of the London Committee, with other contemplated measures, will effectually arouse the attention of the British public to the subject, and also stimulate the abolitionists of this country to pursue the same consistent course.

In connection with this address, the following extract, from the London correspondence of the National Era, is highly interesting:

"Your cotton growers had better open their eyes at once to the claims of freedom; and before it is too late, by an act of justice to the slave, enlist in their favour the feelings of the friends of Freedom in this country. There is now growing up here a deep conviction that we ought to get rid of slavery in America, by going for our cotton to India; and if there should be on the part of your planters a determination not to remove the fetters from the slave, the course that will be taken by our Abolitionists is decided. The matter is now assuming a shape which admits of no delay among your countrymen. On Friday last, the Times, in an elaborate argument, advocated the change of the market from the United States to the East Indies; and the Morning Chronicle does the same thing to-day. The latter journal says: 'The quality of India cotton, the needful cost of production, and the capabilities of several districts in the country, have been examined and tested, and they have been pronounced to offer satisfactory prospects, at meetings of the Manchester Commercial Association, by most competent judges. A demand now exists for a much larger quantity than has hitherto been imported, and attention is earnestly directed to the best means of procuring an increase of the supply, of the best quality. Large farms, under efficient management, are projected, and European agents are to be employed in purchasing directly from the cultivators, and affording to them advice and encouragement, as to the best mode of conveying the cotton to the port.'

"I think these facts will be found to place the question of slavery in your cotton districts in a light in which it has not hitherto appeared, and I indulge the hope that the result may be very beneficial to those who are now in bonds."

WESTERN FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION.—A letter from an esteemed friend and correspondent in Indiana, informs us that the First Anniversary of this Association, was held at West Elkton, Ohio, on the 5th and 6th of last month. It was not as large as it ought to have been, but was interesting and encouraging. Amongst the measures adopted to promote the cause, was the appointment of a committee of fourteen to collect loans, without interest, and donations, to aid in procuring free goods. This committee subsequently appointed Samuel Mitchell its travelling and collecting agent. A few hundred dollars have been subscribed, but a much larger amount is needed. Will not those see to it who desire to avoid the gain, not of oppression only, but of piracy, robbery and war. We hope the effort made by Levi Coffin, to increase the facilities for obtaining a supply in the western states of free cotton goods and free groceries, by opening a Store in Cincinnati exclusively of the productions of free labour, may be well sustained.

CHEERING INDICATIONS ABROAD.—We were glad to observe in the last number of the British Friend, the account of a meeting of the Committee and Friends of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, which was published in the London Friend, and also in our last paper. The Editors of the British Friend express the belief that the subject of disusing slave products is gaining increased attention in Great Britain. The London Friend, for 11th month, contains the excellent Address inserted in our ninth number, and also the following letter from one of its correspondents.

To the Editor of the London Friend.

"DEAR FRIEND.—I was much pleased with the prominence given in the last Nos. of the Friend, to the consideration of the use of slave labour, and with the interesting account of the meeting of Friends in London on the subject. From the time of reading in the late T. F. Buxton's work on the Slave Trade, the affecting statement which he considered himself fully borne out in making, as being considerably within the truth, that not less than 1000 of our fellow-creatures are daily sacrificed in the capture of slaves, their conveyance to the place of embarkation, and their passage across the Atlantic, independently of those consigned to the miseries of slavery, I have felt at times very painfully affected by the reflection, that in so far as I am making use of the produce of slave labour, I am contributing towards the continuance of this fearful waste of human life, and the cruelties and enormities connected with it, as well as the maintenance of the system by which the down-trodden slave is made the victim of tyranny and oppression.

"The more I consider this subject, the more I am convinced of the inconsistency of remonstrating against the slave trade and slavery, and at the same time continuing to purchase and use the products of slave labour. Doubtless there are many Friends who only require to have this subject plainly set before them, and the feeling of their individual responsibility brought into exercise, in order to relinquish the use of whatever thus contributes to the misery of so large a number of their fellow-creatures, although for a time it may involve a pecuniary sacrifice, and be attended with considerable inconvenience. It will be obvious that the more extensive the bearing of this testimony becomes, the easier will the way be made to act in accordance with a sense of duty; we have only to create a demand for free labour produce, and the supply will be provided; and although for a time we may have to sustain a pecuniary loss, this will be amply compensated by the reflection, that we are doing what lies in our power to hasten the time when the yoke of the slave shall be broken, and the oppressed shall be suffered to go free.

Thy friend sincerely,

THE WESTERN FRIEND.—We have received the first number of a periodical with this title, published by Pugh & Pettit, Cincinnati, Ohio, and, we presume, intended to be issued weekly, though it is not clearly stated. We were pleased to see in its columns, an account of a meeting held in London, at the close of the last Yearly Meeting, on the subject of abstinence from the productions of slavery. The simple truth, that a commercial connection with slavery involves us in its guilt, is, we trust, becoming more generally apparent; and a just appreciation of it must lead to the conviction that those who condemn slavery as sinful, and yet make no effort to withdraw from its connection, deny their profession and dishonour the Christian religion.

We hope the Editors of the Western Friend, will not shrink from a decided advocacy of the testimony which they have thus introduced to the notice of their readers, and that in the liberal patronage of Friends and others in the Western states, they will find that "honestly is the best policy."

MUNIFICENT GIFT OF GERRIT SMITH.—We had much desired to place upon the records of the Non-Slaverholder, etc. closing the present volume, an account of the grant of ONE HUNDRED AND TWENTY THOUSAND ACRES OF LAND made by Gerrit Smith of Peterboro, New York, in the autumn of 1846, to coloured citizens of that State, in portions of from 40 to 60 acres each, and of the efforts making by the grantees for fulfilling by their occupancy the beneficent intentions of their donor. We advert to the subject now, as showing that this act of extraordinary benevolence has not been to us an unheeded circumstance, though we have not sufficiently known the facts to warrant us in an attempt at their minute recital; and in the hope that some friend more cognizant of the particulars, will make this journal the vehicle of its communication.

ANTI-SLAVERY FAIRS.—Without passing a sentiment on the efficacy of these instrumentalities for promoting the cause of the slave, we believe that persons who feel at liberty to engage in them, and perceive the duty of abstinence from the use of the products of slavery, should sedulously guard against the introduction into them of any articles of that character, or if this be impossible from want of sympathy in their co-adjutors, that they be careful that all articles of slave and free production shall be distinctly marked. In this way an important public testimony will be borne to the obligations of that doctrine to which the South tamingly invites the attention of northern abolitionists—"TOUCH NOT, TASTE NOT, HANDLE NOT, ONE SINGLE PRODUCT OF SLAVE LABOUR."

EDITORIAL WITHDRAWAL.—The annexed address will announce the withdrawal of one of our number from the editorial board, and following it will be the views of the remaining editors as to a continuance of the Non-Slaveholder during another year.

To the Patrons and Readers of the Non-Slaveholder.

With the present number of the Non-Slaveholder will terminate the editorial services of its senior editor. Some words, friends of the oppressed, may be due from him to you, on this occasion. They need be but few, as the journal will be continued under the sufficient charge of its other editors. But he desires to say to you, that no diminished zeal for the slave, nor any doubt of the efficacy of the remedy which he, with them, has sought to inculcate, has led him to this withdrawal. On the contrary, each added year has given him new interest in the slave's deliverance, and new confirmation of the truth of that principle through which they have sought its accomplishment. There are, however, imperiously calling for his attention, other duties, domestic, social, religious and benevolent, and among them some which have relation to the same end, the overthrow of slavery by the encouragement of its opposite system of labour. Some repose is also demanded by advancing years. In yielding to these considerations, he but confesses that "to everything there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven."

In uniting with his valued colleagues in the effort to show, through this medium, to the friends of the slave, that a consistent and efficient action in his behalf, demanded a disuse of the products of his labour, he felt that the argument was a brief one, resting, as it did, on the plain fact that the users of these products gave the motive for the existence of slavery. He therefore looked to an early conclusion of their labours, whether those to whom their doctrine should be addressed, yielded obedience to its truthful requirements or not. At the end, however, of their first year's enterprise, it did not appear to either of them that the duty severally resting upon them had been fully accomplished, and they therefore determined on a continuance of their labours during another year. He finds at the end of this second period, that the time of his release has arrived, whilst his younger coadjutors still feel impressions of duty in the case.

In withdrawing from his esteemed associates it will be in that respect only in which he is connected with them editorially. In whatever other way he can availingly do it, he will be cheerfully contributory to their efforts, and a glad sharer in the unrepaid cost they will doubtlessly incur. He has but to add his wish that these efforts may be eminently successful in awakening to a proper consistency the professed friends of the slave; in which consistency, exists, in his view, a moral power necessary to the abolition of slavery, and which, neglected, will bring upon them the guilt of its continuance.

ABRAHAM L. PENNOCK.

The withdrawal of our beloved friend and veteran labourer in the anti-slavery cause, makes it proper for the remaining Editors to state, briefly, some of the grounds which induce them to continue the Non-Slaveholder. It is as true now as it was at the commencement of the publication, that "slavery is the crying sin of this land and of large portions of this hemisphere," and we cannot but believe that the measures of the Federal government within the two last years—the annexation of Texas, and the barbarous war still waged against an adjacent nation, for the acquisition of territory to be devoted to the extension of the unchristian system—have imposed additional responsibilities upon all who deplore its existence and possess in any degree the power of removing it. The great work of emancipation is yet at the threshold. Means commensurate with the strength and enormity of the evil are required for its extinction. They will be found in a faithful and intelligent application of the pure principles of Christianity. It is incumbent, then, upon all Christian professors to inquire seriously into their several and common duties.

The slaveholder has intrenched his conscience behind the inconsistency of those who profess to abhor slavery. He says to them: you do not, as far as your circumstances permit, refuse to sustain the system which you condemn, and therefore you neither afford me proof that you believe the doctrine you profess, nor that you would refuse to hold slaves if you were placed in my circumstances. This sentiment is general amongst slaveholders. A fugitive slave, of unusual intelligence, recently startled a friend of ours by saying:—"with all their labours, the people of the North can never accomplish emancipation while they purchase the cotton, rice, sugar and tobacco, produced by slave labour." On being asked, where he obtained such an idea, he answered—"From my master, eight years ago."

While proofs are multiplying, sufficient to assure us that the duty and importance of the abstinence we advocate, are increasingly appreciated, it is but too evident that the harvest is yet plenteous and the labourers few. For the present, therefore, we feel constrained to remain in the field, and, to the extent of our humble abilities, endeavour to fulfil what may be required at our hands.

We hope that our friends who have kindly acted as Agents for the Non-Slaveholder, will continue to do so, and that our readers generally will endeavour to extend its circulation.

EFFECTS OF THE CONSUMPTION OF SLAVE-GROWN SUGAR IN GREAT BRITAIN ON SLAVERY AND THE SLAVE-TRADE IN BRAZIL AND CUBA.

Extracts from a Letter to Lord John Russell, contained in the London Times of the 27th October, under the signature of Jacob Omsium:

"Against the evil condition to which your Lordship has reduced the British Sugar Colonies, you have to boast the set off of cheap sugar and increased consumption.

"Sugar is, indeed, at this moment sold cheap—as cheap as a bankrupt's effects usually are sold. There has been 'an awful crash in trade,' and your Lordship, like the swindling Regent-street drapers, is gaining popularity by supplying your pleased customers with goods at half the price which they cost the honest and industrious men who made them.

"This, however, must soon come to an end; the supplies from the Mauritius and the West Indies will rapidly diminish, and that from the East Indies will cease altogether. Prices will then rise; the cry for more sugar—cheap sugar—will be louder than ever; and, as our own colonies will be unable to furnish it, you will have to transfer your custom to the foreign slave-driver.

"I spent the beginning of this year in Cuba, with a view of ascertaining the preparations which were being made in that island to meet the opening of our markets. To an Englishman coming up from Grenada and Jamaica the contrast between the paralyzed and decaying aspect of the trade of those colonies, and the spirit and activity which your measures had infused into that of the Havannah, was most disheartening.

"The town was illuminated when I landed; in consequence of the news of high prices from England. Three splendid trains of De Rosne's machinery, costing 40,000 dollars each, had just arrived from France, and were in process of erection; steam-engines and engineers were coming over daily from America; new estates were forming; coffee plantations were being broken up and their feeble gangs of old people and children, who had hitherto been selected for that light work, were formed into task gangs, and hired out by the month to the new ingenios, then in full drive.

"It was crop time. The mills went round night and day. On every estate (I scarcely hope to be believed when I state the fact) every slave was worked under the whip eighteen hours out of the twenty-four, and, in the boiling-houses, from five to six P. M., and from eleven o'clock to midnight, when half the people were concluding their eighteen hours' work; the sound of the hellish lash was incessant; indeed, it was necessary, to keep the overtaken wretches awake.

"The six hours during which they rested were spent in a barracoon—a strong, foul, close sty, where they wallowed without distinction of age or sex.

"There was no marrying amongst the slaves on the plantations; breeding was discouraged; it was cheaper and less troublesome to buy than to breed. On many estates females were entirely excluded; but an intelligent American planter told me he disapproved of that system; that the men drooped under it, and that he had found the most beneficial effects from the judicious admixture of a proportion of one 'lively wench' to five males, in a gang of which he had charge. Religious instruction and medical aid were not carried out generally beyond baptism and vaccination.

"Whilst at work, the slaves were stimulated by drivers, armed with swords and whips, and protected by magnificent bloodhounds.

"To afford you an idea of the light in which negroes are looked upon by the Cuban planters, I will mention that I was present at a hiring bargain which took place between an American and a Frenchman, both men of unusually good character. The American wanted ten additional hands. The Frenchman only wished to let eight females, observing facetiously, 'Elles feront feu-veur parmi vos jeunes gens.'

"At last the latter said, 'I'll tell you what I will do; I've a lame houseboy; he has never been used to field labour certainly, but he's a very spirited lad, and your mayoral may get a deal of work out of him if he only presses him a little; you shall have him; that will make nine; and then I've got a magnificent breeding wench, aussi large que Monsieur, (turning to me;) she was confined three weeks ago. I'll wean her baby at once, and she shall be here, fit to go to work, on Sunday.' And, as Dr. Locock was not there to remonstrate, the bargain was struck, the baby weaned, and the breeding wench put to work. Possibly your Lordship is at this moment sweetening your tea with the results of her exertions.

"The Spaniards have always been esteemed humane slave-owners, and I have no wish to make them out worse than they are; what I describe here I saw. The lex scripta of Cuba, as regards the negroes, is indeed most humane; but the corruption which pervades every branch of the public service in that island renders it entirely a dead letter.

"Travellers generally form their ideas of slavery from the domestic negroes, the only ones en evidence, who are picked slaves, and are generally much petted and spoiled; and it is very rarely that they have opportunities of witnessing what really goes on, on the sugar plantations. Our Consul and our two slave-commissioners told me that they had never visited one since their residence in the island, and I doubt whether they would be permitted to do so.

"The Captain-General, O'Donnell, is an open abettor of the slave-trade, and a declared enemy of the English, who cut a very insignificant figure in the commercial community of Cuba. He treats our representative there with studied contempt, and evades, in the most barefaced manner, the treaties which our commissioners are resident there to enforce. Yet they assured me, that previous to your Lordship's alteration of the sugar duties, the price of produce had been so low that the slave-trade had almost died away, not more than one or two cargoes having been landed during the year 1845-46.

"In February last, the market value of field negroes had risen from $300 to $500,—a price which would speedily bring a supply from the coast. The accounts thence of the numbers of vessels captured, and of the still greater numbers seen and heard of, but not captured by our cruisers, bear ready witness to the stimulus which you have afforded to that accursed trade. It is only during the last year that we hear of steam-slavers, carrying 950 slaves, dipping their flag in derision to our men-of-war.

"I know nothing of what is going on in Porto Rico, my Lord, but there is every reason to suppose that the result of your measure has been the same there, and evidence arrives by every packet that the Brazilian slavers have enormously augmented of late in numbers and activity.

"As the Cubans dare not, for their own personal safety, increase the numerical quantity of their negroes beyond a certain limit, they have commenced importing Chinese immigrants, bound to the planters for seven years. These immigrants are transported to Cuba in English ves- sels, and the fate which awaits them there, is not a very dubious one.

"If you are to look to these foreign planters for a future supply of cheap sugar, I ask you in the name of common sense, what excuse you will have for continuing the presence of our costly squadron on the coast of Africa—costly in seamen's lives as well as in money? Will it not be too flagrant an absurdity to pretend to wrest the tool from the hand of the cultivator on whom you depend for your supplies, and who cannot raise them without it?"

LETTER FROM THE FRENCH ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY TO THE COMMITTEE OF THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.

Paris, September 16, 1847.

Mr. President.—We could have wished to have replied long ere now, to the letter with which the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society favoured us, on the 23d of January last; but having been unfortunately misled, it did not reach us till a day or two ago; and this is the first opportunity which has presented itself for answering it. This circumstance gives us much pain, for we attach very great importance to the communications which your Committee make to us on the great question of emancipation; a question which leaves far behind all those political questions which engage, in so great a degree, the attention of civilized nations.

Allow us, Mr. President, to congratulate ourselves on the progress which our cause has made in France since the date of your letter. If we had answered it some months before, we should only have been able to deplore with you that state of things which your Secretary pictures so truthfully in his letter; we should have been compelled to state with grief that public opinion was at a stand-still on the question; and that those measures, which were only adopted as preparatory to the entire abolition of slavery, were considered as definitive by the great majority of our countrymen. But the late discussions in the Chambers have filled us with unbounded hope. Our Colonists have at last begun to understand that France wishes immediate emancipation; and the language of the ministry, on several recent occasions, seems to indicate that if this wish of the country continues to be expressed with firmness, the government will comply with it.

We quite agree with your Committee in thinking that the lot of the slaves cannot be materially ameliorated by any of the measures which may have been adopted for the purpose of effecting that object. The experiment has frequently been tried, and the results have ever been the same. In the bosom of every society, weighed down by slavery, there will ever be found obstacles, before which all attempts at amelioration or partial reform must necessarily fail. There is no remedy for slavery, but its abolition.

For this reason, all our efforts are now directed to the obtaining complete emancipation. Nevertheless, we see with satisfaction the adoption of projects of law favourable to the slaves, because they are concessions to our opinions; but we are firmly resolved not to be contented with them. After too long hesitation, perhaps, our Society has become convinced, that in simplifying its task, and confining itself to demanding the immediate and complete emancipation of the Negroes, that task will advance more rapidly to its completion than if we had troubled ourselves concerning the means to be employed in its execution. Our duty, as an abolitionist society, is essentially to urge for a prompt action. The rest belongs to the legislative body. With this object in view, the petitions presented to the Chambers last sessions were drawn up, as well as those now under course of signature. In conformity with this view also, the matured conviction of the society has been made known, a conviction in accordance with the conclusions embraced in the letters you have from time to time addressed us. It gives us great pleasure to find, Mr. President, that on this fundamental point we now agree entirely with your society. The success which has crowned its efforts plainly shows how just are its views as to the course which ought to be followed, for the purpose of obtaining the abolition of slavery, and how surely that course leads to the desired end.

Permit us here to express, Mr. President, our entire sympathy, with your generous and persevering efforts.

In the name of the Society,

(In the absence of the President,)

(Signed) H. Passy,

Peer of France and Vice President.

(Countersigned.)

DUTRANE, Secretary.

SOME FACTS.

Looking over some calculations on the Census of 1840, we found these results:

For every one hundred whites—South Carolina has 145 slaves; Mississippi, 109; Florida, 92; Alabama, 75; Georgia, 69; Virginia, 66; North Carolina, 50; Kentucky, 31; Tennessee, 28; Maryland, 28; Arkansas, 26; Missouri, 18.

The whole slave states number 15.

The slaves are chiefly centered in the planting regions. You may find 2000 slaves in parts of South Carolina, to 100 whites—on the other hand there are districts having but few bond. In the low lands of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and in Florida and Louisiana negroes abound; in the hill country, or upland region they are limited in numbers. The same holds true of Mississippi, Tennessee, &c. But in East Tennessee, Western Virginia, &c., slavery is nominal.—Examiner.

THE CUBA MOVEMENT

Seems to be a-foot, and there are people mad enough to think that the annexation of that island can be effected without violence. Cuba would swell our slave population to about thirty-three hundred thousand souls, give additional representatives of the Slave Power to the number of eight or ten in the Senate, and ten or a dozen in the House, and impose upon the Government the necessity of keeping a standing army in Havana to keep down the slaves. A precious acquisition!

We copy the following from the Charleston Mercury:

"The New Orleans Bulletin of Saturday last says: The Patriot of yesterday announces that it is informed, through a respectable source, that a new Spanish journal will, in the course of a very short time, be established in this city, 'dedicated exclusively to advocate the emancipation (independence) of the Island of Cuba, and its annexation to the United States.' One of the two principal editors will come hither from Havana, where the sum of ten thousand dollars is already available for this new enterprise; the other is already in the United States, and if not now in New Orleans, will be soon here. With regard to its introduction into Cuba, in anticipation of the hostility of General O'Donnell, it is stated that the persons interested have so well established relations there, that there will be no difficulty in distributing 5,000 copies of the paper among the inhabitants of the island."

IMPORTANT DECISION.

A slave belonging to Louis Alme Pigneyguy was yesterday declared to be free, in consequence of having been taken to France.—N. O. Picayune of the 10th.

This is in accordance with decisions which have frequently been made here, and with which the South has never been satisfied. If a slave be brought by his master, voluntarily, into this State, his shackles fall off at once. Slavery cannot exist here for a moment. And it is so with every free State, and with every country where slavery is not recognized. The decision in New Orleans goes further, however, than our decisions have gone or can go. It establishes the important fact, that the freedom which a slave thus acquires, by the voluntary act of his master, shall avail him permanently; and that if he, of his own choice, shall afterwards return to a slave State, he shall not again be subject to bondage.

Boston Transcript.

The same court decided, a few days previous, as it appears in some of the New Orleans papers, that the steamboat Missouri was not liable for carrying off a slave. In this case a singular fact was disclosed, viz: a slave being so white that he could pass anywhere for a white man, and who was supposed to be such when he was taken into the employ of the steamer and carried out of the State. The slave had been permitted to hire himself on boats trading to places where slavery does not exist, and to remain there till he chose to leave, and the court expressed great doubts whether his master could exercise ownership over him afterwards.—N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

MARYLAND.

Dr. SNODGRASS attended a meeting in Cecil county, Maryland, on the 26th ult., and, after addressing it on the subject of slavery, the following resolutions were passed:

Resolved, That the time has come when our sectional jealousies and differences should be forgotten in an earnest and persevering effort to rid not only Maryland, but the country at large, of this moral and social evil.

Resolved, That we are determined that our sanction shall never be given to the further extension of slavery, feeling as we do, that having allowed it the constitutional guarantee within its present limits, we have done all that can be fairly asked of us as lovers of Truth and Justice, or as true patriots.

Another meeting was held in the same county, in which Marylanders declared their determination to discuss the whole subject, and passed the following resolves:

Resolved, That we believe that not only the physical, but the moral interests of Maryland, demand that slavery shall cease within her borders—resting, as it does, like an incubus upon her body social, while blasting, as if with a general mildew, the fruits of her beautiful and naturally productive soil, and drying up, as with a rushing wind, the fountains of Truth and Justice.

A letter from a Kentuckian in Cumberland, Maryland, to a friend in this city says:

"There is an evident and growing determination to bring up the subject of emancipation, and when the Presidential election is over, I believe it will be done, as slaveholders seem as bent upon it as those who do not own any negroes."

This looks bright and cheering. It seems, indeed, as if the border slave States were resolved to master their one great evil. The will alone is wanting. Give them that, and they conquer it, and rise to a pitch of moral and physical greatness such as they could never begin to reach under slavery.—Louisville Examiner.

JOHN WOOLMAN.

Have you ever, gentle reader, chanced to meet with the History of the Life of John Woolman?

If you have not, then go, I pray you, to the library of some ancient Quaker of your acquaintance, and borrow it. But do not read it then, not, at least, if the "Wept of the Wish-ton-wish," with half its leaves still uncut, is lying upon your table—or if you have only just peeped between the pages of one of the annuals;—but when you are wearied of all these things; when you sit among your "pleasant company of books," listless and discontented; when your heart turns sick with the long details of human crime and misery, written within your volumes of history; when biography serves but to humble you, with the knowledge that the best have been so frail, and the wisest so ignorant; when philosophy, which has led you with a proud wing among the secret influences of nature, leaves you but a knowledge of your own ignorance—and poetry, glorious poetry, that you thought had almost become a portion of the life-spring of your heart,—you fed so long on its magnificent imaginings—comes only with a dazzling gaudiness to your worn and feverish spirit—then go forget yourself for a while, in the unpretendingness of John Woolman's auto-biography.

Were you ever ill of a fever?—and do you recollect the blessedness with which you closed your eyes, when the cool fingers of a beloved friend came and pushed aside the loose hair, and were laid upon your hot forehead. With such a moon-light feeling will the pure simplicity of Woolman come to your sick heart. There is no glitter of fancy, no display of stupendous intellect, no splendid imaginations to bewilder you into tears, with their intensity of brightness; it is not even a tale of striking or romantic incident: but it is the beautiful history of a meek heart laid open before you, in all its guilelessness. You will become familiar with a character of the most perfect humility, full of a simple majesty, yet gentle as a very child, unfaltering in its quiet self-denial, and unbending to its own weakness, assuming no superior sanctity, lifting not up the voice of stern judgment against the frailties of others, and gifted with all the holy and affectionate charities of life.

You will feel a purifying influence steal gradually over your heart, while you bend over the quiet pages, calming the rude beatings of its pulse into a thankful evenness, and cooling the impatient irritation of your spirit, with the lesson of its gentle words, till you feel almost as if the unworldly moments of your childhood's time had again come back to you.—E. M. CHANDLER.

A NIGHT ON MOUNT KATAHDIN.

To the summer tourist and fashionable traveler, the White Mountains of New Hampshire are familiar as Cape May or the Catskill. Every rugged pass or green dingle of their wooded sides; every stream leaping down from their high well-springs; every picturesque outlook from the winding paths which lead to their rocky summits, has been annually made the theme of admiring description. But, comparatively few travellers have turned their steps towards Katahdin, the solitary mountain-giant, whose head, five thousand feet above the waters of the Penobscot, overlooks the vast valley beneath, glittering with its hundred lakes. Situated in the midst of a wilderness traversed only by the trapper and the lumberman, difficult of ascent, and peculiarly liable to sudden storms and snow-blows, it has been seldom visited; and of those who have attempted to reach its summit, only a few have succeeded. Professor Bailey, of West Point, ascended it in the 8th month, 1836, in the midst of a cold drizzling rain. In the 9th month of the following year, Dr. C. T. Jackson, State Geologist, made the ascent, but was compelled to stop short of the highest peak by a sudden storm of sleet and snow. The first ascent of which we have any knowledge was made in 1804.

The Legislature of Maine having granted an appropriation for a botanical survey of the State, and having appointed Dr. Young, of Bangor, to carry it into execution, that gentleman, in company with Dr. Thurber and several others, left the City of the East on the 18th ultimo, for the purpose of ascending Katahdin. John K. Laski, of Bangor, one of the party, has given a long account of the tour, which, although evidently written in haste, has the merit of conveying a vivid idea of the writer's adventures. It appeared in the Bangor Courier of the 14th instant.

Leaving Bangor, the party, seven in number, passed up the Penobscot to the village of Passadumkeag, camping at night in a violent rain. At noon, on the next day, they reached Lincoln, the principal town on the Penobscot above Bangor, where the river moves quietly through a rich interval, its banks studded with pleasant farms, and embosomed "beautiful islands, whose open growth of large elms formed a picturesque and charming appearance." The night found them at Mattawamkeag Point. On the following morning, quitting the military road, they struck into the Aroostook track, which takes a northwesterly direction through the forest. In the course of the afternoon, while passing the unincorporated township of Benedicta, (a purchase of the late Bishop Fenwick,) they for the first time obtained a distinct view of the object of their journey. Far in the west, the huge granite pile towered through the hazy atmosphere, its loftiest summit circled with white smoke-like clouds. At a lone farmhouse in township No. 3, at the distance of eighty-five miles from Bangor, they left their carriage, and started on foot towards the mountain. Late in the afternoon of the 21st ultimo, they reached the solitary dwelling of a pioneer farmer, who, a few years since, sat himself down in the wilderness, with no other resources than his axe and a strong arm to wield it. He had now a cleared farm of one hundred acres, a good house, and substantial barns filled with seventy-five tons of hay. The next day being the first day of the week, it was decided to remain until the 23d. One of the company, it seems, was a clergyman, and he was requested by their host to exercise his vocation, which he did, very much to the satisfaction of the good man and his wife, to whom the presence of a minister was a rare and welcome event. On the following morning the party continued their journey to the base of the mountain, a distance of thirty miles, along the banks of the Wassataquoik, a wild rocky stream, dammed with huge boulders, which appear to have been swept down from the granite sides of Katahdin in some terrible submersion far back in the geological ages. At three o'clock in the afternoon of the 24th, they commenced the ascent. The first part of their way was extremely difficult, over steep, broken rocks, and through a thick growth of maple, birch, spruce, and fir. They encamped for the night, weary and thirsty, with no water, to their knowledge, nearer than that of the Wassataquoik, which they had left foaming and roaring down its rugged channel two thousand feet below them.

Seneca, in one of his epistles, says, that "where there is a lofty deep-shaded grove, full of old trees with interlacing boughs, shutting out the light of heaven, the silence, the depth of shade, the grandeur of the wood, infuse into the breast the notion of a Divinity." If such was the effect of mountain groves upon the heathen sage, we cannot wonder that, on waking amidst the ancient shadows of Katahdin, our Christian travellers gathered around their clerical companion and listened to the voice of prayer and thanksgiving. After toiling onward about two hours, they came to a clear-gushing mountain stream, at which they slaked their thirst, feeling, as they did, very much like the behemoth of Job, that they could "draw up Jordan at a draught." "Here," says the narrator, "Dr. Young and his assistant botanists searched for rare plants, and were successful. He found here the pyrola uniflora, (the one-flowered pirola,) a beautiful little thing, about three inches high, concealing its leaves in the moss, but just modest enough to run its beautiful little blossom upon a slender stem, an inch or two long, to greet with a smile the morning sunlight, and to bask in his effulgent beams. We saw here, in the greatest abundance, the mountain ash, some of which were quite seven inches in diameter. The sugar pear, growing in bushes from three to ten feet high, we frequently met with. The berries were very delicious, and particularly so to us before we discovered water."

Passing onward through a broad belt of the pinus nigra, a low, dwarfed spruce, tangled and twisted in all conceivable forms, "kicked about and snarled up in the crazy waltzes of the North winds," at the noon of a bright, cloudless day, they reached the loftiest summit of Katahdin, famous in the traditions of the Penobscots as the residence of a mighty mountain spirit, Pomoola, who carried thither a beautiful daughter of their tribe, beyond the reach of the most adventurous hunters of her race. The thermometer, even at that height, (nearly 6,000 feet,) stood at 61 degrees. We will let the narrator give his own account of the outlook from his lofty position over that wild and wonderful "lake country" of the East:

"There was not a cloud in the sky nor a breeze of wind upon the mountain, and the whole hea-

von was filled with warm, gorgeous sunlight. The eye could not be withdrawn from the scene till the soul was filled with the transporting images of beauty around. The tallest trees were like grass in the distance, and the lakes, Chesuncook, Moosehead, and a hundred I cannot name, were glowing like burnished silver in the noontide effulgence. I thought of many similes, but can give you the best idea of it when I say the scene reminded me of that represented by a splendid mirror broken into a thousand fragments, and wildly scattered over the grass, reflecting the full blaze of the sun. Be it recollected that Mount Katahdin is the very centre of all the head waters of the Penobscot, and that almost seven-tenths of the lakes in the State can be seen from its summit. We saw, with the glass and the naked eye, Mars Hill, and might have seen the Atlantic ocean, had not the southern horizon been overcast with haze, or fog. To the west and northwest stretching away as far as the eye could extend, were the White Hills, while, in the south, east, and northeast, we could see only here and there a mountain. It seemed to us that the area of the whole State was in view.

Between sixty and seventy lakes, some of them of large size, are in full view from the top of Katahdin, more beautiful in their wild loneliness than those which feed the Hudson, amidst the Adirondack wilderness, so finely described in Hoffman's "Vigil of Faith."

"Lakes which the sun, though pouring down
His noontide splendor round each isle,
At eventide so soon forsakes,
That you may watch his parting smile,
For hours around the summits glow,
When all is gray and dark below.
Some broadly flashing to the sun,
Like warrior's shield when first displayed;
Some dark, as when the battle done,
That shield oft blackens in the glade."

Dr. Young improved the afternoon in gathering specimens of Alpine plants and flowers. "Here," says the narrator, "we found beautiful mosses and flowers; the flowers short-lived to be sure—and so is man, who has the vast globe for his realm. But one sweet little flower only lived here because it was nearer heaven, as it seemed, to gaze freely at the stars, and catch the first glance at the sun's golden eye. It was the Arenaria Greenlandica, called Greenland sandwort. It is only found on high altitudes, such as on Mount Washington, &c., and grows about three inches high, with a thousand little stems in tufted masses, and crowned with beautiful white flowers."

The top of the mountain is a table land of seven-ral hundred acres, broken by two or three elevations, Pomoola being the highest. In the eastern part is a vast chasm or valley, which is thus described:

"From the highest points on each side of this tremendous valley, frowned on by scornful brows of granite, in a straight line across, the distance is not less than a mile, and certainly not less than a thousand feet of perpendicular descent. In the bottom of this valley are two lakes, perhaps from three to eight acres surface in each. From those points on the eastern ridge of this valley, rocks might be rolled into the lake nearest. With the glass, it seemed reposing just under the base of those angry pinnacles. The walls were perfectly smooth, in some places, so that even a man might, for many hundred feet, slide down without losing a tolerably upright position. I had the pleasure of rolling down rocks on the opposite side—the western part of this valley. Can any one judge of distance by the descent of rocks in such places? Then it was twenty thousand feet, and could be likened to nothing but the 'bottomless pit,' in idea of depth. I rolled one rock, as large as I could start, and in its descent it carried others with it, and away they went, like so many fiends, jumping, howling, now leaping almost off at right angles, then again falling in a perpendicular position, and again thrown off in a counter direction, scattering before their paths the small trees that presented themselves, and filling the whole valley with the thunders of the concussion."

Night overtook our travellers on the mountain, a glorious summer night of star-light and moonlight. Think of a sunset view from Katahdin, followed by a moon-lit panorama of lake, and mountain, and forest!

"I stood alone," says our traveller, "no one within a mile of me, on the highest northern point—phrenologically speaking, on the very fringes of the mountains—and saw the sun go down in the west, surrounded with golden clouds. His light was spread far over the west, till, by and by, the dim twilight was diffused over the earth, and the appearance of lakes, forests, streams, and mountains, changed and grew less distinct. But the moon had already risen above the horizon, full and cloudless, and looked as it seemed to me, for the first time and with astonishment, upon these wild scenes of nature. Soon the stars came out from their hiding places, and, as the moon continued to mount the sky, another glorious brightness, of moon-light and star-light, filled the heavens, and was poured over forest, mountain, and lake."

At 10 o'clock at night the party bade farewell to old Pomoola, and commenced their descent by moonlight. After travelling an hour and a half, they reached a suitable camping ground. Early in the morning they continued their descent, following the course of the Katahdin stream, which takes its name from the mountain. They counted five splendid cascades, some of them of nearly one hundred feet fall. Their sound filled the deep dark valley with echoes. At 7 o'clock in the evening, the party encamped once more on the mountain, on the very verge of the rushing river, amidst trees hewn only by the dull axe of Time. The night was perfectly clear and calm—a brilliant moonlight streaming through the arches of the forest, and silvering the wild water flashing under them; far above, rose the dark form of Katahdin, dimly seen through the mists flowing like grey hair over his giant brows. On the morning of the 27th the travellers reached the Wassataquoik river, at the base of the mountain, and three days after, returned to Bangor, having been absent fourteen days.

Smoke of clearings will ere long curl about the wooded spurs of Katahdin; rail cars thunder along its still valleys; its lakes and waterfalls be made the slaves of mechanism; and the great lonely mountain itself become a familiar resort for the fashionable idlers of our cities. But it may well be doubted whether the prospect which its summit may then afford will equal, in beauty and grandeur, that which our late travellers enjoyed. Improved water privileges, painted shingles, and steeple houses, could lend no additional charm to the simple majesty of Nature in these vast solitudes. In one of his essays, Ralph Waldo Emerson says, that "Nature is loved as the City of God, although, or rather, because, there is no citizen. The beauty of Nature must always be universal and mocking, until the landscape has human figures that are as good as itself. Man is fallen, nature is erect." Hence, when describing his visit to Monadnock, he laments that the dwellers amidst its mountain glory seemed so totally unworthy of the magnificent theatre upon which they were acting their poor farce of existence. Under the shadow of the heavenward mountain, he found men—

"With step of cat, and eye of bug, Dull victims of the pipe and mug."

Our fastidious philosopher would experience none of this revulsion of feeling upon Mount Katahdin. Man has neither made nor marred the landscape which is overlooked by that lone watcher by the eastern gateway of the New World.

THE BETTER LAND.

"The shapings of our heavens are the modifications of our constitution," said Charles Lamb, in his reply to Southey's attack upon him in the Quarterly Review.

He who is infinite in love as well as wisdom has revealed to us the fact of a future life; and the fearfully important relation in which the present stands to it. The actual nature and conditions of that life He has hidden from us—no chart of the ocean of Eternity is given us—no celestial guide book or geography defines, localizes, and prepares us for the wonders of the spiritual world. Hence imagination has a wide field for its speculations, which, so long as they do not positively contradict the revelation of the Scriptures, cannot be disapproved.

We naturally enough transfer to our idea of Heaven, whatever we love and reverence on earth. Thither the Catholic carries in his fancy the imposing rites and time-honoured solemnities of his worship. There the Methodist sees his love-feasts and camp meetings; in the groves and by the still waters and green pastures of the Blessed Abodes. The Quaker, in the stillness of his self-communing, remembers that there was "silence in Heaven." The churchman listening to the solemn chant of vocal music, or the deep tones of the organ, thinks of the song of the Elders, and the golden harps of the New Jerusalem.

The heaven of the Northern nations of Europe was a gross and sensual reflection of the earthly life of a barbarous and brutal people.

The Indians of North America had a vague notion of a Sunset Land—a beautiful Paradise far in the West—mountains and forests filled with deer and buffalo—lakes and streams swarming with fishes—the happy hunting-ground of Souls. In a late letter from a devoted missionary among the western Indians, (Paul Bloom, a converted Jew,) we have noticed a beautiful illustration of this belief. Near the Omahaw mission-house, on a high bluff, was a solitary Indian grave. "One evening," says the Missionary, "having come home with some cattle, which I had been seeking, I heard some one wailing, and, looking in the direction from whence it proceeded, I found it to be from the grave near our house. In a moment after, the mourner got up from a kneeling or lying posture, and, turning to the setting sun, he stretched forth his arms in prayer and supplication, with an intensity and earnestness as though he would detain the splendid luminary from running his course. With his body leaning forward, and his arms stretched towards the sun, he presented a most striking figure of sorrow and petition. It was solemnly awful. He seemed to me to be one of the ancients, come forth to teach me how to pray."

A venerable and worthy New England clergyman, on his death-bed, just before the close of his life, declared that he was only conscious of an awfully solemn and intense curiosity to know the great secret of Death and Eternity.

The excellent Dr. Nelson, of Missouri, was one who, while on earth, seemed to live another and higher life, in contemplation of Infinite Purity and Happiness. A friend of ours once related an incident concerning him, which made a deep impression upon our mind. They had been travelling through a summer's forenoon in the prairie, and had lain down to rest beneath a solitary tree. The Doctor lay for a long time, silently looking upward, through the openings of the boughs, into the still heavens, when he repeated the following lines, in a low tone, as if communing with himself, in view of the wonders he described:

"Oh, the joys that are there, mortal eye hath not seen!
Oh! the songs they sing there, with hosannas between!
Oh, the thrice-blessed song of the Lamb and of Moses!
Oh, brightness on brightness! the pearl-gate uncloses!
Oh, white wings of angels! Oh, fields white with roses!
Oh, white tents of Peace, where the rapt soul reposes!
Oh, the waters so still, and the pastures so green!"

The brief hints afforded us by the sacred writings concerning the Better Land, are inspiring and beautiful. Eye hath not seen, nor the ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive of the good to store for the righteous. Heaven is described as a quiet habitation—a rest remaining for the people of God. Tears shall be wiped away from all eyes; there shall be no death, neither sorrow nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain. To how many death-beds have these words spoken peace! How many failing hearts have gathered strength from them to pass through the dark valley of shadows.

Yet we would not forget that "the kingdom of Heaven is within;" that it is the state and affections of the soul; the answer of a good conscience; the sense of harmony with God; a condition of Time as well as of Eternity. What is really momentous and all-important with us is the Present by which the Future is shaped and coloured. A mere change of locality cannot alter the actual and intrinsic qualities of the soul. Guilt and Remorse would make the golden streets of Paradise intolerable as the burning mar of the infernal abodes, while Purity and Innocence would transform hell itself into Heaven. J. G. W.

THE STEAMER BAY STATE.

A correspondent at New Bedford complains of the treatment of coloured persons on board the Fall River and New York steamboat Bay State. He says that a woman with a nursing infant was obliged, not long since, to sit all night on deck. Joseph Holley, a respectable young man, was also treated as freight on board this boat, though he paid full passage as a human being. We have heard the same complaint from another quarter. The Rev. Mr. Gardner, a highly respectable clergyman of Philadelphia, was subjected to the same outrageous and contemptible treatment, and could get no redress, though he complained personally to the Captain. He has arrived at that age, and is in such a state of health, that an exposure all night might have been fatal to him. But he was indebted to one of the writers for a shelter and a bed, which his money, though he paid full price—could not purchase for him, and which no appeal to the humanity of the officers of the boat could procure. These, we presume, are only examples of the manner in which coloured people are uniformly treated on board the Bay State.—Nat. A. S. Standard.

COLOURED ORPHAN ASYLUM, NEW YORK.

The managers of the Coloured Orphan Asylum, in anticipation of the exigencies of the establishment during the approaching winter, would once more appeal to the sympathy of their friends. The wants of the institution now present themselves under the most urgent of all forms, that of an imperative necessity of defraying the expenses of food, clothing, fuel, and other contingencies, for the maintenance of 145 children; requisitions which have hitherto demanded the utmost care and forethought in the employment of their limited and fluctuating income, and which now present themselves with a totally exhausted treasury.

Children are admitted into the institution from two to eight years of age; and being thoroughly grounded in the rudiments of a practical education, and early instructed in their duties to themselves, their fellow beings, and their Creator, are indentured generally at the age of twelve. The habits of honest and useful industry, which are sedulously cultivated, will not, it is believed, allow them to be thrown upon society helpless and incompetent to provide for themselves, but will act as a stimulus to that self-respect, which, in its humblest form, ever tends to usefulness and virtue.

The managers hope that none will censure the earnestness of their expressions, when they insist upon the importance of their work, but that the friends of this neglected class will so far co-operate in it as to afford them pecuniary assistance in their present necessities.

POETRY.

For the Non-Slaverholder.

The following lines, which were published in one of the papers of this city, immediately on the appearance of the first number of the Non-Slaverholder, were cut out and laid aside at the time. Now near the close of the second volume, they have accidentally met my eye, and I offer them for insertion. I wish also to say, (and I say it in no spirit of adulation) that not only has the plan of the Non-Slaverholder met my approbation, but the carrying out of the plan has surpassed my anticipation, though I expected much. Conscious as I am that the Journal has been conducted without hope of emolument, and even with the certainty of pecuniary sacrifice, I feel, as an individual subscriber, that my acknowledgements are due to the editors; and I can state with equal truth and pleasure, that among many periodicals introduced into my family there is no one that I more highly value, no one that I more entirely approve, no one which I should more regret to have discontinued. In pursuing its blameless tenor, it has supplied what else had been a void; interfering with the province of no other journal, and, by its amiable spirit, giving occasion of offence neither to Jew nor Gentile, nor the Church. ## COERCION!

Lines suggested on seeing the first number of "The Non-Slaverholder."

Fresh help! fresh champions in the field
Of moral bravery,
Truth's promptly to wear and wield
'Gainst Slavery!
To stand in virtuous freedom bold,
The banner with firm hand to hold,
A life-time warfare to proclaim,
In freedom's name,
Against a system foul, inhuman,
And to a bloodless battle summon!

But hark! as from a bleating flock,
Who fear the moral battle shock,
I hear the timid cry arise,
Of those who mark, with mournful eyes,
Truth nailed against the cross by Hate,
And, with vague fear of unseen bait,

Afraid of ghosts where ghosts are none,
Or seeking worldly loss to shun,
Follow afar, with conscience stricken,
That Truth, believed, and yet forsaken.

Truth's lovers, struck with pallid terror,
Join the Ephesian shout of Error,
And cry "Conarion!"
Evil is odious in their sight,
And yet they dread the moral fight,
Some spectre rises to affright
And check exertion.

Backward they look with reverent gaze
On conquests won in former days,
Past triumphs win their ready praise,
As "MORAL SUASION!"

Their valiant fathers battled well—
Proudly their sons their virtues tell
On each occasion.

And, oh, had Satan kindly lain,
Prostrate and slain,
When those good fathers struck the blow
As ye strike now,
Who could have blamed the fatal thrust,
Coercing him to lie in dust,
Or feared, (their faith excused from trial, Temptation having taken wing,)
To use luxurious self-denial
Separate from the unclean thing.

Yet list ye to that chorus cry!
With ready ear its meaning try!
Subject the word to test discreet,
As with the mouth ye taste of meat!
It stands you much in stead to ken
The temper of the assailants' blade,
The one they ever brandish, when
Fresh movements for the truth are made!
To me, I ween, that cry has grown
An old familiar tedious tone,
Still ringing, ringing in my ears,
Since first I grew to manhood's years,
I've known it raised, with craven terror,
At every new attack of Error—
And not without this deafening roar,
Was gained one inch in righteous war.

When chaste and lovely Temperance, first
Her "few and feeble" champions mustered,
The sages, at the battle nursed,
Struck with dismay, were sadly flustered,
To the pure Love of Truth a stranger,
Each saw his gainful craft in danger,
And, lacking argument for Evil,
Yet bent at moral Truth to caviel,
In hope of gain—in pure perversion,
They raised this bug-bear shout, "Conarion!"
And silly Echo caught the cry,
Nor suffers yet the sound to die,
Filling with the re-echoing sound,
Graniums where brains not much abound,

And hollow hearts where sordid pelf,
Or that wounding canker, Self,
Upon the vital fluid preys,
And every generous impulse stays.

Since then I've marked, on each occasion,
That called for fearless Moral Suasion,
In every stage of every fight
Where Error was assailed by Right,
Conarion was the favorite shout
Employed to put the Truth to rout,
And lingering sometimes on the tongue
Of truthful ones who loathed the wrong,
Good men and true in pure mistake
As argument the word would speak,
And Truth would always kindly bear

The attacks which most obstruct
When hearts mistaken, yet sincere.

The many join in blind applause,
Of plausible insidious Error,
And view her form with honest terror!

NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

VOL. III.] PHILADELPHIA, FIFTH MONTH, 1843. [NO. 5.

COMMUNICATIONS.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

Few men truly lay to heart the atrocity of slaveholding, or view the act in its true character. To know its character would be to feel its pangs; and those who are victims of its power are not permitted to proclaim the sum of their afflictions. But if we have full assurances that the slaves are bought and sold like cattle in the market—husbands separated from wives, wives from husbands, parents from children, and children from parents, to be driven to some southern plantation, there to drag out a miserable existence under the lash of a tyrannical master, whose only and highest object, in general, is to obtain the greatest amount of labour from his victim with the least possible expenditure for his subsistence, though this be but an item in the aggregate of the slave's sufferings, and not by us felt—is not this of itself sufficient to cause us to pause for a moment and seriously reflect whether there is not a remedy? We have too long viewed the system as without a remedy. From the benumbing influence of long custom the sufferings and wrongs of the slave have had too little penetration into our hearts. This fact is evinced by the support generally given to the system, by which it remains in force. They do great injustice to themselves, to reason and common sense, who conclude slavery an incurable evil—yes, further; if made an act of necessity, they charge it upon the Almighty. We ought not so to view it—we might deem war with equal propriety indispensable—when, in truth, nothing can be more irrational and preposterous than to claim necessity for man's slaughtering his fellow man. Men by their own voluntary acts make war; it is not matter of necessity, but an undue indulgence of the propensities. "From whence come wars and fightings among you? come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members?" Now the sure remedy for this evil is near at hand, in the reach of every person. "I will write my law in their hearts and put it in their inward parts." This law, written by the divine finger, being obeyed, restrains and directs all the propensities of the human mind in their legitimate sphere of action, otherwise the law would be imperfect, and suppose an imperfection in the Deity—"the law of the Lord is perfect converting the soul." Where self-will, envy, pride and covetousness—indispensable elements of war—are extinguished, war must cease. The enslavement of the African is a voluntary act; the barbarous system has been deliberately and intentionally provided for by law in these United States, and it is but reasonable to deem the law the will of the people—a majority at least; hence we see, that slavery has been and continues to be matter of choice, however much the evils are complained of, which are inseparable from it. Would such a law ever have been made and sustained had the moral sense of the people been just and right on this subject? No! Here, then, we see that the system originated in, and is sustained by, the unrighteousness of the people; and it is a remarkable fact that many denounce slavery as one of the grossest evils, but charge its existence upon the government and upon certain slave states, without sufficiently considering that such as is the state of the people, such will be the character of the government. It is the people who make governments, and the slave states do not stand alone—they are in intimate connection with the free states, and require and do absolutely receive their countenance and aid in sustaining slavery, without which it would speedily be abolished. If the people make the government, and the government sanctions slavery, and slavery is acknowledged to be one of the grossest of evils, a violation of morality and christianity, then, however great the crime, still the responsibility is with the people, and the remedy too. But such is the power of custom upon the human mind, that this responsibility is not felt in the degree it should be, nor the remedy seen with proper clearness. Now, suppose this country was free from slavery, and it was proposed to open a market for slaves, by passing a law legalizing the kidnapping of Mexican slaves without distinction of colour or rank, by which hundreds and thousands were likely, with their posterity, soon to be placed in the most bitter and aggravating bondage in these United States. Would such a proposition be viewed with indifference? I presume not. The responsibility would be sensibly felt; its injustice, cruelty and barbarity every where spoken against and acted against, as unbecoming a civilized people; and yet no greater responsibility would attach to the people in that case, than does at the present for the existence of slavery. Here we see the powerful influence of long and general custom to make people indifferent and unconcerned when under deep responsibility for the continuance of one of the greatest of evils. I have said the remedy for slavery is with the people, and, I doubt not, even with those of the free states. But, alas! too many are indisposed to fully comprehend and apply the remedy. The voice and action of the people want to be turned against slavery, and it would vanish as a vapour; it must and would die, for it lives for and by the consent of the people. Now, the community is made up of individuals; hence a certain portion of the remedy for the evil of slavery attaches with as great certainty and force to individuals as the whole does to the community. How is it with me? Have I constituted myself one of the number who can with cold indifference look on and see the system of slavery pressing its helpless victims to the greatest point of suffering and degradation, and not apply the remedy for this evil to the extent possessed? If this be the fact, then what assurance do I give that I would apply the remedy, did I possess it, to the extent the community does? None! And if clothed with power for the abolishment of slavery, and unwilling to exercise it, what proof do I exhibit that I would not hold slaves, if tempted with the inducements with which the southern slaveholder is surrounded? None! Then to how much better stamp is my moral character entitled than that of the slaveholder himself? By thus entering into a serious and candid enquiry respecting ourselves, we may come to see the relation we sustain to the slaveholder, and the awful responsibility attaching to us, if giving our countenance or aid to the inhuman system. And can it be denied that he who, acquainted with all the attending circumstances, is a purchaser or consumer of slave-labour products, is by such act countenancing and aiding slavery? Is not the free and indiscriminate purchase of these products as practical and positive an endorsement as can be made of the slaveholder's right of property in his slave? It certainly is, if such purchase is claimed to be morally just, for it would be repugnant to common sense to suppose we had a valid right to purchase of one whom we knew and acknowledged had no such right to sell. Again, by endorsing the right of slaveholding, we also endorse all its inseparable evils, even the right of war, in the full sense of the word; for the slave is made and retained such only by superior physical force, regardless of moral right. This being the case, let us be candid; let us put the question to ourselves, are we not too insensible to the atrocious character of slavery and a due discharge of our individual duty for the removal of the evil?

However unjust the slaveholder may be, ought not we of the North to blush with shame in asking him to desist from his tyrannical grasp, if we are still unwilling to withdraw our countenance and practical aid, on which he is dependant for the maintenance of his hold? How long shall we who make a profession of Christianity dwell at ease with this partnership responsibility with the slaveholder resting upon us, by which a system of iniquity is maintained; inflicting mildew upon everything physical and moral coming in contact with it, and now raising a portentous cloud over the United States which blackens as it spreads.

If the people holding no slaves were to refrain from participation, it would prove a moral force, hastening the day of emancipation with a certainty and speed far exceeding all the combined efforts that have been heretofore made; for this would be removing the cause, and then the effect must cease. Surely, then, no one thing can be clearer, than that there is a remedy for the evil of slavery, and that, too, even in the hands of those who deem themselves non-slaveholders. Shall it be applied? It does seem to me that morality and christianity forbid that it should not. Slavery in these United States has reached an awfully important crisis, a crisis of the deepest interest, which justly claims the serious consideration of each individual to know how and where he stands. Christian friend, hast thou made up thy mind to occupy neutral ground upon this subject? If so, be entreated to reconsider the thing, and remember that Jesus said to his disciples, "he that is not for us is against us," and so it will be found, I doubt not, upon the subject of slavery. On proper examination, if thou art not against it, whatever thy profession, thou wilt be on the side of its supporters, who, having the means for the abolishment of slavery, are indisposed to bring them into operation.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, FIFTH MONTH 1, 1848.

ANTI-SLAVERY MOVEMENTS IN GREAT BRITAIN.—So apparent have become the results of the increased consumption of slave-grown sugars by the people of Great Britain, in an increase of the slave trade from Africa to Cuba and Brazil, that the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, and other Christian philanthropists, are renewing their efforts to induce Parliament again to impose the prohibitory duties, by which those sugars were formerly shut out from the British market.

A deputation of the Anti-Slavery Committee, consisting of Samuel Garney, George W. Alexander, Joseph Sturge, Josiah Forster, George Stacy, Henry Sterry, Joseph Cooper, Robert Alsop, Samuel Sturge and John Scoble, waited upon Lord John Russell, on the first of last month, to present a memorial against the further introduction of slave-grown sugar, and recommending, at the same time, the importation of all other sugars, whether foreign or British Colonial, on equal duties. The Minister received the deputation with much courtesy. A petition of a similar character has been presented to the House of Commons, from the Committee, by Sir E. N. Buxton.

Three Committees have been appointed by the House to examine and report upon important questions closely connected with the anti-slavery cause. The first committee is to inquire into the state of the sugar and coffee planters, both of the East and West Indies, and to suggest remedies for their relief. The second, of which John Bright is chairman, and George Thompson one of the members, is to inquire into the causes which impede the growth of cotton in India, with a view to their removal. The object of the third committee is to investigate the present state of the foreign African slave trade, and to report whether the cruising system of repression should be persevered in or not.

We cannot but hope, as we earnestly desire, that these investigations may lead to important results, both upon the action of the government, and of the people individually. The state of the West Indies has given rise to an interesting debate in the House of Lords, and we have transferred to our columns from those of the London Anti-Slavery Reporter extracts from the speeches of Lord Stanley and the Bishop of Oxford on that occasion. We ask the special attention of our readers to the statements and arguments of the Bishop, and we would remind them that the people of the United States, equally with those of Great Britain, are sharing in the "Cuba profits," and consequently incurring the "Cuba guilt," and the Cuba chastisement.

There is evidently an increasing conviction, not only that the attempt to put down the slave trade by armed cruisers must continue unavailing, but that they are actually enhancing, to a vast extent, the sufferings of the slaves. The importance, too, of rejecting the productions of slave labour, as a means of destroying the slave trade, is obtaining increased attention; and this, of course, is equally applicable to the destruction of slavery itself. Lord Stanley stated that the sugar duties' act of 1846 "had given such a stimulus and encouragement to the slave trade, that it more than neutralised the efforts of the naval force, and that if he were compelled to choose the MOST EFFECTIVE MEANS of putting an end to this traffic, and one only, he should prefer to retain the differential duty on all slave grown sugar and withdraw the naval squadron."

The Bishop of Exeter said:—

"If it was the settled policy of this country to encourage the production of slave-grown sugar, he hoped they would decide on the removal of all difficulties in the way of importing slaves from Africa, for it was perfectly clear that the difficulties thrown in the way of that importation only caused increased suffering to those actually imported. The more vigilant and successful the squadron on the coast, the greater was the pressure on the unhappy creatures embarked in the slavers. If, then, they were to encourage the growth of slave sugar, they could not do better than at once give every help to the importation of slaves." Lord Denman quite agreed with the Bishop of Exeter that "if the policy of the government was to encourage slave-grown sugar, it would be far better to withdraw their squadron from the coast of Africa at once."

Whatever may be said about "the legislation of government giving a stimulus and encouragement to the slave trade," or the "policy of the government encouraging the production of slave grown sugar," must be resolved into the simple fact, that all this is done by the INDIVIDUAL CONSUMPTION of that sugar. Let this cease, and no policy of government could induce the planters of Cuba and Brazil to store their sugars in the warehouses of London and Liverpool. This, after all, is the grand point to which a Christian people should bring their conscience and their practice. "Let the principle be comprehended," said the Bishop of Oxford, "and the mind of the people will insist upon morality and honour; they will dash at once from their lips the chalice you offer to them, tinged, as it is, with the blood of fellow creatures sacrificed to economy."

The inconsistency of which those are guilty who wish to abolish the slave trade and slavery, and yet consume the articles produced by them, is strongly exhibited in the following remarks made by Counsellor Hill recently, in a great trial in the English Court of Exchequer:—

"What is our conduct at this moment, as a nation? We, who have lavished our blood and our treasure without stint to check the trade we once lived by and encouraged; we, who have abolished slavery throughout the British Dominions and the world, as far as in us lies—now sue to the Brazilian slaveholder for the produce of that labour which we have pronounced unlawful and odious to God and man. To them we say, 'Bring us your sugar and we will buy it; and if it costs more, by reason of the very exertions we are now using to prevent its manufacture, we will readily pay that extra price.' Such, gentlemen of the jury, is British philanthropy! We pay hundreds of thousands to annihilate the slave trade, and we pay as much in the shape of increased cost to those who deal in articles produced by it to supply our own markets. We thus coin our efforts into an encouragement to slavery, and but that such a thing is unknown to the law, as applied to nations, well might we expect that a commission de lunatico inquirendo, would issue to try the sanity of England with reference to this subject, and richly would she deserve it."

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.—This body commenced its sittings for the present year, on the 17th, and closed on the 21st of last month. It appeared from the minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings, that a committee stands appointed by that meeting, to investigate the present state of slavery, and the foreign and domestic slave trade. No report has been made on these topics by the committee, but the minutes contained an account of a census taken by its direction, of the coloured population of Philadelphia, and the result of an examination into their moral and physical condition. Their number was not given, but it was stated that about one half are emigrants from the slave states, and it is principally among this class that the degradation and misery exist, which have been so often held up as proofs that the coloured people are "better off in slavery than in freedom."

A large portion of the coloured inhabitants of the city and its districts, are industrious and respectable, acquiring property, providing for their own families, and paying a fair proportion of taxes and other contributions for the relief of the poor. We hope the information obtained by the committee, will be speedily published.

With respect to the proposed investigation into the present state of the slave trade and slavery, we do not know what specific object the members of the Meeting for Sufferings have in view, but, we confess, we cannot hope for much benefit to the cause of the slave, from such an investigation. The character of both slavery and the slave trade, is fully known. The census of the United States proves a constant increase in the number of slaves; and of the continuance, and even extension of the slave trade, there is no want of evidence.

It seems to us, that the great concern and business of Friends, both individually and in their church action, should now be, to seek for the remedies that may remove these evils, and, so far as lies in their power, to apply these remedies.

The British House of Commons has recently appointed a committee to investigate the present state of the foreign African slave trade; but a distinct and definite object is in view—to ascertain whether the present cruising system of repression should be persevered in or not. The legislators and statesmen of England are slow to believe that so long as a demand exists for African slaves, there will be a supply, notwithstanding the laws against the trade, and the combined efforts of armed squadrons to suppress it. Hence, the propriety of their inquiry into the effect of the measures hitherto pursued, to enable them to decide whether the existing circumstances of the case render some change of policy expedient.

But it is sufficient for Friends to know that the whole system is in active and vigorous existence; they possess no legislative or coercive measures, to be varied by circumstances; their duties are not changed by the increase or decrease of the foreign or domestic slave trade, nor by the greater or less intensity of the evils inseparably or temporarily connected with slavery. Under these impressions, we believe the inquiry now proper for Friends to make, and, indeed, imperative upon them if they would fulfil their high calling, is not, to what unusual sufferings and abuses the slaves are subjected, or to what extent the slave trade is now pursued, but what are their own duties as Christians and Christian citizens, individually and collectively! To this point they must come at last, and we cannot but fear that the present movement, if movement it may be called, of the Meeting for Sufferings, will have little effect other than to divert the attention of the members of the Yearly Meeting from an examination into their individual duties, and to render them easy under, and unconscious of the solemn responsibilities which are really resting upon them.

In our last number, we had occasion to advert to the advice issued nine years ago, by this Yearly Meeting, inciting its members to "seriously and impartially examine what is required at their hands," and to an "individual inquiry, with a single eye to the pointings of Truth, how far they are clear" in respect to the "close connection and intimate intercourse" with the slaveholding sections of our country, "through the diversified and widely spread channels of commerce and business." If this had been earnestly repeated, year after year, as has been the case in relation to the subjects of education and temperance, and due heed had been given to it, we cannot but believe that, instead of being at the threshold of the matter, and instituting an inquiry into the extent, condition and character of the slave-trade and slavery, the Society would now be prepared, not only to acknowledge that "Slavery is the support of the slave-trade—without it, this system of theft, oppression, rapine and murder, must of necessity cease,"* but also to perceive that slavery is supported by the use and consumption of its productions, and to advise its members to "cease being customers in the market which makes slavery."

But, alas! how widely different from this is the general feeling amongst us! On no former similar occasion, have we observed so little disposition to enter into an exercise on the subject of slavery—to sympathise with the slave, or to consider what was required at our hands. A darkness which might be felt, seemed to shut out nearly every gleam of light, and so far as he might look to this highly professing Society for his deliverance, to extinguish almost all hope for the slave.

undimmed perseverance, the faithful devotion of those who are truly awakened to their duties. May they be enabled to cherish their grain of faith!

CORRESPONDENCE.—An esteemed foreign correspondent writes thus: "The views developed in the speech you wisely quote at large, delivered by George Thompson, M. P., point out, what I consider, the true remedy for American slavery. Replant India with its native weed; people again the grass-grown streets of Dacca with a race of manufacturers; give them all the improvements of English machinery, and the great end of the philanthropist would I think, gradually be attained. The great stimulus would be removed from slavery and the slave trade; and while the cotton trade of India would gradually revive, slavery in America, from year to year, would gradually languish; while the slave, as his labour became less valuable, would, step by step, arise to the condition of a freeman. Evil, according to the apostolic method, would be overcome with good, just as in the every day process of nature, light expels darkness."

Our friend seems to have a clear conception of the results to be expected from a great combined movement by a nation, or the people in the aggregate; and he sees no objection to thus removing the "great stimulus"—the consumption of slave-labour products—from slavery and the slave-trade, through a rejection of the slave-grown cotton of America, and the substitution of cotton cultivated in India by freemen. We scarcely need say that we have long entertained and often expressed similar views. But we regret to find, from subsequent remarks of our correspondent that he is one of those who forget that the aggregate action which would produce the contemplated effect, must itself necessarily be the result of individual action; and he even goes so far as to question the propriety of individuals adopting a principle and a course of conduct, which, he acknowledges would, if pursued by the people generally, constitute "the true remedy for American slavery;" attain "the great end of the philanthropist," and remove "the great stimulus from slavery and the slave trade." But we must let our friend speak for himself. "Be it remembered," he continues, "that the products of the slave, equally with those of the freeman, are the works of nature's God, and, I confess, I doubt whether it be the best mode to refuse these gifts, because, by an anti-slavery fiction, 'blood-stained.'" deat can entertain this doubt, and at the same time approve the views of George Thompson. The fallacy of his argument has often been exposed, and yet, we fear, there are many sincere seekers after the truth, who continue deluded by it. We deny, on behalf of the slave, that the product of his labour is a gift to any but himself. On this point, our sentiments were given several years ago in a pamphlet, entitled, "Considerations on the use of the productions of slavery;" and we shall take the liberty of quoting them here.

We do not know how our esteemed correspon-

"Overlooking the end for which slavery exists, it has been contended that however wrongful may be the holding of a slave and the using of him as an instrument of labour, there is no wrong in taking and using the fruits of his coerced labour. These, it is said, do not belong to him; they have been grown on his master's soil, and withal are the increase of the earth—the good gifts of heaven to man—which we are thankfully to accept and use.

"Let it be granted that no man is created to be a slave, but that every man is entitled to the proper use of himself, and it must follow that the results of that use should be accorded to him also: otherwise the grant would be a mere nullity. Obviously then, the man who is compelled to work for another, the fruits of his work being taken to that other's use, is robbed of those results. The aggression, overlooking the protracted torture of the labourer, is as perfect as any act of piracy can be, and is identical in spirit with it.

"The gift of 'the increase of the earth' is doubtless to all mankind. It is deeper, and higher, and stronger, than right conferred by parchment and seal. But it is a gift proceeding in an orderly manner: first, to the cultivator, and thence through him, according to fixed laws of moral action, to the consumer or user. There is no gift to one of another's coerced industry, any more than there is of his person, or any more than there is a gift of the earth's increase to the robber, who neither toils for nor buys it, or to the purchaser from that robber, though his plea may be that he has 'no control' of the robbery.

"Conceding, however, to him who holds a patent for the soil, all the rights it can justly give him, he has no patent to the man, and as much superior as is man to the dust he treads upon, are his rights to those of the other when they come in collision."

The same argument, in another form, has been thus urged: "God blesses the produce of the slave's labour, and therefore, in refusing to partake of it, we do wrong, and call in question His goodness and His mercy."

To this objection, the pamphlet already quoted, replies:

"It is true His rain descends upon the just and unjust; are we therefore to be partakers of the sins of the unjust? His light guides the robber to the work of evil—the murderer to the deed of death; are we hence to conclude that the robber and the murderer are right, or that we may innocently partake of the fruits of their deeds?

"The inference from God's blessing the slaves' labour, if just, would be more comprehensively expressed thus: God has blessed the labour of slaves, therefore the holding of slaves is right! But the rice, cotton and tobacco plants, the sugar cane and all other plants which are cultivated by slaves, grow in accordance with a law which was established by the Almighty when he said, 'Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit tree yielding fruit after his kind, whose seed is in itself upon the earth.' Now His laws of nature are unalterable, except by His special intervention; and are we to conclude that because He does not thus interpose, and by a miracle blast all the plants cultivated by slaves, He therefore regards their labour with His especial favour and blessing! And because He does not send down fire from Heaven to destroy the oppressor—the slaveholder—that therefore He blesses slavery! God blesses the labour of all, both freemen and slaves, in contemplation of His having benevolently given to the cultivator of the soil, the production of the sweat of his face. God changes not; it is man who perverts and misuses His blessings. 'When the earth is planted and tilled, and the fruits brought forth are applied to support unrighteous purposes; here the gracious design of infinite goodness in these his gifts being perverted, the earth is defiled, and the complaint formerly uttered becomes applicable, 'Thou hast made me to serve with thysins, thou hast wearied me with thine iniquities.'—Woolman.

"We assert for man an ownership in the production of his own toil, unless alienated by his direct or implied consent; the exception being an affirmation of the doctrine. The freeman cannot raise his arm to do an act of labour but that he feels the truth of this ownership. The Christian cannot read the history of man's fall and the accompanying promise, without perceiving that in the sentence which connected labour with his condition,—'in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread,'—the fruit of it was given to him. Thus both natural and revealed law accord to man the produce of his labour. It is true, that man in society parts with some of his rights that others may be the better secured; and thus is the primitive law rightfully modified by parties to the social compact, and is so modified in the matter of labour: though the justice of natural law is often affirmed in the granting of specific liens on workmanship performed. But shall the slave's right be mystified by the plea of having surrendered some of his rights that others may be assured to him? Who is he? An outlaw! What is he in contemplation of the social law? A chattel! What are his rights in that relation? He has none—not even the right to complain of being treated as the beasts that perish! He has no lot in the social arrangement. The fruits, then, of the sweat of his brow belong to him, and he that takes them from him commits a robbery; not the less true or monstrous because sanctified by law. What, in this view of the case, are the rights of the slaveholder to the produce of the slave's labour? Can he create ownership to it by selling it to us? Can we honestly buy it?"

REVOLUTION IN FRANCE.—Our readers will not expect the Non-Slaverholder to furnish details of the remarkable events which have recently occurred in France and other parts of Europe. It will, however, be proper that we should note some of the results which flow from these overturnings.

An article which we have copied from the London Anti-Slavery Reporter, announces the highly important and cheering fact, that one of the first measures proposed to be adopted by the new government in France, is freedom to more than two hundred thousand slaves in her colonies. One of the deputation who presented to the French Provisional Government, the Address headed, "Peace with France," which will be found in our pages this month, having expressed a wish for the complete abolition of slavery, Lamartine replied:—"We should have considered that we conquered a selfish and guilty liberty for ourselves, had we monopolized its blessings. We accordingly hastened to proclaim the freedom of all our brethren, and we congratulate ourselves on being, in that respect, in accord with the noble sentiments of England, which has so long emancipated the black race in her colonies. The moment the National Assembly shall meet, it will proclaim the principles we ourselves proclaimed the day after our glorious Revolution. One question only remains to be decided, which is, the indemnity to be paid to the colonists."

We are further informed by one of the members of the deputation, that Arago, the Minister of Marine, gave them an equally unequivocal assurance that slavery would be completely and at once abolished in the French Colonies.

The address to which we have alluded, sufficiently explains its origin and object. It was presented to the Provisional Government by George W. Alexander and Edward Miall, of London; Joseph Sturge, of Birmingham; B. Bradshaw, of Manchester, and Robert Norris, of Bristol. The evidence it contains of a friendly and brotherly feeling on the part of the British people towards their neighbours, whom they had long regarded as "natural enemies," gives promise of the preservation of peaceful relations between the two countries.

The London Nonconformist publishes the following extract of a letter from a highly respectable Wesleyan Minister, as testimony to the moderation of the French people.

"During the three days I was about, constantly mixing with the people in all their moods, and marked all their deeds; but not from the roughest or the drunkest (and I saw more drunken men those three days than all the time I have been in France,) did I receive a word or a look, but what was polite, and even kind.

* * * The speed with which order was re-established, and the firmness with which it has been maintained, have been unspeakably creditable to the authorities. Their measures generally have borne, to my judgment, a stamp of remarkable aptitude, and generally breathe a spirit of elevated intention. Whatever be the issues of their experiment, they have, by their conduct in the crisis, deserved well of France and of all lovers of freedom, as also of all friends to peace and order.

The only part of their course on which I look with apprehension, is that respecting the 'operatives,'—as they are called, I fear they are taking steps which, if not made abortive by their own feebleness and precocity, will tend to deprive the working classes of self-reliance and the will to toil. And the country whose working classes fail on those points must waste away, and either live emaciated, or die of decay.

As to religion, I see no ground to regard the change in any aspect but that of hope. Whether or not the State will dissociate itself wholly from churches, as is generally expected, there can be little doubt that a more complete liberty than has been hitherto allowed, will prevail, and that everything necessary to complete the opening for the gospel will be afforded. Your Baptist brethren, I rejoice to think, will have no more legal persecutions."

Since the above was written, we have received the London Anti-Slavery Reporter, which contains the following important intelligence:

"No man, whatever may be his political opinions, can regard the marvellous events which are taking place on the Continent of Europe, with other feelings than those of the profoundest interest; and no philanthropist certainly can observe them without the most ardent wishes that their issues may advance the true liberties, the happiness, and the civilization of their fellow-men. Amidst the labours and excitements consequent on the great revolution which has just been accomplished in France, we are delighted to find that one of the earliest acts of the Provisional Government was to decree the abolition of slavery in all the French Colonies and Dependencies abroad. This was nobly done; and we trust will be peacefully realized. The decree which terminates this brutal and impious system, and which is soon to have the force of law, is as follows:—

"FRENCH REPUBLIC.

"Liberty, Equality, Fraternity.

"The Provisional Government of the Republic, considering that no French land can any longer bear slaves,

"Decrees.—A Commission is appointed at the Provisional Ministry of the Marine and Colonies, to prepare, as quickly as possible, the act of immediate emancipation in all the colonies of the Republic.

"The Minister of Marine will provide for the execution of the present decree.

"Paris, March 4th, 1848. F. ARAGO."

"The Provisional Minister of the Marine and Colonies decrees,

"The Committee, instituted by the decree of the Provisional Government, to prepare the Act for the Emancipation of the Slaves in the Colonies of the Republic, shall be composed of the citizens

Victor Schoelcher, President.

Mestro, Director of the Colonies.

Perrinon, Mayor of the Marine Artillery.

Galine, Advocate for the Council.

Gaumont, Operative Clock Maker.

Citizen Walker and Citizen Percin, Secretaries to Commission.

"Paris, March 4th, 1848. F. ARAGO."

"The agent of the Government was despatched to the colonies by the second mail in March, we may therefore soon expect intelligence of his arrival in them, and of the reception he has met with from the planters. For their sakes we earnestly hope, that they will throw no difficulties in the way of this functionary, but aid him in the great object of his mission. They have now the opportunity, by the generous exercise of their power, to attach the negroes to themselves, and of showing their respect for their mother country.

"The coloured population resident in Paris, of whom there are a considerable number, have waited by deputation on the Provisional Government to express their gratitude for the great measure of emancipation. They were well received by M. Cremieux, who, in an eloquent address, said: 'The new Republic will accomplish what the Republic in 1792 proclaimed. You shall again become free. There shall no longer be a slave on the soil of liberty. In our colonies, as well as in continental France, every man who inhabits the land shall be free.' These declarations were received with loud acclamations."

ST. DOMINGO OR HAYTI.—The "horrors of St. Domingo," have been so long and so frequently attributed to an attempt on the part of the slaves to obtain their liberty, that the error has become generally credited. A correct history of the transactions which resulted in the independence of that Island, has recently appeared in the National Era. We copy a part in this number, and intend to give the remaining portion next month, recommending the whole to the careful attention of our readers.

SELECTIONS.

From the National Era.

ST. DOMINGO.

THE MISREPRESENTATION.

April 3d, 1848, Mr. Bayly, of Virginia, in the House of Representatives, in replying to Mr. Giddings, said:

"But he would give the professed philanthropist from Ohio one instance—a horrible instance it was—where this process of universal emancipation was done at a blow, with a single dash of the pen; it was the well-known case of St. Domingo. Then the thing had been effected by the busy intermeddling of visionary fanatics, just as it was now sought to be done by the gentleman from Ohio and his associates. There was then a band of fanatics in London, who met in the old Jewry, and who passed resolutions very similar to the amendment which it was now sought to foist on the pending resolution.

"It was then proposed to aid these negroes with men and money in a struggle for their freedom; and similar resolutions were at the same time adopted in France by an association similar to that to which the gentleman and his abolition friends belonged among us. These fanatical visionaries set the revolt of the blacks in St. Domingo in motion; their machinations succeeded in exciting a servile insurrection, in the course of which every white man and woman and child in the island was massacred, with the exception of a small remnant, who fled to the shipping in the harbor, and barely escaped with their lives. Whole hecatombs of dead bodies were piled up in the streets, amid burning, murder, and pillage. Nay, so great was the fury of the blacks, that their rage and revenge could not glut themselves with the butchery of every white person, (and they found no difficulty in drawing that line of distinction which the gentleman thought so great a mystery; it was no problem to the negroes;) but they then turned upon the mulattoes, and exterminated them. They seemed to hate every human creature that had white blood in his veins with a bitterness that had no parallel, unless in the breast of the member from Ohio."

Mr. Bayly, just before making these statements, remarked that the "House knew very well that he was not in the habit of speaking of what he had not looked into, or of making assertions without knowing on what they were founded." We shall soon demonstrate to the satisfaction of every reader, we care not what his prepossessions, that, in regard to St. Domingo, Mr. Bayly has made assertions which he cannot prove, and spoken on a subject without knowing any thing about it, if we may judge by the extract above quoted.

His loose declamation, we presume, was stimulated by an editorial in the National Intelligencer, which appeared on the morning of the day when the speech was made, betraying a similar misunderstanding of the subject referred to:

"Les Amis des Noirs," says the Intelligencer, "having, in the old Revolution, just as they have done now, procured the passage of a decree to the same effect as that to which we have referred, the Government of the principal colony (St. Domingo) knowing that the decree was one of desolation and death to them and theirs, made by persons who either knew not or were reckless of what they were doing, hesitated to carry it into effect. Impatient of the delay, Les Noirs took the execution of it into their own hands."

The assertion is here made that a decree for the immediate abolition of Slavery in the French Colonies was procured by "Les Amis des Noirs," and that from this sprung the horrors of St. Domingo. It is utterly groundless, as we shall presently show.

One word in regard to the "Amis des Noirs"—"fanatical visionaries," "an association similar to that to which the gentleman from Ohio and his abolition friends belong among us," says Mr. Bayly. The leader of this abolition association, of these "fanatical visionaries," whose "machinations succeeded in exciting a servile insurrection," was LA FAYETTE, the friend and ally of America, whose full length portrait, in the Hall of the House, was looking down on the man who ventured to stigmatize him as a fanatic. La Fayette, Condorcet, Brissot, and the Abbé Grégoire, were the controlling spirits of "Les Amis des Noirs." This is a matter of history, into which, we presume, the gentleman from Virginia had never looked.

PRELIMINARY.

We now ask the attention of our readers, especially the Southern portion of them, while we present a record of well authenticated facts in relation to the "horrors of St. Domingo." We have carefully examined standard authorities upon the subject, and if Mr. Bayly or the Intelligencer choose to question our statements, there is not a member of Congress who may not verify them by consulting the several volumes treating of St. Domingo, in the Library of Congress. It is a shame that the American People should permit their minds to be abused by the inconsiderate, reckless assertions of men, either too prejudiced or too careless to examine, before they presume to assert.

The population of St. Domingo in 1789 was estimated as follows:

In the French section.

Whites	-	-	-	30,826
Free coloured	-	-	-	27,548
Slaves	-	-	-	465,429
Total				523,803

In the Spanish section.

Free people of all colours	122,640
Slaves	30,000
Total	152,640
Grand total	643,000

Never was there a more heterogeneous and inflammable population. The whites were divided into three classes—the creole planters or large proprietors, constituting the native aristocracy; the European residents, composing the office holders, adventurers, speculators; and the petite blancs, the poorer whites, tradesmen, mechanics. Each of these classes hated the others. The aristocratic planter was jealous of the monopoly of office in the hands of the European, and regarded with profound contempt the lower order of whites who in their turn looked up with sullen envy at the ostentatious display of the planters.

These classes had but one feeling in common; and that was a most implacable abhorrence of the mulattoes or free coloured people, who, it is stated, owned one-third of the real estate and one-fourth of the personal property of the island. Notwithstanding this they were considered as public property; compelled to do any kind of service without compensation; degraded and insulted in every possible way, short of absolute enslavement.

The slaves, or negroes, were most brutally treated in the French part of the island. This is the testimony of all who have written upon the subject. Large masses of them consisted of Africans recently imported, who still retained the heathenish superstitions and usages of their mother country.

It is obvious that whatever temporary prosperity in a pecuniary sense such a colony might enjoy, it was doomed to ruinous convulsions. The state of society was unnatural, abhorrent, repugnant to every principle of humanity, morals, and, we may add, political economy. Any violent change in the mother country would be certain to array in fierce conflict elements so fearfully discordant.

We shall prove,

1st. That Emancipation was not in any sense the cause of the troubles and insurrections in St. Domingo.

2dly. That the history of that doomed colony furnishes conclusive evidence in proof of the entire safety of Immediate Emancipation, as it is called.

THE BEGINNING OF TROUBLES.

The beginning of troubles may be dated in the year 1788. December 27th of that year, the States-General of France passed a resolution to admit to that body a number of the "Tiers Etat," equal to that of the other two orders. When the news reached St. Domingo, the white colonists immediately resolved to assert their right to be represented, and commissioned eighteen delegates, six of whom, after much discussion by the States-General, were recognized. About this time the Society of Les Amis des Noirs was organized. Next arose in Paris a secret association of the planters, called the Massiac Club, with branches in the colonies; instituted ostensibly to support the revolution, but really to sustain this movement, so far as it might strengthen them against the colonial authorities who were supposed to favour the rights of the free people of colour.

Every blow struck for liberty in France electrified the colonies. When the fall of the Bastille was announced in St. Domingo, the colonists became wrought up with intense excitement.—"Liberty and Fraternity" sounded from the lips of all classes. All were seized with the fever of imitation; and whatever France did was regarded as a pattern for her dependencies. Just at this time a rumor was started of a servile insurrection; and a large force was marched to the locality designated as its seat, but every thing there was tranquil. The rumor was groundless; still the preparations made against this imaginary horror, it is thought, suggested to the slaves possibilities never dreamed of before.

THE REAL STRUGGLE.

Meantime, in the general discussion of the subject of human rights, the mulattoes, or free people of colour, began to take a deep interest. Many of their number were at Paris, receiving an education, and their correspondence with relatives at home stimulated them to the demand of rights, which the French Revolutionists could with no consistency deny.

October 22d, 1789, the wealthy mulattoes despatched a deputation to Paris to urge their claims to representation in the Colonial Assembly. They presented 6,000,000 livres to the Government, and pledged one-fifth of their property to aid in the liquidation of the national debt. The deputation received great encouragement. Lafayette and his associates deeply sympathized with them. The President of the National Assembly said, that no part of the nation ever reclaimed in vain its rights from the Assembly of the representatives of the French People. M. Charles de Lameth declared that, although he was one of the largest proprietors in the colony, he was in favour of the admission of the mixed races to a share in the legislative power.

Encouraged by these indications, the free people of color in the colony began to press their claims on the attention of the authorities; but they were at once met by the most unrelenting opposition from all classes of the whites. Lacombe, a mulatto, was hung at Cape Francois for having merely signed a petition on the subject. M. Ferrand de Baudiere, a magistrate at Petit Goave, a venerable old man who had drawn up a petition of a similar kind for the mulattoes, was dragged from his home and brutally murdered. The petits blancs signalized themselves above all others by their outrages against these unfortunate people, who, thus far, had distinguished themselves for their forbearance.

January, 1790, the Assembly of the colony convened, consisting of some two hundred and thirty members, who were implacable against the mulattoes, and disposed to assume for themselves independent legislative powers.

Lafayette and his friends were meanwhile urging the claims of the free people of colour, and had the satisfaction of procuring the passage of a decree by the National Assembly, dated March 8th, 1790, that "every person of twenty-five years of age, the proprietor of real estate, or, in fault of that, who had been a resident of the place for two years, and paid taxes for the support of the colony, should be entitled to vote for members of the Colonial Assembly."

Let it be observed that the contest concerned not the natural rights of the slaves, whom nobody proposed to emancipate, but the political rights of the free coloured people. Although the decree did not, in specific terms, extend the right of suffrage to this class, it was clearly understood that by the omission of any qualifying prefix to the word "persons," its rights were secured.

The promulgation of the act kindled a flame in the colony. The whites execrated the National Assembly. The Colonial Assembly passed a resolve that it would prefer death rather than share political rights with "a degenerate and bastard race." The populace went so far as to threaten death to the French residents in the colony. This Assembly was dissolved. A new election was held; the mulattoes were excluded by force from the suffrage to which they were entitled; the same unrelenting enemies of their class were returned; and one of the first acts of the new Assembly was, to assert its right to originate all legislation, and overcome the Governor-General's veto by a majority of two-thirds. This functionary, finding his prerogative encroached upon, endeavoured to strengthen himself by secretly encouraging the coloured party.

Ere this, however, intelligence of the disturbed state of the colonies, and of apprehended violence in Martinique, having been received by the Home Government, the National Assembly passed a decree explaining away that of March 8th, so far as it conferred political rights on the free people of colour, and, in effect, licensing the slave trade—an act of tergiversation which aroused the indignation of Lafayette and Les Amis des Noirs.

Bitter feuds continued to prevail in the colony until the principal provinces were arrayed against each other, and open war broke out between the Governor General and the Colonial Assembly. In the struggle, the free people of colour were invoked by the former, and he made such head against the Assembly that the whole body, driven to desperation, resolved to embark for France, and lay its grievances before the National Assembly. Meanwhile the mulattoes continued to be the subjects of the grossest outrages and insults, and began to lose their patience.

Vincent, or James Ogé, an educated mulatto, in Paris, who had for a long time been labouring for the reclamation of the rights of his class, disgusted at the explanatory decree of the National Assembly, out of heart, irritated and desperate, abandoned Paris, and on the 2d October, 1790, landed at Cape Francois, where, without much deliberation, he put himself at the head of two hundred of his friends, resolved to compel concessions. He demanded of the Governor General that the decree of March 8th be carried into effect; expressly excluding from his demand the negroes or slaves. With them he would have nothing to do. No rights but those of the mulattoes were in question. The response to this demand was a force of six hundred men sent out to punish him. These were routed. Another force, twelve hundred strong, with artillery, was more successful. Ogé's band was scattered; he and his fellow-chief, Baptiste Chavanne, took refuge in the Spanish part of the island, whence they were reclaimed. They were tried secretly. The whole mulatto population was deeply excited. At last, after two months' confinement, they were sentenced; led, bareheaded, en chemise, into the public square, with ropes round their necks, and then placed upon the wheel, where, with faces upturned to heaven, and their thighs, legs, and arms broken, they died a horrible, lingering death. This took place on the 9th of March, 1791. It was never forgotten; it filled the hearts of the free coloured population with undying hate.

Similar efforts were made by them in the Southern and Western provinces, but they were peacefully put down by the Governor General and his adviser, Colonel Mauduit. But for this they received no credit. The planters suspected them of having made secret promises to the mulattoes, to be fulfilled at a more convenient season.

September 16th, 1790, the Assembly of St. Mark's arrived at Brest, and soon made known their complaints. But the decision of the National Assembly was against them. It passed a decree extinguishing all the legislative powers of the Colonial Assembly, prohibiting its members from being elected thereafter, sustaining the Governor General, and the king was besought to issue commands for a new election, conformably to both the decrees of the 8th and the 28th of March—decrees, by the way, clearly contradictory. The consequences of this unwise, vacillating, inconsistent legislation by the National Assembly were most ruinous. This decree was dated October 12th, 1790.

Nothing could exceed the consternation of the great planters. They looked with dismay upon the elevation of the petits blancs; and both were fired with deadly animosity against the mulattoes. The authorities were overwhelmed. Col. Mauduit was horribly murdered; Blanchelande, the Governor General, was compelled to fly from Port-au-Prince, and the colonists there usurped independent powers. Cape Francois, actuated by rivalry with Port-au-Prince, received the Governor General with open arms; but everywhere else the wildest anarchy prevailed.

"Amid all the varying animosities of party warfare," says Brown, in his History of St. Domingo, "on one subject the unanimity was perfect. This was the doggedness of creole prejudice when the question was brought up to establish the political rights of the mulattoes." Up to this moment, despite all the measures of the Home Government, these people had been excluded from their rights. The Constituent Assembly at Paris, to obviate all doubt, and settle the question, decided (May 15th, 1791,) that "all people of color residing in the French colonies, and born of free parents, were entitled to the same privileges as French citizens, and, among others, to the right of voting at elections, and to seats in the Provincial and Colonial Assemblies." The violence of the colonists now overleaped all bounds. The Constituent Assembly was execrated; France was abjured; every French resident was menaced; the parties swore to resist force by force. The Governor General, in consternation, ventured to announce that he would suspend the operation of the decree until he could receive the reply to a remonstrance he had just addressed to the Minister of Marine.

All this time the free people of colour were quiet, carefully abstaining from violence, relying upon the energy and good faith of the Home Government. An influential member of their class wrote to a friend in Paris: "The punishment of Oge has only served to make us more than ever resolved to conquer, or perish in the struggle which is to decide whether we shall enjoy the rights offered to us by the restorers of French Liberty. We have never been guilty of murdering any one, or of intending any one's death; yet our own blood has been poured out like water. We could retaliate, but we refrain. The idea that the negroes might take advantage of such hostilities to desolate this beautiful country is enough to make us renounce the thought."

House of Lords.—Feb. 7.

STATE OF THE WEST INDIES.

Lord Stanley opened the debate.—In 1841 the House of Commons came to the decision not to admit sugar the growth of slave-labour; a general election ensued, and the vote was confirmed by the great majority of the country. Hopes of present support and future protection thus encouraged, they relied upon Parliament to maintain their interests against unjust competition, while they boldly buckled on their armour to compete on nearly equal terms with our own rival colonists. In 1844 and in 1845, when the subject was under deliberation, the principle was laid down on all sides in Parliament that the slave-grown sugar should be for ever so far prohibited as to prevent its interference with the ordinary and regular supply from those countries where free-labour only was employed. It was under these circumstances the faith of Parliament was pledged, and these efforts made; yet, after all this, by a sudden and rapid change in your policy in 1846, not only was slave-labour introduced and brought into competition with British labour, but was introduced without that discriminating duty which, in 1840, the same ministers deemed to be indispensable to the protection of our colonies,—without that duty of 12s. which, a few years before, was thought the very minimum which could safely be resorted to,—with a duty of only 7s., that 7s. duty being, year by year, reduced, and so far reduced in the course of six years, that our colonies were put eventually on precisely the same footing as Cuba and Brazil, although we, from motives of humanity, and at the dictates of religion, prohibited to our own countrymen that species of labour by the means of which alone they could carry on a fair competition. Under these circumstances, then, I say, the act of 1846 was a bounty on, and a bonus to, slave-labour. With a degree of infatuation which appears to me to be monstrous, you waste the lives of your subjects, the wealth of the country, and the energies of your seamen, on the pestilential coast of Africa, in an attempt which you confess yourselves to be hopeless, and not only hopeless, but so utterly unsuccessful as to tend rather to increase than diminish the evil you are seeking to put down—and you go to all this expenditure of life and money for the purpose of eradicating on the coast of Africa, that very trade which, in Cuba and Brazil, you are doing all in your power commercially to foster. The noble lord, after briefly recapitulating some of the main points of his speech, proceeded to say, that upon the whole question his opinion was firm and decided, and that, do what they would, apply what palliatives they might, it was impossible—that, in the present state of the West Indies, in the present state of our colonies in every part of the world, it was impossible that the proprietors could, on equal terms, compete with slave-grown produce. There was now a larger stock of sugar on hand than had ever been known—a stock equal in amount to all the slave-grown produce that had ever been imported. The competition of the slave-grown sugar had supplanted and thrown out of the market the produce of our own colonies to the extent of 36,000 tons, while the houses connected with the trade had been ruined. If they persevered in that course they would find, when by the encouragement they had given to Cuba and the Brazils, they had transferred slavery from their own possessions to those of other countries; when, with all their vaunted notions of humanity and love of freedom, they were lured by the temptation of a reduction of one penny a pound on the price of sugar,—and a "penny wise and a pound foolish" act it was;—when they found, that after all their inconsistency, folly, and crime, they had really encouraged slavery,—and, in God's name, if that was their intention, why not withdraw the squadron from the African coast?—when they had done all this, they would discover that the result was not even the miserable boon of cheap sugar, so eagerly sought, and that they had not only failed in stopping slavery and the slave-trade, but had effected the ruin and destruction of our colonies.

The Bishop of Oxford said—

I hold in my hand a petition, the prayer of which is nearly the same as that of others which have been laid on your lordships' table. It is a petition from the Council and Assembly of the island of Barbadoes, complaining of the same disasters, and pointing to the same cure as the others I have referred to. Important as I have felt this petition to be, on account of the source whence it comes, I should have begged the parties who committed it to me, to commit it rather to some other person, if I felt that this question could properly be considered a mere fiscal question. I should be glad to leave that subject to be discussed by the lay lords I see around me. But I think this question is drawn up into a much higher region, and must be judged on higher principles than a mere fiscal question. This is at once my excuse for addressing you on the subject, and the reason why, not viewing with the same dread as others do the principle of abolishing protection generally, I think, in this instance, protection ought not to be abolished. There are circumstances in which the warmest advocates of free-trade would at once allow that the principle ought not to be applied. The man would be thought insane who should claim a liberty to introduce infective bales of goods to spread death and desolation around, on the principle of establishing an open market; and he would be thought almost equally mad who should deny the legality of a national blockade for the same reason, or who should say that a nation ought to allow its subjects to give pirates firearms in exchange for food, because firearms were dear, and nowhere else could goods be got as cheaply. Any man would be held insane who would speak of this as a free-trade argument. What has been the argument of the noble earl? This—that the depreciation of the produce of the West Indies is the result, not of the competition of slave produce of Cuba and Brazil, but the general depreciation of all mercantile affairs. But the noble lord did not answer, because I believe it was unanswerable, the argument of the noble lord (Stanley,) that if the general depreciation of mercantile affairs sank the price of West Indian sugar, how is it that the price of Cuban and Brazilian sugar has risen during the same time? This argument is, I think, unanswerable. The produce of Cuba is just as much exposed to the general depreciating causes which the noble lord says have operated against West Indian produce; but the fact is, the sugar of the West Indies is now, for the first time, brought into ruinous competition with sugar that can be produced more cheaply. What was the only other argument used by the noble lord? He told us, that just as the protective duties sank the price of labour sank, and that therefore the West Indian proprietors, no longer obliged to give extortionate wages, could produce sugar with gain to themselves. What did the argument go to prove? Nothing more than this—that it is necessary the West Indian proprietor should never know anything like prosperity; that he should always be kept on the verge of ruin in order to make his plans work well. We do not deny the difficulty the planters have to contend with in dealing with men who are every year more aware of their value in the labour market. A prompt command of labour is an absolute necessity in the tropics. Every one knew the importance of a full command of agricultural labour at certain times of the year in England; among the vegetation of the tropics that necessity is increased tenfold. He then went to show that by the Act of Emancipation a pledge was given that free labour should be encouraged and supported. That pledge was not a mere question of how far you were bound by acts and treaties; it was a pledge founded on the labours and sacrifices of all the great men of successive ages—the cautious preparations of Pitt, the zealous exertions of Fox, the labours of those who devoted their whole lives, not to building themselves a great name or vast fortune, but to wiping away a stain from England—to giving a pledge that she as a nation would never more have anything to do with the accursed slave-trade. This is a bond stronger than a parchment deed, an engagement more binding than the promise of any minister. I say you are now sinning against these great men; let the argument be drawn out as finely as you will, you are, in plain English, sharing a future profit with the planters of Cuba. The noble earl tells us it is in vain to exclude slave-grown sugar—that we shall but drive it to the continent; and it comes to the same thing whether the 150,000 tons are sold there or in England. All the same, my lords? Is it the same thing whether I buy stolen goods or know that another man does it? Is it the same thing whether I keep my hands clean of such an enormity, or commit it because if I do not another man will? Surely this is an argument we ought not, as a nation, to tolerate; it does not agree with that high tone which broke out in many parts of the noble earl's speech. It seems to me an argument the people of this country will not endure to have urged upon them: I answer it by saying, even if the evil be done we must not be the doers of it. Let us remember what the noble lord stated at the close of his speech, and it may be a prophetic truth, that if we first ruin the sugar growth of our West Indian islands, we shall give over to the planters of Cuba and Brazil, not only the supply of our own market, but of all the markets of the world. It is a peculiar attribute of slave produced sugar that it is easily cheapened suddenly, and for a time, by an increase in the importation of slaves. The planter has only to give an order to the slave dealer on the African coast, a large number of full grown negroes are imported, a great quantity of virgin soil is broken up, the market is filled with slave sugar to the ruin of the competitor, according to a well known plan of trade. Men say they are prepared to undersell a rival for a few months, drive him out of the market, then raise their prices and pay themselves abundantly. This is what we shall do by putting it in the power of the importer of slaves to ruin our own slower and safer production. Remember another point bearing closely on this subject. The noble earl has told us it was an old abolition argument, that free is cheaper than slave labour, and that it was altogether inconsistent in us to urge for an instant the supposition that the West Indies could not compete with Cuba because it is supplied with slave labour. This is entirely a misstatement, though an unintentional misstatement, on the part of the noble earl. It was not an abolition argument that free is cheaper than slave labour, but an emancipation argument. It was always admitted that it was cheaper to import slaves full grown, without the expense of their youth or age, and work them to death in the sugar plantations, supplying their places with others. The argument was first used by (we understood) Mr. Croker, of Liverpool; he said, as the slave-trade was abolished it would be cheaper to prepare the slaves for freedom by working them as a black peasantry. I believe free labour is cheaper than slave labour. I believe that Providence has so ordained things that what is wrong cannot be really profitable. But what is the measure of profit? It is the greatest amount of money got in the shortest given time by the least given quantity of labour. If that is the true value of profit, we ought not to hold up as crimes the acts of the pirate and robber who by piracy and robbery makes himself suddenly rich. But in the long run God sets his hand against wrongdoing; not by such a suspension of ordinary laws as would make six hours of a freeman produce as much as eighteen of the tasked slave; but by filling the heart with such terrors as those felt by the rich Cuba planter, who trembles, knowing that his wealth to-day may be lost in an outbreak of his slaves to-morrow, by breaking down all the fabric of morality, peace, and happiness, which alone makes life dear and wealth worth having. These are the ways in which God testifies at last against the infraction of such laws as this. The question returned simply to this—shall we, as the English nation, after so many sacrifices to abolish the slave-trade, for the sake of one penny in the price of a pound of sugar, content ourselves to share the profit of the Cuba planter? Let the house and the country remember, that great as were the abominations of the slave-trade, they are now still greater. If the blockade does nothing else, at least it does this, it aggravates a thousandfold the sufferings of these wretched victims of man's cupidity. You have attempted with your war vessels to close the ports of Africa, and in thus rendering exportation more dangerous and hazardous you have made it the interest of the exporter to cram his victims still closer than before in those ships which are now constructed with the one regard to speed, and in this way you but increase the agonies and add to the deaths of those whom you strive to save and to preserve. And when they reach Cuba, how, again, do they fare? I am ready to admit that there is no code of slave-laws in the known world which contains, on paper and parchment, so many securities for the life and protection of the slave as the code of Cuba; but in such a state of society as is there presented, that code is a dead letter, and an unobserved document merely. There is no safety, no law for the slave, and I believe there never was a country where the sufferings of the slaves were greater than they are at this moment in Cuba and in the Brazils. Every horrible feature which has been marked in the history of the enormities of the field slave system of the olden time, is found to be exaggerated fourfold in the unhappy land of which I speak. Things which were never known, never heard of, in the worst days of slavery in our own West Indian colonies, are there taking place unconcealed in the face of day. The professed importation of the one sex alone, the evident intention to work them, and not to reproduce them, the invariable use of the lash to compel to labour, and the presence of bloodhounds in the plantation by the side of the miserable driver—these things are evidences of the horrors of the system. As one of these drivers said, when the question was put to him, "Do you think I could trust my life in the field if I had nothing more than this lash to defend myself? I must have these brute animals for guardians, and I must have these weapons in my belt, and by these only could I compel the code under which my victims are to live." And this, observe my lords, is the system which, as I contend, you are called upon to support and perpetuate. Most truly do I, in my conscience, believe that if these truths, in all their revolting aspect, were made manifest—if the English people would but recognize these facts, and see that it is not a question of protection, one way or the other, but whether or not they shall have sugar cheaper by the sufferings of these slaves of Cuba, the settlement of this discussion would be certain and immediate. Let the principle be comprehended, and the mind of the people will insist upon morality and honour; they will dash at once from their lips the chalice you offer them, tinged, as it is, with the blood of fellow-creatures sacrificed to economy. I am convinced that the people have been misled, and that they are ignorant of the inevitable truth, that if they violate their most sacred duties and the holiest feelings, and become abettors in the guilt of others, they will be condemned in some way or other, to be partakers in the punishment; for, as the noble lord has eloquently remarked, it is impossible that any nation can continue long to set at defiance the plainest laws of God without some corresponding suffering accruing to the sinners. You cannot share the Cuba profit without incurring your share of the Cuba guilt; and you cannot incur the Cuba guilt without having recorded against you the Cuba chastisement. Let, then, this question, in all its forcible simplicity, be stated in England, and I doubt not of the result. It may be a little sooner or a little later; but I hope, as ruin to the West Indians is impending, and we may shortly be called upon to abandon ourselves to new treaties with other states, the present moment will be made available to our purpose. I have ventured to press this matter upon your lordships once again, because I feel that it is a question of the deepest national prosperity. I have endeavoured to state the argument fairly, and I cannot believe, if the subject be but viewed in a clear light, that after all our anti-slavery labours we will now consent thus palpably to frustrate our own designs, and contradict our own principles. I, for one at least, do declare, if we barefacedly admit this produce of slave labour, on the single ground that sugar will be one penny per pound dearer if we do not admit it,—that it is, in point of fact, to make our abolition struggle a deep and indelible disgrace to this country, to convert our cordon of ships on the coast of Africa into a glaring piece of hypocrisy, and to render our treaties with neighbouring states an insulting and degrading mockery.

THE AFRICAN SLAVE-TRADE.

The question of the African slave-trade is again, we are happy to say, attracting public attention. Recent facts show clearly that it is on the increase; and that instead of an abatement, there appears to be an augmentation of its horrors. The increase in this horrible traffic is to be attributed to the Sugar Act of 1846, which permits the slave-grown sugar of Cuba and Brazil to enter the British markets for home consumption.

In reference to Brazil, no one will be found hardy enough to contest the fact, that since the passage of that fatal measure, a vast impulse has been given to the slave-trade, and a corresponding extension to slavery. Sugar cultivation in that country is now all the rage, new plantations are being laid down, and new capital is freely invested in the blood and sinews of the African. It may be affirmed, on good authority, that the number of slaves imported into the Brazilian empire in 1846, was between 50,000 and 60,000; and in 1847, upwards of 70,000. In fact, from the impunity which is enjoyed, and the vast profits realized in slave-dealing transactions, it is no longer a question in Brazil, whether the supply will be equal to the demand.

By those who are unwilling to give up the idea that it may be destroyed by force, we are constantly told that the number of captures increases every year, and that they never were so numerous as at present. But, in our opinion, this only proves the fact of the increased activity of the slave-trade. Those who reside on the Western coast of Africa, or who are engaged in its suppression, tell us that for every slaver captured, from seven to eight escape, and that the united action of the three fleets of France, England, and the United States, is powerless to put it down. A few captures have been made by the United States squadron, but it has led to no useful result. The skill with which the enterprises are planned, the secrecy with which they are conducted, and the daring energy with which they are executed, are more than a match for the activity of the cruisers. The last accounts we have seen of the French squadron, state that it has captured about a dozen slavers, but on their being brought for trial before the French Courts, every one of them escaped condemnation. Our own squadron has been more successful, because it has had a wider field of action, and greater power under treaties, but the great bulk of the slavers captured have been under the equipment article, without slaves.

To show the vast benefits which Cuba has derived from the Sugar Act of 1846, we give the following facts, from Drake, Brothers & Co.'s Havana Price Current of the 8th January last, from which it appears that the exports of sugar from that island in 1845, was only 135,407 boxes of four cwt. each, whereas in 1846 it amounted to 353,185 boxes, and in 1847 to 415,405 boxes. In making this statement, Drake, Brothers & Co. observe, "The production of 1847 has far exceeded that of any previous year, and the prices obtained by the planters have been so HIGHLY REMUNERATIVE, that they are enabled to adopt every means for the further extension of their crops." In a subsequent price current, dated Havana, the 23d of January, we learn, that "During the past year, the prices of sugar in our markets were supported at high rates, with but slight and temporary fluctuations, notwithstanding the large crop. This was mainly owing to unprecedentedly heavy shipments to the United States and Great Britain, aided by a well-sustained enquiry for Spain, with a fair demand for other parts. The shipments for British ports comprised 167,000 boxes from hence and Matanzas, with an addition of some importance from other parts of the island. The bulk of the exports went forward in the early part of the season, when there was not only the stimulus created by the admission of our sugars for English consumption, but also a general expectation that a large quantity would be required for the use of breweries and distilleries." Thus we perceive that, notwithstanding the unusual supply of sugar imported from all parts of the world, into this country last year, which reduced its price so low, that the British growers of the East and West Indies suffered frightful losses thereby, it was nevertheless sufficiently good as to be "highly remunerative" to the Cuban planters, and to afford them the means of extending their cultivation.

The quantity of sugar imported into Great Britain during the year 1847, from British India, Mauritius, and the West Indies, was about 280,000 tons—the whole quantity consumed was 290,000 tons; of this latter quantity, about 50,000 was foreign. This year the quantity of British sugar imported will be probably one-third less, which will afford Cuba and Brazil still farther scope for their produce, and give additional stimulus to the slave-trade. The following year, unless some marvellous change takes place, which we do not expect, the quantity imported from British possessions will not be one-half the quantity sent home in 1847. We confess we cannot contemplate so frightful a result, with the ever growing demand for sugar in this country, and the extension that will be given to its use in breweries and distilleries, without feelings of the greatest distress. Alas for Africa, when political economy is armed against the liberty of her children, and the insatiable spirit of commerce is fed with the bitter tears and the life's blood of crushed humanity!—*A. #### DIFFICULTIES.

Milton tells us that he dared be known to think the poet Spencer "a better teacher than Scotus or Aquinas;" and it is true that the poets, while they present to us "truth severe in fairy fiction dressed," often give us more impressive lessons with regard to the duties of life, than the professed teacher does. An incident in Tasso shows us in the most striking manner, how to deal with difficulties. We give the passage in Hoole's version, a friend having borrowed our Fairfax. When Alcasto offered to enter the Enchanted Forest—

"To oppose
His further way, a mass of flame arose;
Wider each moment it expands, and higher,
And seems one lofty wall of solid fire,
Which round the wood a wondrous bulwark stands,
To guard its treasures from intrusive hands.
Part high above the rest aspiring grew,
And seemed a towering castle to the view.
The ramparts of this new-made hell to guard,
Vast stores of warlike engines were prepared;
And oh! in what dire crowds the infernal brood
To guard the castellated barrier stood!
Some eyed the chief with stern and withering look;
Their weapons some with threatening gesture shook."

Alcasto was alarmed and retired. When Tancred undertook to enter, the same wall of fire was there to oppose him. But he was not to be daunted by difficulties, and determined to make them give way—

"If boldly I advance, the fires I see More fierce in aspect than in fact may be;
But come the worst! As thus the hero spoke,
A desperate leap among the flames he took;
Boldness unmatched! Yet did no heat intense,
As of surrounding fire, affect his sense;
Nor rightly, in a space so brief, he knew
If fancied were the flames he saw, or true;
For hardly touched, the baseless phantom fled."

This is the way to meet difficulties. Plunge into them, and they are gone. There are always lions in the way, but if you march up to them boldly, they growl and retire. "Madame," said one of the ministers of Louis XVI. to Marie Antoinette, "if the thing is only difficult, it is done; if it is impossible, it shall be done." The boasting Frenchman, without knowing it, expressed a great truth. The true principle is to act as if nothing were impossible which it is our duty to do. Where there is a will there is a way. The great Disposer of events seconds the efforts of those who resolve to accomplish noble ends, and our duty is to "Act, act in the living present, Heart within and God o'er head."

There is a class of men who, when any course of conduct is proposed to them, see nothing but difficulties in the way. Though blind before, they instantly acquire a supernatural intensity of vision. They are surrounded with horrors. In whatever direction they turn, awful phantoms rise before them threatening destruction—lions roar, tigers growl, jackals scream, thunders below and lightnings flash. Urge them to advance, and the wall of fire before them burns to the very heavens.

The story in the Arabian Nights of the Princess Perizadeh and her two brothers, furnishes a beautiful illustration of the effects of fear upon the accomplishment of great enterprises. When Prince Bahman began to ascend the mountain that he might get the speaking bird, the singing tree, and the wonderful gold-coloured water, immediately he heard voices around him calling out, "Where is the fool going? What would he have? Do not let him pass!" Others cried, "stop him! catch him! kill him!" Others in tones of thunder exclaimed, "Thief, assassin! murderer!" Others ridiculed him, and said, "No, no, let the pretty fellow pass! the cage and bird are kept for him!" The Prince was at last filled with terror, and turned to run down the hill, when he was instantly changed to a black stone. Prince Perviz next undertook the exploit and met with the same fate. The Princess followed them, determined to succeed or perish. Before commencing the ascent, however, she took the precaution to stuff her ears with cotton, that she might not hear the sounds which had been so fatal to others. The higher she went, the greater the number of voices that attempted to intimidate her; but the cotton prevented them from penetrating her ears in such thundering tones. Every opprobrious epithet was heaped upon her; but she pressed on undaunted, till at last she could perceive the bird in its cage. The bird itself now joined in the effort to drive her back, and cried out in a voice of thunder, "Go back, fool!" The Princess rushed on, laid her hand upon the cage, exclaimed, "Bird, I have you!" and the enterprise was achieved.* We may see in this an illustration of the history of every great undertaking. Most men listen to their fears, and are turned to stone—to mere lifeless masses. It is only those who stop their ears, and determine not to listen, that succeed. "Abstain from entering Worms," said Spalatin's messenger to Luther, as he approached the city. "Go tell your master," said the intrepid man, "that though there should be as many devils at Worms as there are tiles on its roof, I would enter it." This is the spirit that commands success. There are difficulties in the way of accomplishing any thing great; but the brave man never stops to count his foes. "The less fear, the less danger" is a very old adage whose truth has been proven by the experience of every age. When satisfied that a thing ought to be done,

"Steel thy fearful thoughts,
And change misdoubt to resolution."

We have been led to make these remarks by observing the disposition in the minds of some to consider slavery an incurable evil. They acknowledge the system to be a dreadful wrong—a wrong to both master and slave—one of the greatest evils that has ever cursed the human race; and, yet they say there is no remedy; we must submit; the subject must not be discussed, there is a wall of fire before them defended by innumerable devils; voices are crying all around them, "Stop, fool! rascal! murderer! go back! die! perish!" It seems to us that such a course is worse than that of those who contend that slavery is a blessing. What! shall our enemy stand with his foot upon our neck, and we make no attempt to rise? Shall we, like cowards and sluggards contend that it is useless for us to make any efforts? Who that calls himself a man should not be ashamed of such a degradation? The very ground ought to shrink from permitting such cowardice to lie upon it. This conduct seems to us not only dastardly, but cruel. We not only tamely submit to the evil that is crushing us down; but to avoid a little exertion, we throw it doubled in weight upon the shoulders of our children. Cowards that we are, we fear to kill the wolf that we "hold by the ears," and when it has grown to be a monster, and our own strength is exhausted, we give it infuriated into the hands of our innocent offspring.

*An incident similar in some respects to this in the Arabian legend is related by Apuleius in the story of Cupid and Psyche. Psyche is ordered by Venus to bring her an urn of water from the black fountain. When she arrives near the top of the mountain, and sees the terrible dragons, and hears the black waters themselves warning her to retire, she is overwhelmed with terror, impossibilitate ipsa in lapidem mutata, turned to stone by the very impossibility.

PEACE WITH FRANCE.

Citizens of France, Friends and Brethren.—Assembled in a great public meeting in London, as the conclusion of a Conference of Delegates from various parts of the United Kingdom, for the purpose of opposing any measure of the British Government designed to increase the Military expenditure of the Nation, or to give a single aspect of hostility or distrust to its attitude towards other countries, and recognizing the great truth, that "God has made of one blood, all nations of men," we have deemed it a fitting occasion to tender to you an expression of our fraternal sympathy and unfeigned esteem.

Brethren of France! The sentiments to which we now give expression, are not the offspring of a few hundreds of human hearts, touched with a momentary inspiration of kindly feeling toward you, our nearest neighbours. They are not the offspring of an evanescent wish to make you feel that we indeed are your brethren in the truest sense and sympathies of that relation: they are the sentiments of the people of England; of millions of hearts in these Islands, that beat kindly and warmly toward the people of France: they are sentiments which have been uttered and received with enthusiastic acclamations in great public meetings recently held in nearly all the large towns in this Kingdom. Many communities in England have sought to convey these sentiments to communities in France, through the medium of friendly addresses. Manchester has sent its fraternal greeting to Lyons; Liverpool to Marseilles; Birmingham to Bordeaux; Leeds to Lille; Bristol to Brest; York to Rouen; Norwich to Nismes. Twenty other large towns in England have already addressed these friendly overtures to the same number of towns in France. These interesting communications will testify that we speak the language of England to France, in wishing that your great nation may soon realize all its aspirations, and the richest reward of all its magnanimous efforts for the acquisition and uninterrupted enjoyment of all the civil, religious and commercial freedom which can conduce to the progress, peace, prosperity and true greatness of any people.

Brethren of France! But a few weeks ago, we were watching with fraternal solicitude and sympathy, the great moral struggle in which you were engaged against restrictions imposed upon those vital and inalienable prerogatives of the human conscience and public opinion, which are so essential and dear to a nation of freemen. Through all the phases of this struggle, we believed that victory would decide for the right, if the wronged would adhere to righteous means. We believed that all the political changes which you sought, might be secured without the perpetration of a single crime, or the shedding of one drop of human blood, on the part of an aggrieved people. A few days of mighty consequence have come with their wonderful events, and France has burst the bonds that fettered her energies, and now stands before us in the noble promise of a new career. If, in the sudden conflict, some few drops of blood have been shed, we would rather wash them away with our tears, than attempt to conceal their stain from our eyes. Most earnestly do we desire that the watchword of her new sovereignty, "Liberty, Equality, Fraternity," may become a practical and permanent reality to all her children, and signify to the surrounding world, peace, prosperity and progress, as the perpetual condition of the French people.

Brethren of France! From all your borders we hear the acclamations of joy over your glorious Revolution;—and in that joy we deeply participate. Whilst this Revolution plucks up by the roots, from the soil of France, systems that impeded the development of her destiny, let it also eradicate from the heart of the nation, every thought which can germinate into a sentiment of distrust, jealousy or unfriendly feeling towards the people of England. Let the mutual alienation of past times be swept from the records of memory, and let nothing hereafter be remembered between us which shall not tend to strengthen the bonds of our fraternity, and beautify and illustrate the spirit of our fellowship. In whatever France may do peacefully, in the unfettered energy of her moral power, and fertile genius, for the elevation and happiness of mankind; for the abolition of war in all its manifestations; of human slavery in all its forms; of restrictions upon international correspondence and commerce, in all their ramifications; in whatever she may do legitimately and morally, for the development and extension of the principles and privilege of civil, religious and commercial freedom through the great brotherhood of nations, she will find England not only her compeer in progression, but also her co-partner in humane and heroic activities; ready to sympathize with every magnificent enterprise of philanthropy which her enlightened genius may devise; ready to give her a sister's hand in all her paths of peace and progress; ready to mourn in her sorrow, and rejoice in her joy: thus travelling together through the remaining years of time, an example to the world of the exceeding beauty of peace and international amity.

Signed on behalf of the Delegates, and of the Public Meeting held in the Hall of Commerce.

SLAVES IN THE DISMAL SWAMP.

This gloomy swamp is not without its interest; for it serves as a hiding-place, a "city of refuge," for the poor slave. I am told that there are hundreds of fugitives who have sought an asylum from oppression in this damp and dreary region, and here they have hitherto been secure. So extensive is this place, and so inaccessible to the population, that many of its inhabitants have never seen a white man. Many of them receive their sustenance by labouring for slaves who have their tasks in parts of the swamp. A planter sends a faithful servant to get out shingles, and gives him his task, and promises to give him so much for every task, and not unfrequently the slave takes once in two weeks, a barrel of pork, and two barrels of flour, etc., etc., and at the end of the two weeks his rations are gone, he has performed so many tasks, and his master pays him as he promised, thus encouraging secretly the runaways. But recently, parties of young men with dogs, have hunted out these poor creatures; and, to use the expression of my informant, have "shot them down like partridges." A few weeks since, a company of them were discovered, and made resistance, as they were armed with pistols; they fired, without effect, and then were fired on by these man-hunters, with their longer and heavier guns, and four of them shot, and others wounded so that they could not retreat. One of them in particular, was shot in the knee, which was badly shattered. He was then brought out to a place near where I am now writing, when a surgeon dressed his wound, and placed it in a box prepared to keep it straight and still. When his master arrived, he was so enraged at seeing him, that he stamped on the poor man's face where he was lying, in a most shocking manner. My informant was a witness, and is a respectable man. So many of these poor wretched fugitives have been shot and wounded, that others have become so alarmed that they have come out and returned to their former masters. Query—if the slaves are happy in their present condition, would they prefer a residence in the Dismal Swamp?—Cor. Zion's Herald.

FROM WHAT COMES THE WAR SPIRIT?

If from our Father in heaven, the fact should be generally known, and the principle universally cherished.

But according to the Scriptures, man was created upright; in the image of God—a stranger to the spirit and art of war.

And although we have by transgression lost this image and rectitude, yet God is unchanged. It is true, 'twas said in "old times," that idolators should be destroyed. And when the iniquity of the Amorites was full, they were dispossessed by the descendants of Jacob. Yet when this same Jacob called his twelve sons around him to receive his last blessing—he said nothing to two of them, but to rebuke and curse something that was about them; and that something was the WAR-SPIRIT!

In vain do we search the New Testament for this spirit, unless we take the example of Herod, or those who crucified the Lord of glory. The example and teachings of Jesus of Nazareth, are the very opposite of this spirit. Is it not so? "But I say unto you, that ye resist not evil. A new commandment I will give unto you, That ye love another. Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you," &c. And James says, "From whence come wars and fightings among you?" And he answers the question himself, by plainly showing not only the origin of the war-spirit, but also the fruits.

The question, where does this spirit come from?—I have only answered negatively. But if it lead all who are concerned to enquire, to "search and look," my object will be gained.

AN OUTRAGEOUS CASE OF KIDNAPPING.

We learn that a worthy and industrious man by the name of Henry Williams, while within a few rods of his house, on Wednesday evening, was seized by a gang of men, and carried across the river into Kentucky, and was lodged in the Covington jail, as a runaway slave. He was taken from a wife and family, who are deeply afflicted at the brutal outrage that deprives them of a husband and father. The man has lived in this city for some time—came from Pittsburg, and is said never to have been a slave. The responsibility of these atrocities, by far too common, rests, in a great measure, upon the people of this State. Their authorities provide no sufficient guards to secure personal rights, while our Black Laws, and the pro-slavery party connections of a majority of the people, invite and sanction such aggressions. It is our business to set the example of justice to the coloured man. We cannot otherwise expect to have the peace and dignity of the State respected.—Cin. Herald.

LETTER FROM WILLIAM JAY.

BEDFORD, 9th October, 1847.

DEAR SIR:—You inquire what course in my opinion should be pursued by the friends of liberty, humanity and religion, when an attempt is made in their presence, or neighbourhood, to seize an alleged fugitive from the house of bondage?

If a slave is in fact what the southern law regards him, a beast of burden, a mere chattel, an answer to your question is furnished in Exodus, xxiii. 4. "If thou shalt meet thy enemy's ox or his ass going astray, thou shalt surely bring it back to him again." But if the slave be a fellow man, then we may learn our duty towards him in Deut. xxiii. 15. "Thou shalt not deliver to his master, the servant who hath escaped from his master to thee."

It is clear to me that the whole spirit of the Bible, and the example of prophets and apostles, absolutely forbid us to perform any act we believe sinful, although it may be required by the laws of the land. Nevertheless, we are commanded to submit to the Powers that be, by which I understand we are not forcibly to resist the execution even of wicked laws. The contrary doctrine strikes at the root of all civil government. The apostles resolutely persevered in preaching in the name of Jesus Christ, although such preaching was illegal, but they submitted to the penalties of the law they deliberately and conscientiously violated, and never made battle with the officers who led them to prison or to execution.

Not merely is the slave code an accursed code, but the act of Congress, and many of the laws in the free States, relative to the seizure of fugitive slaves, are a burlesque alike upon Christianity and Republicanism. Shall we in obedience to these laws refuse to the wretched fugitive the common offices of humanity and Christian kindness? Will acts of Congress and State laws exempt us at the great day of account from the awful charge, "I was an hungered and ye gave me no meat, I was thirsty and ye gave me no drink, I was a stranger, and ye took me not in, naked and ye clothed me not, for inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it not to me."

As we fear God and hope for his favour at the last day, let us harbour, succour, secrete, and aid with food, clothing, money and advice, every fugitive who seeks our protection, regardless of the statutes which make such acts of mercy penal offences; and then let us unresistingly enter the dungeons to which sinful laws may consign us.

By the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, the master may in his own person, or by his agent, without warrant, seize and carry away his slave, wherever he may find him. Of course there must be some limitation to this terrific privilege accorded to Southern gentlemen. They may not take at pleasure any man, woman, or child, they may happen to find in our streets. They may take their slaves, but they have no right to take any who are not slaves, or who are not their slaves. Hence it follows that when our fellow citizens and neighbours are thus seized, we may demand of the captor proof of his right to make the seizure. This surely is not an unreasonable demand, and northern servility has taken care to make it as little inconvenient as possible to the slaveholder. Should a Virginian claim my horse, before he can take possession of it, he must bring his claim before a court, and obtain the verdict of twelve men selected by lot. But should he think proper to claim me as his property, the act of Congress affords him very great facilities. Instead of going before a Court and Jury, he may select any Justice of the Peace he may think most obsequious and accessible, and if he can succeed in prevailing on this Justice to declare me his slave, I may be torn forever from my wife and children, and sent bound and fettered, a vendible commodity, to a southern market.

Think not this is idle declamation, or that a white man cannot be claimed as a slave. A little reflection will convince you that southern slaves must be of every shade of complexion; and the frequent advertisements in the southern papers for fugitives having "blue eyes, straight hair, and fair complexion," prove that white as well as black slaves run away.

A few years since, a Maryland gentleman seized a white girl, 14 years old, in Philadelphia, as his slave. The case was investigated not by a Court and Jury, but by a single Judge. It was proved before him by the most abundant and incontestable evidence, that the alleged slave was born in Philadelphia of poor Irish parents. The father had absconded while the daughter was an infant, and the mother had died about the same time in the hospital. I allude to the well-known case of MARY GILMORE.

Surely, then, it is right, and just, and proper, that the kidnapper should be compelled to prove his title to the prey he had seized, before he is permitted to carry it off. Against these men, we are denied the protection of TRIAL BY JURY. Let us avail ourselves of such means of defence as are still left us.

When these hunters of men appear in our neighbourhood, let them be closely watched, and let every magistrate, officer and lawyer, who voluntarily aids them, be held infamous. As soon as a seizure has been made, let the captor be compelled by a writ of Habeas Corpus, to show that he had a right to make it. If from any circumstance the writ cannot be served in time, let the kidnapper be arrested on a Justices' warrant for assault and battery, and required to enter into a sufficient recognizance for his appearance at the next court; and in default of bail, let him be committed to the county jail. If he satisfies the Court that he has acted legally, his recognizance will be discharged, if not, let him be indicted, tried, and sent to the State Prison.

This course appears to me to be legal, constitutional and righteous. There is not one of our base, cringing demagogues, ever trafficking northern rights for southern votes, who would not, if seized as a slave, be more disposed to rely on his pistol, than on a Habeas Corpus for his protection.

We are horrified at the idea of a poor Irish orphan girl being kidnapped as a slave. Is the outrage on justice and humanity less, because the complexion of the victim is dark? Are the rights of man and the laws of God founded on "the tincture of a skin"? Such would seem to be the opinion of our politicians, whose "end and being" are to court the favour of the slaveholders. But those who fear God have a very different standard of right and wrong.

If, through the wickedness of our laws, the unhappy slave must be torn from among us and returned to bondage, we must submit, but let us be careful not to be partakers of other men's sins. The laws, bad as they are, do not authorize the Southerners to convert our inhabitants into slaves, and we owe it to our country and our God to use all lawful means to prevent the perpetration of such iniquity. I am, Sir,

Yours respectfully,

WILLIAM JAY.

"THE BLACK LAWS OF OHIO."

Below will be found all the enactments that we are aware of in the Statutes of Ohio, imposing disabilities on the Coloured portion of our citizens, now in force. They are mostly inoperative, on account of their unreasonable requirements; but sometimes, in cases of great excitement among the people, they have been productive of mischief.

An Act to Regulate Black and Mulatto persons.

[Passed and took effect, January 5, 1804, 29 v. Stat. 439.]

1. SECT. I. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio. That from and after the first day of June next, no black or mulatto person shall be permitted to settle or reside in this state, unless he or she shall first produce a fair certificate from some court within the United States, of his or her actual freedom; which certificate shall be attested by the clerk of said court, and the seal thereof annexed thereto by the said clerk.

2. SECT. II. That every black or mulatto person residing within this state, on or before the first day of June, one thousand eight hundred and four, shall enter his or her name, together with the name or names of his or her children, in the clerk's office, in the county in which he, she or they reside, which shall be entered on record by said clerk; and thereafter the clerk's certificate of such record shall be sufficient evidence of his, her or their freedom; and for every entry and certificate, the person obtaining the same shall pay to the clerk twelve and a half cents: provided, nevertheless, that nothing in this act contained, shall bar the lawful claim to any black or mulatto person.

3. SECT. III. That no person or persons, residents of this state, shall be permitted to hire, or in any way employ, any black or mulatto person, unless such black or mulatto person shall have one of the certificates as aforesaid, under pain of forfeiting and paying any sum not less than ten, nor more than fifty dollars, at the discretion of the court, for every such offence; and one-half thereof for the use of the informer, and the other half for the use of the state; and shall moreover pay to the owner, if any there be, of such black or mulatto person, the sum of fifty cents for every day he, she or they shall in any wise employ, harbor or secrete such black or mulatto person; which sum or sums shall be recoverable before any court having cognizance thereof.

4. SECT. V. That every black or mulatto person, who shall come to reside in this state, with such certificate as is required in the first section of this act, shall, within two years, have the same recorded in the clerk's office, in the county in which he or she means to reside, for which he or she shall pay to the clerk twelve and a half cents; and the clerk shall give him or her a certificate of such record.

5. SECT. VII. That any person or persons who shall attempt to remove, or shall remove from this state, or who shall aid and assist in removing, contrary to the provisions of this act, any black or mulatto person, without first proving, as hereinbefore directed, that he, she or they is, or are legally entitled so to do, shall, on conviction thereof, before any court having cognizance of the same, forfeit and pay the sum of one thousand dollars; one-half to the use of the informer, and the other half to the use of the state; to be recovered by action of debt, quitam, or indictment; and shall moreover be liable to the action of the party injured.

An act to amend the last named act.

[Passed January 25, 1807. Took effect April 1, 1807.
29 v. Stat., 440.

6. SECT. I. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That no negro or mulatto person shall be permitted to enter into, and settle within this state, unless such negro or mulatto person shall, within twenty days thereafter, enter into bond with two or more freehold sureties, in the penal sum of five hundred dollars, before the clerk of the court of common pleas of the county in which such negro or mulatto may wish to reside, (to be approved by the clerk,) conditioned for the good behaviour of such negro or mulatto, and moreover to pay for the support of such person, in case he, she or they should thereafter be found within any township in this state, unable to support themselves. And if any negro or mulatto person shall migrate into this state, and not comply with the provisions of this act, it shall be the duty of the overseers of the poor of the township where such negro or mulatto person may be found, to remove immediately such black or mulatto person, in the same manner as is required in the case of paupers.

7. SECT. II. That it shall be the duty of the clerk, before whom such bond may be given as aforesaid, to file the same in his office, and give a certificate thereof to such negro or mulatto person; and the said clerk shall be entitled to receive the sum of one dollar for the bond and the certificate aforesaid, on the delivery of the certificate.

8. SECT. III. That if any person being a resident of this state, shall employ, harbor or conceal any such negro or mulatto person aforesaid, contrary to the provisions of the first section of this act, any person so offending shall forfeit and pay for every such offence, any sum not exceeding one hundred dollars, the one-half to the informer, and the other half for the use of the poor of the township in which such person may reside; to be recovered by action of debt, before any court having competent jurisdiction; and moreover be liable for the maintenance and support of such negro or mulatto, provided he, she or they shall become unable to support themselves.

9. SECT. IV. That no black or mulatto person or persons shall hereafter be permitted to be sworn or give evidence in any court of record, or elsewhere, in this state, in any cause depending, or matter of controversy, where either party to the same is a white person; or in any prosecution which shall be instituted in behalf of this state against any white person.

10. SECT. V. That so much of the act entitled "an act to regulate black and mulatto persons," as is contrary to this act, together with the sixth section thereof, be and the same is hereby repealed.

This act shall take effect and be in force from and after the first day of April next.

An act to amend the act entitled "an act to regulate black and mulatto persons," passed Jan. 5, 1804.

[Passed and took effect, Feb. 27, 1834. 32 v. Stat., 22.

11. SECT. I. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That in all cases wherein a certificate is granted to any black or mulatto person, resident within this state, agreeably to the second section of the act to which this is an amendment, the clerk of the court issuing the same shall make or cause to be made, a record of the same, in a book provided for that purpose, and carefully preserved in said office; and on such record of the same being made, the said clerk shall endorse thereon the number of the same, the book in which, and the page or pages where such record is made; and shall forthwith, if required, deliver over the same to the individual for whose benefit it was intended. And it shall furthermore be the duty of the presiding judge of such circuit in which said certificate may be issued, on application being made to him by the holder of the same, to endorse thereon his certificate of the genuineness of the same: provided, that nothing in this act contained shall be so construed, as to bar the lawful claim to any black or mulatto person thus obtaining a certificate within this state.

BLACK LAWS IN OHIO.

The Legislature of Ohio has refused to annul or amend her black laws.

Not one of the members of that body would hesitate about denouncing Slavery generally.—Very few of them who do not condemn the South for holding on to the institution. Yet they deny justice to the negro, and refuse to take his testimony in any of their courts.

There are hundreds of planters in this State who refuse to emancipate their slaves—and who oppose emancipation because of free State legislation of this character. They ask—"What can the slave do if he be set free? Where can he go?" And fearing that he may be worse off, they conclude to do the best they can with him, and for him!

Most of the free States deal shamefully in this matter. The majority of the Ohio Legislature, certainly, merit a rebuke for their inhumanity in sustaining laws which a Kentucky Statesman calls "atrocious," and most men admit to be disgraceful.—Louisville Examiner.

ABOLITION OF SLAVERY IN THE FRENCH COLONIES.

The great revolution which has recently been accomplished in Paris, deeply as we may lament the loss of life which accompanied it, will, we have no doubt, be the means of speedily securing to the slaves in the French colonies, their long-promised and long expected liberty. In the distinguished men who now form the Provisional Government of the French Republic, we have a sure guarantee that not a slave shall henceforth breathe where her dominion extends. The venerable Dupont, Arago, Lamartine, Carnot, Ledru Rollin, and Cremieux have nobly and eloquently advocated the rights of the slave; and they will not now be unfaithful to the lofty principles and generous sympathies they have so often displayed at the tribune. But not only do we cherish this confidence in the great men we have named, but we are satisfied that negro emancipation will be one of the first acts of the government when it shall have received the sanction of the nation, and shall be fully installed; because the men, the high-minded and generous workmen of Paris, have already willed it. In a remarkable document which they have issued, they not only point out, with great talent and temper, the measures which they deem necessary to secure their own and their fellow-citizen's rights, but they cry with one voice and one heart, "No more slavery of our brethren of the negro race!" In these words the death-knell of slavery is rung; and soon that hateful and atrocious system, with all its abominations, will disappear from every part of the French territories. As a prelude to this great act of national justice, we give the following translation of an address which has been transmitted to the colonies. The planters will, we trust, listen to the eloquent voice which addresses them; and even anticipate the government and people of France, by voluntarily, immediately and completely emancipating their slaves. An act of this kind will secure for them not only the applause of their fellow-citizens, but the good-will of all civilized and christian men.

"TO OUR BRETHREN IN THE COLONIES."

"In presence of the noble and generous victory of the people, whence will spring liberty for all, we recommend our brethren in the colonies to remain calm and tranquil. They will thus give to the Provisional Government, which is composed of citizens devoted to the cause of emancipation, that power and liberty of mind which is necessary for the preparation of this great and humane measure. Soon there will be neither masters nor slaves in the colonies. The republic will give the latter to France as new citizens. But it is necessary that each should well understand the rights and duties conferred upon them by the name of citizen. We must all, by our love of order, labour, and true liberty, prove ourselves equally worthy of that name with the heroic people of Paris. We must, by our calmness and moderation, teach not merely France, but the whole world, that we are capable of making the greatest sacrifices, and exercising the greatest self-denial, in order to obtain liberty. Impatience would spoil everything.

"We recommend the negroes to put confidence in the whites; the whites to trust the negroes; and all classes to put confidence in the government. We advise the former to consider it their duty, as good citizens, to forget the past, and the latter to make the most sincere and loyal preparation for the new era on which we are about to enter.

"Let us hope that the free-will of the planters will cause the whip to disappear from all the plantations. A generous beginning alone can assure gratitude.

"We must facilitate the task of government by making large concessions to the labourers, and employ ourselves diligently and without delay to the organization of labour.—This great and noble problem, which it will be the endeavour of the republic to solve, is much more easy of solution in the colonies than in France. The intelligent men of the country would, therefore, be wanting in their most important duty as citizens, if they did not hasten, from this time forth, to devote themselves frankly and legally to the task, in order that the most important element of universal happiness may result therefrom.

"Let this grand device of civilization, order, liberty, and brotherhood include all men of all complexions. Let every one well weigh its terms in his conscience, and consult his heart, in order to pursue its realization with all the force which he has at its disposal. Order leads to liberty, and liberty conducts to universal brotherhood.

"Let us chase from our minds the evil passions which might lead us away from the pursuit of this great object; we have no longer to fight for or defend liberty, but rather to prepare and to organize it.

"To work, then, without further delay! but to work with proper tools. We know of no sacrifice too great for obtaining this end, and if, hitherto, we have made some little progress towards it by our efforts, the only recompense which we ask from our compatriots is, that they should not act precipitately, but should place implicit confidence in our devotion, which will never fail them.

"To conclude, we have no right to carry the flag of liberty to the colonies; no more has the Provisional Government. But we feel convinced that this will be one of the first acts of the Constituent Assembly. We therefore recommend to all, patience, hope, union, order, and labour.

I.

O dwellers in the valley-land,
Who in deep twilight grope and cower,
Till the slow mountain's dial-band
Shortens to noon's triumphal hour,—
While ye sit idle, do ye think
The Lord's great work sits idle too?
That light dare not o'erleap the brink
Of morn, because 'tis dark with you?

Though yet your valleys skulk in night,
In God's ripe fields the day is cried,
And reapers, with their sickles bright,
Troop, singing, down the mountain side:

Come up, and feel what health there is
In the frank Dawn's delighted eye
As, bending with a pitying kiss,
The night-shed tears of Earth she dries!

The Lord wants reapers: O, mount up,
Before night comes, and says, "Too late!"
Stay not for taking scrip or cup,
The Master hungers while ye wait:
'Tis from these heights alone your eyes
The advancing spears of day can see,
Which o'er the eastern hill-tops rise,
To break your long captivity.

II.

Lone watcher on the mountain-height!
It is right precious to behold
The first long surf of climbing light
Flood all the thirsty east with gold;
But we, who in the shadow sit,
Know also when the day is nigh,
Seeing thy shining forehead lit
With his inspiring prophecy.

Thou hast thine office, we have ours;
God lacks not early service here,
But what are thine eleventh hours
He counts with us for morning cheer;
One day for Him, is long enough,
And when He giveth work to do,
The bruised reed is amply tough
To pierce the shield of error through.

But not the less do thou aspire
Light's earlier messages to preach;
Keep back no syllable of fire,—
Plunge deep the rowels of thy speech.
Yet God deems not thine agried sight
More worthy than our twilight dim,—
For meek obedience, too, is light,
And following that is finding Him.

DISMEMBERMENT OF POLITICAL PARTIES—CAN FRIENDS CONSISTENTLY VOTE FOR A PRESIDENT.

Amongst the remarkable events of the present year is to be numbered the extraordinary dismemberment of the two great political parties—the Whig and Democratic. Taking no part myself in political agitations, and not expecting to vote for any candidate who has been or may be nominated, I nevertheless feel a deep interest in the movements relating to the Presidential election—especially those which are intended to prevent the extension of slavery into the vast territory recently obtained by conquest from Mexico. Already has a large section of the Democratic party in New York, nominated a popular statesman as a "Free Soil and Free Labour" candidate. Another Convention, to nominate a "free soil" candidate is to assemble at Buffalo on the 9th inst., to be composed of delegates, without distinction of party, from several States. It remains to be seen whether the Buffalo Convention will go so far in its disregard of old party feelings as to unite in the nomination of Martin Van Buren, or whether it will adopt the candidate of the Liberty Party, John P. Hale, who has nobly sustained his principles, and shown himself eminently qualified to enter into the discharge of the civil duties of first magistrate of the nation.

If the suffrages of all who are disposed to vote for a free soil candidate, could be concentrated on an individual, there can scarcely be a doubt that he would be elected, or the election thrown into the House of Representatives. Whatever may be the immediate result of the disorganization of the two old parties, I am inclined to regard it as a prelude to a more general and decided opposition to the encroachment of the slaveholding power, and the extension of slavery. Some of the cords by which the slaveholders have so long bound the people of the free States, seem to have given way under the extreme tension to which they have been recently drawn. The newspapers teem with accounts of meetings held throughout the northern and western States, and the feeling which animates them generally, is well described in the following extract of a letter from a western correspondent:—"The West is all astir on politics. There seems to be a determination throughout the country, to resist the further extension of slavery. I was at an enthusiastic meeting in _____, on the 8th inst., on the free territory question. It was got up and conducted for the most part, by hitherto leading Whigs and Democrats. A string of resolutions was passed, declaring both Cass and Taylor to be unfit for the Presidency, because the former had been 'bought by the South,' and the latter had nothing to recommend him except that he was 'fresh from the fields of blood and victory,' and had 'proved himself a brave and sagacious warrior, well skilled in the art of human butchery.' There was thought to be one thousand persons present, though it was only a county meeting. Another meeting is to be held in Eaton, Preble county, Ohio, on the 25th inst. If slavery can be kept within its present bounds, it will undoubtedly be vastly better for the country and the slave, than to have it extended over all that wide scope of country acquired from Mexico. To effect this is the object of the present movement in the North. If the Buffalo Convention shall nominate the right kind of a man, the vote at the Presidential election will tell the South that there is a determination, far more powerful than it imagines, in the North to resist the extension of slavery."

My friend adds:—"Are there any Friends in Philadelphia, advocating the claims of Taylor to the Presidency? I am ashamed and mortified to acknowledge that we have such here, though I believe the number is extremely small, and I hope it will diminish. There seems to be an increasing opinion here that Friends cannot consistently vote for slaveholders, or for men who have made themselves notorious by deeds of "human butchery."

Is it not, however, a question, whether a due observance of the acknowledged principles of the religious Society of Friends, would not prevent its members from being "necessary in electing" any man to the office of President of the United States? Without entering now at much length upon the subject, I shall make a few remarks for the consideration of your readers. The United States Constitution declares that "Congress shall have power to declare war; grant letters of marque and reprisal; and make rules concerning captures on land and water. To raise and support armies. To provide and maintain a navy. To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union; suppress insurrection and invasions. To provide for organizing, arming and disciplining the militia, &c."

This power has been exercised by Congress: an army and navy have been raised and maintained, and of this army and navy the President of the United States is Commander in Chief, under the provisions of the Constitution. The oath or affirmation of the President binds him to perform his military duties no less than those which are civil.

Now, the principles of the Society of Friends are entirely and exclusively pacific; they believe all war is contrary to Christianity. In the application of these principles, the Discipline "advises and exhorts all in profession with us, to decline the acceptance of any office or station in civil government, the duties of which are inconsistent with our religious principles." Again, it says: "It is also the sense and judgment of this meeting, that Friends ought not, in any wise, to be active or necessary in electing, or promoting to be elected, their brethren to such offices or stations in civil government, the execution whereof tends to lay waste our Christian testimony, or subject their brethren or others to sufferings on account of their conscientious scruples." p. 33, 34.

I presume no one will deny that the duties of the office of President are inconsistent with our religious principles, or that the execution of these duties tends to lay waste our Christian testimony against war. It is clear then that no Friend could accept this office, or aid, by his vote or otherwise, in electing one of his brethren to the station.

If we enter into an examination of the ground or primary reason of these inhibitions, we shall find it is the nature of the duties appertaining to the office. If, therefore, it be wrong to be active or necessary in electing a Friend to perform these duties, it necessarily follows that it must be equally wrong to elect any other person to perform them. Is not the conclusion irresistible, that no Friend can consistently aid in electing another to an office which he could not conscientiously fill himself?

DISHONESTY OF SLAVES.

The enemies of the poor-slaves often complain of their dishonesty, totally forgetting that the slaves are robbed of all their rights; and that, feeling this, they, in their ignorance, naturally conclude it to be only reasonable that a portion of the fruits of their labour should justly belong to them. It seems, however, from an anecdote which I heard on board a steamboat when going down the Mississippi a few months since, that honour may be found amongst slaves as well as among other thieves. One of the passengers was a Virginia tobacco planter, who made himself popular on the boat by his social chat. During a conversation respecting the dishonesty of slaves, he related the following circumstances to illustrate the subject:—

"I had an old nigger," said he, "who was as great a rogue as I ever saw. He stole things merely to keep himself in practice. I tried many ways to break him, but in vain. At length I put my potatoes under the floor of the old nigger's cabin, and, the boards being loose, I told the old rascal to steal as many as he wanted. They remained all winter, and the — old rascal never took a potatoe! The next winter, my wife and I, on going South, concluded to try him further, and gave him the keys, and left all our household concerns in his charge. On our return, we found everything in order, and in its proper place! He was the only sufferer—from sleeping on a good bed, to which he had not been accustomed. The next winter I went from home, leaving the care of my concerns with my wife, and the — old rascal had like to have stolen all my meat!"

ASSOCIATED ACTION.

THIRD ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BOARD OF MANAGERS OF THE FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS OF NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING.

It was under feelings of deep depression, that we prepared our last year's report, and we then ventured earnestly to appeal to the members of our Society for their countenance and support, in our endeavours to carry out the views adopted and recommended by our Yearly Meeting.

The first object was to procure, by subscription, funds sufficient to establish a store for free labour goods exclusively. A number of Friends have liberally responded to that appeal, and it is with much satisfaction that we can now report that object at length accomplished.

The interest manifested at our last annual meeting, clearly showed that funds could be raised sufficient to establish a store on a small scale, and under that belief, the Board immediately took into consideration the best means of accomplishing the desired object. From the difficulty of procuring a large amount, the managers concluded to commence with the small sum of four thousand dollars.

After diligent inquiries for many months by the Committee appointed to select a suitable person to conduct the business, on the first of Sixth month they reported that Lindley M. Hoag had expressed a willingness to engage in it.

Believing the well known character of this Friend would give general confidence in the store, and overcome that feeling of skepticism and doubt with which many regard all articles alleged to be the production of free labour, a correspondence was opened with him. Several months, however, elapsed before any definite arrangement could be made, and it was near the close of the year before the existing agreement was entered into with Lindley M. Hoag and his partner, George Wood, whom he had introduced to the Board of Managers.

This desirable object, for which we have so long and so perseveringly laboured, is now attained. But if the store is to be continued it must be made to pay its expenses, and also to afford a fair remuneration to those whose time and energies are devoted to it. The Board of Managers have now nothing to do with it, further than to know that it is properly carried on. The conditions upon which it has been established, necessarily place it under great disadvantages when compared with those stores which make no distinction between the products of slave and of free labour. The market from which it is supplied is very variable. Sometimes large quantities of free goods arrive and are immediately sold at auction upon terms of which it is impossible for the proprietors to take full benefit, owing to the limited amount of their capital.

Hitherto the prices of many of their goods have been much lower than we had reason to anticipate. The article of sugar has been sold, at very little, if any, above the cost, owing to the general reduction in the price, since the stores listed.

A little reflection will show that the very existence of the store must depend upon a general and liberal support; not only by the purchase of those articles of free labour, which from peculiar circumstances yield but little profit, but also of all those various and useful articles with which it is liberally supplied. If the demand be general, we may expect to procure many even of the articles competed with by slave labour, at about the prices of the latter; but if it be confined to sugar, molasses, cotton goods, &c., then it will be necessary to pay more for them, or the store cannot be maintained.

We have, however, established this store upon principle, and we must support it upon principle, and with that liberality which will ensure success.

The example of our forefathers in the church is worthy of emulation. Every line of their history speaks of the boldness with which they adhered to their principles. The scorn of the world, the insult and outrage of their persons, the spoiling and sacrifice of their worldly goods, even threatenings against life itself, were powerless to swerve them from apprehended duty. And shall we, their descendants and bearers of their name, hesitate and count the cost, when principle is at stake?

Our principles forbid the countenance of all injustice, extortion and oppression. The dealer in goods which are stolen may offer them to us at a much less rate than he can who procures them by honest means. But can we, therefore, feel at liberty to purchase them? No! we shrink from the idea. Shall we then purchase the fruits of unrewarded toil, simply because they are lower than those from which the price of labour has not been withheld? It appears to us there is no difference between the two cases; for why is slave grown produce cheaper than the free, unless it be that one is paid for and the other is not?

It is not only the injustice which we deplore, in contemplating the lower prices of slave produce; sacrifice of life in every stage of slavery, murder, rapine, and iniquity of all kinds are inseparable from the system; and it seems to us as if every day's report only renews the call upon us, to withdraw as much as possible from its support, and to cleanse ourselves from its pollutions.

In our last year's report, particular attention was called to the act of the British Parliament, reducing the duties on slave grown sugars, and to the effects which it immediately produced upon the slave trade. We are now informed by the highest authority, of the further effects of that inconsistent act. It has, by opening a vast market for slave sugars, given a fearful impetus to the slave trade, and caused a deplorable increase of all its horrors. We would invite the attention of all interested in the subject, to the information contained in recent numbers of the "Non-Slaverholder," and we have no hesitation in recommending this valuable paper as the most effective advocate of the cause which binds us together as an association. It abounds with information upon the subject, and depicts in truthful colours the evil effects which have followed the increased demand for slave sugars.

Though the continued use of the products of slavery talls the conscience, and deadens the sensibilities, yet if honest-hearted men, who, without reflection, consume them, could but be shown that they are indeed the supporters of the system, we believe they would abandon without delay so inconsistent a course.

Recent events in Europe give hopes of better times. France, Sweden, and Denmark have decreed the abolition of slavery in all their colonies. Peru and New Grenada also promise freedom to the slave. Our country resounds with rejoicings over the progress of political freedom in Europe; and yet, strange as it must appear to all, the same voices which re-echo the cry of liberty there, are raised in support of slavery at home. The representatives of the people at Washington send congratulations to the people of France for the spread of liberty, at the same time that the legislature of our country is under the control of the slave interest, and every act of the government upon the subject appears designed still more deeply to involve us. The present war with a sister republic is one of the fruits of slavery. Innumerable evils are forced upon the people of the North to uphold the "peculiar institution" of the South, and yet we are told that slavery is no concern of ours. It is time that the true supporters of slavery were known to the world. It is not a time for us to go backward nor to stand still. We are called upon louder than ever to maintain our principles to the utmost. When the slaveholder shall think it his interest to abandon slavery, he will no longer hold the chain that binds his captive. With these feelings, and this belief, it behoves us to withdraw our support from the system, and to refrain from countenancing it in the least degree.

"Happy is that man who condemneth not himself in the thing which he alloweth." If the Society of Friends, as a body, were to clear themselves from the support of slavery by refusing to partake of its products, it would be a standing, striking, practical testimony against this unchristian system, and could hardly fail to promote its ultimate removal.

Signed on behalf of the Board of Managers,
BENJAMIN TATHAM, Secretary.
New York, 5th mo. 19, 1848.

MINUTES OF THE NEWPORT MEETING.

At a very numerous meeting of Friends, held at their meeting-house in Newport, R. I., 6th month 14th, 1848, for the purpose of promoting the use of the productions of free labour in the place of those of slave labour now in use,—

The meeting was opened by some remarks on the right feelings in relation to the use of the products of slavery, so increasingly prevalent amongst Friends in New England, and so pleasingly manifest in the coming together of so large an assembly. It was suggested that the objects of the meeting might be promoted by presenting some of the leading measures adopted by our friends in other places, in promotion of the same benevolent object; and particularly by the Free Produce Association of Friends in New York and Philadelphia; and those present, both from the New England and several other States, were invited to a free expression of their sentiments.

A member of the Free Produce Association of Friends in Philadelphia stated, that that body had, in the prosecution of its objects, opened a correspondence with planters at the South whose estates are cultivated by hired free labourers, by which they have received and are receiving supplies of cotton sufficient for their present demand; and they reasonably hope that with an increasing demand an increasing supply will be found. They purpose to prosecute their correspondence as they have done, by prudent and conscientious agents, who shall visit such places as can furnish the articles required, and who shall personally make such arrangements as will exclude all probability of deception. The Association have on hand a considerable stock of such cotton goods as are most needed for family use, manufactured from such cotton, under their own direction. They are extending their efforts for an increased supply of rice, sugar, and such other articles as are usually dependent on slave labour, but which may be procured free from that corrupt origin. It was also observed that the agent employed had generally met with a kind reception, in neighbourhoods of slaveholders; the consistency of the Association in withdrawing its support being too apparent to admit of censure; and its kind but steady and undeviating course, tending to enlighten them to their own interests.

By a unanimous expression of sentiment the meeting determined to appoint a committee, consisting of several Friends in each Monthly Meeting of the Yearly Meeting of New England, who are requested to use their efforts in encouraging the use of free labour productions in their respective neighbourhoods, and to facilitate the introduction of them to places where they may be accessible to Friends generally. The committee were requested to prepare a Constitution for an Association, on a plan similar to those of New York and Philadelphia, and present the same to an adjourned meeting to be held at this place next year, with such other information as may promote the objects in view.

The following friends were appointed to that service: [129 names.]

The meeting then adjourned to meet at this place at half-past seven o'clock, in the evening of second day of Yearly Meeting week, next year.

STAS CONSELL, Clerk.

EXTRACTS FROM THE REPORT OF THE AGENT OF THE PHILADELPHIA FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION.

We sailed from New Orleans on the 4th; the weather being boisterous we did not arrive at Galveston until the 8th. This is a handsome little city, settled with many northern people. We tarried here till evening, then took steamboat for Houston, and arrived there the morning of the 9th. Houston is a flourishing town, of about 5000 inhabitants, mostly northern men. It is thought near one-fourth of the population are Germans. I had a short acquaintance with two Methodist ministers, and three of the editors. Some of them expressed their feelings to be with the North on the slave question, and all approved of the emigration of foreigners into Texas, except one, and he did not express an opinion.

On the morning of the 10th we made preparations for our overland journey on horseback, and purchased two Mustang ponies. We started in the direction of Montgomery, and travelled through a level prairie with narrow skirts of timber, mostly pine; a beautiful grazing country, with large herds of fat cattle. Continued our course through this level prairie, which is thinly settled; the land is better adapted to grass than anything else. This country, from what I could learn, is similar all along the coast—low and level—large prairies and occasional cane brakes. This level extends forty or fifty miles wide, and is not much settled, except on the water courses. A large portion of the prairie is over-spread with fine grass, affording an almost inexhaustible pasturage. Timber is mostly confined to the water courses, and chiefly of the pine, with occasionally an oak grove and but little underbrush. This vast plain is but a few feet above the level of the sea, the soil rather poor, except near the water courses; there the health is in danger, though the soil is remarkably fertile, but subject to inundations at times. Cistern water is best for family use; wells are shallow, and the water in them often brackish. The sea breezes extend far into the interior, there being but little obstruction from high lands or timber.

Next adjoining this extensive level country the lands are gently undulating, increasing as we receded from the sea until it becomes rolling or tumbling lands, wearing a magnificent appearance; the brakes large, frequently forming one or two hundred acres in one gentle slope, seldom so steep as to be in danger of washing, and still more seldom too broken for cultivation. In many places the prairie is of a black rich mould, from two to five feet deep, with clay foundation, while the timber adjoining is on sandy soil, apparently so much so as to render it useless for cultivation. Indeed, was it not for the absence of houses, the traveller would fancy himself in some old, highly cultivated grazing country. Here are two kinds of grass; one is the sedge, resembling our timothy, adapted to the summer season, it grows about two feet high, and covers the whole face of the country, except in the tall timber on the creeks and rivers, there the wild rye grows in abundance in the winter. The other kind is the Muskrat grass, which grows in abundance, and is adapted to the winter and spring, resembling our blue grass, and equally nutritious.

Water is better than near the coast, occasional springs and good wells, seldom more than twenty-five or thirty feet deep; yet in this there is a variety. The free stone, the blue lime, the rotten lime (which is bad,) the slate and soap stone water.

Water power for machinery is scarce, except in the north or north west parts near the mountains—there it is said to be plenty, with great advantages for improving it.

Navigation is poor in all parts of the interior. We were much on the three principal rivers. The Trinity is a deep, narrow, crooked stream; it is thought when it is cleared of the logs and snags, it can be navigated by small steamboats to the forks one-fourth of the year.

The Brazos is larger, and runs more rapidly; many places stoney, with rocky banks, which in all probability will be so cleared as to permit small steamers to go to the falls during the winter and spring.

The Colorado is larger than either of the others; the greatest obstacle in the way of navigation in it is the Great Raft at the mouth, which it is believed may be removed.

Thus you see Texas must remain some years yet without any considerable navigation in the interior. Indeed, the permanent outlet must be by railroads, as there cannot be constant steamboat navigation there on any of the rivers, except the Rio Grande.

As a grazing country, perhaps Texas is exceeded by none. Cattle, sheep, horses and hogs, live well without being fed the year round, and in the southern part particularly nothing is necessary but to keep them gentle by herding them. The sugar cane does well in the south of Texas; in the bottom lands it is thought equal to Louisiana. The low lands produce rice well, it is said, though not much has yet been grown.

Cotton grows well in Middle and East Texas, where it has been tried. In many neighbourhoods the people are just commencing its cultivation. The want of navigation is holding them back. Wheat is doing well in East Texas, perhaps the best of any place in the same latitude. Indian corn grows well in all parts; the only difficulty is in the weavils destroying it, which they are apt to do in the southern parts, but not so in the north. The sweet potato grows in abundance, likewise the Irish potato by procuring new seed from the North each year; every kind of pulse grows well. Those fruits peculiar to that latitude may be raised by attention. Game is plenty.

Previous to annexation the people had become so much harassed with their protracted wars, that the spirit of enterprise among them was broken down. The uncertainty of farming had turned them to getting their living on game in a great measure, not raising more grain than would just bread them. Of late some enterprising men have gone in among them, and they are now trying the virtue and strength of the soil in the various productions adapted to that climate.

The inhabitants are from many parts of the world, perhaps more from the Southern States than any other quarter. They are mostly of the poorer order, whose chief object in going is to get cheap lands, which have been given them for settling in certain places; 320 acres for a man, with a family, and 160 for a single man—the settler only having to pay the surveying fees. If they do not wish to settle in those places, they can purchase good situations of timber and prairie adjoining, for 25 cents to $1 per acre, in any part of the country.

There are many northern men settling there, perhaps more Germans, for the last year or two, than all others. It is said that 12 or 15,000 Germans have settled in West Texas, forming a large colony on the Gaudalope, but too far from navigation to do much for a few years in raising such free labour productions as we wish. Many others have formed settlements in various places, one of which we passed through on the Colorado, a good sugar growing region. They informed us that they wished to engage in the cultivation of the sugar cane, but as yet none of their company were able to erect a mill. We were informed when in East Texas that they were looking for 20,000 of them there to settle this season, on the head waters of the Trinity or Red river, which is the best cotton growing part of the State.

A few weeks before we passed, an agent for a company of French made a purchase of a large tract of land, through which we travelled on the waters of the Sabine. It is a beautiful country, and if they turn their attention to cotton raising, it will be a good opening for us. The cotton can be hauled to Shreveport, Louisiana.

On the waters of the Sabine we stopped in a neighbourhood of emigrants from Indiana, who are about commencing the cotton growing business. One of their number said he was anxious to sell his cotton to us, and he thought all the settlements would be when they got to business. His address is Tount, Hopkins county, Texas. A large settlement is forming there from Indiana and Illinois. It is near this place that the large body of Germans are expected to settle.

We passed a large settlement on the Trinity, of free labourers, who are about commencing cotton raising. They can float a boat down the Trinity. — was particularly delighted in hearing of our arrangements, and promised to write when they got to business. His nearest post office is now twenty miles distant, but they are about having one established near, the name of which he will send when he writes. The people will not raise much cotton until they become more numerous; they can make more by raising provisions to sell to new comers. The settlements are too few and small to justify the erection of gins. I look upon Texas as presenting the best opening for collecting free labour productions; in a few years, of any place in the United States. There are but few slaves yet introduced, from different reasons. 1. The want of navigation to transport the produce to a market has operated against it. 2. The uncertainty of establishing the Republic. In case they failed, the slaves would be free under the Mexican law. 3. The thinly settled country in the west and north afforded the slaves greater facility in escaping to the Mexicans or Indians. The continual disagreements between the Texans and these prevented the latter from feeling under any obligations to return the slaves when they escaped, but the reverse. With these barriers there appears not to be any slave market yet opened; the slaves that are there having been carried in by emigrants from the Southern States. With the number of northern emigrants that have settled in Texas, the great emigration already from Europe, and the large number of the southern emigrants who own no slaves; it would be no hard matter, if the subject was properly agitated among them, to make a law preventing all slave emigration into the State.

With the great facilities for emigrants in many parts of Texas, would it not be a prudent step to turn the tide of emigration from England and Ireland in that direction, where they would have no winter to provide for, and with a few hours labour each day they might make a comfortable subsistence, greatly benefitting themselves, leaving a vacancy behind for those that cannot, or do not wish to leave, filling our country with useful citizens, and assisting in restoring long withheld rights to three millions of our fellow citizens.

After saying thus much about Texas, we will turn to Arkansas, the next place of our visit. We crossed Red river, near the corner of the State, in the Indian Territory, and kept down the river some sixty miles or over, and heard of considerable free cotton, but it is raised so scattering that there appeared no opportunity at present of getting a free labour gin established. The character of the Red river cotton has stood so high, that the slaveholders have pretty well filled up that portion of the country best adapted to the cotton culture. Despairing of getting much free cotton there, and my health being poor, we shaped our course directly for Little Rock. When we got on the waters of the Washita, we heard of some strong free labour settlements; we visited them, and made two good arrangements, one with —, who has a good gin, and is quite willing to arrange with us. There are but few slaves in his settlement, and not more than four or five in that portion where he gets his cotton. The other arrangement was with —, about fifteen miles from the first. Here is a large settlement of free labourers, and but two slaves in the whole neighbourhood, and they not field hands. The people are just commencing the cotton raising business, and it bids fair to be good opening for our operations. — is a man of great influence among his neighbours, and we think him a worthy man. He will give all the cotton in his settlement, as there is no other within ten miles of him. His principles are settled against slaveholding, and he is anxious to have an arrangement with us, appearing fully convinced of the consistency of our course. The names of the free laborers with their address will accompany this.

By the accounts forwarded, you will perceive we made arrangements whereby there may be about 2100 bales of free grown and free ginned cotton procured the next year, and with proper encouragement the amount may be increased from year to year as the demand increases. It was the opinion of nearly all that we talked with that it would increase. Gins will be erected in many settlements for the purpose of ginning free labour cotton, if those that have made conditional arrangements should succeed well.

In many settlements that we passed through the largest portion of cotton is cultivated by free labour, but the gins being owned by slaveholders we could not make arrangements to procure it. We received information of many other settlements beside those we visited, that are now in a situation to furnish a quantity of free cotton.

Jackson county, Tennessee, was often spoken of as one of the best openings; some of the adjoining counties were also recommended. From what we heard I have but little doubt there may be several hundred bales collected in that section of country. In many parts of Florida there is said to be a large quantity of free labourers. So of the lower parts of North Carolina, and some in Georgia.

I hope you will bear with me. I have extended this document far more now than I expected, and left off many small items that I had intended to have mentioned, but the length of this forbade. I can't feel satisfied without hinting at one point that I wish to see touched on in your valuable organ, the Non-Slaveholder, by those that are able to do it justice, that is, the expediency of the free labour enterprise, with the right and justice of the cause, of which there has been so many valuable articles written, seemingly enough to convince the judgment of any man that was not interested in it in some pecuniary way. And in doing it, I will simply refer to some of my discoveries in the south. It may be recollected that there is a majority of non-slaveholders in all the States, and they only need arousing to a sense of their misery to cause them to act. The state of society is such, that there is no particular alliance to cause them to cling together, but the reverse. Society may properly be divided into three classes—the high, the middling, and the low—each moving in its respective sphere. The first consists of the wealthy slaveholder, who looks upon all who labour as below his notice as an associate; the second, of those who own a few slaves, but not enough to take off the disgrace of labour, most of whom are in full pursuit of the first class, hoping to arrive at the point where they can dispense with labour, and take a higher stand of respectability; the consequence is that many of them commence too soon, and the result is an early bankruptcy. The third class are those who are not able to own any slaves, but are compelled to labour for all they get. This class are more in numbers than both the others, and are by some denominated poor white trash. Many of them are truly miserable; destitute of many of the comforts of life. Schools are scarce, and far between. Few of this class can read, and being deprived of the common social visits we have in this country, often too poor, if they could read, to take any paper, they can know but little about anything beyond their own observation. They feel themselves oppressed; they know the prejudice that exists against them. The consequence is, when they can find portions of country where they can form society of their own, and enjoy equal liberties, they congregate in such places, which is the case in most of the settlements where we have made our cotton arrangements.

Now our efforts afford an opportunity for the friends of equal rights to go among them; and in explaining the nature of the testimony to them, it unfolds the cause of their oppression, and they rejoice to find a people who can sympathise with them, and look upon labour as honourable and right, which causes them to embrace our sentiments with joy and gladness. They only need to have this testimony discussed among them, and we will have a host of efficient labourers in the midst of the system who will speak and act from experience. They only have to demand justice and it will be granted: their numbers are too numerous to be denied.

I have endeavoured to give a faithful account of my proceedings in all essential parts. It has been a laborious travel, but in this we do not complain. We can truly say it has produced the reward of peace to us in doing what we considered duty.

The difficulty of getting directions from you through the mail placed us measurably under the necessity of directing our course, which we have endeavoured to do to the best advantage of the cause in which we were labouring, irrespective of difficulties and dangers to ourselves. We now return with gratitude to our Preserver whose hand has been extended over us.

I am your friend,

NATHAN THOMAS.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, EIGHTH MONTH 1, 1848.

LONDON YEARLY MEETING OF FRIENDS.—The intelligence we communicated last month, respecting the lively interest manifested by the proceedings of Friends in New York and New England, in relation to slavery, and their duties in connection with it, must have been, we are sure, highly gratifying and strengthening to many of our readers. They will see in this movement, not only the dawning of a brighter day to the stricken slave, but the prospect of increased strength to our religious society, inasmuch as "he that hath clean hands shall be stronger and stronger."

We are now enabled through the kindness of our English correspondents, and some printed reports, to give an account of the proceedings of London Yearly Meeting on the same subject. "After the reading of the Epistles from America," says one of our letters, "William Forster addressed the meeting on the subject of slavery, and the slave-trade, in the very spirit of a Woolman and a Benezet; stating that at times it weighed down his spirit in a manner almost more than his nature could bear, and exhorted us to faithfulness in maintaining our Christian testimony against the cruel tyranny which these systems involve and uphold."

This beloved friend and his wife, who is also a minister of the Gospel, and a sister of the late Sir T. Fowell Buxton, have long been concerned to exclude the productions of slavery from their table, as the senior Editor and his wife had the satisfaction to learn whilst enjoying their kind hospitality for a few days last autumn.

At a subsequent sitting of the Yearly Meeting, a Minute of the Meeting for Sufferings on the slave trade and slavery was read, from which it appeared that the latter meeting had preferred leaving it to the Yearly Meeting to petition Parliament upon this subject, if the way should open. A proposition was accordingly made, that the Yearly Meeting should petition the Government for the entire exclusion of slave grown sugar from the Kingdom. "An animated discussion," says the London Friend, "ensued, on the nature of such petition. The Meeting was united in a strong feeling of duty in regard to the public expression at this time, of our convictions against the sin of the Slave-trade and of Slavery; but considerable diversity of sentiment was exhibited, as to what we ought to ask the legislature to do in the matter. The object proposed by the Meeting for Sufferings, viz., the prohibition of sugar from Cuba and the Brazils, did not meet with general concurrence; some regarding it as a compromise of principle, to ask for the exclusion of one article of slave-produce only; and others maintaining that the legal prohibition of slave sugar would be wholly inoperative towards the end in view, namely, the extinction or diminution of the slave-trade. An appeal was made to Friends to abstain from all articles of slave-production, and forcible reasons were advanced for this sacrifice. It was thought too by some who spoke, that we cannot consistently approach the legislature, for the exclusion of any unrequited labour, until we have done all in our power, as individuals, to substitute for them free-labour articles. A Committee was eventually appointed to consider the subject, and if they should see fit, to bring in the draft of a petition to the House of Commons on the general question, care being taken in praying for legislative interference, that our testimony against the use of armed vessels should be fully set forth. The Committee made report to a subsequent sitting that they were not prepared to submit a petition for the adoption of the Meeting, but recommended that the subject should be left to the watchful oversight of the Meeting for Sufferings, which was agreed to."

In the British Friend we find the following statement of these proceedings.

"A Friend introduced, at considerable length, the question of abstinence from the produce of slave-labour; and for a time, the current of feeling in the Meeting seemed in favour of that practice; and in accordance with such a view, a proposal was made to petition Parliament against the introduction of slave-grown sugar. A number of Friends, however, objected to this course: on the ground that, from the almost universal implication in the use of the produce of Slavery, our own hands could not be said to be clean, and hence our going to Parliament would, under these circumstances, be only exposing our own inconsistency. It was therefore concluded, to petition on the general ground of our well known testimony against the slave system; whereupon, a committee was named to draw up the petition, and to bring it in to a future sitting."

"The Committee appointed at a former sitting, to prepare a Petition to Parliament on the question of Slavery, reported, that after giving the subject the best consideration they were able, they had not seen their way to the essaying of a Petition at the present time; and they therefore recommended referring the subject to the Meeting for Sufferings, to act therein as it may deem to be for the best; in which recommendation the Meeting concurred."

We hope much good from the earnest discussion and the weighty consideration which it is evident the subject of abstaining from the use and consumption of the productions of slavery, obtained in London Yearly Meeting.

Time was when the immediate participation of Friends in the African slave-trade and in holding slaves, often led that meeting into deep sorrow and exercise. This participation has long ceased, but slavery and the slave-trade exist in a greater extent than at that day, and a new era now occurs in the history of the Yearly Meeting. Its members deplore the continuance of the inhuman system, and are "united in a strong feeling of duty in regard to the public expression of their convictions against the sin;" but when they essay to put forth their hands, behold! they are stained with the blood of the slave. They feel that by asking Parliament to exclude one article of slave produce, while they, themselves, are receiving and using or consuming both that and other articles of the same character, they would only expose their own inconsistency, and that in reply to their remonstrances, the Government might justly say, "Physician, heal thyself."

We are glad that our English Friends have thus been brought into a very narrow place; that the duty of abstaining from all articles of slave production has been so powerfully impressed on their consciences. We trust they will not be long unprepared for the battle, nor rest satisfied to remain idle while a great work is to be performed in the Lord's vineyard, and the call to labour has been loudly sounded in their hearts. There was an occasion when the children of Israel "turned their backs before their enemies," and "fled before the men of Ai," and "the hearts of the people melted and became as water." They had taken of the accursed thing, and had also stolen, and had put it even among their own stuff, "therefore the children of Israel could not stand before their enemies, but turned their backs," and it was not till the Babylonish garment, the shekels of silver, and the wedge of gold were removed from the camp, that the men of Ai were made to flee before them.

We rejoice in knowing that amongst our beloved brethren in Great Britain, there are faithful Joshuas, and that the hearts of many are open to receive the truth in relation to their individual duties respecting the "accursed thing" which has been brought amongst them. May it be speedily removed, so that with willing hearts and strong hands they may go boldly forth at the command of the Lord.

ADDRESS OF THE LONDON ANTI-SLAVERY CONFERENCE TO THE FRIENDS OF THE ANTI-SLAVERY CAUSE IN THE UNITED KINGDOM.—The last number of the London Anti-Slavery Reporter contains a forcible Appeal against the system of African emigration, as it has been carried on in the British Colonies, and in favour of the repeal of the Act of 1846, so far as slave-grown sugar are concerned; also in reference to the unjust and oppressive laws by which the labouring population of the Colonies, especially in British Guiana and Trinidad, have been deprived of their just rights, and a power has been placed in the hands of their employers wholly at variance with equality and sound policy.

The friends of the Anti-Slavery cause are earnestly urged to put themselves into immediate communication with their borough and county members, and urgently press on them the necessity of acting in conformity with the resolutions adopted by the Conference.

The London anti-slavery committee have laboured on these subjects most faithfully, and with unwavering perseverance; but, we are sorry to say, with little success, and we fear the present government will adhere to the policy recently pursued. Is it not time, therefore, that "not leaving these things undone," British Abolitionists, and those of America also, should turn their attention more earnestly and practically to an individual adoption of the moral principles which are urged upon the observance of the Government.

We know, and rejoice in knowing, that strong efforts have recently been made, and are now in progress in England, to awaken the people to this duty. When the news of the passage of the sugar Act of 1846 reached us, we used the following language to our friends in that country, and in the present crisis we would again respectfully address it to them.

"We turn with intense interest and hopeful anticipations to the course which may now be pursued by the philanthropists of Great Britain. They have declared that the measures adopted by Government, will have the effect of strengthening the system of slavery, of stimulating the slave-trade, and of adding to the horrors of both; that it will, as certainly, and almost as directly, increase the slave-trade, as if this country had given a premium for every kidnapped negro forced on board the slavers and carried from Africa through the unutterable horrors of the middle passage, to interminable bondage; that besides the increased sacrifice of human life, and the augmentation of crime and suffering which will undoubtedly be the fruits of this measure, they contemplate with the deepest sorrow, its destructive effects upon all that is done and is doing for the civilization of Africa; and that the slaves who are murdered by wholesale, to make the quantity of sugar now exported from Cuba or Brazil, will have to make more—that is, they must be forced by the lash to a new excess of labour, at which they will be more wretched while they live, and under which they will race rapidly die."

"In view of these deplorable consequences, we would most seriously press the question upon our friends in the British Isles, what is it that will alone give effect [and, we may now say, has alone given effect] to the measure so justly deprecated? The answer is obvious—the consumption of the slave-grown sugar. They say truly, that 'when the labourer is free, every augmentation in the demand for the produce of his toil increases his means of subsistence and comfort; when the labourer is a slave, it as certainly diminishes them and destroys him.' But this augmentation of the demand for slave-grown sugar, and the demand itself, are consequences, not of any governmental measure, but simply of the individual consumption of the article. If the act of the Government in permitting slave-grown sugar to be landed at London or Liverpool is wrong, because such sugar is stolen property, we know of no process by which its character can be afterwards so changed that the merchant, the grocer, and the consumer may rightfully purchase it. [The Cuban and Brazilian planters would not be likely to send a second crop of sugar, while the first remained unsold and unconsumed in the storehouses of English seaports.]

"How plain then is the path of duty which now opens to British Abolitionists. It will not do to plead that they cannot distinguish between slave-grown and free-grown sugars. In every town and village, and hamlet of England, they may readily make arrangements to procure sugars unstained by the blood of the slave. It is only needful that they should realize their individual responsibility in the case, and arouse the people also, as did Clarkson and his coadjutors when labouring for the overthrow of the Anglo-African slave-trade. We say then to the British Abolitionists, let pamphlets, such as that which Clarkson asserts occasioned the general abstinence from sugar in England in 1791 and 1792, be placed in every family in your Kingdom; let all be made to feel that 'the consumer is equally guilty with the planter;' proclaim in every ear that 'so far as our means extend, we are to combat evil as if its extinction depended on our individual action;' carry out thus your individual duties, as Christians, and you will need no laws to prevent the introduction of slave-grown sugars over your threshold."

We need scarcely say, that these remarks are equally applicable to all in our own country, who regard slavery as an evil and desire its extinction.

EXPEDIENT OF ABSTINENCE FROM SLAVE PRODUCTS.—Our friend Nathan Thomas, whose notes of travel are concluded in this paper, is deeply impressed, by his observations during his journey, with the expediency and importance of collecting free grown cotton as a means of arousing the energies of the non-slaveholders in the south, who in many places, and taking all the slave States into the account, form a majority of the white people. He thinks that even those abolitionists who have not learned to regard abstinence from slave products as a moral duty, may with great propriety adopt it as the most efficient medium through which correct principles on the subject of slavery can be disseminated in the slaveholding States. When the non-slaveholders of the south find that a plan is in operation which directly tends to elevate them from their depressed condition, they will be stimulated to active exertions for their own improvement. Our friend believes that this class, when thus aided and enlightened to their true interests, will labour for themselves and the slave not less benevolently in the political and moral than in the cotton field. Few of them could now read anti-slavery publications, if these could be circulated amongst them, and the slaveholders take no pains, we can readily believe, to give them favourable accounts of the actions and motives of abolitionists. Elevate the poor white people of the south, and give them the right of suffrage—which, notwithstanding our boasted democracy, they do not now enjoy in all the slave States—and the political power of slaveholders would soon be at an end.

This view of the effect to be anticipated from a general preference for the products of free labour is undoubtedly an interesting and important one, and should receive the attention of the friends of the slave. It will be seen, also, by the extracts from N. Thomas's letters, that even slaveholders have felt the influence of consistent anti-slavery action. In a letter recently received from him, and dated at New Garden, Indiana, alluding to an individual with whom he had frequent intercourse in the south, he says: "I had the pleasure a few days ago of welcoming one of ———'s slaves to our school. He came in company with several young men from Mississippi. ——— is expected soon with some others, who are now at Cincinnati. I have just received a letter from my friend ———, of ———, mentioned in my Report, who has concluded to take our advice about his slaves, and we shall look for them soon. He speaks of the friends of the poor coloured people in terms of commendation."

The writer adds: "Can you make arrangements to encourage the emigration to Texas of persons who will be useful when there? A company is making arrangements to go from this place, and a letter received yesterday from my fellow-traveller of your State, informs me that a considerable company is preparing to go from his neighbourhood."

We trust the labours of our esteemed friend, during his long journey, attended with many perils and much privation and fatigue, will be greatly blessed in various happy results, both to himself and to the good cause for which he is a faithful, practical and devoted advocate.

THE RESULT OF THE LABOURS OF BRITISH AND OTHER PHILANTHROPISTS.—There is too much truth in the following remarks which we take from the London "Times," May 29th. "It may well be asked—and every abolitionist should put the question to himself—why, after all the efforts of Great Britain for more than half a century to promote emancipation, 'the gross amount of negro slavery throughout the world has been progressing fully in the ratio of the increased consumption of sugar, coffee and other West Indian produce, and England is losing all power of softening or ameliorating [by legislative acts] the condition of the slaves?' And why 'Clarkson, Wilberforce, and the abolitionists,' have not succeeded in checking the seizure of slaves in the interior of Africa, but have aggravated the horrors of the middle passage, and have driven the slave to the tender mercies of the Brazilian or United States planter?' The answer is so obvious, so simple, so incontrovertible that we cannot but wonder it is not perceived by the wise men who are seeking 'measures' and 'fiscal regulations' to destroy the cruel system.

Where now would have been American slavery

if the first bale of slave grown cotton introduced into England had been rejected as the fruit of piracy!

Why is it that long after one half the original states of this Union have abolished slavery, it continues to flourish in the other, and to extend far and wide into new states and adjoining territories? Simply because of the increased consumption of sugar, cotton, and other tropical productions by those who no longer hold slaves themselves. Why will not the abolitionists of the present day learn wisdom from the experience of those who have passed away? Why do they content themselves with endeavouring to lop a few of the branches of the poisonous tree, instead of drying up the source of its nourishment which is under their control? It would, undoubtedly, be the "least of two evils," to hold the slaves ourselves and cultivate our own sugar and cotton, instead of procuring them from "countries where they are grown by slaves whose compulsory labour we cannot regulate; whose condition we cannot better, and whose transportation from Africa to the various slave markets we cannot prevent." We must leave it to those, who, while they condemn the "least," are committing the "greater" evil, to explain their own inconsistency; for ourselves, we must earnestly bear our testimony against both.

"Were Clarkson and Wilberforce right or wrong in the steps they took in the cause of negro emancipation? Sentimentalism apart, are they to be numbered amidst the enlightened benefactors of humanity? The practical result of all the efforts Great Britain has made during the last half century for the abolition of slavery is merely this:—The gross amount of negro slavery throughout the world has been progressing fully in the ratio of the increased consumption of sugar, coffee, and other West Indian produce; and England is losing all power of softening or ameliorating the condition of the slave. Let us suppose for a moment that all the legislative acts for the abolition of slavery which the humanity of philanthropists ever devised, or the votes of Parliament ever passed into law, had never been thought or spoken of, and what would have been the result? It is well to look the plain truth boldly in the face, and ascertain whether the condition of the African has been at all bettered by our exertions. Let us suppose all emancipation acts to have been waste paper, compensatory sums of twenty millions at a time never to have been plied from the English tax payer; and that the estuaries of the African rivers had never witnessed the evolutions of an English squadron amidst their pestilential miasma and deadly fogs. We may fairly presume that in this case the slave trade between the African coast and the British West Indies would have been regularized. The oscillations of demand and supply would have kept their even pace. Philanthropy, instead of doing what it has done, would have taken another form. Philanthropy would have declined as of old about the horrors of the middle passage, and to the softening of the horrors of the middle passage the remedy would have been confined. Commodious vessels adapted to the traffic would have been provided. It would have been desirable, as a mercantile speculation, that the human merchandize should have arrived sound in wind and limb, and fit for delivery. This would have come to pass, or else the purveyor of slaves would have regulated his business by other conditions than the importer of oranges from Malis or the dealer in cotton from the United States. Factories or entrepôts would have been established here and there along the African coast, and by all analogy we may presume that even in the interior, even in the spots where human beings are seized and sorted for sale, some improvement on the horrors of the trade might in the course of half a century have been devised. Be this, however, as it may, it is on the condition of the slave when once under the protection of the British laws that we might have reflected with satisfaction. The original, the damning taint of the traffic we could not have washed out. We could not have restored the African who had been torn from his deserts and his home, to the society and the fellowship of early days, as dearly cherished by him as are the more refined regrets for the days of his childhood by civilized man. This we could not have done; but we could have taken the slave in Jamaica or St. Vincent as a slave, and have rendered his condition more tolerable than that of any unhappy being placed under similar circumstances. By this time a humane code of slave laws would have been enacted—the arbitrary power of corporal punishment have been taken away from the master; the separation of husband and wife, of parent and child, forbidden; regulations of the hours and conditions of labour have obtained. On the whole, such a system might have been devised, that, setting aside the original sin inherent in a traffic where man is the merchant and man the merchandize, philanthropy might have doubted, and sterner wisdom denied, that the African had been the loser by a bargain which removed him from the frantic license and constant physical suffering of barbarism, and placed him even in the lowest degree within the pale of civilization. It is conceivable, it is probable, considering the interval between the posting of a letter at Kingston and its delivery in London, in May, 1848, that the system would have shaken itself into some such form as this. Let us now turn to what we actually have done.

We have emancipated the negro. We have caused such a deficiency in the supply of labour, and so raised its price in the Antilles, that the cost of producing a ton of sugar in the British colonies is considerably higher than in foreign sugar-growing countries. Concurrently with this measure, we have said to the British West Indian colonist, you shall at once, or within a short period, lose any discriminating duty which would place you on a footing of equality with the foreign sugar grower. Your feet shall be tied, and his feet shall be loose, and yet you shall have no start in the race, which you are ruined if you lose. We are not, however, considering the question with reference to the British planters—let them perish by all means, and let the West Indian colonies be destroyed—but purely as it may affect slavery throughout the world. Sugar must be had somehow and from somewhere; if not from the British West Indies—then from the Brazils, from the United States, from countries where it will be grown by slaves whose compulsory labour we cannot regulate, whose condition we cannot better, and whose transportation from Africa to the various slave-markets we cannot prevent. That is at present the gross result of the labours of Clarkson, Wilberforce, and the abolitionists. They have not succeeded in checking the seizure of slaves in the interior of Africa; they have aggravated the horrors of the middle passage; they have driven the slave from the protection of the British flag to the tender mercies of the Brazilian or United States planter, whose proceedings are not influenced by any such public opinion as would have softened their dealings with those slaves in a British colony. It is well, ere it be too late, to ponder upon these things.

Here are a few facts from the speech delivered by Mr. Samuel Gurney to the meeting held at the London Tavern on Saturday:—

"Since 1846 a great change has taken place on the subject of the slave trade. Up to that time the slave trade had been checked by the British and other governments; and the Brazils and Spain, not by treaty, but by acts, would have abandoned the traffic if their sugar had not been admitted to this country at that time. The government of this country had thrown away, then, a golden opportunity, but not he hoped, so completely as not to be able to get it back. He would read them a few statistics of the slave trade in recent years. In 1845 the number of slaves that crossed the Atlantic was estimated at 45,000. In 1847 the number was 60,000 by official reports, but by private and well authenticated accounts it was 70,000. He would wish them to consider well what the slave trade really was. He would mention one or two cases by way of elucidation. One of our admirals, within the present month, had written to his government that he had a slaver in tow of 60 tons burden, with 217 individuals on board. The system of packing those individuals was such as to make them a solid mass of human corruption. Some few remained alive. He knew cases in which nine out of ten of the persons composing cargoes of slaves died on the voyage. If such vessels of 60 tons were employed to transport the 60,000 slaves in 1847, the meeting might form some calculation as to the amount of deaths. He only told half the evils of the slave trade when he mentioned the horrors and deaths during the Atlantic voyage. What if he told them of the wars and cruelties exercised in Africa—of the ruin committed in that country to get possession of those unfortunate individuals—if he told them all, they would see that for every 70,000 exported from Africa an equal number had been destroyed. He believed that the consequence of the African slave trade, as now carried on, was at least 1,000 deaths a-day!

This meeting in itself is no inconsiderable symptom of the change of public opinion on this matter, or rather of the strange manner in which parties have been brought together who were formerly in diametrical antagonism. The West Indian interest and the abolitionists are now making common cause, the one to preserve their estates, the other to prevent the abolition of slavery becoming a mere delusion. The means to be adopted for the attaining of these two distinct ends are identical."

We now have the satisfaction definitely to inform the friends of the Free Produce cause in Ohio, that Joseph Williams, having recently procured a stock of Free Labour Goods from the store in this city, has opened a Free Produce Store at Mount Pleasant, and intends keeping no other than the products of free labour.

SELECTIONS.

From the National Anti-Slavery Standard.

SLAVE PRODUCTS.

Friend Gay:—Your intelligent and candid remarks on my last article are worthy of impartial examination. I do not maintain that there is a "perfect" analogy between the holding of slaves and the use of slave products. The question is, whether or not there is an analogy which requires us to predicate moral wrong of both, if of either!

Is it correct to consider the refraining from the voluntary purchase and use of goods, known and affirmed by ourselves to be stolen, simply "as a means to an end?" Is it not a moral duty? Of the slaveholder, you say, "His wrong is primary and voluntary; that of the consumer of slave products is secondary and involuntary." The wrong of the robber indeed precedes the wrong of the receiver and purchaser of the stolen goods. Does this prove the innocence of the latter? I cannot admit that we ate "involuntary" in purchasing and using the known fruits of slavery. If Abolitionists are to be considered "involuntary" in doing so, because they would prefer free goods, if they could conveniently obtain them at the same expense, then are slaveholders acting "involuntarily," who would prefer free labourers if they could so obtain them. "The slaveholder," you remark, "in his own person, deprives his fellow-man of all his rights, and is bound to restore them to him. It is his first duty. The consumer of slave-products, at the worst, is using those things which are in themselves harmless; and how far it is his duty to refrain from them, under the circumstances of their unpaid production, depends upon its relation to other duties." I ask, does not the receiver of stolen goods "deprive his fellow-man of his rights?" If the slaveholder deprives his fellow-man of his rights, by taking from him the fruits of his unpaid toil, and selling it for his own benefit, is not the purchaser, who knows the facts in the case, involved in the same guilt? May the receiver of stolen sheep excuse himself by saying, I am using creatures "which are in themselves harmless!" Can we truthfully say, "how far it is his duty to refrain from" purchasing them from the sheep-stealers, depends upon its relation to other duties?

My friend remarks, "The slaveholder can abolish slavery at once, for it exists at his will." So far, my dear sir, can the consumers of their ill-gotten goods "abolish slavery at once, for it exists" by the profits voluntarily paid by them. You will admit that although the individual slaveholder can do but little towards demolishing the whole infernal system, by emancipating his few slaves, it is his duty to do so; so I say in respect to the refraining of the Abolitionist from the purchase and use of those fruits, the profits of which are the vital sustenance of the whole body of slavery's iniquities.

You concede that "abstinence" is a "right" measure. Is it not wrong to omit a right measure as far as we can adopt it? You add, "but as it is neither the only right, nor the only expedient one, it is a question how far it can be used without encroaching upon other acknowledged duties," &c. As moral rights and duties are perfectly harmonious, and, consequently, can never encroach on each other, I think this inference inadmissible. If the purchase of stolen goods is not a case of moral wrong; if it is a mere matter of expediency, whether or not I shall be continually purchasing goods I know and affirm to be stolen, then is your reasoning sound. Will you allow the man, who opens shops for the purpose of receiving stolen goods, thus to excuse himself, saying, refraining from doing this is not the only right measure to prevent stealing; therefore, it is a question how far it can be used without encroaching upon other duties; such as the duty of supporting my family, &c.?

You justly require the slaveholder to make every sacrifice which emancipation involves; why? Because, "he has no right to rob his fellow-man," &c. You believe that he robs his fellow-man of the fruits of his hard toil; you recognize those fruits as belonging, not to the slaveholder, but to the slave. Does not your voluntary purchase of them, not of the true owner, but of the robber, sanction his injustice and involve you in his guilt? Moreover, does not your act present the chief motive to the robber to continue his unrighteousness and oppression? Is it a mere matter of expediency whether or not you shall so act? I trow not.

My friend believes that the slaveholder ought to sacrifice everything, even his life, rather than hold his brother in slavery; but that "the Abolitionist is not bound" to do so, "that he may be free from all participation" therein. This I admit. Impossibilities are not duties. To be free from all participation in slavery or other evils, we must need go out of the world. But it is as practicable for Abolitionists to abstain, to a great degree, from the purchase and use of slave products, as it is for slaveholders to emancipate their slaves. If you say to the dealers of horses, or of sheep, of cotton, or of sugar, you had better die than do this, and they reply, if so, then those who are partakers of our sins and present the chief motive for their commission, by continually and voluntarily purchasing the stolen goods, had better die than do so; will not my friend Gay "accept this reasoning?"

My esteemed friend considers that his "strong argument," and what is "more to the point," is that I, myself, use "the product of the unpaid toil of the slave." This inspires me with the hope that we shall soon see eye to eye on this subject; for if his chief foundation is the inconsistency of "friend Grew," or that of any other Abolitionist, his building is very far from being founded on a rock. If a man, who declares that it is a moral wrong to buy and use goods known to be stolen, occasionally does so himself, does this prove that the continual purchasing and using of such goods is a mere matter of expediency or inexpediency, and not a moral wrong? I do not love my neighbour as I ought. I am not perfect. Shall another plead this to justify himself in not loving his neighbour at all? For fourteen years I have, for the sake of the suffering slave, endeavoured to supply my family with groceries and cotton goods unstained with my brother's blood. It may, at least, be worthy of the consideration of my abolition brethren, what the effect would have been in respect to the poor slave, had they all done so as imperfectly as I have. Let them contemplate the deplorable fact, that to supply their demands, the unrequited toil, the unmerciful flogging, and various other outrages, are the cruel wrongs which have been perpetrated on far more than a thousand of their fellow-men, which would not have been inflicted had they refused to purchase the products of oppression. The supply of these articles is in proportion to the demand.

With grateful acknowledgements of your kind liberality in allowing, for truth's sake, a full and fair discussion to this important subject, I remain, yours truly,

HENRY GREW.

SLAVERY IN THE DISTRICT.

Messrs. Editors:—I was much interested in the argument of Lysander Spooner upon the unconstitutionality of slavery in the District of Columbia, and have been led thereby to examine the question of slavery in the District, in company with a friend and neighbour. The view we take of it may not be unworthy of public consideration; and I will quote verbatim, the sections of the constitution and laws to which I refer, for the convenience of your readers.

In the Constitution of the United States, adopted 17th September, 1787, Section 8, it is provided that,

"Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such District (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular states, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of government of the United States."

On the 16th July, 1790, the President approved an act for establishing the permanent seat of government; of which the first section is as follows:

"1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That a district of territory not exceeding ten miles square, to be located as hereafter directed, on the River Potomac, at some place between the mouths of the eastern branch and Comangocheague, be, and the same is hereby accepted for the permanent seat of the government of the United States: Provided, nevertheless, That the operation of the laws of the state within such district shall not be affected by this acceptance, until the time fixed for the removal of the government thereto, and until Congress shall otherwise provide."

Section 6th provides that on the first Monday of December, 1800, the seat of government shall be transferred to the District. See laws of the United States, vol. 1, chap. xxviii.

It was the only condition of the cession by the States of Maryland and Virginia, that the laws of those States should be in force in the District, until Congress accepted the grant. The grant being accepted, Congress deemed it necessary, in the exercise of its power of "exclusive legislation," to provide either a new code of laws, or to continue the State laws until the occupation of the District by the officers of government, and until Congress shall otherwise by law provide.

On the 27th February, 1801, the President approved of an act of which the first section is as follows:

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by, &c., That the laws of the State of Virginia, as they now exist, shall be and continue in force in that part of the District of Columbia which was ceded by the said State to the United States, and by them accepted for the permanent seat of government; and that the laws of the State of Maryland, as they now exist, shall be, and continue in force in that part of the said District, which was ceded by that State to the United States, and by them accepted as aforesaid."

Thus at the first session at the permanent seat of government in the District, did Congress directly enact over the District the laws of Virginia and Maryland, which ceased to be in force—slave laws and all: and the man who asserts that Congress has never perpetuated the existence of slavery, is either guilty of a wilful falsehood, or else betrays his ignorance and stupidity.

Now the same power that creates an obligation can dissolve it. A legislature may repeal laws of its own enactment, and Congress has the power to abolish slavery and the slave-trade in the District of Columbia. Let Congress repeal the first section of the act of February 1st, 1801, by which it re-enacted the slave laws of Virginia and Maryland, and every slave within ten miles square would become a freeman.

Look for a moment at these old slave laws of which we speak. In Virginia and Maryland, the severity of the slave laws yielding somewhat to the advancing spirit of the age, have been modified; but they are still unchanged in the District. These laws forbid the education of the slave; thus depriving him of the information of what the laws are, whilst they inflict upon him the punishment of death for several offences, which, if committed by a white person, are only punishable by fine or imprisonment. These also require that a slave guilty of murder shall be hung, drawn and quartered, and that his dismembered limbs be exposed in four of the most public places in the District; one of which most public places would be, of course, in front of the Capitol itself. And these are the laws that are enacted and continued in full force and obligation by the representatives of this republic!

Messrs. Editors, shall we not petition for the repeal of the first section of the act of Feb. 27th, 1801? Don't stop to argue that slavery is unconstitutional from the preamble to the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, and therefore should be abolished in the District. Show the people of the free States (and of the slave too) that Congress has by its enactments sustained slavery there, and ask them unitedly to implore Congress to repeal its cruel, black, disgraceful laws, or else to remove the seat of government to a soil where slavery does not, and cannot exist.

ENGLISH PAUPERS AND AMERICAN SLAVES.

The last Millennial Harbinger contains a long quotation from the National Intelligencer, intended to demonstrate that the condition of the slaves in this country, is superior to that of the paupers of Great Britain. Well, suppose it is, what then? Does that make slavery right, or justify its continuance? Are the people of this country to rest satisfied because it happens that there is a class of creatures in another nation worse off, even, than our slaves? No one will venture to answer these questions affirmatively, and yet if they are not so answered, there is no object gained by the comparison. To our mind, if the facts stated be true, the comparison, although against Great Britain, is nothing in favour of the United States. It may prove that our slaves are a grade above British paupers; but it can never prove that American slaves are what they ought to be. If a drunkard is better than a thief, it does not follow that it is right therefore to be a drunkard. If Great Britain tramples on her poor, for that wrong God will hold her responsible. He will also hold the people of this nation responsible for the wrongs done to the slaves;—and in His sight it will be no mitigation of the offence to plead that the victims of our wrong suffered less than the victims of Great Britain.

Let us not be understood, however, as admitting that there is any truth or justice in the comparison alluded to. We do not believe that the condition of the British pauper is at all to be compared to that of the American slave.—Perhaps in some places the slave may be better fed, but as the experience of millions can testify.—Washington (Pa.) Patriot.

"It is not all of life to" EAT,

To Jeandell and Vincent:—I herewith enclose an address delivered immediately after the close of the Circuit Court of the United States, sitting at New Castle, Judges Taney and Hall on the Bench, 5th month 29th, 1848, after the close of my trials, for the penalties of aiding the escape of certain slaves from their owners, where the penalties and damages were awarded by the jurors for seven slaves (a mother and six children) from one to sixteen years of age, to be $5,400, after a verdict had been rendered against J. Hunn for $2,500 in the same case. Judge Taney had left the Court before it adjourned; Judge Hall I invited to stay, and hear me, but he left when I was about to commence. If thou art of opinion that it is worthy a place in the Chicken, thou art at liberty to publish it, and oblige

THOMAS GARRETT.

"I have a few words which I wish to address to the Court, Jury and prosecutors in the several suits that have been brought against me, during the sittings of this Court, in order to determine the amount of penalty I must pay for doing what my feelings prompted me to do as a lawful and meritorious act—a simple act of humanity and justice, as I believe, to eight of that oppressed race, the people of colour, whom I found in the New Castle Jail, in the 12th month, 1845. I will now endeavour to state the facts of those cases for your consideration and reflection after you return home to your families and friends: you will then have time to ponder on what has transpired here since the sitting of this Court, and I believe that your verdict will then be unanimous that the laws of the United States, as explained by our venerable Judge, when compared with the act committed by me, are cruel and oppressive, and need remodelling. Information was sent me that eight coloured persons were in New Castle jail, charged with being runaway slaves, and that the individual believed several of them were entitled to their freedom, and requested to have their case investigated. I went to New Castle next morning, and took Edith Pusey along and had an interview with Samuel Hawkins, Emily, (his wife,) and some of the children, in a private room, in the presence of the Sheriff, Jacob Caulk. Hawkins and wife admitted to us that two of their sons claimed by Glandring were slaves; but assured us, in the most positive manner, that themselves and four small children were entitled to freedom; that himself and wife had been keeping house, and living together as free persons previous to the birth of the eldest of the four children. Neither the Sheriff, or myself, had the slightest doubt of the truth of their statement. The Sheriff thought the mother so good a Christian that she would not lie even to free her own children. I then requested to see the commitments of the Magistrate, which were handed to me. Tat once saw that they were defective; and had no doubt, if the individuals were taken before Judge Booth, (by legal process,) but what he would discharge the parents and four young children, if not the two older boys. After my return home, I called on Wales; stated the facts of the case; and requested him to accompany me to New Castle, in order to take the family above-named before Chief Justice Booth for examination. The habeas corpus was prepared, and they were all taken before Booth, about eleven o'clock, on second day morning. The investigation lasted about one hour. The business was conducted by Attorney Wales in such a manner that the Judge was induced to discharge the whole family; and with his decision I was well pleased; but had little or no hope when they were taken before him that the two boys would be discharged. The statement made by Samuel and wife, in the Judge's office, was the same in substance as they had made in prison to the Sheriff, Edith Pusey, and myself; and that was, that the mother and four young children were free—the two elder children slaves. I then put this question to Chief Justice Booth: 'As those people have been discharged, will there be any impropriety in my employing a hack to take them to Wilmington?' My impression then was, and still remains the same, that his reply was 'O no.' I then in the Judge's office and presence, asked the Sheriff to procure a carriage. He sent his son for one, and the owner came into the Judge's office, where we made the contract for him to take them to Wilmington. In about half an hour, they were all in the carriage, and started for Wilmington, and arrived at my store at noon, nothing secret, or covert, in the transaction whatever. And I now most solemnly aver, that when they were discharged by Judge Booth, and for some time after they arrived in Wilmington, I had not even a suspicion of the mother and four small children being slaves. If my statement above is correct, which I presume will not be questioned by any one acquainted with my character, your verdict of $2,500 for the penalty as rendered by you on Seventh day last was not just, as the Judge in his charge to the Jury, on that occasion, distinctly stated I must at least have cause to believe them to be slaves to entitle the plaintiff to a verdict. With that small clause, as explained in my favour by the Judge, I was entitled to your verdict of acquittal. I do not pretend to assert that I was able, with the latitude allowed to the witness, to prove my innocence in this case clearly to the Jury. The Judge's charge was positively against me, if I knew they were slaves, or had good cause to suspect them of being such, even though examined by and discharged by the Judge. The first case tried during my absence, while I was sick at home, was different—I believed the two boys claimed by Glandring to be slaves; but the Judge having set them at liberty, I thought there would be no breach of law, or risk of penalty, in providing them a conveyance with the rest of the family to Wilmington; and had I believed every one of them to be slaves, I should have done the same thing, after they had been released by the Judge, with the feelings of humanity which the Almighty has implanted in my breast, and the interest I have felt for this oppressed people of colour in our midst. I should have done violence to my convictions of duty, had I not made use of all the lawful means in my power to liberate those people, and assist them to become men and women, rather than leave them in the condition of chattels personal. I am called an abolitionist, once a name of reproach, but one I have ever been proud to be considered worthy of being called. For the last twenty-five years I have been engaged in the cause of this despised and much injured race, and consider their cause worth suffering for; but owing to a multiplicity of other engagements, I could not devote so much of my time and mind to their cause as I otherwise should have done. The impositions and persecutions practised on those unoffending and innocent brethren, are extreme beyond endurance. I am now placed in a situation in which I have not so much to claim my attention as formerly, and I now pledge myself, in the presence of this assembly, to use all lawful and honourable means to lessen the burdens of this oppressed people, and endeavour according to ability furnished to burst their chains asunder, and set them free—not relaxing my efforts on their behalf while blessed with health and a slave remains to tread the soil of the State of my adoption—Delaware; and after mature reflection, I can assure this assembly it is my opinion at this time that the verdicts you have given the prosecutors against John Hunn and myself, within the past few days, will have a tendency to raise a spirit of enquiry throughout the length and breadth of the land, respecting this monster evil, (slavery,) in many minds that have not heretofore investigated the subject. The reports of those trials will be published by editors from Maine to Texas and the far West; and what must be the effect produced? It will no doubt add hundreds, perhaps thousands, to the present large and rapidly increasing army of abolitionists. The injury is great to us who are the immediate sufferers by your verdict, but I believe the verdicts you have given against us within the last few days will have a powerful effect in bringing about the abolition of slavery in this country, this land of boasted freedom, where not only the slave is fettered at the south by his lordly master, but the white man at the north is bound as in chains to do the bidding of his southern masters.

NEAR CANTWELL'S BRIDGE, }
6th mo. 6th, 1848. }

Friends Jewell and Vincent:—As you have volunteered in your last paper to publish a statement of the case tried at the last session of the United States Court for Delaware District, at New Castle, in relation to fugitive slaves, I have thought proper to write out a brief statement as far as I am concerned, in order to let my fellow-citizens know by what laws we are to be governed, and the application of the United States law of 1793 in particular. On the 5th day of the 12th month, (called December,) 1845, a free old coloured man, with his wife and six children, came to my house at half past seven o'clock in the morning, asking food and shelter, as they had travelled all night through a snow storm, and their horse was nearly ready to fall. In consequence of the deep fall of snow, they concluded to tarry with me until the roads should be opened, and recruit both themselves and their horse. The poor creatures were nearly frozen, and were very hungry. They were made welcome, and came and went as they pleased on my premises. At four o'clock, P. M., of the same day, Thomas Schee Merritt came to my house, (having received information that there were some strange coloured people there,) and at half-past four o'clock, P. M., Robert A. Cochran, Robert T. Cochran, Richard C. Hays, and Wm. Chesney, (all residing in or near Middletown) came to my house in a sleigh. I went out to meet them, and Robert A. Cochran asked me if any strange blacks were at my house. I told him yes, and he said he guessed they were runaways. I asked him why so? and he pulled out an advertisement for some, in which a reward was offered for their apprehension. I told him he could walk round and see them. They were not in the kitchen: so they proceeded to the granary, where my folks were getting off corn. Here they got sight of the old free man, and he ran from them. They gave chase, and finally he came back to my house, with two large knives in his hands. These he gave to me at my request, and showed his pass to his pursuers. They pronounced it a forgery, and said he must go before a magistrate. I protested; but it was of no avail: they took him up, and he acknowledged that his two elder boys (one fourteen and the other sixteen years old) belonged to Charles W. Glanding, of Beaver Dams, Queen Anne Co., Md., and that his wife and the four younger children (the eldest six years old and the youngest at the breast) belonged to Catherine Turner, of the same neighbourhood, but that his wife and four younger children had lived with him for six years past in a house to themselves; that said Turner had not contributed towards their support in any way; and, having a desire that they should all be free as he was, he had concluded to take them to another State. Well, the whole matter is that they took the whole family from my house and lodged them in the New Castle jail—since which I have never seen any of them—and here is the offence for which I am sentenced to pay $2,500, for feeding and warming helpless children when they were perishing with cold and hunger. In conclusion I have to say that the "negro catchers" testified before the Court to the facts of the case, with the exception to Thomas Schee Merritt. The jury was taken from the State at large, contrary to custom, as I am informed, and only three, who adjudged my case, were from New Castle County. Such a jury was summoned that my attorney (Wm. H. Rogers) thought there was no choice in them. No doubt that the Marshal knew what he was doing, as well as the Judge, (Taney) when he told the Jury that "any person who undertook to find runaways for the reward offered, was in fact the agent and attorney of the owner, and had the right to seize them wherever he could find them; and that any right-minded man would bring out any strangers (black) who might be about his premises and have them inspected, and that what I done in this case," viz., gave two meals to a starving family, "was heart-burning within the meaning of the law."

Yours, respectfully,

JOHN HUNN.

MOTIVES FOR EVANGELIZING SLAVES.

The late Southern Presbyterian Review has an article on this subject, which sets it forth as one of the contemplated results of this work to "allow Christianity to throw its broad shield over" Southern Slavery. The policy is indicated in this paragraph:

"This passage shows us the true impregnable position of the Christian slaveholder. The Bible furnishes to the slaveholder armour of proof, weapons of heavenly temper and mould whereby he can maintain his grounds against all attacks. But this is true, only when he obeys its directions as well as employs its sanctions. Our rights are there established, but it is always in connection with our duties; if we neglect the one, we cannot make good the other. Our domestic institutions can be maintained against the world, if we but allow Christianity to throw its broad shield over them. But if we do not act as to array the Bible against our social economy they must fall. Nothing ever yet stood up long against Christianity. Those who say that religious instruction is inconsistent with our peculiar civil polity, are the worst enemies of that polity.—They would drive religious men from its defence. Sooner or later, if these views prevail, they will separate the religious portion of our community from the rest, and thus divided we shall become an easy prey."

EXTRACTS FROM "AN HISTORICAL MEMOIR OF THE PENNSYLVANIA SOCIETY FOR PROMOTING THE ABOLITION OF SLAVERY," &c.

The ardent zeal and indefatigable perseverance with which the Society laboured in the cause, was manifested by the lively and extensive correspondence kept up with kindred Societies, which were now springing up in different parts of America, in their addresses to the Governors of different States in the Union, and to legislative bodies. Also, to the Societies in England and France, to whom they speak of the extent to which the practice exists here, of petitioning the several State Legislatures, and of remonstrating against the cruelties of the system of slavery and the slave-trade, and the obvious benefits resulting therefrom, as well as from the abundant circulation of essays, tracts, and numerous publications and pictorial representations, which were constantly issuing from our own, or foreign writers, showing the utter inconsistency, injustice and impolicy of slavery. They encouraged the Societies addressed to persevere in application to governments; and advised them against too sanguine expectations of success on one hand, while on the other, they were never to be discouraged or cast down by disappointment; they were urged to extend their correspondence in relation to this subject, as far as possible amongst European nations who have colonies in which negro slaves are employed.

1790. A special meeting of the Society was held in the Second month, for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of addressing a memorial to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States on the subject of the slavery of the Africans. The measure was agreed to, and a draft of such a memorial being produced, was read by paragraphs, and after some amendments adopted, and directed to be transcribed and signed by the President of the Society, and two copies transmitted, one to the Senate, and the other to the House of Representatives of the United States.

At the present day, when the Congress of the United States absolutely refuse to receive petitions from any source wherein slavery is in the remotest degree alluded to, the concluding paragraph of this memorial is particularly worthy of notice, for the strength of its diction, the extent of its demands, and for its having been approved and signed by such a high and dignified character as Benjamin Franklin, then President of the Society, for which reason it is presented here, viz.:

"From a persuasion that equal liberty was originally the portion, and is still the birthright of all men, and influenced by the strongest ties of humanity, and the principles of their institution, your memorialists conceive themselves bound to use all justifiable endeavours to loosen the bands of slavery and to promote a general enjoyment of the blessing of freedom. Under these impressions, they earnestly entreat your serious attention to the subject of slavery, that you would be pleased to countenance the restoration of liberty to those unhappy men, who alone in this land of freedom are degraded into perpetual bondage; and who amidst the general joy of surrounding freemen, are groaning in servile subjection; that you will devise means for removing this inconsistency from the character of the American people; that you will promote mercy and justice towards this distressed race, and that you will step to the very verge of the powers vested in you for discouraging every species of traffic in the persons of our fellow-men."

In the Sixth month, a special meeting was convened on the occasion of the death of Benjamin Franklin, the venerable President of the Society, which event was announced by the Vice President. No provision having been introduced into the Constitution of the Society for supplying such a vacancy as had now occurred, a Committee was appointed to consider of, and, in conjunction with the Council, to propose such amendment as may be necessary to remedy that defect; which was done; and, after the amendment submitted by the Committee had been adopted, the Society proceeded to the election of a President. James Pemberton was unanimously elected.

The operations and labours of the Society do not appear to have ever been limited to the State of Pennsylvania. A case is noticed on the minutes of a very interesting suit before the Supreme Court of New Jersey, the decision of which involved the liberties of a number of blacks unlawfully held in bondage. A Special Committee was appointed to assist the Counsel of the Society, in attending to the case, and, if necessary, employ other able counsel. The Court pronounced judgment in favour of the negro, in whose name the action was brought, declaring him to be a free man.

1791. "In the Second month, the Society was informed that a Bill had been introduced into the General Assembly of this State to enable officers of the United States to hold slaves in Pennsylvania. The Acting and Corresponding Committees forthwith drew up and presented to the House of Representatives a memorial upon the subject, which, together with the Bill, had been committed by the House. The proceedings of the Committees were fully approved by the Society, and a Special Committee appointed to assist them in opposing the progress of the bill. They subsequently reported that it had been suppressed.

At the same meeting the President, James Pemberton, communicated an invitation from the American Philosophical Society, to attend the delivery of a Eulogium to the memory of Benjamin Franklin. Whereupon it was unanimously resolved, that this Society will testify their respect for the memory of their late worthy President by their attendance upon this solemn occasion."

1792. A Committee was appointed to take measures for the establishment of an Abolition Society in New Jersey. They subsequently reported that they had succeeded in procuring the formation of a Society at Burlington, called the "New Jersey Society for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery."

1793. First Month. The Society was informed by the Committee of Correspondence that a petition had been presented to the Legislature of this state, by the French emigrants from the West Indies, praying for an alteration in the law for the gradual abolition of slavery; which application they had strenuously and successfully resisted. The Committee of the House of Representatives, to whom the petition had been referred, made a very kind and respectful Report, but very decidedly adverse to the change asked for by the petitioners; affirming, in strong language, the immutability of the principles upon which the act was passed. They say, "That considering slavery as unlawful in itself, and as repugnant to our Constitution, they are of the opinion, that it is beyond the just authority of the Legislature to authorize it under any modification whatsoever;" which Report was unanimously adopted.

At the meeting of the Society, 4th month, a letter was read from the New York Society, proposing a Convention of Delegates from all the Abolition Societies in the United States, to meet at Philadelphia, for the purpose of deliberating on the means of attaining their common object, and of uniting in an address to Congress upon that subject. After mature consideration, it was "Resolved, that the Society do agree to the proposition of the New York Society, and will appoint Delegates to the proposed Convention, provided a majority of the Abolition Societies in the United States do agree to the measure." In the 12th month, Delegates were appointed, with authority on behalf of this Society, to agree to an address to Congress on the subject of the slave trade; to decide on all matters that should come before them which have any relation to domestic slavery within the United States, and generally to unite in any measures that to the Convention may appear most likely to effect the common purposes of the several Abolition Societies. A Committee was appointed to prepare a place and provide other necessary accommodations for the meeting of the said Convention, which was proposed to be on the 1st of First month, 1794. And it was subsequently agreed that the Pennsylvania Society will defray all the expenses of copying, printing and publishing the proceedings of the Convention. The Delegates afterwards reported that the Convention assembled in the Select Council Chamber, at which ten Societies had been represented, and an address from that body to this Society had been agreed upon, which recommended, amongst other matters of great interest, the institution of annual or periodical discourses, or orations, to be delivered in public on the subject of slavery, and the means of its abolition; that by the frequent application of the force of reason, and the persuasive power of eloquence, slaveholders (or their abettors) might be awakened to a sense of their injustice, and started with horror at the enormity of their conduct. And also, that such meetings of Delegates be annually convened.

The Delegates also informed the Society that the Convention had prepared Memorials to the Congress of the United States, and to the Legislature of this state, upon the subject of slavery. A Committee was appointed to attend to the progress of these memorials before the respective Houses to which they are addressed, and to give to the members of those bodies respectively such information on the subject as may be required. That Committee subsequently reported, "That Congress had passed an act to prohibit the carrying on the slave trade from the United States to any foreign place or country."

In the Address from the Convention, 1796, they suggest the propriety of Abolitionists giving decided preference to such commodities as are of the culture or manufacture of freemen, to those which are cultivated or manufactured by slaves, as a means by which every individual may discountenance oppression, and bear a testimony against a practice which is still suffered to remain to the disgrace of our land.

1799. A committee was appointed in the 11th month, to attend to and promote the passage of a bill, then pending before the Legislature of this state, for the total abolition of slavery. They subsequently reported that they had attended the Legislature, and sedulously endeavoured to effect the purpose of their appointment, but their exertions had failed of success.

1800. Seventh Month.—A special meeting of the Society was called at the suggestion of the committee on the slave-trade; their minutes were produced, by which it appears that two American vessels, having on board a considerable number of black people, supposed to have been bound to the Havana, had been captured by one of the armed vessels of the United States, and sent into this port; and that the said black persons are now in circumstances demanding the attention of this Society. A committee was appointed to watch over their situation, and that of any others who may be hereafter brought in under the acts of Congress against the slave-trade, and to afford them such assistance and protection, by co-operating with the officers of the General and State Governments, as may be necessary, and to provide places for such as are found to be free.

1801. A bill having been introduced into the Senate of Pennsylvania, ostensibly providing for the total abolition of slavery, but containing provisions highly injurious and oppressive to the blacks; a special meeting of the Society was called, to consider the expediency of addressing the Legislature on the subject. A memorial in accordance with the decision of the meeting was prepared, from the tenor of which, it appears that it had been proposed to create a fund for the purchase of slaves, by a tax upon the free blacks for that special purpose. The memorial states, "that the Society impressed with a high regard for the Constitution of the State, have ever sincerely lamented, that a mistaken policy should have led to a violation of the first most clear and solemn declaration of its bill of rights, which declares 'That all men are born equally free and independent, and have certain inherent and indefeasible rights; among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty, of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property and reputation, and of pursuing their own happiness.' With this solid ground to act upon, they had hoped that an enlightened Legislature would with firmness have ventured to declare that slavery in this State cannot constitutionally exist, and a declaratory statute to this effect has appeared to your memorialists a consistent and just mode of at once announcing a candid and irrefutable exposition of the Constitution, and an overthrow of the existing system of domestic slavery, by which it has been so long violated. How far does the bill before you afford a prospect of these expectations being realized?"

"Why," they ask, "is the fund for the redemption of slaves to be created by a heavy and exclusive tax on the people of colour, when many of them have pined away their best days in a cruel bondage, and from the weight of declining years are now barely able by their industry to supply the common wants of nature, and are not permitted the full rights of citizenship?"

The memorial was adopted, and forwarded to the Legislature.

From the London Friend.

"The discussion in the Yearly Meeting on petitioning Parliament against the admission of slave-grown sugar exhibited a variety of opinions. Amongst other arguments in opposition to such a course of action, it was asserted that the prohibition would have no effect whatsoever towards attaining the object in view, viz., the extinction of the slave-trade and slavery. One of the Friends who advanced this sentiment has unfolded the reasons which induced him to adopt it, in a letter, which we publish below, and upon which we feel inclined to offer a few short comments.

It will be observed that the ground upon which the frequent recommendations given in our columns to refrain from the use (not merely of slave-grown sugar) but of all the products of slave-labour, have been based, is left untouched by the argument adopted in the letter. This 'quiet practical protest,' the result of moral conviction, and the influence of which we estimate so highly, remains the same, whether the reasoning of our correspondent be true or false. Not only, however, is the value of individual abstinence in no wise weakened by the result of the commercial investigation; the moral force of a national refusal to participate in the gain of oppression still exists as before. One step will have been taken towards closing our ports to the admission of 'stolen goods;' one reproof will have been administered to those governments which foster the iniquitous system of human bondage; one example will have been set to the European nations, an example which would require to be followed only by one or two other countries, and the commercial condition on which alone our friend supports his argument, would at once cease to be. We do not say that this argument, depending upon the fact that the whole consumption of sugar by Great Britain is less than the whole production of that article by free-labour, is illusory; we think, however, that the writer has himself supplied one means of answering his objection. He says that the Act of 1845, 'gave to the merchants of Java and Manilla, the choice of all the markets of Europe; if the price of sugar in London was higher than in Hamburg or Holland, they could send there the whole or any part of the one hundred and five thousand tons, of which their export consisted.' That is, as we understand it, the Act of 1845, conferred a boon upon the merchants of Java and Manilla, not shared by the planters of Cuba and Brazil. It is true our correspondent goes on to say, that 'diverting the sugar of the first mentioned islands from their former continental channels, to this country, must necessarily make room in the markets from which they were so diverted, for an equal weight of the slave produce of Cuba and Brazil;' but we submit that this is begging the question, and is equivalent to the avowal that unrestricted commerce confers no advantage. The merchants of Java and Manilla, finding the market of London, the largest in the world, open to them, would not, it may safely be asserted, rest contented to transfer their trade thither from Holland and Hamburg, and to leave those countries uncontested to their slave-labour rivals. They would eagerly embrace the new market, but they would not abandon the old. Rapid as has been the increase in the production of slave-labour sugar since 1827, the cultivation of sugar in Java and Manilla has increased still more rapidly; and we may fairly affirm, that the natural result of the Act of 1845, if time had been allowed for its full operation, would have been, to have benefited the foreign free at the expense of the slave colonies.

Some of our readers will be able to supply other and perhaps more forcible objections to the course of reasoning pursued in the letter before us. To our mind, however, the free trade argument is of itself sufficient. But even if it should be proved (an attempt which we fear to be hopeless,) that the Act of 1845, has given no real impulse to the cultivation of sugar in Cuba and Brazil, England would still, by repealing that Act, clear her own hands. Having declared the slave trade to be piracy, so far she would renounce its illegal gains; having abolished slavery in her own dominions, not on commercial but on moral grounds, she would so far carry out the principle with consistency; and the people of this country would not be compelled to fall back for protection upon the plea, that since others would be sure to partake if we did not, we might as well be sharers in the spoil.

From J. R.'s friendly attack upon the 'free produce' plan of operations, we may point the reader to the growth of this protest as exhibited in our columns of this month. Besides the communications sent to us by several Friends at home, which prove that the subject is taking deeper root in the minds of our members, he will not fail to remark the very lively interest which it has excited within the compass of New York Yearly Meeting. Gradually our Society seems to be preparing to adopt this procedure of abstaining from the use of slave produce, as 'a necessary corollary of their testimony against the slave-trade and slavery.'

GROSS OUTRAGE ON THE BUFFALO AND NIAGARA RAILROAD.

The following letter is taken from the Daily Propeller, a newspaper published at Buffalo, N. Y. An Editor in New York describes the writer as "a perfect gentleman, though guilty of a skin not coloured like our own;" and adds, "men of the highest moral character, and of distinguished ability, are proud to recognize him as a man." Another editor speaks of him as a "highly intellectual clergyman residing in Troy, N. Y. Mr. Garnett is one of the ablest coloured men in the country, a man of a fine classical education, eloquent both as a writer and a speaker, gentlemanly in his address, and in every way as deserving of consideration as any one in the United States, be he white or black. The community who sympathize with him have but one course to pursue. Let them express their indignation in words and deeds. Let the public be informed of the character of the conductors of this road, and let them patronize the Canada or river line till the company shall discharge the conductors."

Mr. Editor.—You will greatly oblige a traveller, and an American citizen, by allowing a simple statement to be made through the columns of your paper, in relation to a flagrant outrage which was committed upon my person and my rights, by some of the agents or servants of the above named railroad. In making this request, I do not ask you to assume any responsibility, or even to make a remark, unless you should be induced so to do, by your high sense of justice and humanity. After having spent a week in your hospitable and democratic city, endeavouring to inculcate the principles of justice and humanity, I determined to visit Canada, and there present the claims of the Temperance cause. For this purpose I attempted to take the cars for Niagara Falls this morning—but on entering a car, I was ordered by James Graham, a conductor, to remove. Without hesitation I was disposed to comply with his request, until I found that he was about to lead me from the third car to the one nearest the engine. To this I objected, and returned to the seat which I had first taken. The conductor came back, and insultingly ordered me to leave the car. I obeyed his command, and at the same time remonstrated against the unreasonableness of his course. But he only replied, "You shall go where I choose to place you." I asked him if I received such treatment on account of any indecorum. He said, "Coloured people cannot be permitted to ride with the whites on this road, for southern ladies and gentlemen will not tolerate it." This was not a sufficient reason to my mind; and not being accustomed to yield up my right without making at least a semblance of lawful resistance, I quietly returned towards my seat, when I was prevented by the conductor, who seized me violently by the throat, and choked me severely.

I have been for many years a cripple. I made no resistance further than was necessary to save myself from injury; but nevertheless, this conductor and another person, whose name I do not know, continued to choke and assault me with their fists. A part of the time, my legs were under the cars, near the wheels, and several persons were crying out—"don't kill him," "don't kill him!" An officer of the road, whose name I am informed is Wm. A. Burr, said that they would put me or any other person out, whenever they pleased—and that no law could interfere, and that I might as well attempt to sue the state of New York, as to prosecute that company. Mr. Bird,

(if this is the person's name) is a man of grey hair, and respectable appearance, but called me a "fool," and told me to "go to the devil."

I am suffering greatly from my wounds and bruises, so much so, that I called in a physician, who has kindly prescribed for my case. My eyes, temples, and breast are severely injured.

While I would not wish to injure those who have injured me, I would at the same time beg the public to decide whether it is just, humane, or necessary, thus to treat an American citizen, who is guilty of no crime. In justice to the people of the South, whom the Northern dough-faces make the scape goats of their villany and outrage, I would say that there is no evidence that they demand any such gratuitous servility and inhumanity.

This is the only road where such infamous conduct is tolerated, on the whole line from the Niagara Falls to the Penobscot Bay.

With great respect, I am sir,

Your obedient servant,
HENRY HIGHLAND GARNETT.

THE STRAIGHT AND NARROW WAY.

Along a verdant sunlit vale,
There lies a narrow way;
At first 'tis dim and gloomy; yet
It ends in perfect day.
No vulture's eye hath ever seen,
No lion's whelp hath trod
That pleasant path that lies between Earth and the home of God.

To him who views it from afar
Lone looks the vale, and drear,
Yet brightens into beauty when
He deigns to journey near.
Bleak rocks and barren mountains stand
And frown along its side,
Yet fruitful is the valley, and
Its waters softly glide.

If aught alluring should divert
The traveller there astray,
Just as he gains it he beholds
Its beauty pass away.
And, disappointed, turning then,
Some new delight to find,
How hardly does he gain again
The path he left behind.

When fiery bolts are hurled around
Shot from the raging storm,
The journeyer in that quiet vale
Remains secure from harm.

The whirlwind and the thunder cloud
Sweep high above his head,
The angry tempest, roaring loud,
To him hath nought of dread.

Then, oh my soul, if thou wouldst go
To regions bright and fair,
Pursue this straight and narrow way,
'Twill lead thee safely there.
The smiling valley where it lies
Is called Humility;
Descend it quickly, and thine eyes
Its pleasantness shall see.

ON THE DECEASE OF ANNA BACKHOUSE,
ONLY DAUGHTER OF THE LATE JOSEPH JOHN GURNEY,
On board the "Bull Dog" Steamer, in the Bay of Palermo. First Month 17th, 1848.

From fair Sicily's fertile Isle,
Where summer breathes the balmy breath,
On whose majestic lava'd pile,
Where desolation reigned ere while,
Vineyards and orange gardens smile,
I heard the voice of Death!

It called me to Palermo's Bay,
Where, anchor'd on the heaving brine,
A noble ship I saw display
Her serried sides in stern array,
Whose name repulsive seem'd to say,
"Not peace nor love is mine."

Yet on that deck in Death's embrace,
A youth'd mother calmly lay;
The parting smile was on her face,
And peace and love and placid grace;
And there in that unfitting place,
The spirit pass'd away!

And hanging on his nurse's neck,
There too her blithe unconscious boy!
His loss how little did he reck,
As sport'd on the spacious deck,
Not e'en his father's grief could check
His artless baby joy.

For ~~him~~ in sorrow, he was there,
Whose heart to ~~her's~~ in love was bound;
Alone he watched that form so fair,
His dearest joy, his sweetest care;—
But none his agony could share,
His depths of anguish sound.—

Had sympathy then ceased to flow?
Or were the hearts around him steel'd?
No! all that courtesy could show,
And all that kindness could bestow,
To soothe the stricken stranger's woe,
Did that stern vessel yield.

Yet sad that thus thy course should end,
With war's terrific thunder nigh;
A battle-ship its shelter lend,
Warriors thy dying couch befriend,
Mourner's unknown thy bier attend!
" 'Twas a strange place to die!"

Thy gentle birth could it not plead?
Thy wealth which luxury might supply?
Had youth no power to intercede?
Thy loveliness, thy peaceful creed?
For tranquil scenes in Death's sad need,
With all thy lov'd ones by!

Oh! how unlike that funeral throng,
Which mourn'd thy honour'd parent dead!
A weeping city mov'd along,
And preacher's voice, and poet's song,
And orator's mellifluous tongue,
The lamentation spread!

But did no heavenly beam appear
Athwart the darkling path thou trod?
Was not the Saviour's spirit near
To strengthen, comfort, sweeten, cheer,
Dispel each doubt, each anxious fear,
And fix thy hope on God?

Oh yes! the Christian's faith was thine,
Emanuel's power was felt to save:
Thou lean'd upon His arm divine,
Durst on His faithful breast recline,
To Him thy soul in peace resign,
And triumph o'er the grave!

Thus on the billow's foaming crest,
When raging storms perplex the deep,
The fabled Halcyon builds her nest,
And midst the tempest sinks to rest—
So thou upon thy Saviour's breast
Like Stephen "fell asleep."

Then mourn not that the mouldering dust
Beneath a foreign turf may lie—
Since this, the reverent humble trust,
That safe where every storm is hush'd
Her spirit's number'd with the just,
Whose record is on high!

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE PRODUCE ASSO-CIATION OF FRIENDS OF OHIO YEARLY MEET-ING.

At an Annual Meeting of the Free Produce
Association of Friends of Ohio Yearly Meeting, held at Friends' meeting house at Short Creek, on 4th day afternoon the 5th of 9th month, 1840.

The following report was received from the Board of Managers, which having been read, was adopted and directed to be placed upon the minutes.

First Annual Report.

"The Board of Managers, of the Free Produce Association of Friends of Ohio Yearly Meeting, would respectfully report, that though circumstances have transpired to prevent the holding of an Annual meeting for the last two years at the time previously agreed upon, yet the Board have had the objects for which they were appointed under frequent and serious consideration, and would now offer to the Association, the reading of their minutes, as the best authentic record of their transactions."

[Here the records of the Board of Managers, and also of the Special meetings of the Association were read when the Report continues.]

"The Board are happy to have it in their power to add, that the Free Labor Company, which was formed in the 6th month of last year,
through their agency, opened a store in the town of Mount Pleasant for the sale of Free Labor goods, which has now been in successful operation for more than twelve months.

The friends of this enterprise have abundant cause for encouragement, not only from the success which has hitherto attended their undertaking, but also from the increasing interest which is manifested, not only among the members of the religious society of Friends, but likewise among our fellow professors of different persuasions, and in the community at large. Many Friends within the limits of our Association, who have not heretofore felt themselves called upon to bear their testimony against the use of slave labor goods, are becoming awakened to the importance of the movement in which we are engaged, and are using their influence to disseminate correct information on the subject.

The intelligence received from other sections of our Religious Society, is of the most cheering character. Within the limits of Philadelphia,
New York, New England, Indiana, and London Yearly meetings, Free Produce Associations have been formed among Friends, for the purpose, not of offering facilities to those who are consistent on the subject to supply themselves with goods, the production exclusively of free labor; but also for diffusing correct information on this very important subject, and stirring up the minds of Friends afresh, to the special obligation resting upon the members of our Religious Society, to bear a consistent and faithful testimony against the sin of slavery in all its various ramifications.

The first to denounce the iniquitous slave trade, and to free themselves as a religious denomination from the crime of holding their fellow men in bondage; the Society of Friends are looked up to by their fellow Christian professors, as under special obligation to free themselves from all participation in the support of slavery.

We believe the time has nearly or quite arrived, when both consistency and duty require that Friends should bear a faithful testimony against the use of the products of the unrequited toil of the slave. The necessity heretofore urged as an apology for the use of goods either wholly or in part the production of slave labor, cannot longer be pleaded by a large proportion of our members. Free Labor companies are being formed, and stores are opened in many places, wherein goods of almost every description can be furnished, uncontaminated by the dark stains of slavery. New channels are constantly opening for the supply of the kind of goods referred to, and it is more clearly shown, that it is only necessary to create the demand, for that demand to be supplied through channels which cannot be called in question.

"Wherever there's a will, there's a way."

It is now pretty generally admitted by all who have examined the subject with that degree of attention which its importance demands, that "it is the demand for slave grown produce, which constitutes the strength of the slave system, and renders the slave trade necessary." Or more fully, the demand for slaves is to a great extent, at least, the cause of the slave trade; and it is the demand for slave grown produce which sustains the iniquitous system of slavery.

If these things be true, can we, can any one innocently partake of these fruits of unrighteousness, and not be implicated in the support of slavery?

Signed on behalf of the Board, by George K. Jenkins, Secretary.

The constitution of the Association being called for, was read, and a large number of Friends requested their names to be enrolled as members of the Association. A committee appointed for the purpose, reported the names of the following Friends for officers of the Association for the ensuing year, viz: Secretary, George K. Jenkins; Treasurer, Lemuel Jones; Managers, Elwood Ratcliff, Ezra Cattell, Penrose Hussey, Joel Wood, James D. Ladd, Lewis Taber, Sarah E. Jenkins, and Mary B. Stroud.

A number of propositions having been presented to the meeting, in reference to the duties of individuals in regard to the use of slave labor goods, a committee was appointed to embody the substance of these propositions in due form, and if approved by the board of managers, they should be forwarded together with such parts of the minutes of the meeting and Report of the Board of managers as might be deemed proper, to the Non-Slaveholder for publication. The following are the propositions as embodied by the committee.

1st. "That the successful efforts, made by the Society of Friends, by which it was enabled to clear itself from the traffic in slaves, and slaveholding, were in accordance with the precepts of the gospel dispensation, which teach us to do unto others as we would that they should do unto us, and breathe peace on earth and good will to men."

2d. "That abstinence from the use of the products of slavery, is essential to a pure and consistent testimony against that unchristian system."

3d. "That we are called to this abstinence by a two-fold consideration—first, to clear our hands and our conscience from a participation in the unrighteous gains of that system of oppression against which we profess to bear a religious testimony; and secondly, because it is a principle which as it is embraced must exert a potent influence on slavery itself—and ultimately remove this great crime with all its attendant evils and corruptions from the earth."

4th. "That we freely unite with, and feel called upon to revive that sentiment of our dear and valuable friend Thomas Shillito, that 'so far as we are deficient in using our influence and authority, to remedy these and other evils that abound, we become parties thereto in the Divine sight.' Friends' Library, vol. 3d, page 148—and also page 479—'I was earnestly concerned, both by example and precept, to use my utmost influence in checking any wrong practices, that were in danger of creeping, or had crept into the society; from an assurance that by neglect on my part, I should be criminating myself in the sight of my Maker, by becoming a party thereto.'"

The Association then adjourned to meet on the call of the Board of managers, at some suitable time and place during the week of our next Yearly Meeting, or at such other time or place as may be directed, in accordance with the 2d article of our Constitution.

GEORGE K. JENKINS, Secretary.

COMMUNICATION

For the Non-Slaveholder.

THE UNION LITERARY INSTITUTE, INDIANA.

This school is located in a dense settlement of colored people, on the eastern edge of Randolph county, Indiana, and the western edge of Darke county, Ohio. The school buildings are in Indiana, a few hundred yards from the line which divides the two States.

The cause which called this Institution into existence may be traced to those unjust and disgraceful laws which have a place upon most of the statute books of the Western States, depriving the colored portion of the community of the benefit of the common, or free school system, adopted some years since in this and other States. Many of the colored people now residing in this country have been emancipated and sent North, with all the ignorance and superstition common to slavery attached to them. Here, as elsewhere, they are excluded from society to a great extent by that unholy prejudice which so universally prevails against them.

They have generally settled in small bodies, and are living in comparative seclusion. Their children are mostly growing up without mental culture, and with many evil habits.

Hence it became apparent to their friends that the means of instruction should be placed within their reach—not only because of the general persevering influence which it would have upon them, but because it would serve to impress their minds with a sense of the obligations under which they lie to their brethren in bonds and to their country; and also stimulate them to elevate themselves in the scale of morality and religion, to prove to the world that they are men, and capable of acquiring respectable literary attainments, and of filling honorable stations in civil or religious society.

During the course of several years, Friends had interested themselves in behalf of the people of color, had encouraged them to maintain schools among themselves, and in many instances paid the tuition of those who were too poor to educate themselves. Yet these schools seemed to be of little real benefit to those for whom they were intended, partly because they could not be kept in existence long enough at a time for much good to result from them. Under these circumstances it was thought best to establish a permanent school, to which the colored youth should have free access.

In the spring of 1845, a few individuals exerted themselves to establish such a school. Benjamin Thomas donated 150 acres of land, upon which a manual labor school was to be established. In the autumn of the same year, a public meeting was held at Newport, and the subject spread before it. Many persons at once became interested; 100 acres, in addition to B. Thomas's donation, were given by different individuals, making 250 acres, all lying contiguous. Many contributed small amounts of money; others gave goods, utensils, &c., for the purpose, as set forth in the preamble to the constitution of the school,—“Of building up and sustaining a manual labor school, principally for the benefit of that class of the community whom the laws of Indiana at present preclude from all participation in the benefits of our public school system, and further, for the purpose of placing the blessings of an education in the higher branches of science within the reach of all who have not the means and facilities for the acquisition of scientific knowledge, which are always at the command of the wealthy.”

All the estate belonging to the Institution, both personal and real, is vested in five trustees and their successors in office. In addition to these trustees, the donors have chosen eight other individuals, all of whom, jointly united, form a Board of Managers. The Institute received a collegiate charter from the Legislature of Indiana, during its session of 1847-8. The Board of Managers has the supervision of the whole concern, and makes such general and particular regulations as the necessities of the school seem to demand.

Four of the members of the Board are colored men, and thus far have been discharging their duties with entire satisfaction to all concerned.

The broad Christian basis upon which this school is founded, and the peculiar characteristics which distinguish it from most of the popular literary institutions of the day, will be best understood from articles 8, 9, and 10 of the Constitution, which are as follows:

Art. 8. There never shall be allowed or tolerated in the Union Literary Institution, its government, discipline or privileges, any distinction on account of color, rank or wealth.

Art. 9. In all matters relating to ecclesiastics, each person connected with the school, either as teacher or pupil, shall be left to his or her denominational preference; nor shall any teacher be employed, or other instrumentality used to favor one church organization more than another. But the authority of the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament, and the Divinity of the Christian religion, shall be maintained inviolate, and no person known to hold contrary opinions shall be admitted to any official station in the Institution.

Art. 10. The great principles of the Christian religion, as opposed to war and human slavery, shall be carefully inculcated in this school.

The school has been kept in session about nine months in each year, commencing with the spring of 1846. It is under the care of Ebenezer Tucker, of Oberlin College. Professor Tucker is a man eminently qualified to fill the responsible station in which he is placed. His talents, literary attainments and persevering habits, and his devotion to the cause of suffering humanity, all point him out as a man pre-eminently qualified to fill the department of Principal in such an institution.

Since the commencement of the school, 230 students have received instruction under E. Tucker's care. Of these 166 have been colored, 68 of whom were from other States. Most of them commenced their studies at A, B, C, but some have gone over nearly the whole course necessary to constitute a substantial English education. A considerable number of colored young men and women are preparing in this school to take charge of schools in different localities, where, by the blessing of Providence, we hope they may accomplish much good.

The school has acquired an excellent character at home, and is acquiring a good reputation abroad. Some months since, it was visited by the Superintendent of Common Schools in Indiana, and pronounced by him to be one of the best conducted he had visited in the State. The influence which it has exerted upon the surrounding neighborhood, has been of the most gratifying kind. The doctrine that mental culture is a powerful instrumentality in the promotion of moral and virtuous conduct, has been proved in this, as well as many other cases, to be a correct one.

Students are gathering to this Institution from many different sections of country, and young men from the Southern States have been in attendance almost every session.

This school, as has been said, is conducted upon the Manual Labor principle.

The price of tuition for the first grade, per session, is $3 33; second grade, $4 37; and third grade, $6 50, to be paid in advance on entering the Institution.

Each student is expected to find bed and bedding, and room furniture, except bedstead, chairs and stove. Board in the boarding house, one dollar per week; twenty-five cents of which must be paid in money monthly, in advance. The remainder may be paid in work, at ordinary country prices, to be contracted for with the superintendent.

Each student is desired to furnish an axe, spade, or other instrument for his own use.

A boarding house has been erected, capable of accommodating the superintendent and teacher, with their families, and 30 students, at a cost of near $1400, a portion of which remains unpaid. There is a school house on the premises, which, when completed, will accommodate 80 or 100 students;—the lower story only is finished.

With these scanty accommodations, it has been found impossible to give instruction to all who have applied, and the friends of the Institution, although of that class who "effect much with little means," have not, as yet, been able to enlarge it, as the growing wants of a large and destitute colored population demand.

As already intimated, the Institute is in debt, probably to the amount of $550. In consequence of this indebtedness, the Board feel much embarrassed, and unless the friends of the oppressed colored man give liberally, the Institute must suffer seriously, and perhaps go down.

The school stands very much in need of a library. A few benevolent individuals have presented about 150 volumes, as a commencement.

Those who attend the school have thus far paid their own tuition; the tuition fees for several of the last terms have been sufficient in the aggregate to pay the teacher's salary, and but very little, if anything more. The Superintendent's salary has been paid by the benevolent friends of the school, and for some time to come must continue to be thus paid.

There is a class of the colored community in the West too poor to pay for tuition at the Institute, or any where else.

From this brief account of the progress, present situation and prospects of the Union Literary Institution, its friends can glean a meagre knowledge of its wants and necessities; and it is hoped their feelings may be enlisted in behalf of the unfortunate people whom it was intended to bless. Does it not behoove the benevolent and good to make an effort to place within the reach of this people the means of counteracting that unholy and cruel prejudice, which, like a millstone about the neck, has so long been sinking them into the depths of ignorance and depravity? In the language of another, we ask, "Shall we not, out of the abundant means with which Providence has blessed us, extend to them the helping hand of brethren? Shall we not take them under the healing wing of education until the day of their persecution shall have passed away, and the Government shall resume its proper functions, the protection of the weak against the strong, and the education of every child in the State?"

HENRY CHARLES.

DESCENDANTS OF REV. THOMAS HOOKER.—It is stated in the life of this eminent New England Divine, that among his posterity there are forty-one ministers of the Gospel, and forty more who married his female descendants; nine professors, authors and poets; forty who have occupied important public offices; fourteen members of the bar, not included in the preceding, and seventeen doctors of medicine.

YOUTH'S DEPARTMENT.

For the Non-Slaverholder.

"IT'S ALL FOR THE BEST,"

From recollections of Uncle Jerry.

How I do love those simple words; they seem to combine so much of giving up—of entire trust in the goodness of Providence; and well they suited that kind-hearted old man. If his eye was ever dimmed by a tear, it was of benevolence; he had no selfish tears. If sickness or death bereft him of some dear friend, he wore the same kind smile, but the few words "It's all for the best," spoken in a low meditative tone, convinced one there was no callousness at his heart.

Ah! Uncle Jerry, well do I remember thee! peace to thy slumbers! When death called thee home there was a sad blank in this world. The fireside seemed no longer cheerful, when thou wast not there. Oh! sadly we missed thy long tales—thy kind smile and thy gay "good night." There was no heart to sympathize kindly in our childish troubles, and thou wast gone. It was hard to feel resigned, children as we were, but now we can adopt thy living and dying words, that all's for the best, and that our loss was thy gain. How many kind remembrances the thought of Uncle Jerry brings to mind! how many of childish glee, of old stories by a bright winter fire! Well do I remember my little sister Rosa running into the room in all her baby beauty, her eyes glistening with tears, and her bosom heaving with suppressed emotion: "Oh! dear Uncle, my rose, my beautiful rose is broken; it will not live; come, do come Uncle Jerry and see. By this time tears were running down her cheeks. She led him to the window—it was a beautiful rose tree, and the idol of my sister; but it lay torn and broken—there was no hope of resuscitation. Well do I remember that kind old man's look of pity as he placed his hand on Rosa's flaxen curls, and kissing her, said, "don't cry Rosa, it's all for the best." How Rosa's blue eyes dilated, and her little hands clasped themselves in astonishment; "all for the best, Uncle?" "Yes, Rosa, it is good for us, when we are children, to learn how to bear these little disappointments: it enables us to support the greater calamities of after life with calmness. Come, Rosa, sit on my knee by the fire; would you love to know how I learned my first lesson in resignation?" The little creature climbed his knee, put her fair arm lovingly around his neck—her curls were thrown from off her forehead—her eyes still glistened with tears—her cheek still wore a flush, not the crimson hue of anger, which had revelled there a moment before, but the bright delicate flush of expectation:—she was a beautiful creature.

We all drew our chairs, for a story from Uncle Jerry was not to be neglected. "Well," said he, and he drew his hand across his eye—"it was a long day ago that I had a little daughter—older than you, Rosa, and oh, far more beautiful.—Your eyes are blue—her's were soft hazle—the blush which dyed her cheek was a mere thought, and her hair inclined to a dark auburn—her voice was sweetly modulated, and with a smile on her lips, and gladness ever in her eyes, methought she was the fairest flower that ever bloomed on earth. She was like you Rosa, in her temper—so good, so affectionate. She was my heart's idol, and I cared for nought on earth or in Heaven, but my Fanny and her queenly mother. They were to me what the soft refreshing shower and sunshine are to the green earth—it seemed that I only lived in the atmosphere of home—and that home was to me a paradise. Fanny grew in grace and beauty, and I longed to behold the time when the world should first gaze on the peerless creature. I beheld in imagination my Fanny, the reigning queen of many a brilliant circle—the admired and loved of all. After these bright fancies, my eye would rest upon my darling like a phantom—they were gone—it was only Fanny—and I saw but the gentle daughter soothing her parent's downward way. I seemed to feel her soft hand closing my weary eyes when the drowsiness of death was upon me. It was thus I loved to look upon her—but ah! how were all my bright anticipations blasted! The destroyer was hovering near and I knew it not. Her cheek was flushed—I thought it was with joy; but a deadly fever lurked in her veins, and three weeks had not flown by ere my lovely flower was laid in the tomb. Oh, what a season of anguish those three weeks were to me—how I watched every movement, and satisfied every want, and when cold death laid his hand upon her and closed her eyes that ever beamed with sweetness, I thought the sunshine of this world had forever departed—that there was no more joy for me; I was stupefied; I felt not; I cared not; I knew not; I laughed, but it sounded hollow like a maniac's laugh. Her mother took me by the hand—"Come Jerry, we will look on Fanny in her quiet sleep." The words startled me; they were so mild; so deep. We went together. She pointed out the cherub smile that still lingered round her beautiful mouth. She spoke of Heaven, of the goodness of Him who had taken her thus young, thus unspotted, from a sinful world, to taste of his glories and his love in her heavenly home, of her happiness there, of our meeting all glorified and pure; and she asked me if I would not be willing to give her up if it were for her eternal happiness? It was hard; but said my wife 'it's all for the best,' and so I learned to think.

Two short years passed by, and my wife was taken to her eternal home; it was hard, hard to part; but I prayed that I might be resigned, and resignation came, and I was enabled to say it was all for the best. It softened my heart, it enlarged my sympathy for the sufferings of human nature, it taught me to place my trust in Heaven, and it consigned my treasures to a life of eternal happiness."

There was not a dry eye amongst us; but I looked at Uncle Jerry; his was calm and untroubled as a summer heaven, and every feature beamed with a trusting confidence. "Remember, Rosa, every misfortune is meant for our good: to humble our pride, or to subdue our worldly feelings. Remember, dear Rosa," said he, kissing her, "it's all for the best."

INDUSTRY AND PERSEVERANCE.

Early one delightful morning in April, a young man stopped at the door of a little road-side inn, situated near Paris. Though he had not reached his eighteenth year, yet his person was tall and vigorous, his large black eyes were full of fire, and his countenance at once open and agreeable. On his entrance he accosted the landlady with a cheerful "Give me some breakfast my fair hostess, for I have been walking since day-break, and I am very hungry."

While he was speaking, there came in another traveller, more youthful in appearance than the first. Like him he was on foot, and seemed much fatigued. He was small in stature, with a complexion of red and white, and possessed the voice and hands of a young girl. "Madame," said he, with great timidity, "will you please to give me some breakfast?"

On hearing this, the first comer advanced toward him, saying, "Monsieur, let us breakfast together—you are travelling on foot, so am I—you are hungry, so am I—you are going to Paris, so am I—let us then sit down at the same table, drink each other's health, then enter Paris together, shake hands, and separate; do you agree?"

The modest stranger, still with the same sweet, low voice, replied, "You honor me, sir, and I consent with great pleasure."

There is something so pleasing in the contemplation of frank generous youth, that even the most careless are often influenced by it, and thus the mistress of the inn, contrary to custom, served these poor tired pedestrians first.

The table, set in the best place before the open window, was quickly covered with provision; the young men took their seats, their plates and glasses were filled, when a third traveller passed the window and looked in. This last was dark, rather stout, the expression of his features calm, grave, and composed, his fine forehead shaded with tresses of long wavy brown hair. The manner of this comer was very different from the vivacity of the first, or the timidity of the second.

"Gentlemen," he cried to the others, "will you not wait for a poor fellow like me?—I fancy I am come just in time—a little later and I must have contented myself with the remains of that magnificent smoking omelette I now see."

Hardly had he spoken when the first comer, with his ready smile, held out his glass through the window. The stranger took the glass, emptied it, squeezed the other's proffered hand, then entering the inn he placed himself at the end of the table, the bashful youth being in the middle, apparently astonished that so many pleasant companions could be picked up on the road to Paris.

Their repast was soon finished, and they pursued their journey. They were all travelling the same road, and they walked on together. At last they arrived at the barriers of Paris—they stopped by mutual consent. Till then the conversation was light and cheerful, but they now became grave and thoughtful—it was time to part. It was once more the first traveller who broke silence.

"My name," he said, "is Portal; I am going to Paris with the intention of becoming a Member of the Academy of Science, and first physician to the king."

"And I," said he of the brown hair, "am going to Paris to become Advocate-general."

They waited for the modest stranger to speak. "And I," he answered with his soft voice and air of timidity—"I visit Paris to become a Member of the French Academy, and Cardinal."

"Then," said the others gravely, pulling off their hats, "It is you, my lord, who must pass first."

At that moment the clocks of a neighboring Church struck, and they entered Paris. Let us follow the fate of these three young men. The last mentioned became the Abbey Maury, an eloquent orator, member of the French Academy, and Cardinal; he died honored and esteemed. The other was Count Treillard, minister of state, and friend of the Emperor; he is still living, and has not forgotten his first entry into Paris. And the tall, vivacious Portal—he became the glory of his profession, member of the Academy, Professor. (He was all, except physician to the king. Louis XVI perished on the scaffold while Portal was yet a student. The republic had no physician; the Emperor had one who was his friend; besides Portal would be an attendant on a king, and he was.) He became principal to Louis XVIII. Portal died lately, and the preceding narrative was related in the funeral oration pronounced in the Academy of Science.—Lady's Dollar Newspaper.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, TENTH MONTH 1, 1849.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE OHIO FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS.—It is with feelings of much satisfaction and encouragement that we are enabled to lay before our readers the proceedings of the Annual meeting of this Association, including the Report of the Managers, held on the 5th ult., in Friends' Meeting house at Short Creek. We understand the subject of avoiding the use of slave produce was largely discussed in the Ohio Meeting for Sufferings recently, indicating an increased concern on the subject amongst Friends. In the late Yearly Meeting of Ohio, this important testimony also received consideration, as appears by the following paragraph, extracted from Friends' Review—

"The subject of slavery engaged much of the attention of the meeting, and desires were expressed that all our members might be fully alive to the necessity of improving every right opening to plead the cause of this oppressed portion of the human family. It was cause of thankfulness to find that this important branch of our testimonies is increasing in interest amongst the members of this Yearly Meeting, particularly in reference to the use of the produce of slave labor; and though the meeting was not prepared to take any action in relation to it, Friends were encouraged to attend to their individual convictions of duty."

WILLIAM FORSTER'S MISSION TO THE EUROPEAN NATIONS.—It was stated, three months since, in an account of London Yearly Meeting, that our beloved friend William Forster had offered to be the bearer, on the continent of Europe, of an Appeal in relation to slavery and the slave trade, addressed to the rulers and people of nations professing christianity. By letters from England we learn that, accompanied by his brother Josiah Forster and Peter Bedford, he has satisfactorily accomplished his mission to Holland and Belgium, and, after an absence of five weeks, had returned to England, and was about to proceed to Sweden, Denmark and Prussia.

We deeply sympathize with him in his laborious and important undertaking, and with his dear wife in the frequent and prolonged absence of her husband from their quiet home, and ardently hope he may be preserved to return from his journey, to pursue his further prospect of visiting France, Spain, and Portugal. The recent action of the Portuguese chamber of Peers leads us to anticipate a favorable reception for him and the Address in that country.

"Whether he goes to Brazil, or that duty will devolve on another," writes one of our correspondents, "time must determine; but we think the concern of our Yearly Meeting cannot be carried out effectually, unless a personal visit be made to that country."

OUTRAGE ON COLORED CITIZENS IN PHILADELPHIA.—The newspapers frequently record accounts of unprovoked assaults and bloody outrages upon colored people by white persons in Moyamensing, a district of Philadelphia. Efficient measures are not taken by the civil authorities to prevent these gross violations of law and humanity.

A case of diabolical character recently came under our notice. A colored man, remarkable for his uniformly quiet and inoffensive behaviour, who had lived more than three years in the family of the Editor of this paper, was quietly walking along Cedar street about eleven o'clock in the forenoon of First-day, the 19th of 8th month last, when a young white man, who had been standing with several others, went into the middle of the street, picked up a stone and threw it at him, striking him above the right temple and fracturing his skull. He was carried to the Pennsylvania Hospital, which was near, and he remains there under surgical treatment, with a prospect of recovery.

The wound was so severe that the poor man, who had only recently recovered from a severe attack of the cholera, could not, as the Physician of the Hospital believes, have lived more than an hour or two, if he had not been relieved by a removal of the fragments of bone.

These cruel and wanton attacks growing out of the prejudices which are the fruits of slavery, should stimulate every man who possesses the common feelings of humanity, to a serious inquiry how far he is contributing by any means to the continuance of the iniquitous system, and whether he is faithfully performing his part toward its overthrow.

THE UNION LITERARY INSTITUTE, INDIANA.—In the second number of our second volume a circular was inserted on behalf of this Institution, addressed to those who take an interest in the moral elevation of the African race in this country. Through the kindness of a correspondent, we are now enabled to give a further account of this interesting establishment. If the education of white children is justly regarded as essential to their own prosperity and to that of the State, there are additional reasons, which will suggest themselves to the Christian philanthropist, for extending instruction to the colored portion of American children.

It appears that the operations of the school are burdened with a debt of several hundred dollars, unavoidably incurred in erecting the buildings, and that aid is greatly needed for their completion, and also to furnish the school with books and philosophical apparatus, and to extend its benefits to the poorest class of colored children.

We commend the institution to the liberal consideration of the beneficent, and will gladly remit any contribution which may be entrusted to the care of the Editor.

CRUEL LAWS OF MARYLAND AND DELAWARE.—In another part of this paper we give a statement from Friends' Review, of a case of cruel oppression at Elkton in Maryland, together with the law of that State, under which the proceedings were instituted.

In Delaware, laws no less unjust and oppressive exist and are enforced against that portion of mankind, formed "in the image and after the likeness" of God, but guilty of a colored skin. It seems that all colored persons not born in that State, no matter how long they may have resided in it, are liable to be expelled in a summary manner; and we are informed that a large number has been thus driven from the city of Wilmington. We saw one of these within a few days—a man well versed in the Latin, French, German and English languages, and yet, on account of the color of his skin, and the curl of his hair, condemned as unworthy to reside in the professedly Christian and republican State of Delaware, and about to be seized and sold for a slave. He had been obliged to sacrifice his property and flee to Philadelphia, leaving his wife and children behind him until he could find means to pay their passage.

The following remarks, by the Editor of Friends' Review, upon the laws of Maryland, in connection with the case at Elkton, are equally applicable to the laws of Delaware:

"The circumstance, noted in one of our columns, of two respectable colored men being arrested, fined and imprisoned, under authority of law, for no offence, unless visiting a sick parent may be deemed one, furnishes a renewed evidence of the cruel prejudice indulged in some parts of our land, against an inoffensive race; and suggests the consideration whether such laws ought to be permitted to work their mischievous purposes without having their validity subjected to a legal investigation. In the articles of confederation, it was provided that the 'free inhabitants of these states shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several states.' In the congress of 1778, a motion was made to insert in this article the word white, so as to limit the provision to free white inhabitants. But the motion was negatived by an overwhelming majority. In the Federal Constitution of 1787, a provision of the same import was adopted, with a slight change in the phraseology. The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states.' Art. 4, Sec. 2. According to Chancellor Kent, this provision 'applies to natural born, or duly naturalized citizens; and if they remove from one state to another, they are entitled to the privileges that persons of the same description are entitled to in the state to which the removal is made, and to no other.' Now, the free blacks who were born, or are resident in Maryland, have the right to remain there; and consequently those who go there from other states, have also the right to continue there.

"The proposed Constitution of the new state of Missouri required the Legislature to pass such laws as might be necessary 'to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to settle in the state, under any pretext whatever.'

"The Constitution being submitted to Congress, the article excluding colored citizens, was deemed by the House of Representatives a violation of the national compact, and that body refused to receive Missouri into the Union. A compromise was at last agreed to, and Congress admitted Missouri on the express condition that the offensive clause in her Constitution should never authorize any law by which any citizen of any of the States should be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled by the Constitution of the United States; and that the Legislature of Missouri should, by a solemn Act, declare their assent to this condition. The Legislature passed the Act required, and thereupon the State became a member of the Union.

"Hence it appears, that the Maryland act under which the proceedings in question took place, is palpably unconstitutional."

PEACE CONVENTION IN PARIS.—As introductory to the account which will be found in another part of this paper, of the great convention of the friends of peace, lately held in Paris, we cannot do better than copy the following remarks from the editorial columns of the London Friend for last month.

"The Congress of the Friends of Peace has met according to arrangement, in the French capital. An event which, at one time, raised their hopes, and at another, excited their fears, has ceased to be a cause of anxious expectation, and become enrolled among the records of the past, the retrospect of which will be attended with interest proportioned to the importance of its results.

"At no period of the history of Paris, so replete with reminiscences of warlike enterprises and diplomatic intrigues, has this city entertained a company of persons animated by a more sincere desire for the welfare of mankind, whose single object it has been, to cultivate that brotherly feeling between nations which has been hitherto so much obscured by iniquity and wrong. The aspect of such a meeting was also as novel as it was pleasing. Two years since it would scarcely have been believed, that individuals, differing so much in language, political predilections, and religious opinions, could have been found ready to unite, in one common endeavour, to abolish the crime of war, or to diminish the frequency of its scourge upon the face of the earth. The present has been said to be the age of great principles, and the human mind to be, now especially, a soil suited to their reception. Without restricting to our day such an exclusive possession of enlightenment, we believe there never was a time when, with greater prospect of success, it was more incumbent on the philanthropist, to hold up the moral standard of truth to the world, in all its breadth and dignity. The progress of the cause of peace is owing, in great measure, to the high principles on which its supporters have based their operations. Opponents may sneer at their alleged impracticability, but there is in them, however, that which commands respect, and affords a prestige of future triumph. One cannot fail to be thus impressed, in reading the reported proceedings of the late Congress. Minds of a different order, who denounce the practice of war, chiefly on account of one of its many curses, and advocate peace, in one or other of its bearings on human welfare, yet yield united homage to the great Scriptural truth,—that because God hath made of one blood all nations of men, they are bound by every consideration, to cherish mutual amity and love.

"Sentiments of this kind, placed strongly and continually before the public view, cannot fail to be productive of some genuine fruit. Their practical meaning has not long been, even imperfectly, recognised by civilised and professedly Christian nations; less than half a century has elapsed since they were taught to believe that different races, separated by geographical boundaries, and distinguished, as it was supposed, by contrary social interests, were thereby designed to be natural enemies to each other. If these prejudices are only now beginning to give way to the light of a superior faith, and are still found lurking in many quarters in a half-concealed guise, is it a matter of surprise that the Christian philanthropist should encounter serious obstacles in his mission of peace; or that in a general view, the aspect of society does not present the progress he would desire in this department of his labour? It is rather a motive for thankfulness that, in the midst of so many elements of strife and alienation from the moral law, there is yet a partial reception given to the authority of truth. We do not undervalue those efforts in the cause which spring from what are termed secondary motives—they are highly useful as tending to illustrate and complete a catalogue of the evils which War has entailed on us; but the friends of Peace, on the ground of the essential sinfulness of War, were never more loudly called to come forward, to rally round the present movement, and to give the weight of their character and consistency in support of the practical measures taken at the Congress."

COLORED MECHANICS.—FREE LABOR BOOTS AND SHOES.—It is well known that colored persons have to encounter great difficulties in attempting to learn any mechanical business; and it too frequently happens, when individuals of this class have, through perseverance, become qualified to engage in such business for themselves, that they are deprived of a proper share of public patronage by the general but cruel prejudice against color.

These facts suggest to the true friends of the colored man, the propriety and, we may perhaps say, the duty of giving special encouragement in such cases; and we have great satisfaction in recommending our friend Peter Lester, boot and shoe maker, No. 76 north 7th street, Philadelphia, to the patronage of our readers. He recently commenced the manufacture of Boy's shoes in addition to his former business of making men's boots and shoes; and we are particularly gratified in being able to state that he not only uses leather of the best quality, but so far as muslin is used in his work, it is exclusively made of free cotton.

THE LIBERTY ALMANAC FOR 1850.—We have received a copy of this valuable Almanac, published by the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, and for sale at their Depository in New York. It contains nearly 30 pages of Anti-Slavery matter, and should be widely circulated. The price per thousand copies, is $26.00; per hundred copies, $2.50; for one dozen, 40 cents; and for a single copy, 5 cents.

Orders may be directed to Wm. Harned, agent, No. 61, John street, New York, and should state by what mode of conveyance the Almanacs are to be sent.

THE CHESTER COUNTY ABDUCTION.—In reference to this case, an account of which will be found in another part of this paper, it may be stated that a public meeting has been held in Chester County, at which a committee was appointed to wait upon the Attorney General of the State, and give him the facts relative to the forcible abduction of Mitchell, and urge him to take immediate measures for the demand of the kidnappers from the Governor of Maryland.

Thomas Mitchell was present at the meeting, having been restored to liberty by the payment of a sum of money through the generosity of the people of Chester County.

LETTER FROM T. WILLIS.—FRIENDS' TESTIMONY AGAINST SLAVERY NOT COMPLETE.—To those who are acquainted with the writer of the following letter, addressed to the editor, it will not be surprising that the latter places a high value on the encouragement it offers, and also upon the clear and decided testimony which our dear friend, now nearly fourscore years of age, bears to the truth and importance of views which our convictions of duty have led us to advocate in the midst of ridicule, contempt and obloquy:

JERICHO, L. I., 8th mo, 14th, 1849.

DEAR FRIEND,—* * * * I hope that neither thyself nor thy coadjutors in the free labor movement will become weary in well doing, whatever may be the result of your labors in so good a cause. I cannot but believe that if Friends generally had kept under the same exercise in which they labored until the Society had cleared itself from possessing slaves, they would have clearly seen that their testimony against slavery was not yet complete; but that something more remained for them to do, as the pioneers in this great and good work.

It has often appeared to me that if our Society had duly cherished this concern, and abode in its proper allotment in the Divine counsel, they would have been made instrumental in furthering the work of emancipation far beyond its present position. I must say as my opinion that if such had been the case, our example as well as precept would have shed a salutary influence on those around us, and the work would have prospered: who can say that it might not so far have spread in our land, that ere this time there would have been few if any slaves held in the Union? For such are the effects of faithfulness; first of individuals, then of larger bodies, until the fruits of their labors become apparent in the community at large. We can scarcely calculate the amount of good that may result from small beginnings.

Let us then neither faint nor be weary, whether we see much of these results or not; but endeavor to do that which our hand findeth to do, according to ability received, that so we may obtain that peace which is above all things desirable; and in the trying season the language may be applicable to us which the Master applied to one formerly—"Let her alone, * * * she hath done what she could." Thy sincerely attached friend,

THOMAS WILLIS.

If we do not mistake the "signs of the times" there are now indications in various parts of the Society of Friends of an increasing conviction that their testimony against slavery is, indeed, not yet complete, and we rejoice at these indications.

There is warning as well instruction in the slow steps by which the Society of Friends emerged from a state of darkness, as respects its position in relation to slavery, in which its members not only held slaves but imported them from Africa, and bought and sold them in this country. The true character of slavery has never been more clearly portrayed nor more decidedly condemned than in a remonstrance to Philadelphia

Yearly Meeting, from the German Friends of Germantown in 1688, and yet slaves were held by members of that meeting nearly a century afterwards and subsequent to the passage of the Pennsylvania act of emancipation in 1780. An impartial examination of the history of that period shows clearly, that what has been praised as "earnest perseverance," and held up in the present day as worthy of imitation, was really a disgrace to the Society, being simply the result of opposition to the zealous and indefatigable labors of a few faithful Friends from those slaveholding members who were influenced by the same selfishness, desire of gain, and love of power which mark the general character of slaveholders in the present day.

From the disgraceful delay in emancipating their slaves which thus arose in the Society of Friends, a salutary lesson should be learned by those who are now, by their practice in word and deed, standing opposed to that complete testimony against slavery which forbids a participation in its fruits and a contribution of the support by which it is mainly sustained. We have no doubt that the time will come when the present general custom of Friends in purchasing and selling, using and consuming the products of slave labor will be regarded by their posterity with the same astonishment which we now feel in contemplating the fact that our forefathers both held slaves and imported them from Africa.

The humane and enlightened of all Christian and of some Mahomedan nations have come to look upon the African slave trade with such detestation and horror, that if the fact were not well authenticated it could not be credited that members of the Society of Friends were allowed to engage in the dreadful traffic up to a period almost within the recollection of persons now living, notwithstanding the sin of slave-trading and slaveholding was undoubtedly seen in its true light by individuals of several successive generations.

A VISIT TO THE WEST INDIES.—The abuses which have crept into some of the English colonies, to the great injury of the emancipated classes, have been for several years a source of painful regret and anxiety to British abolitionists. The Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society have faithfully endeavored to counteract the selfish and cruel expedients of the planters and other interested parties to obtain cheap labor at the expense of the poor colored people; but the adoption of the Coolie and African emigration scheme, together with various colonial measures, has occasioned many evils, both moral and political.

It has been believed that a searching personal investigation into the condition of the West India colonies by competent and disinterested witnesses may conduce to the welfare of all concerned, but especially to the benefit of the emancipated class; and we are exceedingly gratified to learn that our dear friends, John Candler and George William Alexander are about to proceed to the West India Islands for the purpose of making such an investigation. They expected to embark on the 2d of this month, accompanied by their wives, in a steam packet for Barbadoes. After a short stay on that island, they will probably spend some time on the coast of South America, visiting the Guianas, English, French and Dutch, the latter being still a slave colony. They may also pass over to Trinidad, and then visit Dominica, Antigua, and other windward islands, taking the French Islands, Martinique and Gaudaloupe, and the Danish island, Santa Cruz, into their plan. It is understood that they will close their investigations in Jamaica; and then, if health and other circumstances permit, visit the United States before they return to England. The journey will be one of great peril by sea and land, and from climates; and the mission involves high responsibilities as well as important and interesting results. We believe the views of our friends are not confined to a mere examination into the state of the emancipated peasantry, but that their object embraces the promotion of the education and economical condition of this class.

BRAZILIAN SLAVE TRADE.—ABUSE OF THE AMERICAN FLAG.—We have been kindly permitted to extract the following from a letter written by an officer of a United States ship of war, dated

"Off MONTVIDEO, February 26, 1849.

"We have, for some time past, been endeavoring to put a stop to the shameful abuse of our flag, which is made in Brazil as a cloak for the slave trade. It is sad to say, but owing to our having taken the ground that no foreign vessel of war shall search an American merchantman, every species of rascality now takes our colors as a screen. For some time past not a slave was imported that did not in some way soil us. Either the slave goods to buy him were carried to Africa in one of our vessels through the British Anti-Slavery squadron, or he was brought over in an American vessel, merely changing her flag temporarily to avoid search. Thus, if pursued by an English man-of-war, the slaver hoists American colors, which protect her against search from any foreign man-of-war. If the slaver encounters an American cruiser, she hoists Brazilian, English, or any foreign flag, and we, to be consistent, cannot meddle with her.

"We have, however, caught four of our vessels, and sent them home for adjudication. This is but a drop in the bucket, as there are at least fifty American vessels concerned at this moment in this traffic between Africa and Brazil."

So it seems that Americans, with all their professed abhorrence of the African slave trade, and even by many of slavery itself, are yet implicated, closely and deeply, in both, from beginning to end. American vessels, protected by the American flag, carry goods to Africa to purchase the slaves, and then carry the slaves themselves to Brazil. There they are worked up into coffee and sugar, which are brought to this country in American vessels to gratify American appetites, including those of most abolitionists, so called; and thus furnish the inducement and the means for the prosecution and the maintenance of the whole iniquitous and unchristian system.

SELECTIONS.

EXTRACTS FROM THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE PEACE CONGRESS AT PARIS.

On Tuesday morning the 21st of August, the English and American delegates, numbering between six and seven hundred, left London for Folkestone in two express trains. They arrived safely at Folkestone about twelve o'clock, and about one embarked on board two steamers. The day was remarkably fine, and the company appeared greatly to enjoy the passage. As the sun shone brightly on the cliffs of Albion and of Gallia, one and another asked, "Are the inhabitants of yonder shore our natural enemies?"—"Why should those who are separated from each other only by a comparatively narrow sea, ever regard each other but as brethren?"—and remarks of a similar character. The two vessels arrived safely at Boulogne, where many hundreds were assembled to witness their arrival. The visitors were greatly cheered as they landed, and were met by the Mayor and a deputation.

He stated that he had received instructions from the French Government to extend every facility to the English and American delegations for landing at Boulogne and proceeding at once on their journey to Paris. He therefore wished them to know that they were at liberty to land and proceed without any hindrance. On the part of the authorities and inhabitants of the town, he wished to express the pleasure which it gave him to welcome the delegation to the shores of France, on their benevolent mission.

E. Fry briefly expressed on the part of himself and his fellow voyagers, their thanks for the cordiality with which they had been received by the authorities and inhabitants of Boulogne, and for the flattering consideration which had been shown for their comfort by the government.

In consequence of unexpected delays, the trains did not leave Boulogne till nearly two hours after the time appointed. The company arrived safely in Paris about two o'clock on Wednesday morning, and proceeded to numerous hotels, where due preparations had been made by the committee for their accommodation.

The first meeting of the Congress took place on the 22d, in the Salle, St. Cecile, Rue de la Chaussee d'Antin.

The whole of the large hall was completely filled at a little after twelve o'clock. A considerable number of the Society of Friends were to be seen scattered about amongst the auditory. Some women Friends were also present; but—as usual at public meetings—the number of females present was greater than might have been expected.

The proceedings commenced by the secretaries of the French, English, and American Peace Societies reading out the names of the members of the committees of the three bodies. According as any name was pronounced of any person of rank, loud applause arose amongst the persons in the hall below; M. Victor Hugo's name, that of R. Cobden, M. P.; W. Ewart, M. P.; C. Hindly, M. P.; Joseph Sturge; M. Francisque Bouvet, representative of the people; M. Horace Say; M. Michel Chevalier; Elihu Burritt, &c., were received with the loudest acclamations.

The reading of the names having been concluded, M. Victor Hugo, representative of the people, came forward, and took the chair, and was received with loud applause. On his left was M. Coquerel, representative of the people and Protestant Clergyman, and on the right M. Deguerry, curé of the Madeleine. After a moment's pause, he rose and delivered the following address:—"Gentlemen, many of you have come from the most remote quarters of the globe, your hearts full of religious and holy thoughts. You number in your ranks public men, philosophers, ministers of religion, eminent writers, and many of those public men who are the light of their nation. You have wished to date from Paris the declaration of this assembly, of convinced and serious men, who desire not only the welfare of one people, but also that of all nations. You have come to add to the principles which at the present time influence statesmen, governors, and legislators, a superior principle. You have come to turn over in some sort the last and the most august prayer of the gospel, that which enjoins peace on the children of God; and in this city which has hitherto only cheered the fraternity of citizens, you have come to proclaim the fraternity of men. Gentlemen we bid you a hearty welcome. Gentlemen, is this religious thought, the universal peace of all nations, bound to one another by a social bond, not of the gospel? Is this idea capable of realization? Many political men reply no! As for myself, I reply with you, without hesitation, yes!—and I shall try to prove the truth of my statement immediately. But I go farther. I not only say that it is an object capable of being realized, but that it is inevitable: all that can be done is to hasten or retard its consummation. The law of the world is not and cannot be distinct from the law of God. But the law of God is not war, but peace. Men begin with struggles, just as creation commenced by chaos. Whence do they come? Evidently from war? Whither are they going? To peace. When you affirm these lofty truths, it is quite plain that your affirmation meets with negation, that your faith meets with incredulity, that in this hour of our troubles and of our commotions the idea of universal peace surprises and alarms every one as being the apparition of something impossible and ideal. It is quite possible that our views may be called Utopian; and as far as concerns myself, an humble and obscure laborer in the great work of the nineteenth century, I accept the opposition without being either astonished or discouraged by it. Is it possible for you to prevent people from turning aside their heads and closing their dazzled eyes when, in the midst of the thick darkness which surrounds us, you suddenly open the radiant gate of the future. If any one, gentlemen, four centuries ago, during the time when commune waged war against commune, town against town, and province against province; if any one had said to Lorraine, to Picardy, to Normandy, to Burgundy—A day will come when you will no longer make war—when men will no longer bear arms one against the other—when it will no longer be said, 'The Normans have attacked Picardy,' or 'The men of Lorraine have beaten the Burgundians,' you would still have many differences to arrange, many interests to discuss, many disputes to settle; but do you know what you will put in the place of armed men? of infantry and cavalry? of cannon and falconets? of lances, pikes, and swords? You will put in the place of all these a little wooden box, which you will call the balloting box, and from that box will proceed an assembly, an assembly in which you will feel that you all live, which will act as a soul to all of you—a sovereign and popular council—which will decide, judge, and settle all questions—which will make the sword fall from the hands of all, and justice rise in every heart—which will say to each man, 'Here ends thy right, there begins thy duty!' Lay down your arms! live in peace! and on that day you will feel that you have one common thought, common interest, a common destiny; you will embrace one another, you will recognize one another as children of the same blood and of the same race. On that day you will cease to be hostile tribes; you will be a people; you will no longer be Burgundy, Provence, Normandy, Brittany—you will be France. Appeals will no longer be made to war, but to civilization. If at the period I allude to such words had been uttered, all men of serious character, and all great politicians of that day, would have exclaimed—What a dream! what ignorance of the human heart! What folly! Time, however, has gone on, and this dream, this folly, has been realized. Well, you say at the present day, and I join with you in saying it, all of us here present speak to France, to England, to Prussia, to Austria, to Spain, to Italy, to Russia, and say, 'A day will come when arms will fall from your hands also, when war will appear as absurd, and will be as impossible between Paris and London, between Vienna and Turin, or between St. Petersburg and Berlin, as it would now appear absurd between Rouen and Amiens, or Boston and Philadelphia.' A day will come when France, Russia, Italy, England, Germany, all the nations of the continent, without losing your distinguished characteristics and your glorious identity, will be merged into a superior unity, and shall form an European fraternity, just as Normandy, Brittany, Burgundy, Lorraine, Alsace, have been blended into France. The day will come when the only battle-field shall be the market open to commerce and to the new ideas of the mind. A day will come when bullets and shells will be replaced by votes, by universal suffrage, and by the arbitration of a great sovereign senate, which shall be to Europe what the Parliament is to England, or the Diet to Germany, or the Legislative Assembly to France. The time will come when a canon will be exhibited as an old instrument of torture, and wonder expressed how such a thing could have been used. A day, I say, will come when the United States of America and the United States of Europe will be seen extending to each other the hand of fellowship across the ocean, and when we shall have the happiness of seeing everywhere arising the majestic radiation of universal concord. Subject worthy of meditation! It is our precautions against war which have brought about revolutions. All has been done, all expended against an imaginary danger. Misery—the real danger—has thus been aggravated. Nevertheless, gentlemen, let us not despair; on the contrary, let us hope more than ever; let us only regard our epoch in its proper light. After all, it is a prodigious and admirable epoch, and the nineteenth century will constitute the most important page of history. One kind of progress brings on another; the fall of national animosities, the obliteration of frontiers from the map, and of prejudices from the heart; a tendency to unity and the level of education, the predominance of the most literary languages—all move at the same time, and converge to the same end—the creation of wellbeing and good will—the extinction of misery at home, and war abroad. Yes, the era of revolutions is drawing to a close, and that of improvements is beginning. The improvement of nations leaves its violent form and takes a peaceable one. The time is come when Providence will substitute, for the disorderly action of agitators, the religious and calm action of peacemakers. Henceforward this will be the object of politics: the recognition of all nationalities—the restoration of the historical unity of the people, the connection of this country with civilization by means of peace—the incessant enlargement of the civilized world, the giving of a good example to nations that are still barbarous—the substitution of arbitration for battles, and, to crown the whole, the utterance by justice of the last word which this ancient world uttered by force. Gentlemen, to say, in conclusion, and let this thought encourage us; it is not to-day that the human race is traversing this providential road. In our old Europe, England has taken the first step, and has said to the people, You are free. France has taken the second step, and said to the people you are sovereign. Now, let us take the third step, and let France, England, Belgium, Germany, Italy, Europe, and America, all unite in saying to the people, you are brethren!"

M. Coquerel then rose and read the conditions and regulations of the meeting.

A letter was read from the Archbishop of Paris, expressing his regret that, on account of the state of his health, he could not preside over the Congress as he had been invited to do.

The Chairman announced that M. De Rochefoucault Liancourt, in the name of the Societe de la Morale Chretienne, proposed as a prize for next year a sum of 500 francs for the best essay on the Advantages of Peace, and another of 500 francs for the best collection of opinions from all authors, ancient and modern sacred and profane, showing that war is alike contrary to humanity and morality. These prizes are altogether independent of any which the Peace Society, properly so called, might think fit to propose.

The Chairman then said that the preliminary business having been disposed of, the resolutions would be brought forward in order. He would now read the first to the meeting:—

"Recourse to arms being a usage condemned alike by religion, morality, reason, and humanity, it is the duty of all men to adopt measures calculated to bring about the abolition of war; and the following resolutions will be submitted to the friends of universal peace, assembled in Congress at Paris on the 22d, 23d, 24th, and 25th August, 1849.

"1. As peace alone can secure the moral and material interests of nations, it is the duty of all governments to submit to arbitration all differences that arise between them, and to respect the decisions of the arbitrators whom they may choose."

This resolution was advocated by several speakers, amongst others,

Henry Vincent rose, and said: I am so overwhelmed at the sight of this magnificent meeting that nothing but a strong desire to call upon you to adhere closely to the resolution under discussion could have induced me to address you at this time. I cannot, however, omit the opportunity of expressing the delight I feel in witnessing the triumphant advancement of our righteous cause. We are in the civilized and polite city of Paris—and it is fitting we should be here—we, who are a portion of the old Saxon race—and we love our French brethren, and wish to bring about that union between the two nations that shall promote the interests of peace and civilization throughout the globe. We come to give a practical direction to the floating sentiments in favor of peace, and to adopt a policy that shall command the respect and support of all the friends of human improvement. There are many here—and I am one—who regard war to be not only a great curse, but an open resistance to all the morality and spirit of the Christian religion. There are others, whom we highly esteem, who oppose war from commercial and financial motives, and from impulses of a philanthropic and humane nature; and this Congress seeks to combine these great elements of social power, and to guide them into the channels of practical usefulness. The arbitration question is the first upon which we wish to fix your attention. We wish the quarrels of governments to be settled without an appeal to arms, and we think there is nothing Utopian in this wish. Now, I caution you against discussing probabilities and difficulties that may or may not occur in the present state of public opinion. It is because difficulties exist that we are assembled in this Congress. Our design is to convince the governments and people that "arbitration" is more Christian, more humane, and more economical than war. This sentiment once created and diffused will soon devise the most effective method for accomplishing its object. I differ from my American friend who thinks we must necessarily discuss the details of our system here. That is the business of a smaller meeting. Our duty is simply to demonstrate the value of our principles; and whenever governments are disposed to adopt them, other difficulties will immediately vanish. And may we not appeal, to some extent, to the practice of nations, civilized and savage? Arbitration always exists in one form or another; but it is seldom used in time. I ask the illustrious orators and senators around me, whether war ever settled a single dispute? War complicates a quarrel, extinguishes a sense of justice, inflames old national animosities, creates new antipathies, enkindles unholy passions, wastes the resources of nations. But arbitration must commence before peace can be restored. We say, therefore, that arbitration should precede a war, not follow it. We say that if but a small proportion of the effort expended upon war were expended upon the policy of arbitration, our victory would be complete. Our progress, too, is so encouraging that we have the strongest faith in our future success. Already in the National Assembly of France—and in the Parisian press—are voices raised in response to our own. In the English Parliament our distinguished countryman, Richard Cobden, raised this question amid general sympathy. In spite of sneers from a few, he succeeded in fixing the idea in the mind of parliament, and in securing for it the most respectful attention at the hands of the existing ministry; and I, who know something of the spread of public opinion, know of no cause that has lately made more way in England than this. Encouraged by what we have done, let us advance. Let this great Congress influence our zeal. Let those who believe in the essential sinfulness of war rejoice with me in the rapid diffusion of our principles, and in the fact that the great moral, unsectarian truths of the gospel are at the basis of this movement, and see how all the intellectual and material influences of the age are working with us. Education aids in the work of civilization, and makes inroads upon the domain of brute force. Science, in ministering to the wants and comforts of man, aids us in our great endeavor. The free-trade policy, that everywhere grows in public esteem, calls the commercial and industrious spirit to our side. That steam power that waded us in one day from London to Paris is our friend, it breaks down the barriers of distance and time—it runs nation into nation, annihilating and scattering national hatreds around it. Be cheerful, then: all modern influences are with us; and this Congress will aid in blending the moral power of France and England together until these great nations are united in the holy resolve to give, by the force of their example and teaching, civilization and peace to the world. We shall surmount all difficulties and conquer all prejudices, and enter even the true Utopia, by basing all our aspirations upon the laws of God, and upon the progressive characteristics of our noble race.

The first resolution was put to the vote, and adopted unanimously.

SECOND SITTING—Thursday, the 23d.

The Salle St. Cecile again presented a very animated appearance to-day; the galleries were well filled with elegantly-dressed women, and the body of the salle was closely crowded.

The Chairman rose and said that the society had received a communication from six towns—Berlin, Breslaw, Danzig, Calvet, Jeahsburg, and Cassel—through M. Borenstadt, the secretary of the German Peace Society, giving in their full and heartfelt adhesion to the objects which the Congress had in view. He considered that after such a manifestation from these northern towns, the society could not do less than pass a vote of thanks by acclamation.

The vote was then passed amidst loud cheers.

M. Coquerel had to inform the meeting that the Minister of Public Works had signified to the members of the Congress that all the palaces and public buildings of Paris and its vicinity should be opened to all the strangers who had come to the French capital to attend the Congress, and particularly to the English and the Americans, on the mere exhibition of their blue cards of members of the Peace Society.

A member said that in his opinion the meeting could not do less than express their sense of the kindness of the Honorable Minister. A vote of thanks was then passed.

The Chairman—the preliminary proceedings of the day having been now disposed of—proceeded to the examination of the second resolution, which is thus worded:—"It is useful to call the attention of all governments to the necessity of entering, by a general and simultaneous measure, on a system of disarming, in order to reduce the expenditure of states, and at the same time to remove a permanent cause of disquietude and irritation amongst states."

M. Coquerel, representative of the people, then came forward. One subject, he said, had much struck him, in considering the circumstances connected with the present meeting. Here were 700 or 800 Englishmen and Americans, who had left their own countries to bear testimony to their faith in the blessings of peace. A Congress, representing the principal states of Europe, had come together to concoct the best measures to carry out their principles; and where had they thought fit to fix their place of meeting? In Paris, the centre of the most military nation in the world, where the noblest triumphal arch in existence was to be seen, and which had been erected in commemoration of the brilliant career of the greatest French captain of modern days; where a gallery had been formed with the significant title of the Musée des Batailles—it was in such a city the friends of peace had come to proclaim their principles. He maintained that such an act was emblematic of great courage; it showed that they had faith in the final success of their ideas, that they believed them to be based on truth—since truth was the thought, the emanation of God himself, and as such was certain to triumph. The object of the society was to induce all nations to adopt the principles of peace, and to settle their disputes by means of arbitration; and in order to carry out that idea, the second resolution proposed as a necessary measure that a general disarming should be agreed to. It should be borne in mind that this course was to apply not only to Europe but to the whole world. France was essentially an inventive nation, and amongst others, she had invented that of permanent armies. It was in 1139, at the general states of Orleans, under Charles VII.—he ought perhaps to apologize for mentioning Charles VII.—it was at that period, he said, that this step was decided on. And yet, paradoxical as might appear this assertion, this was the first step, though a very remote one, towards universal peace. Before that period every man was a soldier, as the feudal system was then in all its vigor, and each chief was obliged to be at all times prepared to furnish his contingent of men. The act of establishing a permanent army lessened the number of soldiers previously existing, since in place of all being soldiers, only a certain number was kept. Now the object was to go still further—it was to disarm the army itself. What was it that constituted a soldier? Did a gun and a knapsack make a foot soldier, or a horse and a helmet a horse one? No; there was something more than that required—there was the discipline and instruction, without which he could do but little.

If the objects of the society were carried out, all that preparation would be rendered unnecessary. It was said that these objects were impossible to be carried out. But why should that be affirmed? or, if affirmed, believed, when it was notorious that when Christianity had commenced its career, it had also been declared that its success was impossible; it had been the same with the system of feudality, which, in its day, was looked on as impossible to be altered. The system of slavery had also been held by the great philosophers, Plato and Aristotle, as absolutely indispensable, and its abolition as impossible. Yet had not all these impossibilities successively yielded to the strenuous efforts of enlightened and determined minds? It would be the same in the course of time with the disarming of armed forces, and he could not but imagine that a very considerable progress had been made, when at such a meeting as the present the chairman was supported on the one side by a Protestant clergyman, and on the other by a venerable cure of the Roman Catholic Church. He thought that France ought to give the example of the general disarming; such a step would add the brightest laurel to her wreath of glory. Practical minds had already effected, as it were, the apotheosis of peace. The state of things, of which that was the type, must surely in the end become the moral situation of the world. God had established Christianity as the religion of peace and good will towards men. War was contrary to the state of things so ordained; and were the hopes which the Congress entertained in this respect not to be realised, man would not be man, and God not God. When M. Coquerel proceeded to his place, the Abbe Duguerry stretched out his hand, which M. Coquerel shook heartily.

The President called upon R. Cobden, M. P., who spoke in French as follows: M. le President—I join with all my heart in the wish expressed by one of the speakers, that we could have one universal language. Nevertheless, I am a little afraid that there might be a dispute, even amongst the friends of peace, as to which of the thousand dialects of the world ought to prevail, and that oceans of ink, at least, would be shed before it was decided. In the meantime, let every country enjoy in peace its own dictionary and grammar; and it is on this principle, recollecting that I am in the metropolis of France, that I prefer to throw myself upon the well-known politeness of a French audience, whilst I address to them, a few words in broken French, rather than be guilty of an act of foreign intervention, even in the matter of language. So much has been said, and so well said, by the eloquent speakers who have preceded me, that I do not feel it necessary to add a word to the general argument; but I should wish to draw your attention for a moment to the manner in which the governments of your country and mine have augmented their standing armaments in mutual rivalry and defiance of each other. I speak only of our navies and coast defences, for we do not pretend to enter into a competition with you in respect to your army. Do not be alarmed, Mr. President, I am not going to infringe upon the wise regulations of the Congress, which forbid our alluding to the politics of the day. Unfortunately, my grievance extends back for many years, and implicates several ministers in both countries; although your present government must certainly be exempted from all responsibility in the matter. Now, during the last thirteen years you and we have been constantly increasing our navies, adding to our coast defences, enlarging our arsenals, building new basins for steam-vessels, and constructing fresh harbours for refuge. No sooner is the keel of another line of battle ship laid down in your dock yards than forthwith new hammers begin to resound at Portsmouth. A new forge has hardly begun to work at Cherbourg, when immediately the sparks are seen to fly from fresh anvils at Plymouth, and vice versa. The consequence has been that the cost of our navies has been increased fifty per cent. in a time of peace. My first objection to this is its supreme folly, for as both countries increase their naval strength in equal proportion, neither party has gained anything by the change, the only result being a pure waste to the amount of the augmentation. My next objection is to the extreme hypocrisy of this system; for at the very time that all this increase of armament has been going on, our respective governments have been exchanging assurances of mutual feelings of friendship and goodwill. If these professions are made in sincerity and truth, where was the necessity for more ships of war and more coast defences? An individual does not cover himself with armour in the presence of his friends, unless indeed he happen to be mad. But my greatest objection to these vast armaments is, that they tend to excite dangerous animosities between the two nations, and to perpetuate fear, hatred, and suspicion—passions which find their gratification instinctively in war. And here is the great reason why this Congress desires, in the terms of the motion before it, to bring the nations into a system of disarmament. Now, how shall this be accomplished? Why, by teaching our respective governments this little arithmetical problem, of which in times past, they seem to have been ignorant—namely, that if two nations are both armed in time of peace, up to a certain point, say six, they are not relatively stronger than if their armaments stood both at three, and that they would be equally strong relatively if they disarmed altogether. But you, the tax-payers of France, will see that there is an immense difference to your pockets. Do not, however, let us deceive ourselves with the idea that we shall easily succeed in teaching this little arithmetical lesson to our governments. I speak from long experience when I say that no men are so difficult to teach as professional statesmen. They are so devoted to routine, and so fortified in self-sufficiency, that they do not easily believe that any wisdom exists in the world, excepting that which radiates from their own bureaux. Do you suppose, then, that they will listen readily to the advice of this Congress? On the contrary, they are at this moment laughing at us as Utopists, theorists, and dreamers. And yet I think the result of this system, in a financial point of view, ought to make them more modest. I ask the governments of Europe, can you continue your present financial system for ten years longer? With scarcely one exception they must answer, "No!" Is it then Utopian on the part of the Congress to arouse their attention to the subject, to point to the great gulf which yawns before them, to show that the danger of financial ruin which they lose sight of is far more imminent than the risk of foreign attack, which they so constantly dread and so diligently provide against. Even in this, the lowest point of view, as a question merely of finance, you stand justified before the world for holding this congress of nations. It is time that the people interfered, and the governments of the world ought to tender you their thanks for having, by this fraternal shaking of hands across the Atlantic and the channel, facilitated that process of disarmament which is called for alike upon every principle of humanity and sound policy.

The resolution was then put to the vote and unanimously adopted—as were paragraphs four, five, six, and seven of the next resolution; paragraphs one, two, and three being reserved for discussion to-morrow.

THIRD SITTING—Friday 24.

The sittings of the Congress were more crowded to-day than on the two previous occasions, and crowds were assembled in the side galleries, who were unable to obtain seats in the body of the building.

M. Coquerel said he held in his hand a small volume entitled "An Essay towards the Present and Future Peace of Europe by the Establishment of an European Diet, Parliament, or States." One motto in this volume was, "Bene Pacifice," another, "Celant arma Toga." It was printed in London in the year 1693, and its author was William Penn. The very volume he held was the volume itself which William Penn offered to Queen Anne of England. It was marked with her royal initials in two places, and it has now been presented to the library of the Protestant Church de l'Oratoire, by the eminent writer, Andre Bacher, as a monument of the first congress of peace.

The volume was given to M. Coquerel by M. Barbier, who accompanied it by the following letter:

"Sir,—The idea of Henry IV. had inspired to William Penn in the midst of the wars of Louis XIV., 'An Essay on the Peace of Europe.' Allow me the honor of offering it to the library of the Oratoire of Paris. None better than you can show its merits to an assembly wherein the children of William Penn shine in such numbers. The smallness of the volume has no doubt contributed to its rarity. Its intrinsic value will no doubt seem to you increased by its binding, which shows that it is a homage paid by Penn to Queen Anne, A. R. (Anna Regina) at a time when a false accusation placed difficulties in the way of his project in favor of America.

(Signed)

"BARBIER."

Paris, Aug. 23.<sup>77</sup>

M. V. Hugo announced that at the present meeting, it being the last of this session, no written memoir could be admitted with the sole exception of one by Elihu Burritt, who had come from America to spread the cause of peace throughout Europe.

The Abbe Deguerry followed and said—After having voted arbitration amongst nations, after assisting at the ruin of armies, by the word of an illustrious publicist, and by the language of a holy man, who is at once eloquent and mathematical, it remains for us to fix the means of disarming. There is no doubt that, were an international congress in existence, which would form a supreme court, judging all differences, a general pacification would be realised, because it is truth, and because truth is the thought of God, which must succeed sooner or later. It is a Samson, who sooner or later will carry off the gates of his prison. The idea of universal peace is that of God. It is the wish expressed in the gospel and that of humanity. None can contest this, and yesterday I was happy to hear it said that the idea of war was supreme folly. Yes, war is an impious folly, where those who strike best and hardest are most considered. That, surely, was not the idea of God. Therefore do I, for my part, give praise to those governments who have prosecuted, as you do, the great work of pacification.

Charles Hindley, M. P., President of the London Peace Society, then said in French—Gentlemen, my French brothers, I much regret that I cannot speak your language with the facility which would render my speech more agreeable to you—and not wearisome to myself. But in this very circumstance I perceive one manifest consequence of the war state. When I was a young man war was raging between your country and mine. I was forced accordingly to learn the French just as I learned the Latin language, the Greek, and other dead languages not now in use amongst us. I had then never seen a Frenchman, and never expected to see one. I learned to read French, not to speak it, which seemed wholly superfluous, and now you hear the result, that I cannot express myself as I fain would on this interesting occasion. I cannot throw my mind into yours. I cannot mingle my heart with yours as I fain would. Fortunately, however, there is a secret magnetism pervading the entire of this assemblage, spreading from heart to heart, a silent language speaking within us with a more peaceful eloquence than could be supplied by the most potent language that the ears could receive. Now every soul feels the fervor of our principle—the principle of an universal charity; now, I do not feel that I am English as contradistinguished from French. I know and feel that I am a man—and I repeat with the old poet, "Homo sum et nihil humanum alienum a me puto." Yes, I no longer look in this assembly to French, English, German, Dutch, Belgian, American—I occupy myself only with the thought which occupies all—that we are all men—that we are all brothers. To return to the days of my youth. The default of language I spoke of was the smallest fault of our education at the time. We were not allowed to regard you as friends, my French brethren—nay, we were taught to regard you as enemies, whom patriotism called upon us to hate and to injure. It was not only the fashion, it was the principle, with the sons and daughters of England, to scorn and hate the French. But other days came. War was at an end. Peace came, and with it the English visited Paris, and found they were not the natural enemies of France they had supposed. Such was the grand result of temporary peace. And now let permanent peace be instituted by all the English members of the Congress saying to Frenchmen, and to all foreigners by birth, "We are brothers. Adieu war! Adieu hatred! In future let charity, love, and peace be amongst all nations." Accept, my dear French brethren, these words—they come from the heart.

The resolution was then put to the vote, and adopted.

The Chairman, proceeded to read the fourth resolution, thus worded: "The Congress strongly disapproves of all loans and taxes destined to promote wars of ambition or conquest."

R. Cobden, M. P., addressed the meeting as follows: I have the honor to submit to your consideration a motion condemnatory of loans for warlike purposes. My object is to promote peace by withholding the sinews of war. I propose that this Congress shall make an appeal to the consciences of all those who have money to lend. I do not allude to a few bankers who appear before the world as loan contractors. They are the agents only for collecting funds from smaller capitalists. It is from the savings and accumulations of the merchants, manufacturers, traders, agriculturists, and annuitants of civilized Europe, that warlike governments can alone supply their necessities, and to them we will appeal by every motive of self-interest and humanity not to lend their support to a barbarous system which obstructs commerce, uproots industry, annihilates capital and labor, and revels amidst the tears and blood of their fellow-creatures. We will do more; we will, in every possible way, expose the character and objects, and exhibit to the world the true state of the resources of every government which endeavors to contract a loan for warlike purposes. The time is gone by when barbarous nations devoted to war could conquer civilized Europe, unless, indeed, the latter will be so very complacent as to lend the money necessary for its own subjugation. War has become an expensive luxury. It is no longer a question of bows and arrows, swords and shields. Battles are now decided by artillery, and every discharge of a cannon costs from 12 to 15 francs; I wish with all my heart it was ten times as much. The consequence is, that when countries behind the rest of Europe in civilization enter upon hostilities, they are obliged immediately to draw upon the resources of more civilized states—in other words, to raise a loan; and how is the money thus borrowed from the savings of honest industry expended? What is war in our day? Has it learned any of the charities of peace? Let us see. I hold in my hand an extract from a proclamation issued at Pesth, dated 19th July, and signed "Haynau." Praying forgiveness for your outraged feelings, I will read it: "Any individual who shall, either by word or action, or by wearing any revolutionary signs or emblems, dare to support the cause of the rebels; any individual who shall insult one of my soldiers, or those of our brave allies, either by words or blows; any individual who shall enter into criminal relations with the enemies of the crown, or who shall seek to kindle the flame of rebellion by reports spread for a sinister purpose, or who shall be rash enough to conceal arms or not deliver them up within the time fixed by my proclamation, shall be put to death within the shortest possible delay, and on the spot where the crime shall be committed, without distinction of condition or sex." This was addressed to the inhabitants of Pesth; and a few weeks afterwards the same signature appeared to a proclamation addressed to the inhabitants of the countries of the Theiss, from which I will also read a short extract: "Take care not to incur my vengeance by revolutionary movements. Not being able in such a case to find out the guilty party, I shall be compelled to punish the whole district. If on the territory occupied by my army, or on the rear, any attempt shall be committed against my soldiers, or if any of the convoys should be stopped, or a courier, or the transport of provisions prevented, an immediate punishment shall be inflicted on the guilty commune; it shall become the prey to flames, and shall be levelled to the ground, to serve as a frightful example to other communes." I ask you, whilst your flesh creeps and your hair bristles with horror at these quotations, has war borrowed any of the charities of Christianity? Have modern warriors repudiated the practice of the barbarians of antiquity? For my part I can see no difference between Attila and Haynau; between the Goth of the fifth and the Goth of the nineteenth century. But we address ourselves to those who, by their loans, really hire and pay the men who commit these atrocities, and we say—"It is you who give strength to the arm which murders innocent women and helpless old age; it is you who supply the torch which reduces to ashes peaceful and inoffensive villages, and on your souls will rest the burden of these crimes against humanity." I shall be told that it is useless to make an appeal to the sensibilities of men who, with money lying unproductive at the bottom of their pockets, are thinking of nothing but five per cent. I will undertake to prove, though I shall not weary you with an opinion upon the subject, that peace will offer a far better field for the employment of the savings of agriculture than the field of battle, and that she will afford a much more profitable investment for the accumulations of industry than in partnership with Haynau and Co. This discussion will be raised again and again in various places. The Congress of Nations will make the tour of the civilized world. You, French men and French women, who have received with so much enthusiasm your English visitors, in whose name I thank you—who have known so well how to show the noble zeal in the cause of humanity which has prompted your American guests to cross the great Atlantic—who have welcomed the presence of Germans, Belgians, and Dutchmen, and the representatives of other nations in this hall—you have imparted to the Peace Congress a great moral power, which its members will endeavor to use for the benefit of humanity. We shall leave you with renewed hope and courage, confident that we have only to persevere resolutely, but legally, and always in a moral sense, and step by step we shall propagate the sublime idea which now reigns in this hall, till it embraces within its influence all the nations of the earth.

The resolution was then adopted by acclamation.

The last resolution, thus worded—"The Congress decides that the committee be instructed to draw up an address to all nations embodying the resolutions of the Congress; and that this address shall be presented to the various governments, and that special means be taken to bring it under the attention of the President of the French Republic,"—was adopted unanimously, without discussion.

M. Wisscher, one of the vice-presidents charged to report on the various propositions presented during the meetings, and which could not be examined and discussed from want of time, proposed that a committee should be constituted at Paris, which should correspond with those of England, the United States, Belgium, and any others that might be formed; the said committee to be formed of the members who had prepared the meeting of the Congress at Paris.

This double proposition was adopted.

Mr. Durkee, another of the vice-presidents, next addressed the meeting. He should not, he said, then trespass on the attention of the meeting, but for the remarks that had been made by a previous speaker (W. W. Brown). He fully agreed with that gentleman that slavery was a great curse to his country, and he was happy to say that a great struggle was now going on in America to get rid of the evil. There was in fact a war waging in that country against slavery and against oppression. From what he had witnessed since he had come into the place in which he now addressed the meeting, he was convinced that ideas of peace and harmony must ultimately triumph. The smiles of sympathy which there met the advocates of peace were a proof that it was acquiring strength in the minds of the people; and the cheers which greeted those who advocated the glorious cause of peace were, in his mind, a certain proof of its ultimate triumph. The day, he trusted, was not far distant when war among nations would cease, and that the only rivalry between them would be in arts and civilization, and by so doing promote the general interest and happiness of mankind.

J. W. Pennington, an escaped slave, and now a minister of the Presbyterian Church in America, next came forward. He apologized for trespassing on the meeting at that late hour, but he was desirous of adding his humble voice to the declarations in favor of universal peace, which had been so eloquently put forth from that tribune. It had been suggested that the ministers of religion should use their utmost exertions to influence it into the minds of the rising generation, but he would observe that in the present state of the public mind, it required a vast share of moral courage to inculcate such a doctrine. A love of war was looked upon by too many to be a mark of patriotism, and fighting for his country the best means of displaying that patriotism. It would therefore, he said, require great moral courage to tell men that such was not the way to show their love of their country. Another reason why he was anxious to address the meeting was, that if he had not done so he should have been considered as unfaithful to and unmindful of his brethren in captivity. He fully agreed with W. W. Brown that slavery was a great element of war, and that every man of real Christian feeling should put shoulder to shoulder to get rid of such a curse. He was sure that with the assistance of that society the advocates of the abolition of slavery must triumph, when universal peace would reign on the earth, and when no other sentiment would be heard or expressed than that of peace and good will to all men.

On leaving the tribune, the speaker was shaken heartily by the hand by the Abbe Dugerry, M. Coquerel, and the chairman, and received the congratulations of a number of other parties on the platform.

R. Cobden, M. P., then rose to propose votes of thanks to the French government for the marked kindness and liberality which had been shown to the members of the Peace Congress and the English visitors since their arrival in Paris; next, to the Chairman, for the able and courteous manner in which he had presided over the business of the meeting; and, lastly, to the members of the bureau and the secretaries, for the zeal and energy with which they had discharged the functions of their office.

J. Brotherton, M. P., supported the motion. He had not, he said, intended to have addressed the meeting, but he could not refrain from expressing his gratification at the noble hospitality which had been accorded by the French government to the Peace Congress, and he was sure that such a reception as they had met with augured well for the success of the object they had in view. He should therefore give his cordial support to the proposition.

The propositions were then severally put to the vote, and adopted.

The Chairman then rose to return thanks. My address (said he) shall be short; and yet I have to bid you adieu! How resolve to do so? Here, during three days, have questions of the deepest import been discussed, examined, probed to the bottom, and during those discussions councils have been given to governments which they will do well to profit by. If these three days' sittings are attended with no other result, they will be the means of sowing in the minds of those present germs of cordiality, which must ripen into good fruit. England, France, Belgium, Europe, and America, would be all drawn closer by these sittings. Yet the moment to part has arrived; but I can feel that we are strongly united in heart. But, before parting, I may be permitted to congratulate you and myself on the result of our proceedings. We have been all joined together without distinction of country; we have all been united in one common feeling during our three days' communion. The good work cannot go back—it must advance—it must be accomplished. The course of the future may be judged of by the sound of the footsteps of the past! In the course of that day's discussion, a reminiscence had been handed up to one of the speakers, that this is the anniversary of the dreadful massacre of St. Bartholomew. He who was then speaking turned away from the thought of that sanguinary scene with the pious horror natural to his sacred calling. But I, who may boast of firmer nerve, I take up the remembrance. Yes, it was on this day, 277 years ago, that Paris was roused from slumber by the sound of that dread bell which bore the name of the doche d'argent. Massacre was on foot, seeking with keen eye for its victim—man was busy in slaying man. That slaughter was called for by mingled passions of the worst description. Hatred of all kinds was there urging on the slayer—hatred of a religious, a political, a personal character! And yet, on the anniversary of that same day of horror, and in that very city where blood was flowing like water, has God this day given a rendezvous to men of peace, where wild tumult is transformed into order, and animosity into love. The stain of blood is blotted out, and in its place beams forth a ray of holy light. All distinctions are removed, and Papist and Huguenot meet together in friendly communion. Who that thinks of these amazing changes, can doubt of the progress that has been made? But whoever denies the force of progress must deny God, since progress is the boon of Providence, and emanates from the great Being above. I feel gratitude for the change that has been effected, and pointing solemnly to the past, I say, Let this day be ever held memorable—let the 24th August, 1572, be remembered only for the purpose of being compared with the 24th of August, 1849; and when we think of this latter, and ponder over the high purpose to which it has been devoted—the advocacy of the principles of peace—let us not be so wanting in reliance on Providence as to doubt for one moment of the eventual success of our holy cause!

The immense crowd then slowly left the building, and the last day of the Peace Congress of Paris closed at a quarter past six.—London Non-Formist.

OPPRESSION OF THE COLORED RACE UNDER SANCTION OF LAW.

A letter from a respectable inhabitant of Wilmington, Del., recently published in the Pennsylvania Freeman, gives in substance the following account of a case which occurred a few miles from that city, in the course of last month. A free colored man, residing four or five miles from Elkton, Maryland, was taken sick, and sent for his son, who lived in Wilmington to pay him a visit. The son, as well as the father, was a free-man, and had been raised in the neighborhood of Elkton. Upon receiving the message, this son, in company with another colored freeman, likewise a native of the same neighborhood, took passage in the cars to Elkton, with the design of proceeding directly to the abode of the sick parent. But, immediately after leaving the cars, they were arrested by a constable, whose name is given, and taken before a magistrate, who fined each of them twenty dollars, for the offence of coming from another state into Maryland. As they had not with them the money to pay these penalties, they were committed to prison; but next day some person had the humanity to advance the amount of fine and costs, making together about forty-five dollars, and procured their release. Whether the colored men were expected to refund the sum thus advanced, we are not informed.

Now, our readers will naturally inquire, what would have been the result, in case no person had appeared to pay this demand. An act of the State, passed in 1831, contains the following provisions:—

"No free negro or mulatto is permitted to emigrate to, or settle in this State; and no free negro or mulatto belonging to any other state, district or territory, is permitted to come into this State, and therein remain for the space of ten successive days, whether such free negro or mulatto intends settling in this State or not;—under the penalty of fifty dollars for each and every week such person coming into, shall thereafter remain in this State;—the one-half to the informer and the other half to the sheriff for the use of the county, to be recovered on complaint and conviction before a justice of the peace of the county in which he shall be arrested."

"Any free negro or mulatto, refusing or neglecting to pay the fine above mentioned, shall be committed to the gaol of the county, and shall be sold by the sheriff at public sale, for such time as may be necessary to cover the aforesaid penalty, first giving ten days previous notice of said sale; and the sheriff, after deducting prison charges and a commission of ten per centum, shall pay over one-half of the nett proceeds to the informer, and the balance he shall pay over to the levy court or commissioners, as the case may be, for the use of the county."

By this act the penalty would not be legally incurred till the offender had remained ten days in the State. But in 1839 a supplement to the act of 1831 was passed, in which the following provision appears:

"Sec. 1. After the passage of this act, no free negro or mulatto, belonging to or residing in any other state, shall come into this state, whether such free negro or mulatto intends settling in this state or not, under the penalty of twenty dollars for the first offence; and no free negro or mulatto shall come into this state a second time where he or she has been arrested under the provisions of this act, under the penalty of five hundred dollars, the one-half of the said sum of five hundred dollars to the informer, and the other half to the sheriff, for the use of the Colonization Society of the state of Maryland, to be recovered on complaint and conviction before the county court of the county, or during the recess, the orphans' court of said county in which he or she shall be arrested; and any free negro or mulatto refusing or neglecting to pay said fine, shall be committed to the jail of the county, and shall be sold by the sheriff at public sale, to the highest bidder, whether a resident of this state or not, first giving ten days' notice of such sale, to serve in the character and capacity of a slave; and the said sheriff, after deducting prison charges and a commission of ten per cent. shall pay over one-half of the nett proceeds to the informer, and the balance he shall pay over, if sold in a county on the eastern shore, to the treasurer of said shore, or if sold in a county on the western shore, to the treasurer of the western shore, for the use of the Colonization Society of the state of Maryland; and for all sums of money so received by the said sheriff, his bond shall be answerable on his failure to pay the same over, in an action at law in the name of the state of Maryland, for the use of the parties entitled to receive the same by this act; and all sheriffs and constables are hereby required to arrest any free negro or mulatto, who may come into this state contrary to the provisions of this act, and all other persons are authorized to arrest any such free negro or mulatto; and such sheriff, constable, or any other person as may arrest any free negro or mulatto, who shall have come once into the state contrary to the provisions of this act, shall be entitled to the penalty of twenty dollars hereby inflicted, to be recovered on complaint and conviction as before stated, and such free negro or mulatto shall pay the said penalty of twenty dollars, and all jail fees and expenses incident to his or her arrest and detention, or upon his or her failure to do so, he or she shall be committed and sold as herein provided in relation to those who have incurred the penalty of five hundred dollars; Provided, that if said negro or mulatto shall not remove out of the state within five days after he shall have paid the said sum of twenty dollars, he shall be deemed to have come a second time into the state, and shall be liable as if he had so done."

Such is the law in our sister republic, in regard to this oppressed part of our race; and yet in the same act, care was taken to prevent white persons coming into, and travelling through the state, from being deprived of the service of colored servants, or attendants, whom they might wish to employ. That such laws could be enacted in our age and country, may appear incredible; but my readers may be assured that the volume (Latrobo's Justices' Practice) containing these acts lies before me.

THE CHESTER COUNTY ABDUCTION CASE.

Thomas Mitchell, the victim of the late abduction, is a native of Maryland, where he resided as a slave, claimed by a Mr. Hays, of Cecil county. About the year 1837—12 years ago—he came to Pennsylvania, and has since resided in Lancaster and Chester counties, where he has been considered a free man, even according to the laws of Maryland. He always spoke of himself as such, and he still asserts that he was a slave only for a term of years, and is legally free. During his residence here he had married and become a father, and obtained for himself and family a snug and comfortable home, near Unionville, where by industry and honesty he had won the esteem of his employers and acquaintance.

After midnight on the 21st of August, cries of "murder" and shrieks of distress were heard by his neighbors, one family of whom lived but a few rods distant. Instantly they repaired to the spot, and found Mitchell's door battered in, his wife half insensible with fright lying within, but he was gone. Near the fallen wife lay a pistol loaded with three balls, the percussion cap of which was exploded. It was found that the door had been broken in by a large log wielded by several men; that Mitchell had been seized in his bed, and spite of his resistance, torn from the arms of his wife by three or four stout ruffians, and hurried into the carriage almost without clothing. To silence her cries, and compel her to relax her grasp, a pistol was presented to the breast of the wife, and her life was threatened.

Little more than this could be learned from the terrified woman.

An alarm was instantly given throughout the neighborhood, and long before the dawn two parties were formed for pursuit; one going to Wilmington and the other to Elkton, and thence to Baltimore by railroad.

Before reaching Baltimore, they discovered that the kidnappers, (with their victim handcuffed in their midst) were on board the same train with themselves. On their arrival they found Dr. Snodgrass, who had been informed of the outrage by a telegraphic despatch from Thomas Garrett at Wilmington, at the depot, with an officer, to arrest the kidnappers. But the slave prison was near, and the men-servants had everything in readiness, and before they were intercepted, had lodged poor Mitchell in the slave trader's den, where they were followed by friend Martin, while his companion proceeded to procure advice and assistance from friends in Baltimore.

The slave-dealers learning incidentally that Mr. Martin had formerly employed the man they claimed as their slave, arrested him on an assumption for the hire of the slave, and he was thrown into prison, though good and sufficient bail was offered for him. The Sheriff's deputy, fearing the wrath of the slaveholders, refused the bail on the paltry pretence that it was not offered by "freeholders." Able counsel were employed, and the case was brought before Judge Le-grand by a petition for the discharge of Mr. M., under the provisions of a law of 1846 for the relief of non-resident debtors. It was readily proved that Martin resided in Pennsylvania, and was, of course, not liable to Maryland laws.

Though Mr. Martin is personally discharged, the suit is continued, and will be tried at the October session of the Court, should the plaintiffs press it, which is not probable.

In the mean time Thomas Mitchell has been sold to the slave trader, and is confined in Wilson's den, (pen is not the word) and probably would immediately be sent South—as the trader threatens, when trying to speculate upon the sympathies of Pennsylvanians—but that his shoulder was dislocated, and he was otherwise disabled in the scuffle when he was taken.

The names of three of the wretches engaged in this bold outrage are known, and measures will undoubtedly be taken to procure their delivery to the authorities of Pennsylvania, to be tried for their crimes of burglary, the threat of assassination against a peaceable woman, and the kidnapping of a Pennsylvania citizen.

POETRY.

Communicated for the Non-Slaveholder.

MY TWENTY-SECOND BIRTH-DAY.

Well twenty-two years
With their sunshine and tears
Have to-day set their seal on my brow;
The dark clouds which lower'd,
The blessings which shower'd
Upon me are over me now.

As backward I gaze
Through the dim, veiling haze
Which now pales the years of my youth,
Flowers are springing there,
Sweet birds are singing there,
Love hangs o'er the pathway of Truth.

With sunshine o'erhead,
Flowers 'neath my tread,
A shadow was still on my heart;
Though odors were mine
From affection's pure shrine,
That shadow and I could not part.

None loved more than I
The blue of the sky,
Or the night watch still wheeling away,
But by day or by night,
Would that shadow alight
By my side, and it whispered decay.

Now childhood has gone,
The bright hues have flown
That enveloped the morning of life;
My dreams of the earth,
Ever peopled with worth,
Soon waned in the glare of its strife.

That heavenly love,
Which is glowing above,
For the sole of her foot finds no rest;
But the olive she bears,
As a promise appears,
That the earth will yet claim her a guest.

So when I looked round,
And no solace found,
Till pale grew the sunshine and flowers;
When friend after friend,
Would their weary way wend
To fairer than earthlier bowers.

When I saw each depart,
With such peace at their heart—
So gently await their day's dawning—
I longed that the night
Might too pass from my sight,
And I open my eyes to the morning.

The shadow passed by,
And Azriel to my eye
Was clothed only in mercy and love;
Though stars fall, and the flowers
Decay in their bowers,
We have mansions provided above.

Oh, Father of Heaven!
To me thou hast given
To toil in thy vineyard, the earth;
Wilt thou not be near,
And my drooping soul cheer,
Till sure of its heavenly birth.

A promising child,
Soon by pleasure beguiled,
So swayed by the earth she distrusts,
So weak and so wailing—
So selfish, so failing,
Oh, Father, be near the frail dust,

And grant me the strength
That my spirit at length
May faint not when the noonday is high,
But bear all for thee,
By thy mercy made free
From the bonds in which helpless I lie.

I dare not for me
Ask forgiveness of thee
For the follies and sins of my youth;
But oh, by thy love
May I lift me above
All my frailties to live in thy truth.

That my work may be o'er;
When thou knockest at the door
That my lamp may be trimmed but for thee;
That with heavenly peace
I may enter that bliss
Where hours and days may not be.

ASSOCIATED ACTION.

REPORT OF THE BOARD OF MANAGERS OF THE PHILAD'A. FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS.

In surrendering the trust confided to them, the Managers report that during the past year they have endeavoured to give attention to the objects of their appointment. Owing to previous arrangements by which the Board were relieved from the details of the business department originally undertaken, and the whole labor of providing cotton and having it manufactured into the various fabrics needed for the store, devolved upon one of our number, the Managers have been excused from this care and labor, and have confined their attention to the advocacy of the principles of our cause, and the collection of useful information upon the subject, as opportunity offered.
In the prosecution of this concern, the managers prepared and circulated an Address to the Members of the Religious Society of Friends on the subject of Slavery and the Slave Trade. A considerable part of the edition has been distributed in this city and elsewhere, and it is hoped a wider circulation among the members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting may now be given through the agency of Friends in attendance at the Yearly Meeting. We would take this occasion to request that Friends whose views on this subject are nearly correspondent with ours, would endeavor to procure, for this address, a serious and careful perusal. And we would particularly desire the younger portion of the Society to reflect upon the numerous wrongs, which the descendants of the African race have long suffered and continue to suffer, from our hands, and carefully to inquire how far they are contributing to the infliction of these wrongs.

When the forerunner of the Messiah, apparently in doubt and under discouragement, sent to inquire, whether the Saviour was actually come or whether they should look for another; the emphatic and conclusive reply was a reference to the things which the messengers heard and saw. He taught them by the works which he performed, whence his authority was derived.
From that time to this, the test, which was proposed on another occasion and which was substantially the same as that offered to the messengers of John, has been equally clear, "By their fruits ye shall know them."

The Society of Friends have long agreed that the whole system of slavery is radically unjust and totally irreconcilable with the doctrines of Christianity. But do they prove their faith by their works? Do they carry their principles into action, while they freely use, and trade in the products of slave labor! If the slavery of the negro race is unquestionably wrong, as we all agree it is; and if the system is supported by the market for its products, as no one can deny it to be; how can we avoid the imputation of participating in the wrong, if we voluntarily sustain the market? If the principle of truth in the mind of man bears an unwavering testimony against violence and oppression, may we not justly question our sensibility to its monitions, if we feel no scruple in regard to supporting, by our custom, a system which is founded on violence and oppression?

Under a firm conviction that the use of articles which are the product of the compulsive and uncompensated toil of our fellow-men, as those articles are which are produced by the labor of slaves, is giving countenance and support to the wrong-doer; is sustaining the slaveholder in his unrighteous oppression and robbery, we feel solicitous to press upon our fellow professors of the Christian name, and especially upon those who, like the members of our religious Society, have been trained from childhood to believe that slavery is wrong, the careful and earnest consideration of their accountability in this matter to Him who declared, "Inasmuch as ye did it not unto one of the least of these, ye did it not to me!"

Associated as we have been during several years, though but a little band, in efforts to procure, through unpolluted channels, a supply of such articles of daily use and seeming necessity, as are ordinarily in the present age procured for consumption in the United States by the labor of slaves, and now having it in our power to point to a well filled store regularly supplied with a large variety of those articles obtained through satisfactory channels, we invite our friends to supply their demands for such articles from this unexceptionable source.

To the Association we would say, what to most of the members is already known through the columns of the Non-Slaveholder, that the Board again sent our devoted friend and coadjutor, N. Thomas, and our friend H. Charles, as travelling companion and assistant, to the South to explore still further the cotton region, and seek out the little oases cultivated by the labor of freemen, thinly scattered over the wide waste of slavery's domain. Passing through West Tennessee and Northern Mississippi, their aim was principally to explore Alabama and Georgia. They travelled through Alabama with satisfactory results, but did not extend their visit into Georgia, and returned, after an absence of nearly three months, by way of Tennessee and Kentucky.

For the satisfaction of those who are not already informed on the subject, it may not be amiss to state that our friend, George W. Taylor, has procured, during the past two years, sufficient free labor cotton to keep a small manufactory supplied, where he has a variety of heavy goods made, such as muslins, drillings, flannels, ticking, pantaloons, stuffs, yarns for gingham, knitting cotton, &c., the whole of which are sold at his store, besides finer muslins, prints, cambrics, hosiery, and a variety of other fabrics, which he has had manufactured at other establishments, by requiring that the free-labor cotton should be kept separate, and all the goods made of such part of the free cotton as could be kept from mixture, furnished for his store. In this way he has supplied the free-labor stores in New York, Cincinnati, Mount Pleasant, Indiana, and many partial stocks for stores in nearly all the Northern and Western States from Maine to Iowa, besides supplying his immediate customers, by retail, in Philadelphia and vicinity, and many families and parts of families scattered in all the New England, Middle and Western States, except two or three Western States; some small orders from England have also been supplied. This statement is made, not to give the appearance of a large demand, for such is not the fact even in the aggregate, but to show the friends of the cause, that there is a leaven at work all over the free States, and in Delaware and Maryland also, which we may hope will work for the deliverance of the oppressed, in the sight of those who have the power, if they will exercise it, to put away our national disgrace in this respect, by the quiet, inoffensive, unobjectionable remedy of simple non-participation. But it will be asked how can this be effected? We answer, in many ways. How does a little leaven, leaven the whole lump? How does a grain of mustard seed cast into the earth, grow and become the greatest among herbs, so that the fowls of the air may lodge on its branches? A good cause advocated by a few, whose practice accords with their precepts, will gain strength and attract more advocates; thus it will spread. And the moral effect of good example will have a restraining, rebuking effect even on those who will not acknowledge its influence. A bad custom may thus grow unpopular, and pass gradually away even from among those, the greater part of whom may not seem to have abandoned it from the convictions of religious principle. The history of mankind in various ages abounds in exemplifications of this position. Thus may the good continue to grow and prevail until all evil is extirpated from the earth.

Not the least among the favorable signs of the times, we may regard with encouragement the fact that during the last Yearly Meeting in London, a meeting of Friends was held in Gracechurch street meeting house, to consider what practical measures could be best adopted to encourage the use of free grown products. The meeting had been announced in the Yearly Meeting, and the attendance of both men and women was very large, the Meeting House being nearly filled. At this meeting a large committee was appointed to carry out the objects of the meeting.

In the 6th month last, a meeting was held at Friend's Meeting House, Newport, R. I., pursuant to an adjournment of a Meeting held at the same place the 14th of 6th month, last year, for the promotion of the use of free labor productions in the place of those of slave labor. The proceedings of this latter meeting are given at page 193, vol. 4, Non-Slaverholder, and indicate the right spirit at work.

This interesting subject has also claimed the attention of the Meeting, for Sufferings of Ohio Yearly Meeting, and also of the Yearly Meeting itself. The Free Produce Association of Ohio held a meeting on the 5th of 9th month last at Short Creek Meeting House, and has adopted active measures to promote the object. Even in North Carolina, in the heart of the slave country, Friends are waking up to this matter. At the time of the last Yearly Meeting held at New-Garden, Guilford County, interesting meetings were held for the promotion of the free labor movement, and committees were appointed out of the various Monthly Meetings within the Yearly Meeting. The business of these committees is to correspond with one another and with Friends in various situations, with a view of collecting and disseminating information relative to the means of procuring free produce. For an account of these meetings, we refer to a letter from our friend Enoch Lewis, in the Non-Slaverholder, Vol. 4, No. 12.

It is also a pleasing circumstance to record that the Boarding Schools at Providence, Nine Partners, Haverford and West Town are now supplied with free labor groceries, and it is hoped in future, when cotton goods are wanted at either of those establishments, care will be taken to procure such as are the products of free labor. Some cotton sheeting is now in the course of manufacture for the dormitories of Haverford. The impression likely to be made on the minds of the pupils in those institutions, by the care thus taken to supply them with those necessities only which are honestly obtained, cannot be otherwise than beneficial towards building them up in the love of justice and mercy, and preparing them to take a part in the active scenes of after life, in promoting the well being of their fellow creatures.

We should incline to make some extracts from the interesting letters of our travelling agents, but they have already been given in the Non-Slaverholder, and may be supposed to have met the eyes of those who may hear or see this report. It is an interesting circumstance that our friends N. Thomas and H. Charles, were permitted to pass through the centre of the Slave states during the late time of intense excitement on the slave question in that quarter, growing out of the discussions of the subject in Congress, particularly, as the nature of their business unavoidably suggested the topic of slavery for conversation. We feel at liberty to conclude, that the ease with which they made their way, was probably owing in great measure to the consistency of their lives with their professions being perceived by slaveholders, and hence the respect and frequent kindness extended to them, as stated in their letters. Indeed, they had an opportunity of observing, in one intelligent instance, at least, how unaccountable it appears to Southern men, that Friends, with all their profession of opposition to slavery upon principle, should yet be willing to partake freely of the cotton, sugar, and rice which is "whipped out of the slaves." And no wonder they should be accosted by a man of note with such words as these, that "he did not understand what the North meant in their opposition to the extension of slavery, seeing the South had all the trouble and difficulty with the slaves, while the North got at least half the profits." This man, though a strong advocate for slavery, was willing to concede that many were opposed to it on religious grounds, and that he could not object to them. We have often been pained with the frequent assertions made by moderate, well disposed men of the North, and by some who claim to be opposed to slavery, that the agitation of the slavery question in the free states tends only to rivet the chains of the slave, and make his situation more uncomfortable. It was therefore no small gratification to us to hear the sentiment as expressed by Southern men, even in Alabama, that in their opinion "the action of the North on the slavery question is the prime cause of the attempts to improve the condition of the slaves, (which is bad enough yet) and has done more than any thing else in this respect."

In conclusion, when we reflect that seven and a half millions of the descendants of Africa are at this moment groaning under the galling yoke of hopeless bondage on this continent, where a bountiful Creator has spread a wide and richly furnished table for his rational family, our minds are overcast with gloom and sadness, and we are constrained to yield to emotions of pity for the miserable victims of this heartless cruelty. And while we would refrain from contributing towards this fearful aggregation of oppressive inflictions, we would reverently raise our hands and hearts to our common Father in Heaven, and in the language of earnest sympathy, exclaim, "How long?" For, looking at the future with our limited vision, we can only behold that great as have been the efforts in various ways, in Great Britain and America, to put an end to the slave trade and slavery, these gigantic evils still continue to extend, with little hope of their extirpation, while the great body of the Christian world are content to luxuriate upon their fruits.

MEETING AT SALEM, IOWA.

Believing that one of the most vital testimonies taught by the Christian religion, and to which the Society of Friends is becoming renewedly awakened, is not duly appreciated by many in this Western land, and believing at this moment slaves are toiling for us under the infliction of cruelties far greater than were practiced in former times, and being convinced that we are directly hiring oppression by purchasing its fruits and giving the slaveholder and overseer the pay for which, chiefly, this wrong and iniquity are committed—those interested in purchasing articles which are free from the stain of Slavery, met at Friends' Meeting House in Salem, Henry County, Iowa, 3d mo. 29th, 1850, for the purpose of considering what practical measures could be best adopted to encourage the use of free grown products. The meeting organized by calling Joseph D. Hoag to the chair, and appointing Reuben Dorland Secretary. The following resolutions were offered, which, after pertinent remarks by the friends of the cause, were unanimously adopted, viz :

Resolved, That in the opinion of this meeting, the friends of the slaves in this and other countries, have a great individual, as well as collective duty to perform towards the suffering and oppressed millions of mankind, now in bondage, in abstaining, as far as practicable, from the use of slave labor produce, and in the encouragement of that alone, which is grown and manufactured by the compensated labor of freemen.

Resolved, That we believe it to be our duty to set a worthy example ourselves, and also to encourage and sustain every well directed effort to induce the public at large to adopt similar views and practice, as one great and powerful means of securing the universal abolition of slavery: and in order perfectly to carry out our principles, we pledge ourselves that if a free labor store is established in Salem, Iowa, we will give it our encouragement and support, in preference to stores selling other articles, so long as it is conducted upon honorable principles.

The following named persons were appointed a committee to procure the names of those who are willing to pledge themselves to patronize a free labor store, if one should be established in Salem, Iowa, and make report to an adjourned meeting to be held at this place on Seventh-day, the 13th of 4th mo. next, viz: Eli Jessup, Reuben Dorland, Peter Collins, William Marshall, Abraham Gray, Samuel Stevenson, Thomas Frazier, Willet Dorland, and Marmaduke Jay.

Much sympathy and feeling were felt and expressed for this much injured portion of our fellow men, and from information communicated to the meeting, we are encouraged to believe, that a growing interest is felt in various parts of the country, and of the religious society of Friends in particular, in the disuse of slave-grown productions, and we rejoice to find that measures are being taken to meet the demand for the various articles required for domestic purposes, the produce exclusively of free labor.

The meeting then adjourned to meet at Friends' Meeting House in Salem, on Seventh-day, the 13th of 4th month next at 1 o'clock, P. M.

THE RESPONSIBILITIES AND DUTIES OF NON-SLAVEHOLDERS.

Soon after the introduction of Slavery into this country, there were individuals who saw the injustice and cruelty of the system, and some of these shortly engaged in labor for the amelioration of the sufferings of the slave, and the ultimate extinction of his bonds. But time has evinced, that the system has been prolonged far beyond their anticipations. They could not have believed that in an age like the present, under the march of civilization and christianity, a system of slavery worse than marked the dark and barbarous ages, could so long continue, and especially under a government professedly securing civil and religious rights and liberty to all the inhabitants.

But the system diffused its effects through the community by connecting itself, directly or indirectly, with nearly all the various occupations and institutions. It struck its roots deep, and they spread far and wide. Its power to darken the understanding was not fully estimated. It was reasonable to expect that the slaveholder should become insensible to the dictates of justice and sound morality; but moral blindness has not fallen upon the slaveholder alone; the non-slaveholder has shared with him; he, too, has far underrated the criminality of robbing the colored man of his liberty and all his rights; for, while robbing a man of his property upon the highway is deemed a scandalous and reproachful offence by the community, do they, even in the free States, look upon it to be more reproachful, more unjust and cruel, forcibly to rob the colored man, and his posterity after him, of his liberty and his earnings? No! far otherwise. This act of reducing a man to a piece of merchandize, if only done in a State where it is tolerated by law, is not viewed generally by non-slaveholders with that deep disgust with which they regard the stealing of a sheep or a horse. This cannot be denied; then what more positive proof can be had, that even this class, from their long familiarity and connection with the system of slavery, have become sorrowfully blinded in their moral perceptions? Every man of sense, disabused of interest, partiality and prejudice, would determine it a worse act, a greater violation of right, to enslave a man and rob him of all that he can have, than to only rob one of the property he may have in possession, leaving him at liberty to acquire more and enjoy the same. If robbing the colored man of his liberty, and his all, were considered by the non-slaveholders, generally, as odiously disgraceful and unjust as robbing a white man of his property, the disgust pervading public sentiment at such injustice, would produce a moral force that would ensure the speedy liberation of the last slave in these United States; but, lamentable to say, such is not the case. Hence the prolonged disappointment to the philanthropist has arisen from the fact of the prevalent insensibility in regard to the slave's rights, and the consequent indifference to his wrongs; hence, too, the declarations in behalf of the system, that the slave is so deficient in intellect that his labors, to be rendered useful, require the direction of a master; that his morals are so corrupt as to unfit him for liberty; that his condition is better in slavery than in his native country; that the slaves in the Southern States are better off than the free blacks of the Northern; that the slave, having out of his earnings a subsistence, receives a tolerable equivalent for his labors, &c. These and the like slaveholding declarations, have been so long and constantly repeated, publicly and privately, that they are received as truths by many; thus giving a tone, even down to this day, to public feeling and sentiment, and greatly embarrassing the restoration of the slaves to their liberty and rights. Erroneous and absurd as are these declarations, those who use them are indisposed for investigation or information, and consequently can only be moved by a weight of evidence of sufficient force to propel whole communities.

These declarations I have denominated slaveholding (for with the slaveholder they must have originated.) Whether put forth in the North or South, they have their bearing in support of slavery, directly or indirectly. I will not occupy time and space in proving the incorrectness and unfairness of these declarations, because it has been so often done by others; but such declarations are essential to the existence of slavery; they produce that countenance and action upon which the system is most essentially dependant for its support, so that when we hear an individual reiterating any of these sentiments, no matter what his standing in civil or religious society, no matter whether he is the owner of slaves or not, no matter whether his residence be in the North or South, and even though he may profess himself "as much opposed to slavery as anybody," he can only be regarded as having placed himself upon the slavery platform; and however ignorant he may be of his position, he is nevertheless prepared to give such countenance or aid to slavery, as interest, prejudice, or popularity may prompt, either commercially, politically, or religiously, as the case may be. These are among the prominent means by which slavery has so long existed, and continues to exist, and of which non-slaveholders furnish no small share. Now, I have no idea that the inhabitants of this country, generally, would desire the continuance of slavery, if they had a right view of the character and enormity of the evil. I have no idea that all who actually aided the foreign slave trade, would have approved of that inhuman traffic had they possessed a just sense of the great injustice and inexpressible cruelties it inflicted upon its victims. Interest, prejudice or partiality blinds the eye, closes the ear, blunts the moral perception: hence those interested in this foreign trade in their own species, though attended with all the sufferings and horrors imaginable, (and now deemed a crime punishable with death,) were hard and slow to be convinced, that justice, humanity, and policy required its abolishment. This seems to be the case in regard to the continuance of slavery and the slave trade within the United States, as much the larger portion of the inhabitants are also commercially or otherwise contaminated by the system of slavery; consequently are too insensible of the injustice and cruelty inflicted by it upon the helpless slave, and are now as hard and slow to be convinced that justice, morality, and policy require the abolishment of the system, as the supporters of a foreign slave trade were to yield to the abolishment of that barbarous traffic, now despised by all respectable men as among the worst of crimes. How soon would a change of place with the slave remove all this morbid insensibility to his rights. Not a man, no not a single individual, could he feel the anguish and sufferings of slavery, especially that part called the domestic slave trade, but would at once be convinced of the inhumanity of the system, and that it is far worse than highway robbery, and justly deserving the reprobation of every class of the community, without evasion or compromise. We who have never experienced slavery's iron grasp, can form but a faint idea of the condition of a slave sold to go to some Southern market, cast into prison to prevent escape, having attachments which belong to the relations of wife, husband, brother, sister, parent, or child, as the case may be. All must be given up, the strongest ties in human life must be sundered; the mandate of the trader must be obeyed—to go to a comfortable home, with the hope in a few years to return again? No! but to go never to return; to be driven about to labor as a beast of burden by some hard hearted tyrant, whose object is to procure the most labor he can with the least expense, unprotected too from all manner of abuse. This is but an imperfect picture of the realities produced by the slave trade, briskly prosecuted at this day between the slave States, grasping its thousands of helpless victims annually. Now if the system in one of its branches is fraught with such appalling barbarity, how frightfully odious it must be in the whole. Who then but those that have by its influences become blind to the dictates of humanity, or wilfully disobey such dictates, can longer willingly give countenance to its support either by word or deed? To withhold all such support is what morality and christianity imperatively require. The injunction of one formerly to "touch not, taste not, handle not," is peculiarly applicable to the abhorrent system in question, and this non-participating, even observed by the inhabitants of the non-slaveholding states alone, would be a means of breaking the last fetter from the suffering bondmen in this country. On the other hand, if not observed, they not only aid in the continuance of slavery, but also share in the awful responsibility for those evils which are inseparable from a system of slavery. We ought to seriously consider that we are individually by our own choice, in the free States, ranking ourselves in one or the other of these classes; bearing testimony against slavery, or giving it countenance and support. "He that is not with me, is against me, and he that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad."

When I was in Virginia and North Carolina, a few years since, I observed that there were numbers of the colored race under the care of individual members of the society of Friends in those States, placed in their hands by the bequest of their former masters. They are thus made virtually free, though legally slaves, and Friends thus become legal slaveholders. This is the only mode by which the slave can enjoy any tolerable share of freedom in his native land—the laws of those States being such that he can not be emancipated on the soil—and is no doubt justifiable, and an act of great kindness and benevolence on the part of those who accept these bequests and take charge of the colored persons who thus happily escape from the grasp of slavery.

I received the impression that the number of these persons was increasing and becoming burdensome to some Friends. The situation of both parties, I think, calls for the sympathy of Friends in the free States, many of whom are far removed from the sight of slavery, and some of whom are perhaps hardly aware of the existence of the facts to which I have alluded. If, as is suggested by the sound and discriminating mind of our beloved and valuable friend T. W., in a letter published some time since in the Non-Slaveholder, the existence of slavery in its present extent is in any degree chargeable to the unfaithfulness of Friends in not fully carrying out in practice those views to which their profession of a deep sense of the sinfulness of slavery leads; a sentiment in which I fully concur; and if they have given it their full proportion of efficient support by "furnishing the motive," then there is a fearful amount of responsibility resting on the Society of Friends, and it becomes us to enquire after the most feasible and effectual methods by which we can in some measure atone for the wrong, and promote the best interests of that suffering class of our fellow creatures.

While I fully accede to the truth of the proposition that abstinence from the use of slave grown produce is a duty, and one which I greatly desire to see carried out in practice, both as an unobjectionable and peaceful method of operating upon the system, and as the only way by which we can keep our hands clean from our brothers' blood, I would ask if there is not another way in which we might subserve the cause of freedom and advance the interests of that class of our colored brethren to which I have alluded. Might there not a tract of land be purchased in some of the Western States, where land is cheap—say in Iowa—and a Manual Labor School established, where they might be instructed in literary knowledge, and in the art and means of obtaining a livelihood, and of "taking care of themselves?" I make this suggestion with a full understanding of the difficulties to its accomplishment which present themselves at first view; one of which is that of obtaining money to defray the expenses of such an establishment; but I cannot doubt that if Friends who are in possession of much of this world's goods would enter into the concern with the same feeling of interest that they do into many other benevolent engagements, and especially if those who have become rich by trafficking in the products of slave labor would consider part of their wealth belonging to the slave, a sufficient amount of money might be raised for all the necessary purposes of such an establishment. If, in addition to the blessings and advantages that would result to the recipients of such benevolence, in a moral and physical point of view, as well as the effect it would undoubtedly have in doing away the prejudices that now exist against the intellectual capacities of the race, we take into consideration the relief it would afford our friends at the South, and the encouragement it would in all probability give to emancipation in future, a sufficient inducement cannot be wanting, I think, to make an attempt to carry such a plan into effect.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, FIFTH MONTH 1, 1850.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE PHILADELPHIA FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS.—The Fifth Annual Meeting of this Association was held at Clarkson Hall, in this city, on the evening of the 16th of last month. The number in attendance was not large, but, we believe, many more would have attended if public notice could have been given in the Yearly Meeting. Some persons were probably prevented from being present by the fact that this Association is not permitted by the "powers that be," to hold its meetings in the Committee room of Mulberry Street Meeting-house, where the meetings of other Associations of Friends are held.

A minister with whom we recently conversed on this subject, expressed a repugnance to having our meeting-houses "desecrated" by the meetings of the Free Produce Association being held in them! Our faith in the progress of Truth, through the labors of faithful individuals more than from the action of Yearly Meetings, Synods, Conferences, or other ecclesiastical bodies, leads us to hope for the ultimate removal of the unreasonable and unjust prejudice which thus closes the meeting-houses of the Society of Friends against its members, who, in a legitimate and unobjectionable manner, are endeavoring to practice the principles which the Society professes.

The Managers' Report for the past year was presented, and directed to be published. It will be found in another part of this paper.

The proceedings of the meeting derived much interest from the information imparted by our esteemed friend, Nathan Thomas, of Indiana, who was present. His investigations in the South have been of great value to the Free Labor movement, and we are inclined to believe that the tendency of his intercourse with both slaveholders and non-slaveholders is not less important and beneficial to the cause of the slave.

The following officers of the Association were appointed for the ensuing year,—viz: Secretary, G. W. Taylor; Treasurer, Marmaduke C. Cope;

MEMORIAL TO THE QUEEN OF ENGLAND.—In the eighth number of our last volume we inserted a copy of a Memorial, then circulated for signatures amongst the women of England and intended to be laid before Queen Victoria, on the subject of slavery and the slave-trade, and the disuse of slave-labor produce. Recent accounts state that the Address, having 59,586 names attached to it, contributed from most of the counties of England and from many parts of Scotland, has been presented. No official acknowledgment of its reception had been received, but there is reason to believe, from private information, that the Queen has manifested a strong interest in the subject.

The Ladies' Committee, who had charge of the Address, proposed in a letter to Sir George Grey, that it should be accompanied by Alexander Crummell of New York, an Episcopalian clergyman of African descent, who rendered important service at several meetings held to promote the Address, and is now at the University of Cambridge, and by another of his race. Sir George Grey stated, in answer to this letter, that the rules observed on such occasions would not admit of the request being granted, but promised that he would forward a copy of the petition to the Queen, and at the same time call her particular attention to the contents of the letter.

The memorialists, after praying that every legitimate and peaceful means may be resorted to on the part of the Government, to induce Spain and Brazil to fulfil certain treaties, use this language:—"And as nothing can be more clear than that slavery is sustained by the purchase of its productions, we propose for ourselves an immediate and wide-spread abstinence from the slave productions of Cuba and Brazil; and in this we venture to hope for the high sanction of your Majesty's example, and that you will be graciously pleased to exclude these productions from the royal household."

DEBATE IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS ON THE SLAVE-TRADE.—An important debate took place a few weeks since in the House of Commons, on a motion to withdraw the squadron from the coast of Africa, and desist from all acts for suppressing the slave-trade by force of arms. When the House divided there were 154 for the motion, and 232 against it, giving the ministers a majority of 78. It has been stated that if the motion had carried, the Prime Minister, Lord John Russell, would have resigned his office.

Baillie, in rising to second the motion, said, "He asked the Government to adopt an honest and straightforward course with regard to the slave-trade. When the legislature passed the Bill of 1846, the question assumed a new aspect. It was then boldly proclaimed that England had already paid sufficiently for her philanthropy, and was determined to pay no more; and there could be no doubt that one result of the change of policy which took place at that period was, that England now derived more profit and advantage from the slave-trade than any other country in the world. The English people had, in fact, incurred all the guilt which attached to that abominable traffic. To deny this was to deny that the receiver of stolen goods was equally culpable with the thief. For his own part, he preferred the thief—forasmuch as the thief incurred all the risk of danger which arose from his act; the receiver, while assuming an appearance of honesty, tempted others to the commission of crimes of which he shared the proceeds. Slaves were purchased on the coast of Africa with goods manufactured in Manchester and Birmingham, having been previously sent to Cuba and Brazil, to be exchanged for the produce of slave labor. Brazilian mines and estates had been stocked and worked with slaves purchased with British capital. Lastly, England supplied the best market in the world for the produce of slave labor. Could it be denied, then, that England derived more profit than any other country from the slave-trade?"

Another member, Grantley Berkeley, in supporting the motion, "insisted that the only effectual mode of putting down the slave-trade, was to stop the admission of slave produce into Great Britain.

These views correspond with the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons appointed two years since to investigate the condition of the slave-trade. They stated that "the extent and activity of the slave-trade, though in some degree affected by foreign interference, and at times restrained by the Governments of Spain and Brazil, have been mainly governed by the demand for the products of slave-labor in the markets of Europe; and that the admission of slave-grown sugar to consumption in this country has tended, by greatly increasing the demand for that description of produce, so to stimulate the African slave-trade, as to render an effectual check more difficult of attainment than at any former period."

Why do not the friends of the slave, who are anxiously seeking for effectual means of putting an end to slavery and the slave-trade, and who acknowledge the powerful support these evils receive from the "demand for the products of slave labor" and the "admission of slave-grown sugar" into Great Britain, also perceive the simple but all-important truth, that both the demand and the admission mentioned are absolutely dependent upon, and the result of the consumption of the articles demanded and admitted? The individual course required by a perception of this truth is sufficiently obvious.

The editor of the London Anti-Slavery Reporter makes the following remarks in reference to the policy of the British Government for the suppression of the slave-trade. Heartily approving his sentiment, that it is the duty of the Government to "put the brand of reprobation on the productions of slavery," we could wish that the people also might see the necessity of adopting the same consistent mode of action.

"It must not be supposed that we view the course which the Government have pursued with satisfaction. They find fault with Mr. Hunt for not indicating a substitute for the squadron, whilst, admitting themselves the failure of the squadron, they propose no substitute, nor even an efficient auxiliary to its operations. The fact is, they have embarrassed themselves by the application of free-trade principles to slave-trade produce; and they know not how to secure, at one and the same time, the suppression of the slave trade, and an extensive commerce with the countries which carry it on. How marvellous their inconsistency! They send their cruisers, at an immense cost of men and money, to the coast of Africa to suppress the traffic; and they open the markets of this country to the reception of the blood-stained produce on which the traffic depends. Eloquent and Christian as was the peroration of Lord John Russell's speech at the close of the debate, we were compelled to confront with it the Sugar Act of 1846, which doubled the slave-trade, and to ask ourselves how it could be made to harmonize with that appalling fact. If the Government be sincerely desirous of destroying 'the curse and crime of slavery,' and of maintaining the lead in the championship of this great question of freedom and humanity to the people of this country, let them put the brand of public reprobation on the productions of slavery, and use all other means a great and Christian country can properly employ in its extinction, and they may reasonably expect the continuance of the Divine mercies, and the blessings of mankind at large; but if they will persist in sacrificing the highest interests of humanity to the exigencies of commerce—if they will continue to prefer the prosperity of Manchester and Birmingham to the freedom and civilization of Africa—then it requires no prophetic vision to declare, that to this country will not be reserved the honor of securing the triumph of freedom over slavery; and that it would be sheer presumption for it to expect the benediction of Heaven."

THE PENNSYLVANIA FUGITIVE LAW.—The Bill to which allusion was made in our last number, as having been introduced into the Legislature of this State, for the repeal of portions of the Act to prevent kidnapping, has since passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 50 to 29. We are glad to learn, however, that the Senate Committee, to whom the bill was subsequently referred, has reported it with a recommendation that it be negatived. This, we trust, may be the final result.

"NO UNION WITH SLAVERHOLDERS."—A late number of the Liberator contains a report of the proceedings of "a very large and enthusiastic meeting" of the "Old Colony Anti-Slavery Society," recently held at North Bridgewater, and among the resolutions adopted was the following: "Resolved, That the mercantile and manufacturing interests of Massachusetts are in alliance with the cotton-growing and slave-whipping interests of South Carolina," &c.

It seems to us that the motto of the Liberator, "No union with slaveholders," as well as the voice of this meeting, is condemnatory of this alliance. Can those who took an active part in the above meeting, the editor of the Liberator included, consistently advocate the purchase and use of slave-grown cotton?

RICHARD DILLINGHAM.—In the account we gave two months since of the visit of our friends, Nathan Thomas and Henry Charles, to the Penitentiary at Nashville, we stated that Richard Dillingham was from Indiana, and was sentenced to two years imprisonment for aiding slaves to escape from bondage. By a letter received from a relative of the young man, we are informed that his residence was in Ohio, and that the term of his imprisonment is three years; this being the shortest time the law of Tennessee allows for the offence.

Our valued correspondent has kindly furnished us with a brief history of the case, which we think will be interesting to many of our readers who may be unacquainted with it. "Richard Billingham was arrested about eleven o'clock at night, in the 12th month, 1848, and lodged in jail without violence, but few persons being apprised of his arrest at the time. The next day the excitement was so great that the people crowded to the jail by hundreds, to see the prisoner, and many examined him very closely, to ascertain whether he answered the description of an advertised rogue. The Justice went to the prison and committed him legally, in order to prevent his exposure to the mob by bringing him out; but in the course of 14 days the excitement so far subsided, that he was taken before the Court without molestation. It was believed, however, that the excitement was too great to have justice done him, and the trial was postponed until the 4th month following. This was a very favorable circumstance, inasmuch as it furnished the people with an opportunity of becoming acquainted with him, to some extent, and also with the character of many of his friends and relatives, by their correspondence with him; but it subjected him to the disagreeable alternative of being confined all winter without feeling the warmth of fire, and without any glass in the windows of the jail; yet he was treated as kindly by the jailers as circumstances would permit.

"There were two indictments against him, but he was tried upon one only; the prosecuting attorney being disposed to be as favorable as a compliance with the duties of his office would justify. R. D. plead guilty to the indictment, and threw himself upon the mercy of the jury.

After short but pathetic speeches by his counsel, Ferguson and McDonald, and a brief charge from the Judge, favorable to leniency, the jury retired, but in the course of a few minutes returned with a verdict, fixing the shortest term of imprisonment, which was more favorable than any of us anticipated. His mother's presence had great influence in his favor, and notwithstanding the jury, with one or two exceptions, was composed of slaveholders, I believe they would have acquitted him if it had been in their power. Several of them spoke to us after the trial, and one observed that he had a runaway slave then in Ohio. The Attorney General also spoke kindly to R. D.'s mother, and told her that her son would be cared for, and that he would use his influence with the keeper of the Penitentiary in his favor; remarking, that there was no one who had become acquainted with R. D. but would place implicit reliance on anything he asserted. Yet many who did not attend the trial were dissatisfied with the leniency of the verdict, and the keeper of the Penitentiary being one of these, we feared he would treat him with severity; still we did not doubt that his feelings would change, should he become acquainted with R. D., who is well-informed, and remarkably amiable and ingenuous in his disposition, and, I may add, his moral character stands unblemished in his native State. He has borne his trials like a philosopher, and, I think I may safely say, like a Christian.

"By our latest accounts from him, it appears that he is something of a Joseph among them; his employment having been changed from the laborious business of sawing stone to that which was lighter, until he was placed as Steward of the Hospital, and as there are but few sick at present his employment is light. He has also the privilege of reading during his leisure time, and sitting by a comfortable fire in the evening for that purpose."

COTTON CULTIVATION IN JAMAICA.—The cultivation of cotton in the British West Indies, and in other possessions of Great Britain, is becoming a topic of great interest and attention with the British Government and people, principally from an apprehension that serious difficulties may arise from the present dependence of Great Britain upon the United States for a supply of an article so essential to the mercantile and manufacturing prosperity of the former country.

From an advertisement in a New York newspaper, we learn that a Cotton Company is now being formed for the cultivation of cotton in Jamaica, and the advertiser, as agent, wishes to receive applications for shares. It is proposed to purchase a certain estate of between 2,500 and 3,000 acres, in the vicinity of Spanishtown, the metropolis of Jamaica. Cotton grown on the island is stated to be remarkably fine in quality and, when once planted, the friendly nature of the climate and soil renders it independent of much care on the part of the planter.

We would be glad to hear of the success of this, and every other effort to increase the supply of cotton cultivated by free labor.

CONGRESS.—Various questions connected with the extension of slavery, engrossed the attention of Congress during the past month, to the exclusion of almost every other business, but no Bill relating to the subject has yet been passed.

REMARKABLE PRESERVATION.

The following beautiful stanzas were written many years ago by Mrs. Seba Smith, on the death of Mrs. Blake, who perished among the Green Mountains of Vermont, under the following circumstances: She and Mr. B. and their child were overtaken on their journey across the mountains by a violent snow storm. The horses which conveyed them gave out, and sank exhausted in the snow drift, and for a while they pressed forward on foot—but finding their strength failing, Mr. B. hastened forward alone, to obtain assistance, but became so benumbed by cold, that he sank, and was found on the eve of perishing, unable to speak, but retaining his senses so that he was able by motions to apprise the person who found him that there were others in a similar perilous condition. A short distance further they found Mrs. B. in the cold embrace of death, having stripped herself of her cloak, in which the babe was wrapped and laid in the snow. She was the mother of Harrison G. Blake, of Medina, now a member of the Senate of Ohio.

"The cold winds swept the mountain height,
And pathless was the dreary wild,
And 'mid the cheerless hours of night,
A mother wandered with her child.
As through the drifted snow she pressed,
The babe was sleeping on her breast.

"And colder still the winds did blow,
And darker hours of night came on,
And deeper grew the drifts of snow—
Her limbs were chilled, her strength was gone.
O God! she cried in accents wild,
If I must perish, save my child!

"She stripped her mantle from her breast,
And bared her bosom to the storm,
As round the child she wrapped her vest,
She smiled to think her babe was warm.
With one cold kiss, one tear she shed,
And sank upon a snowy bed.

"At dawn a traveller passed by,
And saw her 'neath a snowy veil,—
The frost of death was in her eye—
Her cheek was cold, and hard and pale.
He moved the robe from off the child—
The babe looked up and sweetly smiled!"

THE GLASS RAILROAD.

[A dream of the "Milford Bard," during one of his fits of mania a potu,—and a LOOKING-GLASS for all who touch the "glass."]—

"It seems to me," said the bard, "as though I had been suddenly aroused from my slumber. I looked round and found myself in the centre of a gay and happy crowd. The first sensation I experienced was that of being borne along with a peculiar gentle motion—a soft, gliding motion. I looked around and found that I was in one of a long train of cars, which were gliding over a railway. I could see the train, far, far ahead, it was turning a bend of the railway, and seemed to be many miles in length. It was composed of many cars. Every car, open at the top, was filled with men and women—all gaily dressed—all happy, all laughing, talking or singing. The peculiarly gentle motion of the cars interested me. There was no grating such as we hear on a railroad. They moved on without the least jar or sound. This, I say, interested me. I looked over the side, and to my astonishment, found the railroad and cars were made of glass. The track, the body of the cars, and the wheels, were all glass. The glass wheels moved over the glass rails without the least noise or oscillation. This soft gliding motion produced a feeling of exquisite happiness. I was so happy! It seemed as if everything was at rest within me—I was full of peace. While I was wondering over this circumstance, a new sight attracted my gaze. All along the railroad, on either side, within a foot of the track, were laid long lines of coffins, end to end, and a dead body in each coffin. As far as I could see, I beheld these perpetual lines of coffins, one on either side of the railroad, and every one containing a corpse, dressed for burial, with its cold, white face turned upward to the light. The sight filled me with unutterable horror. I yelled in agony, but could make no sound. The gay throng who were around me only redoubled their singing and laughter, at the sight of my agony, and we swept on and on, gliding with glass wheels over the glass railroad, every moment coming nearer to the bend of the road, which formed an angle with the road, far, far in the distance.

"Who are those?" I cried at last, pointing to the dead in their coffins.

"These are the persons who made this trip before us," was the reply of one of the gayest persons near me.

"What trip?" I asked.

"Why, the trip we are now making. The trip in these glass cars over this glass railway," was the answer.

"Why do they lie along the road, each one in his coffin?" I was answered with a whisper and a half-laugh which froze my blood.

"They were dashed to death at the end of the railroad," said the person whom I addressed. "You know the railroad terminates at an abyss, which is without bottom or measure. It is lined with pointed rocks. As each car arrives at the end, it precipitates its passengers into the abyss. They are dashed to pieces against the rocks, and their bodies are brought up here, and placed in coffins as a warning to other passengers; but no one minds it, we're so happy on the glass railroad."

I can never describe the horror with which these words inspired me.

"What is the name of this railroad?" I asked.

The person whom I addressed replied, in the same low voice—

"It is the railroad of Habit. It is very easy to get into these cars, but very hard to get out. For once in the cars, every body is delighted with the soft gliding motion. The cars move so gently! Yes, it is the railway of Habit, and with glass wheels we are whirled over a glass railroad towards a fathomless abyss. In a few moments we'll be there; and then they'll bring our bodies, and put them in coffins as a warning to others, but no body will mind it, will they?"

I was choked with horror. I struggled for breath—made frantic efforts to leap from the cars, and in the struggle awoke. I knew it was only a dream, and yet whenever I think of it, I can see that long line of cars, moving gently over the glass railroad. I can see the cars far ahead as they are turning the bend of the road. I can see the dead in their coffins, clear and distinct—on either side of the road, and while the laughter and singing of the gay and happy passengers resounds in my ears, I only see those cold faces of the dead, with their glassy eyes uplifted and their frozen hands upon their shrouds.

It was a horrible dream.

And the Bard's changing features and brightening eye, attested the emotion which had been aroused by the very memory of the dream.

It was indeed a horrible dream. A long train of glass cars, gliding over a glass railway, freighted with youth, beauty and music, while on either hand are stretched the victims of yesterday, gliding over the railway of Habit, towards the fathomless abyss.

There was a moral in that dream.—George Lippard.

Reader, are you addicted to any sinful habit? Break it off, ere you dash against the rocks!

SELECTIONS.

ANTI-SLAVERY MISSION OF JOHN CANDLER AND GEORGE WILLIAM ALEXANDER.

[Letters from our friend John Candler, relating incidents of the journey of himself and G. W. Alexander, with their wives, in the West Indies, have appeared in the London Friend, from which we give the following extracts.—Ed.]

Demerara, 1st mo, 5th, 1850.

On the 10th of last month we went on board the Eagle steam-packet at Barbadoes, bound for this colony, and found it crowded with passengers. On the 12th we reached Trinidad, and for the first time saw the coast of South America; then proceeded to Tobago. The next two days we were tossed on awful waves that dashed against the sides of the ship as though they would break it to pieces; the report was often as loud as a cannon, and it seemed as if we might really go to pieces; there was however, no real danger, and we arrived at George Town, Demerara, on the main land of South America, safe and well. The rain was so incessant, that we could not land that night, but slept peacefully in the ship at anchor in a still haven.

Twelfth Month 15th. Came on shore to what was formerly a land of "mud and money," now a land of mud and mosquitoes. This part of the coast of South America, for many hundreds of leagues, is so low as to be seen only a very short distance from land. The sugar estates are all formed on the sea-coast, or on the banks of the rivers, and are secured from the invasion of spring tides by an artificial dam, such as the people of Holland have raised to protect their little kingdom. The estates are all intersected by canals and trenches as in Holland, and these serve at once for draining the land, and as roads for the conveyance of produce. We spent the first day of our arrival in Demerara within doors, for rest and letter-writing: the next day, which was the first of the week, we passed I hope devotionally. Spent the evening at home in reading and re-tiement. The next morning we called on Governor Barkly, who said he had heard of our coming, and would do what he could to promote the object of our visit. We presented to him a letter of introduction from Earl Grey, and another from the Bishop of Guiana.

The authorities show us much kindness, and manifest every disposition to give us the information we seek. The missionaries also of the different denominations are willing to help us, and we find no difficulty in obtaining evidence of the state of the colony. Our time has been most diligently employed in visiting prisons, hospitals, schools, in going over sugar estates, and in visiting the free villages. This is the rainy season here, or rather the winter rainy season, which we find an advantage to us, as the rain cools the air; but at the same time it moistens the earth, makes the common roads and foot-paths muddy, and impedes locomotion. There are exhalations from the moist ground everywhere, and intermittent fever is quite common; but through Divine mercy our health is preserved, and we go on with great comfort. When the Coolies were imported from India to this colony, there came over among them a large number of men who knew nothing of field labor, but who obtained a livelihood as mendicants, who were in fact the very refuse of Calcutta and Madras. A large number of them have died of destitution, and many still remain who walk almost naked through the streets; they sleep at night below the houses which are built on brick pillars, and when no better food is to be had, subsist on carrion. The mortality among the immigrant Coolies and Portuguese in the hospitals, has been so great, that the return of the numbers has been suppressed; but I found that in the years 1847 and 1848, there died of these people 3278, or a twelfth part of the total number of them in each year. The hospitals still continue full of them. Were the same rate of mortality every where to prevail, the whole human race would be speedily extinguished. But the immigrants are not all alike in disposition: some beg, pick up bad food, get sick and die; but many are industrious and thrive well. The African immigrants are healthy; the Portuguese who are become acclimated can now bear field labor; and when the hard working Coolies came into the town, dressed in their holiday garments of crimson cotton, and a turban, they looked refined and handsome. We have seen some fine specimens among them of both men, women and children: their salaam, or manner of salutation is very graceful.

Almost all the Africans imported from our slave ships seem satisfied with their new country, and would much rather continue in our colonies than return to their own land. "What country come from?" I said to one of them. "Guinea, massa, Congo." "Do you Congo men wish to go back to Africa." "No, massa." "Why not?" "In Congo, massa, catch, come sell," was his answer. I asked another what he thought about it, "Me no go back, in Congo too much fight." The truth is that these poor liberated Africans were so hunted in their own country, in order to be made slaves, that Demerara is a sort of Paradise to them; and although to a European eye, they seem to lead only a semi-civilized, almost a barbarous life, with few wants and low desires, their situation is not a despicable one. There is no slavery in our colonies, not even a semblance of it; the common people are wonderfully independent, almost rudely so: they do not work over-hard, and it will be impossible ever again to make slaves of strangers who come among them. The Portuguese, who have passed through the awful ordeal of becoming acclimated, are a quiet, inoffensive, hard working race; they come from Madeira and the Azores; they come out very poor, and are so anxious to make money that they content themselves with insufficient food, and some have died of inanition from this cause.

Now as to their free villages. We have taken drives over very bad roads in the country to visit several of them in this part of Guiana; but the one that pleased us best was in Berbice. On Fourth-day last, we went on board the Clyde schooner and in seventeen hours reached New Amsterdam, a town on the river Berbice, 350 miles north of the equator. We there engaged a covered boat or bungalow, and attended by one of the missionaries, made an excursion up the river. These large rivers of Demerara and Berbice are a little south of the Orinoco, and were the scenes of Waterton's wanderings, where he saw so many strange things. Our boat was rowed by four men, and the captain sat at the helm. The river Berbice was full to the very banks, and we rowed in some parts almost close to the jungle or bush, which was covered with a rank, luxurious vegetation: many of the trees were full of scarlet and yellow blossoms, and some of the flowers which grew there would have been thought beautiful in our English hot-houses. Many boats, full of provisions for sale, were coming down the stream, paddled by black men and women, and gave much life to the picture.

We went many times on shore, and visited several large sugar estates, and returned home at sunset, after spending an agreeable and happy day. The next morning we took the same boat, crossed the broad river to its opposite bank, and landed at the free village of Ithaca, which contains 300 houses in the midst of a plantain grove, and has 1200 inhabitants. But what a day! Whilst in the boat we were sheltered from the rain, but on landing it poured upon us. Our boat was landed on the soft mud, and was pulled up by the boatmen over the mud to near a dwelling house. After waiting awhile for the storm to pass by, we sallied forth to the village, but were overtaken by the rain and made wet to the skin. A carpenter who was once a slave, received us into his house, and showed us no little kindness; he allowed us partially to strip and dry our clothes, and prepared some provender for us. Under slavery and during the apprenticeship, a large number of the poor bond-people had managed to save a good deal of money, unknown to their masters; and when freedom came, it was brought out in such abundance to buy land and build houses, that those who looked on and were acquainted with scripture, said, "The Israelites had spoiled the Egyptians." Our good carpenter was one of the many who had money: his house was a model: it had two good parlours, furnished with sofas, pictures, a handsome lamp, and in one of them a sideboard covered with wine glasses, finger glasses, decanters and a set of castors, and many good books were on the table. Freedom has wrought a great change in the condition of this people, not so great morally as we could wish to have seen, nor to many of them even physically; but still a great change and we see strange things. The houses in this lovely village are some of them very good, the roads that run through it are good, the provision grounds look handsome, and the people have a free independent bearing and port that would give you surprise. We now and then find a poor old man or woman that thinks old times as good as the new, but the general feeling is, "Thank God, massa, for freedom." After leaving this pleasant place, we took boat again, and rowed along the coast to a large sugar plantation, and then we recrossed the river to New Amsterdam.

This is now the 2d of First month, 1850. On the 4th, we expect to set sail for Trinidad, and to remain there for a fortnight. Intemperance is the crying evil of this colony. Last evening we attended a temperance meeting convened by advertisement, and addressed a large company on the importance of total abstinence. A new society was formed in the course of the day to embrace this object, and we have no doubt that our meeting will be useful in its results.

First Month 3rd. This morning the weather is fine; the sun beams out upon us strongly, and we cannot take much exercise. My face has begun to blister a little with the heat, though we constantly use umbrellas. Europeans often wear white masks in this region. Only think of men moving about, as some do, clothed in white from head to foot, and having the face covered with a mask of white linen!

First Month 4th. The packet from England just arrived. Between the Azores and Bermuda the storms were so fearful, that the steamer with all her appliances, was unable to make Bermuda, and therefore brought on all her mails and passengers to the West Indies: she is four days behind her time. What a favour we left England as we did! * * *

We go on board the Comway Packet this evening, and expect to reach Trinidad in two days.

Trinidad, First Month 18, 1850.

We are now about to leave Trinidad for Grenada and St. Vincent, and before doing so I shall begin a letter for the next packet. The passage through the Boccos, or mouths which divide Trinidad and its islands from the Spanish main, affords some very lovely scenery. The limestone rocks of the islands covered with vegetation, the houses and plantations on the shore, the cocoanut and palm-trees, and families of pelicans, young and old, fishing in the clear blue waters, all gave us delight; and added to these tropical objects of interest, we had in view the lofty mountains of Venezuela on the west. On our arrival at Port of Spain, the capital of Trinidad, we waited early on the governor, Lord Harris, who, as no horses or carriage can be hired in the city, kindly offered us the use of both during our stay, and on one occasion we availed ourselves of the benefit. The calls made on us have been so numerous, and we have found so many friends, that we have been helped in this and every other way, and have travelled a good deal. One kind friend, a merchant, has taken G. W. A. and myself into the Santa Cruz valley on a visit to his father-in-law, a French cocoa-planter, who married a Spanish lady and has a family of ten children; he conveyed us thither in an open carriage, and a delightful day we had. Cocoa-trees are planted here in walks, with avenues between them, and are shaded from the sun by other trees, called by the Spaniards "La Madre Cacao," and by the French "Le bois immortel," which run up with a naked stem to a great height, and cover the groves with a dense mass of green leaves, intermixed with bunches of orange and crimson blossoms. You can scarcely imagine how grateful is the shade of a cocoa walk, or how beautiful! I was much pleased with the enthusiasm of our host in his business as a planter: "Look, gentlemen, at that avenue, how beautiful it is: look at that running stream: here we bring our family and sit down on the bank under the shade of these fine trees, and enjoy the cool breezes when the houses are too warm for us: here our young ones bathe! And then, those hills! I take my dogs there into the bush, and hunt the deer and the wild hog."

On another occasion we were taken, all four of us, in a phaeton, in another direction: our first call was at a sugar plantation called Aranguez, where we breakfasted with the owner, who was once a slave. The property deeply encumbered with debt, was bequeathed to him since the emancipation act. It then made only 120 hogsheads of sugar, but by skill and discretion, he has raised the annual produce to 600 hogsheads, and expects in five or six years to pay off the whole mortgage. We went through his works and conversed with his laborers and were greatly pleased with the whole establishment. This black man is a very superior planter; he excites the envy of some of the whites around him, and the admiration of all who look on. We then visited two other sugar-estates, one of which is managed by the agent of an English proprietor, where everything is loss and confusion.

Another of our visits deserves a mention; we received an invitation from a very opulent planter to spend a day or two at his house. He lives eleven miles from Port of Spain; his carriage and horses came over night as the road was bad, and early in the morning we all set out on the journey. His mansion stands in a park at the foot of lofty green hills, and is furnished with much taste. This gentleman is a member of the Council, and is supposed to have grown rich in the days of slavery; fifteen years ago we could not for conscience' sake, have entered his house; but as slavery is now at an end, we endeavor in conversation to forget the past, and to act towards men of the old time as if it had never existed. It is, however, a very painful reflection when we think of such houses as these, built as they were out of the gains of oppression. "The stones of the wall cry out against the owners, and the beams out of the timber answer them."

One tour, an extensive one, G. W. A. and I were compelled to take alone; it occupied us four days. We left home on Seventh-day by schooner for San Fernando, 17 miles distant, a town of 5000 inhabitants, in the fruitful sugar district of Naparima. The morning of First-day we spent alone in retirement at the hotel; in the evening, by invitation, we attended the Wesleyan chapel, and had a meeting which was held after the manner of Friends. Early next morning, horses being provided for us, we rode to an estate called Corinth, belonging to Dr. Philip, who so kindly nursed E. O. Tregelles when sick of fever. Here we were received with great cordiality: after breakfast, fresh horses were saddled, and the Doctor took us a ride of several hours through the North and South Naparima, calling as we passed at some large sugar estates, and at sun-set we returned to San Fernando, and addressed a very large temperance meeting convened by the missionaries. Among the immigrants who have come into the islands are numerous Portuguese families from Madeira, who were persecuted at home for embracing the Protestant faith. In one of our rides with the Baptist missionary, we came upon a group of these people; he explained to them in Portuguese who we were and what we had come for; they seemed overjoyed; there was something about them that interested me deeply, and I was glad to find on inquiry, that the whole company of these immigrants, not only stood firmly to their new religious principles, but were an honor by their conduct to the faith they have embraced. About four hundred of the band have lately left Trinidad with a protestant pastor to settle in Illinois.

St. Vincent, First Month 25th, 1850.—During our stay at Port of Spain, we held a temperance meeting in the city of a very satisfactory character; three missionaries gave in their adhesion to total abstinence principles, and a large number of young men pressed forward to sign the pledge. Intemperance is the crying sin of these colonies, and a large number of young men from this cause find a premature grave. Medical men encourage the delusion of drinking by precept and example, and often themselves fall victims to it. Just before leaving Demerara, I saw a paper containing the names of nineteen medical practitioners who had recently died in that colony; six of them had died of intemperance, as certified by the physician who prepared the statement, and two or three others had probably come to their end from the same sad cause, operating on the constitution more remotely. Besides temperance meetings, which we have held in all the colonies, we have succeeded in procuring anti-slavery meetings to be held.

Within twelve hours after leaving Trinidad by the Eagle steam packet we were safely landed on the quay of St. George in Grenada. A large vessel called the Atlantic, reached the bay a few hours before us, with a cargo of captured slaves from Sierra Leone: we were of course anxious to visit it without delay. The packet agent ordered a boat of eight oars to be got ready, and we went on board almost immediately. Instead of a repulsive sight, as some would have expected, we found a fine, clean, well-ventilated vessel. The captured slaves, 259 in number, men, women, and young people, decently clothed, and in robust health, seated in groups at a plentiful morning meal. We were highly gratified, especially as we found, through our interpreter, that they were rejoiced at having escaped the fangs of the slave-dealer, and that they were come to a free country. We had only two days to spend at Grenada, and we made the most of them. A large temperance meeting was convened for the first evening at the Wesleyan chapel, and a still larger anti-slavery meeting for the second evening at the Court House, in which the Rector of the parish and some members of the Colonial legislature took part; the crowd was so great outside the doors of the large room, that a planter from the country assured us that it took him half an-hour to press through.

Second Month 1st.—During the past week we have been diligently engaged; we have attended one large temperance meeting, and have convened a public meeting for anti-slavery purposes, which is said to have been more numerous attended than almost any the island has known for a long time past. The Rural Dean of the colony took the chair, and several missionaries and planters addressed the company; we also of course took part in the proceedings. In order to give some enjoyment to our wives, and to enjoy a little recreation ourselves, we resolved on making a tour of this beautiful island on horseback. The chief magistrate of police, and the Comptroller of Customs entered kindly into our views, and agreed to make the arrangements for the expedition, and even to go with us the whole way. We set out early in the morning, a cavalcade of six persons with two attendants on foot, and passed over lofty hills and through some lovely valleys, nine miles, to a plantation to breakfast; here we were furnished with horses instead of those that were to go back to Kingston, and we pursued our journey amidst delightful scenery, to Cumberland Bay, another nine miles. We stopped by the way to look at a rock which in ancient times was a Caribb altar, on which human victims were sacrificed, and on which hideous faces are chiselled, and canals for the blood to run down. About 200 descendants of the Caribb aborigines still exist in the country.

Next day came the great trial. The Souffrière is said to be 4000 feet in height, and to be 3300 feet to the first crater. The road was in some places awfully steep: we had often to dismount, and to lead or drag our horses, and after about three hours of hard toil, reached the great crater. The views from the sides of this mountain are wonderfully fine: we look over the island from shore to shore, or rather from sea to sea: the ravines and hills are clothed with forest trees, and all nature is magnificent. A mist covered the edge of the upper crater or recent volcano; our steeds were weary, and some of us were too much fatigued to mount higher: we did not therefore attempt to reach the top of the mountain, but after taking draughts of water at "Jacob's Well," began to descend.

At noon we rested at a plantation, and what was somewhat remarkable, all of us who sat down to a second breakfast there, were teetotalers! A few miles further on, we found that the people of a "Free village," about a mile out of the high road, had sent a request that we should visit them; we resolved to go, and sending C. A. and M. to a plantation near, the rest of us proceeded to the spot. The people had turned out to meet us; a school of about sixty young people formed a lane for us to pass through: the boys took off their caps and bowed, and the whole band repeated the words "And thus do we bid you welcome!" They then sang in chorus the favorite hymn of the West Indies, "O that will be joyful!" We then proceeded to the house of a black man, a planter, and from the steps of his door spoke to the people, who insisted, in their gratitude, on giving us each three huzzas. This village of emancipated labourers has a population of about 800 persons: the houses are many of them very good; they have no spirit-store in the place, so that G. W. A. left them ten dollars for a tea feast. The people were well dressed, and seemed as happy as they are free. No peasantry in the world, we think, are so well off as the emancipated slaves of our colonies. On returning to the plantation for our wives, the kind planter and his wife insisted on our all remaining there for the night, a request to which we gladly yielded.

Castres, St. Lucia, Second Month 5th.—Having engaged the sloop Nautilus of St. Vincent to convey us, we are now on the route to Martinique. We were all either so sea-sick or unwell in beating up against a head-wind, that instead of coming on here to Castres, the capital, as we intended, we turned into the bay of Soufriere, and lodged two nights at a tavern in this port, which is the second best in the colony. We spent the First-day there, and were glad of rest.

ADDRESS TO YOUNG PARENTS.

There are various reasons for training children early in the way they should go, so that they may not depart from it when old:

1. Early impressions are the most lasting.
2. The manner of instruction dictated by the Almighty, in the sixth Chapter of Deuteronomy, is exactly adapted to early training.
3. This divine command is the discipline of the Society of Friends on the subject of education.
4. Daily reading and explaining passages of Scripture, adapted to produce reverence to Almighty goodness in a child, excites similar sensations in the parents, and promotes watchfulness and circumspection in themselves.
5. As life is uncertain, parents should embrace the earliest opportunities for imbuining the tender minds of their offspring with that love and fear which preserves from the "snares of death."

EXAMPLE 1. The parents of a child, as early as he would listen to a little story, commenced daily telling him Scripture over and over in a pleasing manner, or reading and explaining passages. He gradually became interested, and soon learned to read by the help of his parents, who explained his lessons so that he understood them. In his fifth year he had acquired a general knowledge of the Bible, and was delighted and seriously impressed with its contents. He died at this early age, much like an old Christian. This greatly comforted the mourning parents.

2. A distinguished woman who was not serious, but feeling anxiety for her little daughter's future well being, commenced reading in an interesting manner, selected portions of Scripture. She soon perceived it had a serious effect on the child, but still more so on herself; so that she became thoroughly awakened, and from motives of duty she took charge of a school in Canada, where she and her pupils were signally blessed. Young parents, be encouraged to your duty without delay. Natural affection induces parents to supply the physical wants of their children, but it is grace that produces a tender anxiety for their souls; inviting parents to obey the Divine command in the sixth chapter of Deuteronomy. "He that watereth shall be watered also himself."

3. A little girl, well known, commenced learning to read in the most easy parts of the Testament. Very short lessons were first explained, which she would spell and read, and be delighted. She was very much interested in the benevolent and miraculous acts of our Saviour, when explained, and her affection for him was manifest. A toy book, ornamented with pictures, was given her. After reading it she laid it away, saying she did not want it, for it did not say anything about the Lord. The progress of this child in learning to read exceeded any other instance we have known.

Christians believe it essential that their children should be well instructed in the Holy Scriptures. Each sect has also its publications for promoting its peculiar views. Those of Friends have been very instrumental in convincing many strangers of the accordance of their principles with the New Testament. They have also been very confirming to many of our young people who have been conversant in them; they should be much read in our families and schools. These volumes have been written by pious, gifted men and women, of deep religious experience, who have devoted a great part of their lives and property to doing good; and many of them in suffering and purchasing liberty of conscience, which we as a Society so liberally partake of. But for want of a distinct knowledge and appreciation of our own literature, some of our young members have been lost to the Society. If parents desire their children to be attached to the Society of which they are members, let them be specially careful that the flood of new, inviting publications, do not steal their affections from their own more pious and edifying publications, and from the Bible itself. Parents must spare no pains to make their children acquainted and interested with these, if they desire the Society of Friends to be sustained.

The books we practice reading, habit will render the most pleasing to us. This the writer knows by experience; and he has much cause to be thankful that he early acquired the habit of reading Friends' writings, and to old age he is often cheered, and his faith renewed, by the very interesting sentiments and exceedingly precious experience of faithful Friends, who have gone before us. What parents say makes much more distinct and lasting impressions than what they read. Let them make companions of their children; often read with them or hear them read, in the most pious or edifying books, and occasionally parts of our Discipline; converse familiarly, put questions, and answer inquiries, awaken their curiosity, and explain subjects. All this in an easy kind of manner. This will not only interest the young, and store their minds with a fund of useful knowledge, without interfering with school, but also "turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the hearts of the children to the fathers;" and the more cordial the mutual attachment, the more the children will be likely to adopt the sentiments of their pious parents, to follow their example, and be qualified to fill the stations of the faithful, who will be removed, one after another, from the church militant to the church triumphant, through the merits of a crucified Saviour.

THE CONGRESS BILL RELATING TO FUGITIVES FROM SERVICE OR LABOR.

Men resist oppression, or seek to escape from it, because they are men, endowed with a sense of personal, inalienable rights, an inextinguishable love of liberty, and the capacity to enjoy it. That the victim of slavery should flee from its horrors, is no new thing; and that the fugitive should find sympathy among those not interested in perpetuating his enslavement, can excite no surprise among those who understand the instincts and laws of human nature. By the Mosaic code, this sympathy found a sanction for its manifestations in the law which protected the fugitive servant from being seized by his master, and secured to him the protection and hospitalities of the community in which he had taken refuge. The modern Law of Nations, regarding slavery as a municipal, a merely local institution, does not bind one State to surrender fugitive slaves from other States. At times, conventions or treaties of extradition have been made between neighboring Powers, in disregard of the dictates of humanity, in obedience to reasons of State policy. A friend has handed us the following translation of an article in a treaty of peace, entered into in the year 902, between Leon Alexandre V. Constantine, Greek Emperor at Constantinople, and Oleg, Regent of Igor, second king of Russia, on the occasion of the first invasion of the Greek Empire by the Russians, under Oleg.

"If a Russian slave take flight, or even if he is carried away by any one under pretence of having been bought, his master shall have the right and power to pursue him, and hunt for and capture him, wherever he shall be found; and any person who shall oppose the master in the execution of this right, shall be deemed guilty of violating this treaty, and be punished accordingly."

On occasion of a second invasion of the Greek Empire by the Russians, another treaty was formed, in 945, in which it was stipulated as follows:

"If any slave shall fly from Russia into Greece, or shall escape from the Russian merchants residing at Constantinople, the Russian master shall have the right to pursue him, and to hunt for and capture him; and if he cannot be found, the master shall make oath that his slave has escaped, in which case, the Greeks shall pay the said master, according to former treaties, two pieces of cloth for every slave thus escaping into Greece; and if a Greek slave escape into Russia, in the possession of stolen property, and cannot be found by his master, it shall be the duty of the Russians to deliver up said slave, together with the property which he shall have stolen, whereupon the master shall pay to the person so delivering up said slave two pieces of gold, by way of reward."

Of course, the execution of the duty thus imposed, and the manner of executing it, were left to the parties severally contracting. There was no common tribunal for the adjudication of such cases.

It is remarkable, that after the lapse of nearly nine centuries, we find a barbarous stipulation between two barbarous nations reproduced in the compact of union of the most civilized and humane republic of the nineteenth century. We are familiar with the provision referred to:

"No person held to labor or service in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

The language of this clause of the Constitution, like the phraseology of the articles above quoted, is that of a stipulation. No power is conferred upon Congress by the language of the clause expressly, and we have never been able to see how it could be fairly implied. It bears the aspect of a stipulation between the States, and it would seem as if it were left for the States severally to provide measures for carrying it into effect. Such, if we recollect aright, was the decision of Chief Justice Shaw of Massachusetts, some years ago, and such was the opinion of many eminent jurists, until the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Prigg. That decision set aside, and denied the right of, all State legislation on the subject, asserted the exclusive power of Congress to provide means for executing the provision, but asserted, too, the right of the master to seize his slave wherever he might be found, and bear him back to the State whence he had escaped, without process of law.

The free States, finding their right to act on the subject denied by the highest tribunal of the country, discontinued all such action. Some of them, in view of the decision of the court, that Congress could impose no duty on State officers, in relation to the matter, passed laws forbidding their magistrates and ministerial officers to issue or serve process in the case of escaping slaves—laws clearly in harmony with said decision, and not in conflict with the rights of slave claimants. Some States, too, in consideration of the fact that, as the Court had asserted the right of slave claimants to seize their slaves wherever found, without legal process, the liberties of portions of their own free population might be put in peril by sinister or mistaken claims, passed laws securing to persons claimed as slaves the right to have the question legally determined whether they were not free. And no rightminded man will pretend that such laws were unconstitutional or violative of the rights of slave claimants.

That the barbarous Russ should be permitted in the dark ages to hunt and seize by violence, in the territory of a semi-barbarous Empire, any one of its inhabitants, whom he might choose to claim as his fugitive slave, does not surprise us. But the masses have emerged from degradation since the tenth century. Personal rights are now deemed sacred, and no guaranties against their violation are held to be too stringent. The State that would deny to any person within its limits the writ of habeas corpus, in order to test whether he was entitled to his freedom or not, would be wanting in the first duty of a sovereignty—that of the just protection of those within its jurisdiction.

No free State has passed any laws to discharge from service or labor persons fugitive from other States where such service or labor may be due, but many of the free States have severe enactments for the prevention and punishment of kidnapping. The man, then, who seizes in one of these States a person whom he claims as his fugitive slave does so at his peril. If the person seized be a fugitive from service or labor within the meaning of the Constitution, he is secure against punishment; but should it turn out that he has seized a free person, the law visits him with its penalty.

It may be said that this makes it perilous for the owners of fugitives to assert their just rights. Be it so: a State is derelict of duty which does not protect its inhabitants against danger to their liberties. Even a slaveholder must admit that it is more important to protect the liberty of the free, than to perpetuate the slavery of the bondman. The laws of the free States deprive him of no rights, but are intended to guard every portion of their own people from wrong, and to put him on his guard in the exercise of what he or his agent may deem his rights. The truth is, the decision of the Supreme Court, so far as it affirmed his right to seize and bear off without legal process an alleged fugitive, is justly chargeable with the collisions that have since taken place in the recapture of fugitives from service, and also with the laws to remedy injury from illegal seizures, of which the slave States complain. The reclamation of slaves in States holding no slaves and hostile to slavery, is at best so offensive to the opinions and feelings of their people, that slaveholders themselves must admit that it ought to be conducted with as few irritating concomitants as possible. When legal process is issued, when it is served by the officers of the law, when the pretensions of the claimant are made under shelter of the authority of the United States, there is no danger of collision or violent interference. Americans are distinguished for their respect for legal forms, and they will submit, in the hope that no unconstitutional aggression or claim will be tolerated. But it is a very different thing when a stranger, with a band of armed men, appears in a free State community, and proceeds, without authority of law, to seize by violence another stranger, under pretence that he is a slave. Knowing neither, and nothing of the relations of the two parties, the people see brute force put forth by one to deprive the other of his liberty. Would they not be less than men, did they not interpose to see justice done? State law is resorted to, for the unknown claimant may be a kidnapper; the unknown claimed, a free man.

No community, however low in the scale of civilization, will endure the open display of violence against an apparently unoffending individual. Some of the Judges of the Supreme Court did foresee and predict precisely the consequences that have come to pass. We repeat then, that for the collisions that have taken place in the reclamation of fugitives from justice, the Supreme Court of the United States, and not the legislation of the free States, is to be held responsible.

Southern men, irritated by the consequences of the decision of this Court, without stopping to ascertain their true cause, have suffered themselves to become inflamed against the North, indulge daily in their denunciations of the bad faith of Northern men, and insist upon additional legislation by Congress, to remedy their supposed wrongs, although some of them admit that to the States, rather than to the Federal Government, the work of providing means for executing the fugitive clause of the Constitution belongs. Of the justice of their denunciations and the reasonableness of their demands, we may have something to say in our next.—N. Era.

A CRY FROM THE COTTON FIELD.

An English Tract.

By the following extract from a letter written in January, 1850, by a member of the PHILADELPHIA FREE LABOR PRODUCE ASSOCIATION, it will be seen that the internal slave trade of America is in a state of great activity. The quotations it embodies are from the report of the Society's devoted agent, who is now engaged, for at least the third time, on a tour of investigation in the slave States:

"Two years ago, when our agent was in the South, the price of cotton was low, and he wrote to me that slaves were everywhere a drug in the market. He saw them in every town in the hands of the disappointed traders. Cotton was low and falling, and no planter wished to increase the number of his laborers. Now, mark the present state of things: under date of 11th mo. 28th, 1849, our agent writes:—'The tide of emigration south and west to Arkansas and Texas is immense. While we were in Memphis, it was apparently one continued train, and it is said to have been so more than two months. We saw several droves of slaves on their way, and one of boys about 12 years of age, reaching nearly across two squares in Memphis.' Why this great change since the preceding year? Why is the migration immense from the slavery-impoverished plantations of North Carolina and Tennessee to the rich soils of Arkansas and Texas? To what is owing the shocking fact that boys 12 years of age, are collected in droves from hundreds of slave hovels, and driven to labor in the new cotton fields of the south-west? My correspondent incidentally reveals the whole cause in his next paragraph: 'Cotton is high and rising,' says he; 'a good article is now worth 10½ cents; and it is thought by all the merchants we heard speak about it, that it will be higher.'"

The researches of THE FREE LABOR PRODUCE ASSOCIATION have revealed the fact that cotton is cultivated in two ways in the United States, viz., by free labor and by slave labor. It is now positively ascertained that thousands of bales of excellent cotton, untainted by the touch of slavery, may be readily obtained in the very heart of the slave dominion: and that a large additional quantity might be got if the free cultivators more generally possessed gins of their own, and were thus relieved from the necessity of sending their cotton to be cleaned at the gins of slaveholders. It is gratifying to learn that this defect is likely to be remedied by the introduction of an economical hand-gin on an improved principle. Already has this free cotton, to the extent of several hundred bales, made its appearance in the Liverpool market. Already are British manufacturers working it up into several useful fabrics, without any mixture of the tainted fabric in either warp or woof. Already is there one wholesale warehouse in Manchester, established on the principle of excluding slave produce, and from which these free cottons will be distributed over the country to those shopkeepers who may incline to call for them, and for the use of those families who may be disposed to consume them. It now rests with the women of England to give effect to these arrangements, and to work this engine for the depression, if not the overthrow of a system to which every genuine British heart has an innate abhorrence.

The history of Slavery on the cotton fields of America is the very epitome of human misery. From the testimony of credible eye-witnesses, we learn that the negroes are treated like beasts of burden—that their family ties are disregarded—husband and wife, parents and children, sold away from each other, and separated without remorse—that they are constantly worked under the whip; even the women being flogged unmercifully when they fail in accomplishing their appointed task—that when they venture to run away, they are hunted with bloodhounds, and not unfrequently shot down like wild beasts—that in some of the States it is a crime to teach them to read, and a punishable offence to give them the Bible.

More than half the whole cotton crop of the United States comes to England! Consumers of slave produce, think of this! More than half of all the slaves on the American cotton field, toiling for you! Think of the angel of Maummon, visiting, on your account, the dwellings of the negroes, like the angel who inflicted the tenth plague of Egypt, but on a more cruel mission; for the sword of the latter struck down the child of the oppressor at once, while the former drags away his innocent victim to die by inches, exposed to an endless variety of suffering. Think, then, of hovels rifled of their children—women worked under the lash—runaways brought back by the blood-hound, to labor for your benefit! Thousands of your fellow-creatures worked to death this year, to produce your garments for the next! To what a climax of inconsistency have we brought ourselves as Britons, when, after paying our own West India planters handsomely for liberating their 800,000 slaves, we have, at least, a million toiling for our service, under the cruel lash of the foreign slave-driver!

Women of England, it is for you to say how long this shall continue! It is not in your power at once to abolish Slavery, but we believe it is in your power to make Slavery unprofitable, and in doing this, you prepare the way for its downfall—in doing this, you dig the grave of a monster that preys upon the bodies and souls of your fellow creatures. Cease, then, we beseech you, to give a premium to the Slaveholder, by the purchase of his wares. Ask your tradesmen continually for Free-labor Cotton goods, Free-labor Sugar, Rice, and Coffee. If they say they do not keep them, ask them to obtain them for you; and if they refuse, look out for other tradesmen, possessed of honest Anti-Slavery principles like yourselves. Let others use Slave produce if they will; but determine, for yourselves, to clear your hands of it as soon as possible, and to deal with tradesmen that patronise those Free-labor cultivators who pay wages for their work like honest men. By such a course, even if you stand alone, and fail to make any impression on the slaveholder, you have, at least, the satisfaction of keeping your own hands clean, and of giving your decided protest against a system which dishonours God by brutifying His image.

Practical Suggestions to the Friends of the Slave.

1st. That they exert themselves, in their respective circles, to encourage the consumption of the products of free labor, in preference to articles produced by slaves. Tracts advocating the claims of free labor may be obtained, through the booksellers, from C. Gilpin, 5, Bishopsgate-Without, London.

2nd. That they use their influence with DRAPERS and GROCERS to induce them to give a preference to free labor articles, and to recommend them to their customers.

3rd. That wherever sufficient interest can be excited, FREE LABOR ASSOCIATIONS be formed for the promotion of these objects; and information of their proceedings forwarded to the Editor of the "Bond of Brotherhood," 3, Winchester Buildings, Old Broad Street, London.

THE DUTY OF THE BRITISH PEOPLE.

The abolition of slavery and the slave-trade is one of the great necessities and duties of the age. Until it be accomplished, an obstacle to the civilization of the human race, and the general diffusion of the gospel, exists of the most formidable kind. Wherever slavery obtains, we find its victims degraded to the condition of property, the most sacred and endearing relations of social life abrogated, and the claims of humanity, justice and religion, altogether evaded or denied. The testimony of a thousand witnesses shows that slaves are treated with barbarous inhumanity, plunged into the profoundest depths of ignorance, their labor coerced by the whip, and practically, their lives placed at the disposal of their owners. Under such circumstances, no wonder that they are embruted and their masters demonized.

But, it is said, however much we may deplore the existence of slavery and reprobate its atrocities, we are not responsible for its existence in foreign countries; and having no power over their legislation, have no right to interfere with their institutions. All we can do, is to express our abhorrence of their practices, and to persuade those countries to abandon them.

The validity of this plea must be admitted wherever it justly applies; but if it can be shown that either as individuals, or as a nation, we directly or indirectly strengthen and extend this system of iniquity, the plea has no force in it, and we must be held amenable for the consequences. This is precisely our relation to slavery in the United States. We have done more than any other people, by commercial intercourse, to give vitality to the slave system of that country. For instance, the following table will strikingly exemplify how the demand for cotton has extended and consolidated the system of slavery there:—

[This table shows that the exports of cotton from the United States increased from 180,316 pounds in 1790, to more than twelve hundred millions of pounds in 1846, and that during the same period the number of slaves was increased from 657,437 to three millions.]

Commercially speaking, we might rejoice in this large development of the resources of the United States, and of our participation in the material benefits derived therefrom. But when we consider at how dear a cost to human liberty, and at how frightful a violation of the moral laws by which the world should be governed, it has been obtained, we confess that we cannot reconcile ourselves to it. On the contrary, we conceive it to be a solemn duty which we owe to millions of our suffering and oppressed fellow-creatures, no less than to the revealed will of God, that we disengage ourselves as speedily as possible from all participation in its unrighteous gains.—*London A. #### THE FRUITS OF WAR.

From the report of a Committee of the New York Legislature, appointed to inquire into the present condition of the regiment of New York volunteers for the Mexican war, we gather the following melancholy facts, illustrative of the nature of war.

The whole number that departed originally for the seat of war, was 805.

Of these there died in Mexico, or were killed in battle,	227
Discharged from disabilities, wounds, sickness,	226
Missing and deserted,	35
Died since their return,	56
Known to be living,	106
Leaving wholly unaccounted for,	155
Total,	805

Of those discharged in Mexico, as above stated, in number 226, very few have been heard of. It is supposed that most of them died, being sick when discharged.

Of those known to be living, numbering 106, nearly all are broken down by disease, hardships, or wounds received in the campaign, and are unable to support themselves.

Of the 155 of whom we can learn nothing, we suppose most have died, and many have doubtless gone away, it may be to California.

We have discovered 18 widows, who are all in a destitute condition, and about 20 children likewise situated.

We presume that a like investigation would bring to light similar results in regard to the fate of the Massachusetts regiment: and yet all these men who have died or are now pining in almshouses and hospitals, were promised glory and the everlasting gratitude of their country as a reward for their sufferings and sacrifices. The country has long since forgotten the names of the dead, and cares as little for the living as it does for the foreign paupers that throng the streets of our large cities. It is known to the Committee that two of the poor fellows have starved to death since their return,—and this is glory.—Christian Citizen.

TRANSATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

John A. Roebling, Esq., Civil Engineer, of Trenton, N. J., has furnished the Journal of Commerce with a long and ingenious article on a Transatlantic Telegraph. Mr. R. has had much experience in the construction of wire cable suspension bridges and aqueducts, and in the manufacture of wire ropes. He considers the construction of a line of telegraph wire across the Atlantic entirely practicable, and the cost not to exceed $1,300,000, on which he thinks very large dividends may be expected, 25 per cent. at least. It is difficult to judge of the merits of a project so entirely new, and at first view there would seem to be great and insuperable objections to it; but Mr. Roebling shows in his communication that he has considered them all, and taken them into his calculation of the practicability of the plan which he lays down. His design is to sink a strong wire rope upon the bottom of the ocean. The wire rope to be composed of twenty strands of No. 13 or 14 wire, perfectly separated from each other and isolated, so that they will form twenty different and distinct transmitting wires, by which twenty machines can be operated at each end, and twenty messages despatched at one time. It appears, he says, that iron wire of No. 14 size, measuring 50 feet per lb., possesses sufficient conducting capacity for the transmission of telegraphic currents, provided it is perfectly insulated, a necessary condition, no matter what size of wire is employed. The wires being perfectly insulated and protected against the action of the sea water, quietly resting upon the bottom of the ocean, where nothing whatever can disturb them, their efficiency may at all times be dependent on—they will remain free from those vexatious interruptions which are constantly interfering with land telegraphic operations. The communication is a very long one, describing the mode of laying the wires, the strength of the material and the strain it would support without breaking. Coming from this source, the project is at least worthy the attention of practical minds.

FAITH AND WORKS.

On the frith of Forth was an old ferryman, a man of much thought and observation, but of few words; a constant student of the Bible, and a firm believer in its truths. Among his patrons were two loquacious companions, whose business led them across the river once a week. One of them was, as he supposed, a high-toned Calvinist, while the other imagined himself to be equally well grounded in the tenets of Arminius. Their conversation always turned upon some doctrinal point. The ferryman was frequently annoyed by the repetition of faith on one side, and works on the other, because they were used in a sense so different from their real import, and so destructive of their scriptural harmony.

At length the patient old man felt obliged to interfere. He said nothing, but fell upon the following expedient. Upon one of his oars he painted the word faith; upon the other, works. It was not long before the zealous but friendly disputants applied for a passage over the Forth. Upon entering the deepest part of the river, where the swollen water rushed down with fearful violence, the ferryman took in "Faith," and pulled away upon "Works," with all his might. The boat went round and round, much to the annoyance and terror of the two passengers. "Put out the other oar," said one of them, in a loud and angry tone. "Very well," was the calm reply of the old man—at the same time taking in "Works," and relying on "Faith" alone. The experiment with this oar produced the same result, and drove the witnesses of it to the conclusion that the ferryman was "out of his head." The old man however continued his "practical demonstrations" on the water, until he thought the friends were prepared to see two things in connection. He then called their attention to the names of his oars: "I have tried your way," said he—"and yours; and you have seen the result. Now observe my way." And giving a steady hand to each oar, the little boat soon acknowledged the power of their harmonious strokes, by the straight and rapid flight which she took for the landing.—Amer. Mess.

COTTON IN THE ENGLISH ISLANDS AND COLONIES.

It is with great satisfaction we learn that the Manchester Chamber of Commerce has had its attention directed to the cultivation of cotton, during the past year, as a matter of the highest interests to the manufacturing districts. It is felt to be a great impediment to industrial operations, to be so entirely dependent upon the United States for supplies of the raw material, as at present. Not is this all. The dangers arising from servile insurrections, which, at any time, may break out, may well occasion alarm, and lead our manufacturers to direct their attention to other countries for supplies, not liable to the same contingencies, and from whence they may obtain cotton wool, of good quality and low prices. A short time since the Chamber held a general meeting of its members, on the questions relating to British India, and the possibility of obtaining a large supply of cotton from that country. Since then, the Directors state they have received numerous communications relative to the power possessed by many of our colonies to supply this country with immense quantities of that article. It appears, from the information submitted to them, that a considerable supply might be obtained, were it not that their resources were not wisely developed by the Government. Let them be left to their own energies, unshackled by heavy taxation, and free to enact and administer their own laws, and there would be no want of raw cotton and other valuable products for the home market. We feel that Government might, in many ways, stimulate the growth of cotton, not only in India, by wise arrangements respecting the land and by lightening the burthens upon industry, but in the emancipated colonies also, where there is abundance of soil calculated for its production, and a climate admirably adapted to bring it to perfection.—*A. #### WASHINGTON SLAVE TRADE.

WASHINGTON, March 30, 1850.

Nothing said at the present session of congress appears to have given Southern men so great offence, as the remarks of Thaddeus Stevens, upon the breeding of mankind for the market, by the chivalry of Virginia. They have not ceased to brand it as vulgar, indecent, and offensive beyond endurance. No one denied the facts, but to speak truth concerning the slave-breeding business was insufferable.

A gentleman in whom I repose perfect confidence, informed me to-day, that recently an order was received from Virginia for a lot of women; none were to be purchased except those who were known to be useful for the purposes intended.—Forty-one young Mothers were collected, each with at least one child, and no child over five years old. They were torn from their husbands, and the children from their fathers, and were marched in a body from one of the prisons, in open day to the steambot, when they were taken on board for Virginia. The scene is described as one of the most heart-rending character.

And this is the traffic which is kept up here by the action of Northern Representatives in Congress, whose constituents really believe them devoted to the cause of Freedom and of human rights. The people have very little idea of the manner in which it is done.

No bill can be offered, under the rules of the House, except on resolution day. That is, it is not in order to ask leave to introduce a bill on any other than the day assigned to resolutions. Every alternate Monday, only, is thus appropriated, by the rules of the House. Yet it is in order, on such days to move a suspension of the rules to go into committee of the whole on the state of the Union, and a majority will carry such motion. Now those who are in fear that such motion may be made in regard to the slave trade, have only to vote to go into committee of the whole on the state of the Union, upon each resolution day, and all action in reference to this commerce in the bodies of women, is postponed. For months this trick has been practiced, and few of the Northern people are aware of this latent fraud practised upon them by members of Congress, in order to shield this accursed traffic from the efforts of those who detest it. Members have for months been prepared to introduce bills to eradicate this disgrace to our nation, but are unable to get a chance to present them.

POETRY.

THE SLAVEHOLDERS AND THEIR ALLIES.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

Quench every free discussion light—
Clap on the legislative snuffers,
And caulk with 'resolutions' tight
The ghastly rents the Union suffers!
Let Church and State brand Abolition
As heresy and rank sedition.
Choke down, at once, each breathing thing
That whispers of the Rights of Man;
Gag the free girl who dares to sing
Of freedom o'er her dairy pen;
Dog the old farmer's steps about,
And hunt his cherished treason out.

Do more. Fill up your loathsome jails
With faithful men and women—set
The scaffold up in those green vales,
And let the verdant turf be wet
With blood of unresisting men—
Ay, do all this, and more,—WHAT TUES?
Think ye, one heart of man or child
Will falter from its lofty faith,
At the mob's tumult, fierce and wild—
The prison-cell—the shameful death?
No!—nursed in storm and trial long,
The weakest of our band is strong.
Oh! while before us visions come
Of slave ships on Virginia's coast—
Of mothers in their childless home,
Like Rachel, sorrowing o'er the lost—
The slave-gang scourged upon its way—
The blood-hound and his human prey—
We cannot falter! Did we so,
The stones beneath would murmur out,
And all the winds that round us blow
Would whisper of our shame about.
No! let the tempest rock the land,
Our faith shall live—our truth shall stand.
True as the Vaudois hemmed around
With Papal fire and Roman steel—
Firm as the Christian heroine boned
Upon Domitian's torturing wheel,
We 'bate no breath—we curb no thought—
Come what may come, WE FALTER NOT!

NOTICE.

The public are hereby notified that William Beard, of Union County, Indiana, is appointed General Agent for the Union Literary Institute, a manual labor school for colored youth, located in Randolph County, Indiana, and is fully authorized to solicit donations, receive moneys, &c., for the Institution aforesaid, and is hereby commended to the liberality and kind offices of the philanthropic and humane in those places which he may visit.

By order of the Board of Managers,
EZEKIEL TUCKER, Corresponding Secretary.
U. L. Institute, April 3, 1850.

We copy the above notice from the National Era, and cordially add our recommendation of the Institute to the favorable consideration of the friends of the colored race. Although intended principally for colored youth, and with especial reference to training them for Teachers, yet white children are also admitted into the School. For a brief history of its establishment and condition we refer our readers to the 10th number of our last volume, and to page 33, number 2, of the current volume.

The Agent, William Beard, is now in Philadelphia, and intends to visit New York and New England. He has met with liberal aid in this city and the neighborhood, but the wants are great of the poor and oppressed for whom he is asking assistance, and we trust he will not plead in vain during the further prosecution of his journey. Our valuable friend N. C. H., whose letter is inserted in this paper, will perceive that an attempt has already been made to establish a Manual Labor School of the character he suggests.—Ed.

ASSOCIATED ACTION.

EXTRACTS FROM THE MINUTES OF THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS OF OHIO YEARLY MEETING.

Held 3rd of Ninth month, 1850, with the Report of the Board of Managers.

At the Annual Meeting of the Free Produce
Association of Friends of Ohio Yearly Meeting, held at Short-creek meeting house the 3rd of 9th month, 1850, the following Report of the Board of Managers was read and approved, and directed to be forwarded to the Editor of the Non-Slave-holder for publication in that Journal. Should way open, the Board were directed to have the same published, in connection with some other matter, in tract form, for general circulation among our members; and a committee was appointed to endeavor to raise the sum of one hundred dollars, to defray the expenses of publication.

The Constitution having been read, a large addition was made to the list of our members.

A Committee having been appointed for that purpose, reported the names of the following Friends to serve as officers of the Association the ensuing year; which being united with, they were accordingly appointed, viz:

George K. Jenkins, Secretary.

Jonathan Binns, Treasurer.

Ezra Cattell, Cyrus Mendenhall, Elwood Ratcliff, Sarah E. Jenkins, Parvin Wright, Louis Taber, Eliza Binns, and Penrose Hassey, Board of Managers.

The following proposition having been offered, was duly considered and adopted, and the Board of Managers was directed to appoint the Committee in each of the monthly meetings, as agreed upon, viz: "In order to promote more efficiently
the several objects of this Association, it is proposed that a Corresponding Committee of two individuals in each monthly meeting be annually appointed to correspond with the Board, circulate information, awaken an interest in the objects of our Association, encourage the purchase of free labor products, collect important information, report the number of Friends in each monthly meeting, and ascertain the number of families, or heads of families, who give a decided preference for, or use only free productions; making reports on all the above subjects to the Board of Managers in time to have the information incorporated into the annual report next year."

The regular business of the Association having been attended to, our meeting, which was much larger than at any former period, was addressed in a very interesting manner by our esteemed friend, John Candler, of England, who,
in company with his wife, was in attendance.

He assured us that all classes—rulers, planters and laborers, with whom they met in their recent visit to the West India Islands, were highly pleased with the workings of emancipa-tion; and that no class would, under any circumstances, be willing to return to slavery.
The condition of the laborers was incomparably better than it could ever have been under the restrictions of slavery. That there was a depression in the Islands, he admitted was but too true, but this arose not from the liberation of their laborers, but from the impolicy of the legislation at home, which admitted the slave-grown sugars of Cuba and Brazil into the English markets almost without any restrictions. The impoverished estates of the British Islands cannot compete in the production of sugar with the comparatively new estates of Cuba and Brazil, where land is cheap and the soil very fertile and productive. Could the markets of England be closed against slave-grown sugars, it would not be long till even Cuba and Brazil would be willing, or even anxious, to abolish slavery.

Our beloved friends, Benjamin Seebohm, Nathan C. Hoag, Cornelius Douglass and others who were in attendance, severally addressed the meeting, offering us, in the language of christian exhortation, a word of encouragement in the good work in which we were engaged.

ANNUAL REPORT.

The Board of Managers of the Free Produce Association of Friends of Ohio Yearly Meeting, in presenting this, their second Annual Report, though they cannot boast of the accomplishment of all they could have desired in the cause of humanity in which they are engaged, yet feel constrained to hold out a word of encouragement and cheer to their fellow laborers.

During the past year, as may be seen by a reference to the minutes of their Meetings, the Board have had their attention directed to the necessity of awakening, in the minds of Friends and others, a more general interest in the Free Labor movement. And of endeavoring to secure a greater concert of action among those who are already convinced of the inconsistency of professing to hold a testimony against slavery, whilst making an indiscriminate and unnecessary use of its products. In order to accomplish, as far as practicable, the first of these desirable ends, the Board could devise no means, in their opinion, more likely to effect the object in view, than an extensive distribution of tracts, published in a cheap form, and embracing some of the most pointed arguments in favor of the duty of abstinence from the use of slave goods. For this purpose, a committee was appointed to select or prepare for publication, in tract form, some of the most striking arguments on this question, whilst another committee had the charge of collecting funds to defray the expenses of publication. A considerable amount of matter was selected from which a sufficiency was taken to form about 46 pages of ordinary tracts. The Board had 1000 copies of each printed; making about 46,000 pages of matter, the principal part of which has already been widely distributed among our members in the different sections of our Yearly Meeting.

These, so far as we have been able to learn, have been generally well received; and will, we hope, be able to send home a favorable report from the errand of mercy and love on which they were sent forth. Could the Board command a sufficient amount of funds to issue a much larger edition of the above tracts, in connection with some others that might be prepared, we believe it might be made a most powerful auxiliary for awakening an interest on this subject. A correspondence was opened with Friends in other places, in order to secure their co-operation in the publication of tracts; yet owing to the length of time required for making the necessary arrangements for acting in concert, it was thought advisable by the Board to issue an edition with as little delay as possible. They also opened a correspondence in relation to the establishment of a manufactory for the working of free Cotton. Both of these propositions were cordially responded to, though no pecuniary aid was tendered for the establishment of a manufactory at the present. In relation to the other, we believe it would only be necessary to adopt some organized method of communication, to secure the hearty co-operation of the friends of the cause in this interesting object.

The store established about two years since, in our village, Mount Pleasant, under the direction of the Free Labor Company, still continues to afford facilities for those who desire to obtain goods uncontaminated by the stains of slavery. We are induced to believe, that this establishment has also had a salutary influence in awakening in the minds of many Friends, a due sense of the obligation resting upon them, to abstain from making use of articles the production of slave labor. That its establishment may be instrumental in still further extending this concern, is much to be desired; and there is little doubt that such will be the result, if those, who profess to be convinced of their obligations in this respect, are only consistent in their practice.

Although our labors have not been so fully appreciated by our fellow members generally as could have been desired, yet we believe there is a feeling steadily spreading among Friends, that it is not consistent with our testimony against slavery, to purchase the proceeds thereof. And though they cannot generally agree with us exactly in regard to our practical duty on this subject, yet they can readily perceive, that there is not much difference between hiring slaves directly of their masters—thus paying the master for the services of his slaves—and going directly to the master and paying him for the product of their labor, produced under his direction. The manifest inconsistency of making the former a disciplinary offence, whilst the latter is passed over unnoticed, does not appear to have particularly attracted their attention. Though Friends have not yet seen proper in answering our query on the subject of slavery, to reckon the use of its products as an exception to the answer; yet it is not because they do not see clearly that the use of its products supports the system of slavery, but because they believe that friends in framing the query, did not anticipate this application of it.

The same discernment which so readily detects the relation between prize goods and war, we might suppose could not fail to detect a still more intimate relation between slave goods and slavery. Hence it is that the number of Friends who give a preference for free labor products is constantly increasing among us; and the increasing demand for free labor goods has induced a number of merchants in different places to keep on hand a small assortment of such goods to supply the demand. The subject is more frequently alluded to in conversation, thus causing Friends to think more upon it, which cannot fail to advance the testimony.

Within the limits of several other Yearly Meetings, Friends seem alive to the subject. Our western Friends are in many instances associating together for the advancement of this movement whilst in other places, even in the midst of slavery itself, many Friends are convinced that the use of the products, gives a support to slavery; and are anxiously seeking the means of relieving themselves from this responsibility.

With much pleasure we refer to our active coadjutors in Philadelphia, who are laboring in many ways to promote this testimony, and to obtain goods free from the taint of slavery. Within the present year, at their instance, our friends Nathan Thomas and Henry Charles, have passed through portions of several of our Southern States in order to ascertain the opportunities for obtaining cotton, which was entirely the production of Free Labor. They found considerable quantities could be obtained from several of those States, and that slaveholders themselves seemed properly to appreciate our consistency and labors. We doubt not that the results of their labors will be advantageous to our enterprise, and that they will receive their reward for this labor of love. Our friends in Philadelphia have also, during the past year, been manufacturing an increased amount of cotton goods, and of an improved quality. The former difference in the price of free and slave goods has been much diminished, and in many cases the former are now to be procured at about the same price as the latter.

The Non-Slaveholder, under the direction of Samuel Rhoads, still continues battling for the right, against the combined influences of interest and prejudice. While it serves as a channel of communication between the friends of free labor, its correspondence is often quite encouraging—its editorials well-timed and pithy—and its selections generally judicious. We cordially recommend it, as worthy the encouragement and patronage of Friends.

The Friend, and Friends' Review, also give place to communications favoring abstinence from the productions of unrequited toil, and the editor of the latter, as appears from occasional editorials, is decidedly with us in sentiment. We hope that the editors of the Review, and the Friend, may hereafter feel it a duty to give more prominence to this subject in their respective journals.

Within the limits of New York, and New England Yearly Meetings, our testimony on this subject appears to be rapidly gaining ground. There, Friends generally appear to approve, and are taking active measures to further the concern, and to place free labor goods within the reach of all their members.

Nor are our transatlantic friends inactive in their support of the free labor movement. The subject is there undergoing discussion in their journals, and a large number have fully embraced the principle, and are endeavoring to carry it out in practice. Not only Friends, but christians of other denominations are laboring for the same good object.

The Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, are urging this subject on the attention of Parliament and the people generally.

In short, we find many individuals both east and west, who are earnestly laboring for the spread of this testimony, and are endeavoring to live clear of those goods which are wrested by violence from our brethren in bonds.

To all such, of whatever name, we offer our sympathy and encouragement; believing that if acting under right motives, the blessing of Heaven will rest upon their labors.

In thus presenting to the Association a synopsis of their own labors during the past year, and that of their coadjutors in other places, the Board of Managers believe they may look backward with encouragement, and forward with hope. A few years since no allusion to the subject of slavery could be tolerated in our national councils; now, almost an entire session of Congress has been occupied with the discussion of that question alone.

California, the offspring of Freedom, has sprung up with unparalleled growth and vigor upon our utmost western limits—the golden shores of the Pacific; and with her perpetual charter of freedom, has been, or will soon be admitted as a member of our Union. New Mexico, with a constitution prohibiting involuntary servitude, is already knocking for admission, and other States will soon be formed from territories hostile to the blighting curse of slavery. The North is fully aroused, we hope, from her pleasing slumbers of security, and we are sustained and cheered in our efforts by the united voices of the philanthropists of every age and of every clime. Slaveholders are beginning to feel, that the moral sentiment of the civilized world is against the farther extension of slavery; and hence their desperate struggles to suppress the rising spirit of liberty in our newly acquired dominions. They know full well that to limit slavery, is eventually to decree its final extinction. We feel assured that however long, or for whatever unseen purposes it shall please inscrutable wisdom to permit the continuance of slavery, its days are numbered; it has been weighed in the unerring balance and found wanting, and the days, and months, and years of suffering and sorrow, meted out to our sable brethren and sisters in bonds, are in this land, at least, drawing to a close.

But in looking backward to the past and forward to the future, let us ask ourselves in all sincerity, what have we individually done, and what do we purpose doing to hasten forward the emancipation of our oppressed fellow-men? Have we embraced every opportunity for advancing so good a cause, by endeavoring to disseminate correct information, and by abstaining from a participation in the gains of oppression, being fully persuaded that our united and persevering efforts, will, through the blessing of Providence, be eventually crowned with success?

To us it appears that a candid and impartial examination of this subject in all its various bearings, must result in a thorough conviction, that we cannot innocently participate with the slaveholder in the fruits of oppression, and that whatever restrictions may be thrown around the system, it must be felt and acknowledged to be equally wrong, knowingly to consume the products of his unpaid toil, as to hold and employ the slave. Especially should Friends, the children of ancestors the first to burst the fetters of bondage from the limbs of the suffering slave, be faithful in this work of justice, benevolence and love.

Toward those who differ from us in sentiment, we wish to exercise that charity which suffereth long and is kind; but were they willing fully to examine this subject in the light of truth, we believe they would find a work to do, and feel greatly straightened until it was accomplished. Should any one conclude that because he had not always refrained from evil, he would make no effort to lead a life of piety, how could he at all advance in religious growth? And because we find it difficult at all times to be entirely clear of all participation in the fruits of oppression, shall we excuse ourselves from embracing every opportunity, when by abstinence from slave products, we can stimulate free production, and bear a consistent testimony against slavery? Without a commencement there can be no progress.

In conclusion, let each individual of us endeavor both to know, and to do our whole duty toward our oppressed fellow-men; so that even those who may look with coldness or indifference upon our assertions, witnessing our sacrifices and sincerity, may be constrained to say "let them alone, they have done what they could."

Signed in and on behalf of the meeting by
G. K. JENNINGS, Sec'y.

COMMUNICATION.

To the Editor of the Non-Slaverholder.

LONDON, Sept. 3, 1850.

DEAR FRIEND:—I left New York on the 31st of July, in the British steamer America, Capt. Shannon, and in a few hours I bade farewell to my native land. As the last glimpse of the shores faded away, I was very forcibly reminded by the turn of my thoughts, and the state of my feelings, that I hated nothing in America but Slavery and its associated evils. Even to me, my country is lovely—how much more so it must be to those of her sons, around whom she throws her arms of protection.

It was my design to take a second cabin passage, but Mr. Cunard said, in kind terms, that the American feelings would not allow it, although he had not the least personal objection.

He then offered me a state room on deck, at full cabin fare $120. I told him that his vessel offered me the only chance of reaching the Peace Congress at Frankfort, and that I should be compelled to submit to any arrangements that were not actually degrading. This last remark brought English blood to Mr. Cunard's face, and I received the assurance that I should suffer no degradation. All things turned out for the best. My room was excellent and airy, which is an important consideration to any one disposed to be sea-sick. I must not omit to mention that every thing was done to make me comfortable by the officers, and I only protested against being compelled to pay for that which I did not desire, for to my mind it is equivalent to taking what I have without my consent. My room was frequently resorted to by passengers of both cabins, who did not desire any such arrangements. The second officer, Mr. Simpson, very early called at my room, and mentioned that American prejudice was quite repugnant to his feelings, and invited me to his room, and also to take a glass of wine with him. The former part of the civility I accepted, but respectfully declined the latter. As we approached the British shore, the changes which took place in my white fellow countrymen and myself, were quite perceptible. They dwindled down to their proper dimensions, and I arose to mine. When we reached England, they were no larger than they should be, and I, for the first time in my life, felt that my treatment would be graduated by my deportment. We rode in the same omnibuses, ate at the same tables, and conversed in the same saloons, and strange to say, American prejudice, which is said to be natural in every instance failed to show its nature.

From Liverpool we proceeded to Birmingham, purposely to call upon Mr. Joseph Sturge, one of England's best and greatest men. We found him at home in one of those unostentatious mansions peculiar to wealthy English gentlemen of the Society of Friends. We were made happy by finding that he had recovered his health, and would accompany us on the day following to London, whither he was going to attend a meeting of the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, who were to hear a report from Mr. Geo. Wm. Alexander. The meeting was full—J. Sturge presided, and Mr. Alexander made a most gratifying report. There were also present Mr. Scoble, the Forsters, two colored gentlemen from the West Indies, and many other friends of our cause.

Frankfort-on-the-Maine.

On the 19th ult. some five hundred pious people departed for the above named ancient city, and on the evening of the 21st we reached our destination. In passing through the territories of the French, Belgian and Prussian Governments, we were not troubled by any examinations by the respective officers of customs, but were treated with great and surprising courtesy. The Congress was extremely interesting. Some of the greatest minds of the world were present. No other but kind feelings prevailed, for all seemed anxious to promote the cause by example, as well as by precept.

The first Anti-Slavery, and Free Produce Meetings in Germany.

By the request of two distinguished Germans, Mr. Heider and Dr. Carrovi, we had two Anti-Slavery Meetings in Frankfort. Joseph Sturge presided. Mr. Heider is a wealthy banker, and Chief Magistrate of the city. To our astonishment, when he arose to speak the first evening, he went the whole length of the Free Produce doctrine. His arguments were as strong as any I ever heard. The meeting was also addressed by J. W. C. Pennington, D. D. and myself. The meeting on the second evening was full, and before I reached the house I met a multitude retiring, some of whom informed me that I could not enter. But on reaching the door a stalwart German preceded me, manfully applying his elbows right and left, and thus we reached the stand. We made our speeches through an interpreter. Dr. Pennington gave a very clear and concise exposition of the slave laws, and their effect upon the blacks in the United States. Mr. Sturge called the attention of the audience to the merits of the Free Produce question. He said but a few words, but they were weighty, and were received with the utmost respect. The Secretary of "the British Aborigines' Society" then read some resolutions, expressive of gratitude to the German Abolitionists, and to J. Sturge—they passed unanimously. I made the concluding remarks, and referred to the intellectual degradation which is inseparable from the system of chattel slavery, and also pointed to the slaveholding portion of the American Church, the political power of the oppressors, and the general spirit of the American Colonization scheme as presenting bulwarks of slavery in Democratic America. I also spoke of the advancement of our cause at home, and of the friendly feelings of the German emigrants in America towards the people of color.

The whole proceedings were received with great attention. Two Committees were formed, one of ladies, and one of gentlemen, having for their object the promotion of the Free Produce cause in Germany, a correspondence with England, and the establishment of a store in Frankfurt. Thus by the blessings of our Heavenly Father, the door is open in that land is reopened for its sciences, arts, and literature.

On the 26th inst. the delegation made a visit to Heidelberg, the seat of the ancient university. It was here that Dr. Pennington received his degree of "Doctor of Theology." This was his first visit to his Alma Mater, having received the honor by proxy.

After having passed through the wonderful libraries, which contain many valuable manuscripts of remote antiquity, we proceeded to the Chapel, where a most interesting ceremony took place, although it was entirely unpremeditated. One of the learned Professors invited Dr. Pennington to ascend the platform and say a few words. He complied with the request, and concluded by speaking two or three sentences in Latin. When he descended, the Doctor of Law stepped forward and embraced Dr. Pennington in both arms and kissed him upon the forehead, amid loud applause. The Professor remarked in substance "that while the Faculty were desirous to pay a tribute to his worth, talent and learning, at the same time they were anxious to show to the world that in Germany, a man is not judged by the color of his skin—and that they took pleasure in holding out to the African race, as well as to others, inducements to become learned and useful."

The short space of this letter will not allow me to speak to any extent, of the far famed castle of Heidelberg, which, although it is in ruins, is magnificent and sublime.

The day following, the company repaired to Wiesbaden, the beautiful watering place, and one of the most fashionable resorts in Germany. It had been previously advertised, that on that occasion the British members would present the Americans with some tokens of friendship. At five o'clock we went to the splendid Gardens of the Zimmerman Hotel. Joseph Sturge took the chair, and indeed before a motion was made for him to preside, by a common consent everybody looked towards the beloved philanthropist as the chosen man. On taking the chair he stated the object of the meeting, and had the kindness to compliment the Americans for their fortitude displayed in coming thousands of miles to attend the Congress, and concluded by presenting a copy of the New Testament in the German language to the estimable and great hearted Barrit. Mr. Barrit could say but a few words in consequence of having a severe cold upon his lungs, but even those few words spoke much, for a remembrance of his life made up the deficiency of words.

[H. H. Garnet was next called upon to respond in behalf of the Americans. He said that with all his heart he would thank his English friends for the very appropriate gift which they had been pleased to extend to members from the United States. He would assure the chairman that while the sacred token was the favorite choice of the English, nothing could be more acceptable to the Americans. It contains the good seeds, which he trusted would ere long be scattered in all the waste places of the earth, which should be as a handful of corn upon the top of the mountains; the fruits thereof shall shake like Lebanon. Mankind had been torn and mangled by the cruelty of war, and these leaves only could heal the nations. Men would become just and peaceable, so far as they should conform to the unerring principles of this book. The prophecies of the Messiah strikingly accord with the immediate announcement of his advent. Who could fail to be struck with the glorious and sublime climax of the former—"He shall be called wonderful, counsellor, the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace." Nor does the latter—the angels' song—strike the christian with less force, or inspire him with less delight—"Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace and good will to men." In behalf of America and her sons of peace, he would welcome one and all to the Western shores of the Atlantic whenever their minds should be turned thither.]

Dr. Bullard from St. Louis, followed in a few remarks which were received with applause.—Dr. Pennington also made a touching speech. The concluding address was made by Mr. Sturge. The pious and unadorned language of this gentleman, together with the great depth of feeling which he manifested, threw the whole assembly into tears. Germans, French, Italians, Dutch, English and Americans, all wept. The last sentence of his brief speech was nearly as follows—"We are, my friends, about to part for our distant homes, but never shall we all meet again on these grounds. Considering the uncertainty of human life I may safely make the statement. Be it even so, I humbly implore our Heavenly Father that we all may meet in his kingdom where we shall part no more." Here his voice failed from intense emotion, and he descended the stage, and the congregation retired, with the best of feelings, and many were filled with gratitude to God.

On Thursday the 29th, we left Frankfurt, hospitable Frankfurt, and floated down the Rhine. At Bonn, we were met by a delegation consisting of two Catholic Priests, and a part of the committee of the Cathedral at Cologne, who bade us welcome to the last named city, and kindly offered us a free survey of that wonderful edifice, the cathedral. You would have smiled to have heard the cannon thunder along the shores of the Rhine as we passed—all in honor to us Peace men. In spite of Mr. Mackay, the good people seemed to think that cannon, if not "cannon balls, could add the truth." While at the cathedral I was among the few fortunate ones who were permitted to inspect the celebrated Shrine, which is said to contain the three skulls of the three wise men who went from the East to Jerusalem saying, where is he, that is born king of the Jews; for we have seen his star in the east, and have come to worship him." It is made of gold, and studded with precious stones. The story of the relics staggered my credulity. The Cathedral has been six hundred years in building, and is still far from being finished.

Sept. 4. This night at half past nine, I arrived in New Castle on the Tyne, and soon had the joy of entering the mansion of those laborious and untiring friends of the down-trodden bondsman, Henry and Anna H. Richardson. At once they made me feel myself at home, and immediately set themselves about making arrangements for our Free Labour campaign. You know the energy of these dear friends. Leaf after leaf, covered with arguments and appeals in the behalf of the children of Africa, are scattered by their hands upon the winds of heaven. Not only does the anti-slavery cause receive their sympathy, but also the Bible, the missionary, and temperance causes, all are promoted by them.—Likewise the little children share their benevolence. Mrs. Richardson is at this moment busy in sending out letters for the appointment of meetings.

To-day I have had the pleasure of addressing two schools—viz: the Union and the Jubilee. Both were extremely interesting, and the scholars of the latter kindly invited me to come again. I was struck with their strict attention, and their deep sympathy—but it was all accounted for, (slaves!)

when I learned that their kind teachers, and their patrons make it a point to tell of the sorrows and the wrongs of my poor brethren.

Your friend,
HENRY HIGHLAND GARNET.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, TENTH MONTH 1, 1850.

THE "EVENING BULLETIN," "THE FRIEND," AND THE "COMPROMISE BILLS."—While the Fugitive Slave Bill, which has become a law, was pending in the House of Representatives, the Evening Bulletin, a newspaper of this city, thus urged its passage:

"So long as we remain members of this confederacy, and property in slaves is acknowledged by the Constitution, so long ought we to deliver up, without a quibble, all negroes who are fugitives from labor. The bill which has just passed the Senate, provides an effectual method of determining who are, and who are not runaway slaves. There need be no fear, as the abolitionists affect to believe, that any free colored man will ever be consigned to bondage under this bill. The aversion to slavery is so great in the North, that, even in the Commissioners' Court, there will be more danger of slaves getting off, than of freemen being surrendered to captivity. In fact, so hostile is public sentiment here to slavery, that the most stringent measures have become necessary in order to secure justice to the master. It is because the fugitive bill is stringent that we advocate it. Under different circumstances we should favor a different law. But, at present, we see no other way to carry out, in good faith, the provisions of the Constitution; and, therefore, we strenuously urge the speedy passage of the bill."

A few days since, this newspaper contained the following article:

"The 'Friend,' the organ, we believe, of the Orthodox Quakers (so called) has the following language in reference to the passage of the compromise bills: 'However the sacrifices made may be regretted in themselves, no true lover of his country can otherwise than rejoice, if thereby the inestimable blessings of Peace, Union and Harmony shall have been secured.' These sentiments, let it be recollected, are those of the great body of a sect eminently distinguished for its practical benevolence, unswerving love of justice, and constant testimony against the holding of slaves!"

If we had not known that the Bulletin, in the exercise of the "milder and more conciliating spirit," which "The Friend" approvingly says has prevailed in Congress, had zealously advocated the Fugitive Slave Bill, and the abandonment of the Wilmot Proviso, we might have supposed that, by affixing a note of admiration, the writer of the above remark intended a bitter, ironical censure on a paper which professes to be the special defender of the faith, and guardian of the testimonies of the Society of Friends. In another part of the article from which the Bulletin quotes, the editor of The Friend refers to "the progress of declension," which, he asserts, "has in one or another portion of our religious society, weakened and undermined," "important doctrines, or long established rules," and then declares, "it is the privilege, and no less the duty of religiously concerned members, freely and fearlessly to express their convictions on these subjects." Having had an opportunity of observing something of the "progress of declension" amongst Friends, in respect to their anti-slavery principles and practices, we do not doubt that many of them hold the sentiments expressed by The Friend in reference to the passage of the "Compromise Bills;" but if we had to believe that such sentiments are held by the "great body," we freely and fearlessly express our conviction, that it would be our duty at once to renounce our membership in a Society which had abjured its fundamental principles, and returned to the "beggary elements" of compromise and expediency. Under existing circumstances, as a public journalist and a member of the Society of Friends, we feel bound to express our disapprobation of the general tenor of the sentiments of the editorial article alluded to, contained in The Friend, No. 52, dated Ninth month 15th, 1850, which we quote as follows:

"The year which is now closing upon 'The Friend' has been unusually eventful. The death of our upright chief magistrate, the closing years of whose life proved that his countrymen were not mistaken in attributing to him great talents for the administration of affairs, and equal firmness of purpose and integrity of character, threw a gloom over the whole land. That gloom was heightened by the critical situation of the country—the threats of disunion and separation—the bitter feuds of extreme partisans and ambitious demagogues in Congress—and the violent exhibitions of certain parties in the Southern sections of the Union. After a long and obstinate struggle, a milder and more conciliating spirit has prevailed; and, however the sacrifices made may be regretted in themselves, no true lover of his country can otherwise than rejoice, if thereby the inestimable blessings of Peace and Union and Harmony shall have been secured."

That the "closing years" of the late President proved his ability, through long experience, to command an army on the bloody field of battle, may be admitted; but we think it would be difficult to specify the instances in which, during the few months of his Presidential career, he exhibited "great talents" in the administration of civil affairs. While we feel no disposition to detract from whatever credit may be justly due to him for some of his public acts, and would reverently leave the decision of his uprightness and integrity to Him who "shall judge the people righteously," we cannot but believe that to endorse a man who, during his life, was an oppressor of the poor, and a destroyer of his fellow men, is not quite consistent with the character of a Journal which professes to represent the peaceable principles of the Society of Friends. It is well known, too, that General Taylor was not selected as a candidate for the office of President on account of a belief that he possessed talents eminently fitting him for the position of Chief Magistrate; but that it was from his availability as a successful and popular military hero. Even Daniel Webster, a leader of the Whig party, declared that the nomination was one "not fit to be made."

But who were the "extreme partisans and ambitious demagogues in Congress" between whom "bitter feuds" existed? These terms sound harsh when applied to Seward, Hale, Chase, Durkee, Giddings, Julian, Stevens, Preston King, Horace Mann and others, who, in consonance with at least one Memorial from a representative body of the Society of Friends, stood faithfully for the cause of liberty, justice and humanity; and yet these are the men for whom the epithet "extreme partisans" must have been intended, as they formed a party in the so-called "bitter feuds."

The Friend further says: "After a long and obstinate struggle, a milder and more conciliating spirit has prevailed," &c. What was the occasion of this struggle? On the one hand there were persevering efforts to open, for the extension of slavery, vast territories now free; to shut out a State from the Union because her Constitution prohibited slavery, and to enact a fugitive slave bill, in violation not only of the fundamental principles of christianity, but even of the humane precepts of the Mosaic dispensation. These efforts were opposed on the other hand, and hence the "long and obstinate struggle;" the imputed obstinacy being, of course, on the part of those who steadfastly maintained the right. But, continues The Friend, "a milder and more conciliating spirit has prevailed; and however the sacrifices made may be regretted in themselves, no true lover of his country can otherwise than rejoice, if thereby the inestimable blessings of Peace and Union and Harmony shall have been secured."

To understand the force of these expressions, we must inquire into the character of the measures which have been adopted by Congress—the results of the spirit which has "prevailed."

By the Texas Boundary Bill, tens of thousands of square miles of territory, to which that State had scarcely the shadow of a claim, have been directly yielded to slavery, and ten millions of dollars appropriated for the purpose of satisfying the arrogant demands of the slave-holding power.

By the New Mexico and Utah Territorial Bills, immense territories, in which slavery had been abolished by Mexican law, have been again opened to the introduction of that wicked system, with an express provision that if New Mexico and Utah shall hereafter make application to be received into the Union as Slave States, they shall be admitted.

By the Fugitive Slave Law, fearful sacrifices have been made to the demon of slavery, and "all good citizens" are rendered liable to the infliction of imprisonment, and heavy fines and damages, if they "hide the outcasts and betray not him that wandereth" from the cruel captivity of man towards the liberty which is the gift of God; or if they prefer to seek the glorious reward—"Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world," rather than incur the awful condemnation—"Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." Such are the sacrifices over which, we are assured, no true lover of his country can do otherwise than rejoice, if they secure Peace, Union, and Harmony! What is this but to tell us that "the end justifies the means," and that no matter to what extent the laws which have been enacted violate the Divine laws of Truth, Justice, and Religion, and however they may be regretted in themselves, yet we must rejoice if, peradventure, certain blessings are thereby secured! Is this Quaker doctrine? Was it on the principle here avowed that "Fox, and Penn, and Penn-

nington" acted, when they braved the persecutions of their enemies, and suffered cruel imprisonments for refusing to live in "Peace, and Union, and Harmony" with a corrupt church and an unchristian government?

The recent triumphs of the slave-holding power at Washington, and the extraordinary re-action amongst almost every class in the North in favor of compromising—of which the article under notice is a striking and lamentable instance—impress us with a deep sense of the necessity of every friend of the slave—every true lover of his country—standing firmly on the first principles of emancipation, and showing by their lives, as well as by their words, that they are laboring sincerely and religiously for the abolition of slavery. "Touch not, taste not, handle not" the fruits of the "accursed thing."

ANNUAL MEETING AND REPORT OF THE OHIO FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS.—Under the head of Associated Action, our readers may find an account of the recent annual meeting of Friend's Free Produce Association in Ohio, together with the report of the managers. A friend who was at the meeting informs us that, notwithstanding the difficulty of assembling in the country at an evening meeting, upwards of 200 were in attendance. The progress in Ohio of the testimony against the use of the products of slavery is particularly encouraging. Four years since, about a dozen Friends—the Editor of this paper being one of them—met at Mount Pleasant, under circumstances of great discouragement, to form the Association which can now make the satisfactory Report presented in this paper.

It is true there are many Friends in Ohio who are not prepared to unite in the support of this testimony, and we have heard with regret that a proposition to hold the annual meeting in the meeting house at Mount Pleasant, after a long discussion in the Yearly Meeting, was not united with; yet this circumstance should only induce patient labor and persevering faithfulness. We were pleased to find that Benjamin Seebohm and John Candler from England, Nathan C. Hoag from Vermont, Cornelius Douglass from Indiana, and other friends from various places, took an active and encouraging part in the proceedings of the Association.

THE LIBERTY ALMANAC FOR 1851.—The American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society have published their Almanac for the ensuing year. It contains a selection of 21 pages of useful and interesting matter with special reference to the great question of Slavery at the present juncture. The paper is finer than usual, the printing is handsome, and there are well executed wood engravings.

It is suggested that the friends of the cause throughout the country make arrangements with merchants about to visit New York, to have a few hundred Almanacs packed with their goods, thus making the cost of transportation very small. The prices are, $20 for 1000 copies; $2.50, for 100 copies; 40 cts. for one dozen copies, and five cts. for a single copy.

Orders, enclosing payment in bank notes or post office stamps, may be addressed to Wm. Harned, Agent, No. 61 John street, New York city.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE PENNSYLVANIA ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.—The 15th Annual Meeting of this Society will be held in the Horticultural Hall at Westchester, commencing the 15th of this month at 10 o'clock, A. M. and continuing in session probably, three days.

The desperate efforts now being made to extend Slavery into new regions, and to secure for it additional safeguards where it now exists; the passage of the Fugitive Slave law and other triumphs of the slave-holding power, together with the abandonment of the Wilmot Proviso, are justly represented by the Executive Committee as imperatively calling upon the friends of the anti-slavery cause to assemble together with earnest hearts and ready hands to enquire what their obligations are.

It seems to us that the results of the protracted contest in the late Congress, may almost be considered as a disastrous conclusion to a crusade of eighteen years against slavery; and that now is the time for every abolitionist in the country to remove the warfare—first, proving his armour and going forth with clean hands. "The righteous also shall hold on his way, and he that hath clean hands, shall be stronger and stronger."

CALIFORNIA, NEW MEXICO, UTAH, AND THE TEXAS BOUNDARY.—California has been admitted into the Union as a State with her Free Constitution and the boundaries as described in it; and her Senators and Representatives have taken their seats in Congress.

New Mexico is organized into a regular Territory including, East of the Rio Grande, such portion of the territory acquired from Mexico as lies North of the boundaries of Texas, fixed by the recent Boundary Bill, and all of the said territory lying West of said river to the Rocky Mountains.

Utah is also organized as a territory, comprising the country between New Mexico and California, which includes the Great Central Basin and the Salt Lake region where the Mormons have formed their settlement.

Slavery is not prohibited in New Mexico and Utah, and they are to be admitted into the Union as States, with or without Slavery.

The Texas Boundary Bill fixes the northern boundary of that State on the parallel of 36 deg. 30 min. north latitude extending three degrees of longitude, westward from the point where this parallel is intersected by the meridian of 100 deg. west from Greenwich; thence the boundary runs due south to the 32nd deg. of north latitude; thence on the said parallel of 32 deg. westward to the Rio Grande, and thence with the channel of said river to the Gulf of Mexico.

Texas is to receive ten millions of dollars in five per cent bonds of the United States, five millions of which are made applicable, specifically, to the payment of the public debt of Texas.

LETTER FROM H. H. GARNET—FIRST PUBLIC ANTI-SLAVERY MEETINGS IN GERMANY.—We have much pleasure in presenting our readers with a letter from our friend Henry H. Garnet; who, it appears, after attending the Peace Convention and two antislavery meetings at Frankfort, had returned to England and was the guest of our valued friends, Henry and Anna H. Richardson at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. He was about to enter on his labors in England, Scotland, and Ireland. The last number of the London Anti-Slavery Reporter, after introducing extracts from the Annual Report of the New York Free Produce Association of Friends, says: "In connection with this subject, we have the pleasure to announce that Mr. Henry H. Garnet, who has been advocating the Free-Labor movement in the United States, has arrived in this country to pursue the same class of labor here. Mr. Garnet is of African origin, a fugitive from slavery, and an able and respected minister of the Gospel. On his return from the Peace Congress at Frankfort, it is expected he will lecture, under the sanction of some leading abolitionists of this country, whenever an opportunity may be afforded him. We cordially wish him success."

We refer with great satisfaction to the interesting fact that two anti-slavery meetings were held in Frankfort, and that at this first presentation of the subject to the people of Germany the duty of the friends of emancipation was clearly set forth. We are informed by another correspondent that in addition to the remarks of Mr. Heider, chief magistrate of Frankfort, and Joseph Sturge, M. Suringer of Amsterdam also expressed his warm adherence to the Free-labor cause. We hope to hear frequently from H. H. Garnet, and intend to keep our readers informed of the progress of his mission.

HENRY G. CHAPMAN.—A friend has placed in our hands the following notice of the life and death of Henry G. Chapman, published nearly eight years since in the Liberator. We know nothing of his character apart from this interesting sketch; but we believe the anti-slavery cause would not be in its present low condition, if every abolitionist could say with him: "one of the first things I did when I became an abolitionist, was to give up my trade in cotton." Let all the professed opponents of slavery imitate this noble example, and extend the principle to all the staples of slave-labor product, and we would soon hear no more of the triumphs of the slave-holding power.

"Our beloved brother, Henry G. Chapman, has ended his pilgrimage, and begun his life. He passed away, from his residence in Boston, on Monday, the 3d of October, 1842, at the age of 38. It was generally known to the friends of the anti-slavery cause, that he has, for the last two years, been afflicted with pulmonary consumption, for the relief of which he has twice sought the more genial climate of Haiti. During this long, anxious period of alternating hope and fear, his admirable wife devoted herself to him with patience that never wearied, and tenderness without limit. We know her strong and serene character too well, to doubt that she will bear his loss with fortitude; but she will feel it deeply. Of his father, we hardly dare speak. The tears are gushing, while we think of that kind, bereaved old man. Strengthen him, oh Father of mercies! strengthen him with the remembrance that his beloved ones stand waiting for him in brightness on the other shore.

"The world heard little of Henry G. Chapman, for he was a quiet, reserved man, more earnest to live the true life, than to talk thereof. Truthful and conscientious in an eminent degree, he would never consent to exchange any counterfeit coin; not even when it was stamped with the signs of fashion or popularity. He was an early and constant friend of temperance, and gave offence to college companions by the disuse of wine, at a period when almost no one in his rank of life had the courage thus to incur the charge of meanness, for conscience sake. The same moral heroism, and honesty of purpose, led him to espouse the anti-slavery cause in the days of its greatest persecution. His fashionable friends had gradually cooled off under the manifestation of his temperance principles; but when he sealed notes to them with a kneeling slave, they exclaimed, 'This is too much;' and forthwith turned their backs upon him. At the time of the 'gentlemen's mob,' in 1835, a merchant of Boston threatened to inform Mr. Chapman's southern customers that he was among the foremost fanatics. 'I thank you for your friendly intentions,' replied he; 'but your intimation of loss in business comes too late to be of use to me. One of the first things I did, when I became an abolitionist was to give up my trade in cotton.'

"That one circumstance indicates the character of the man. With him, to see the right was to do it. In all this progress of enlightened conscience, he was cordially sustained by his venerable father. Though old, he easily parted with the prejudices of education and habit, and though nurtured in the midst of commercial and aristocratic influences, he did not forget that he was the almoner of God. Few know how largely the anti-slavery cause is indebted to him; for he loves to do good in secret. Henry was his only son; the stay and staff of his old age. The life of such a son is the best consolation that can be offered, when he passes out of sight, for a season, through the gate of evergreens which men call Death."

THE DISTRICT SLAVE TRADE BILL.—The first section of this bill, which has been passed by Congress, enacts that from and after the first day of the year 1851, it shall not be lawful to bring into the District of Columbia, any slave whatever, for the purpose of being sold, or of being placed in depot, to be subsequently transferred to any other State or place to be sold as merchandise. And any slave taken into the District by 'its owner,' or by the authority or consent of 'its owner,' contrary to the provisions of this act, shall become free.

The second section empowers the corporation of Washington and Georgetown, and the levy court of Washington Co., to break up and abolish any depot or place of confinement of slaves, taken into the District as merchandize. This law has been erroneously regarded as a concession on the part of the South, but it is nothing more than the application to the District of a law which has long existed in Maryland. There is no prohibition of the sale of slaves now in the District. It is simply the removal of the slave-pens from Washington to Alexandria. The latter city which is no longer in the District, has been heretofore the place of shipment for slaves sold in Washington.

A Washington correspondent of a Philadelphia newspaper, in speaking of the passage of this law, thus betrays the motives and feelings of some of its Southern and Northern friends:—

"Thus the final stroke has been given to another feature of this sectional reform, which has deprived the propaganda South, and the abolitionists North, of their only reasonable and partially excusable hobby of discontent. There is no longer an intermediate source of disquietude. If the war is to rage hereafter, it must depend solely upon the bitter extremes of abolitionism and Southern resistance. Free Soilism, per se, is dead, buried, and its requiem chanted. If it awakes at all, it must be in echoes, proceeding from the Garrison school; and it will be for the great masses of the people meanwhile to say, how far they will permit themselves to be led by it. Let us frown down the Seward and Garrison faction, and by this means not only disappoint the propaganda, but preserve intact an Union which has thrice escaped the perils of a civil conflict."

"The new York Evening Post, taking its cue from Mr. Seward, says the District bill is but the commencement of the good work. Does it know that its incendiary paragraphs are reprinted here, and circulated by letter throughout the entire South, as the expression of a leading northern paper? Such is the fact however. And in this manner, the whole people of the Free States are made amenable for the conduct and sentiments of a single journal."

SETTLEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE IN MICHIGAN.—We are indebted to a valued correspondent, from whom we would be glad to hear more frequently, for the following gratifying intelligence.

"I noticed the following statement in the Michigan Farmer, by the Editor, which may perhaps be interesting to the readers of the Non Slaveholder. After giving an account of the extensive farming operations of George Redfield, sixteen miles east of Niles, on the St. Josephs, Michigan, he says, 'some ten miles to the north of his farm, Mr. Redfield has a colony of blacks, consisting of some seventy families, whom he has settled upon a tract of timber land. He has also quite a number of white families upon his land in that neighborhood. The colony of blacks are altogether ahead of them, being far more moral and industrious in their habits, and prompt in their payments for their land, which were made as fast as they became due. They were from the state of Ohio.'

W. L. CHAPLIN.—We take the following from the Pa. Freeman.—The friends of Mr. Chaplin having furnished the required sureties, ($6,000) he was admitted to bail in Washington by Judge Cranch, on Thursday the 19th inst., though every effort was made by the slave party to delay and embarrass the proceeding, that time might be given to their minions in Maryland to defeat his hope of bail there. He was immediately delivered over to the Maryland authorities on the requisition of the Governor, and conveyed to Rockville, the county town of Montgomery. Arrangements had been previously made for Mr. Chaplin's release, the magistrate having agreed to admit him to bail and the sum required ($1,000) being deposited in the hands of a respectable merchant, who had consented to stand his surety. But both the merchant and magistrate were over-awed by the mob, and receded from their engagements, and Mr. Chaplin was committed to the wretched jail of the county, where he must await his trial on charge of assault and battery, with intent to kill.

THE "CHAPLIN FUND."—A circular has been issued by "The Chaplin Fund Committee" earnestly appealing for pecuniary aid to defray the expenses connected with the defence of William L. Chaplin. The charges against him are, first, with having assisted certain enslaved fellow men in their attempt to escape from bondage; and secondly with an assault upon those who arrested him, with an intent to kill them. "Now be it known to all men," says the circular, "that he did not commit the second offence. At the time of his seizure he had no weapon of violence about his person, nor does he ever wear any; neither did he know any of his companions were armed; much less did he counsel them to make resistance. All this we know and do affirm. He was ignorant too of the persons who seized him. No warrant for his arrest was announced.

A band of men, like ruffians, in the darkness of the night came upon him, on the highway, and the first salutation he received was a savage yell, and a blow that felled him senseless to the earth. When he recovered from the shock, he was in the hands of four stout men, and therefore powerless.

The other charge, that he helped men in their attempt to escape from slavery, if true, should fix upon his good name the stigma of no crime, unless it be a crime to act in obedience to the command of Christ, to follow the example of the good Samaritan."

Gerrit Smith, Peterboro, N. Y., is treasurer of the fund, and donations of money may be sent to him or to William Harned, 61 John St. New York; also to any of the committee, of whom we may mention Wm R. Smith, Macedon, N. Y. G. W. Johnson, Buffalo, N. Y.; J. R. Giddings, Ashtabula, Ohio; S. P. Chase, Cincinnati, Ohio; Francis Jackson, Boston; J. G. Whittier, Amesbury, Mass.; Silas Cornell, Providence, R. I.; E. M. Davis and C. D. Cleveland, Phila.; and Samuel Fessenden, Portland, Maine.

"Memoir, Letters and Poems of Bernard Barton. Edited by his daughter. Philadelphia, LINDSAY & BLAKISTON, 1850."—We have received a copy of this work from the publishers and wished to give it a more extended notice than is practicable at present. It forms a handsome volume of 405 pages, of which the Memoir occupies 30, the Letters 149, and the Poems 214. To those who are acquainted with the character of Bernard Barton's poems, and to all who are fond of poetry, principally religious, the publication must be especially welcome. We cannot, however, but regret that this selection contains only one of his anti-slavery poems—that addressed "to a pious slave-owner":—

"Wouldst thou before the altar place thy gift,
Thou who canst hold thy fellow-creature slave,
First from his neck the yoke of bondage lift,
And then of God and him, forgiveness crave."

Till this be done, the word of holy writ,
The folly of thy offering implies;
Oh! read, mark, learn, and duly ponder it,
"I will have mercy, and not sacrifice."

The work is for sale by the publishers at the N. W. corner of Chestnut and Fourth streets, Philadelphia.

SELECTIONS.

PEACE CONGRESS AT FRANKFORT.

Frankfort, August 22, 1850.—The first meeting of the Peace Congress has just been held in the celebrated St. Paul's Church in this city, with an enthusiasm and clat exceeding, if possible, that which marked the previous demonstrations of a similar character in Brussels and in Paris, in 1848 and 1849.

St. Paul's Church is an immense circular building, which has been used for the sittings of the first reformed German Parliament. The centre of the building was appropriated to the members of the Foreign delegation, and to the German members of the Congress; the galleries, both on the ground-floor and above, being devoted to the accommodation of the visitors, among whom was a large number of ladies.

The business of the Congress commenced at ten o'clock A. M. M. Jaub, ex-minister of Darmstadt, being unanimously elected President. The first resolution submitted to the Congress was to the following effect:—1. The Congress of the friends of universal peace, assembled at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, the 22d, 23d, and 24th of August, 1850, acknowledges that "recourse to arms being condemned alike by religion, morality, reason, and humanity, it is the duty of all men to adopt measures calculated to abolish war; and the Congress recommends all its members to labour in their respective countries, by means of a better education of youth, by the pulpit, the platform, and the press, as well as by other practical methods, to eradicate those hereditary hatreds and political and commercial prejudices, which have been so generally the cause of disastrous wars."

The following members of the Congress spoke in support of this resolution, which was carried by the unanimous vote of the assembly: JOHN BUNNETT, le Pasteur BONNETT of Paris, M. COMEIRIN of Paris, H. H. GARNETT of New York (whose appearance—his being of pure negro blood—excited considerable sensation and interest,) M. EMILE DE GIRARDIN of Paris.

The second resolution, which was as follows, was presented in a speech of great power, by M.

Visschers of Brussels:—1. "This Congress is of opinion that one of the most effectual means of preserving peace, would be for Governments to refer to arbitration all those differences between them, which cannot be otherwise amicably adjusted."

This was supported by M. BACH of Darmstadt, M. MOURCH of Frankfurt, M. EMILE DE GIRARDIN (this gentleman rising to reply to some difficulties which had been suggested in the practical application of arbitration,) PROFESSOR CLEVELAND of the United States, and RICHARD COBDEN M. P., who said—

"It was not his intention to have spoken that day, but he must say a word or two on the supposed difficulties of arbitration. No doubt there were difficulties, but were there not difficulties in war too? and what he wished to put before the diplomatists of Europe and America, was, which of these difficulties will you choose—War or Arbitration? One of them it must be, for you confess that neither your diplomacy nor your mediation enable you to settle your quarrels, generally about some point of etiquette, or some trumpery debt of a few thousands of pounds. What he wanted was, that if ever the people of England or America saw their Governments again involved in a quarrel with some weaker power, whether on the shores of Portugal or Greece, and refusing the offer made by such a power to settle the dispute by arbitration, but resorting to the sword to enforce their demands, then he did hope that the people would drive such Governments from power, and supply their places with men who would do their work in a more workmanlike manner. He alluded to the progress which the Peace cause had made during the past year, and said that two remarkable illustrations of this progress had occurred in the last Peace meeting which he had attended in London, and in the meeting which he was then addressing in Frankfurt. At the meeting in London, he sat side by side with General Klapka, the general who had unsuccessfully fought the battles of liberty in Hungary; and at the meeting of the present Congress at Frankfurt, no less a person than General Haynau had for some time occupied a place among the visitors (General Haynau had left the hall before R. Cobden rose to speak). He thought it very significant, when they found at their meetings such men as the military leaders both of liberty and despotism. It incites in these men's minds something like the dawn of a suspicion, that their own profession was not of the most stable and satisfactory character."

The attendance at the Congress is very large, about 500 came over in the steamboat and special train from England. There are a considerable number of delegates from the United States, and several men of influence from France, Belgium, and other countries. There must have been at least 2000 persons present during the sitting.

Frankfort, August 23.—The second sitting of the Congress has taken place to-day, and the crowded state of the galleries appropriated to the accommodation of the public, afforded convincing proof of the interest which the people of Frankfort take in the discussions of the friends of peace. The Committee have been obliged to restrain the issue of tickets, so inadequate has even the vast space of St. Paul's Church proved, to accommodate all those who have applied for permission to attend the sittings of the Congress; thus far, not a single incident has occurred to interrupt the perfect harmony and unanimity of the proceedings. Several military officers in regimentals, have attended the meetings both yesterday and to-day; indeed all classes of the population have eagerly sought admission to St. Paul's Church.

The meeting was opened this morning by Charles Hindley, M. P., who moved the third resolution—"That the standing armaments with which the Governments of Europe menace one another, impose intolerable burdens, and inflict grievous moral and social evils upon their respective communities; this Congress cannot, therefore, too earnestly call the attention of Governments to the necessity of entering on a system of international disarmament; without prejudice to such measures as may be considered necessary for the maintenance of the security of the citizens, and the internal tranquillity of each state."

He was followed by Dr. Stein, a Jewish Rabbi, who delivered a most eloquent speech in the German language, which elicited enthusiastic applause. J. Garnier, of Paris, Secretary of the Society of Economists in France, then spoke, dealing with great force and clearness with the statistics of the resolution, and combating the objections raised against its practicability.

After a short speech from Dr. Ballard, of the United States, M. Emile de Girardin ascended the tribune amid loud and long-continued applause. He spoke at length, and with great power, upon the several topics embodied in the resolution. He met the charge of Utopianism, which was directed against the Peace movement, by preferring a counter charge against war as being a far greater Utopia, one by which millions were annually expended by the nations of Europe for the purposes of mutual destruction, and to foster national hatreds and jealousies.

He was succeeded by George Dawson, of Birmingham, who commenced by observing upon the appropriateness of holding such a Congress in Germany, the birthplace of many great principles, and especially in Frankfort, in the neighborhood of which the mighty art of printing had been discovered. Whenever war should die, it would leave at least one valuable legacy to mankind. It would show what might be done by skilful organization, and men would, by and by, be wise enough to bestow, at any rate, half the cost and labour, in well-organized efforts to subjugate the bogs and waste lands of Great Britain, especially of Ireland, that they now bestow in pipe-playing and drilling soldiers.

Professor Hitchcock, of America, spoke briefly; and after a short adjournment, R. Cobden, M. P., was called to the tribune. His appearance was hailed by repeated bursts of applause; and great excitement was apparent among the foreigners present to obtain a sight of the champion of Free Trade. He commenced by saying that much had been said about war. It was now necessary to speak of peace, or what was called peace, but which would be more correctly described as a state of truce. Such a state was, in some respects, more disgraceful than war itself. The follies and crimes committed during the excitements and passions of open war might be accounted for, if they could not be excused, on the plea that reason was overpowered by a temporary frenzy; but that men or governments, with peace on their lips, should continue to maintain and augment their enormous armaments, is to have nations giving themselves over to a permanent suspicion and distrust. "We may gather a lesson," he continued, "from the Red Indians of America, one of whose chiefs I see now before me as a delegate to this Congress. When war is over, the uncivilized Indian buries his hatchet, not to be disturbed again while peace exists between him and his neighbor. But England, after thirty-five years of continental peace, is still employing all the resources of science in her arsenal at Woolwich, in preparing her deadly instruments of destruction." He read some calculations forwarded to him that day, by Baron Royer, showing the ruinous consequences entailed upon the industry of Europe by pursuing the present war policy. He also quoted a remark of M. Frederic Bastiat of Paris, in a letter addressed by that gentleman to the Congress, that, "the ogre, war, costs as much for his digestion as his meals." He then alluded to the recent revolutions on the Continent, as demonstrating that great armaments were as dangerous to the stability of kings and governments, as they were to the true interests of the people.

The resolution was unanimously carried; as was a fourth, condemning all foreign loans negotiated for the purpose of furnishing to one people the means of slaughtering another.

A vote of thanks was proposed and carried to the Governments of Belgium, France, and Prussia, for the facilities afforded for the transit of the delegates through their respective countries to Frankfort; Richard Cobden remarking, that the Governments had treated the delegates as ambassadors, who were always exempted from the necessity of carrying passports, and whose baggage never underwent custom-house search.

Frankfort, August 24.—The third day's sitting was opened on Saturday morning, at ten o'clock, when several new members were announced, among whom was Professor Liebig, of Giessen, whose name was received with a round of applause. A letter was received from Professor Charles Biedermann, of Leipzig, regretting that the present state of Schleswig-Holstein would not permit him to attend the sitting. Another letter from the Archbishop of Paris was also communicated, containing a general recognition of the Christian idea which the members of the Congress are seeking to realize.

The fourth proposition of the programme, "That this Congress reiterates its strong disapprobation of all foreign loans, negotiated for the purpose of furnishing to one people the means of slaughtering another," having been adopted unanimously.

George Copway, a native North American Indian, of the Chippewa tribe, moved the fifth resolution:—

"That this Congress, acknowledging the principle of non-intervention, recognizes it to be the sole right of every state to regulate its own affairs."

He said:—When, sixteen years ago I lived with my brethren on the other side of the ocean, I never thought the time would come when I should enter a city like this to hear and speak of peace. I am the first of my people who have journeyed so far east as this. But the time will come when the great chain of brotherhood will gird the whole earth. Yesterday, as I was walking in the streets of Frankfort, I admired the splendid establishments which adorn the city. I learned that those beautiful gardens were once covered with military works. Now these fortifications have been removed, to give comfort and convenience to the peaceable; and the inhabitants now enjoy the blessings of nature, where once were seen the evil works of man. Just as one mountain is not suddenly raised above the plain but receives gradual additions, so will the people cause this union to increase in height; at first it will be a small elevation, then a hill, and then a mountain. A few years ago, and men would not have believed that the thoughts, nay, the very words of man, would soon be transmitted over plains, through mountains, and under seas, as is now done by means of the telegraph, thousands of miles in a few minutes; and shall not the great thought of peace be transmitted and succeed? Do not such lessons teach man to think nothing impracticable which is good? The instrument I am about to exhibit, Sir, is no sign of our martial tendencies; it is no sword, but the pipe of peace of the aboriginal tribes of America. The speaker here produced a long pipe, ornamented with feathers, and handing it to the President, said, "I here deliver to the President this pipe of peace in the name of my brethren in the far west. I bring you greeting from the dwellers in the Rocky Mountains, greeting to the children of the valley of the Rhine and Danube. No more shall the people groan under the burden of war; most devoutly do I believe in the coming of the time when all men will consent to live in peace." (Great applause.)

The President here signified that on account of pressure of time, each speaker would be limited to a quarter of an hour, especially as the Committee had a seventh proposition to submit.

The resolution having been unanimously adopted,

Elihu Burritt occupied the tribune, and submitted the following resolution, which was adopted:

"That this Congress recommends all the friends of Peace to prepare public opinion, in their respective countries, for the convocation of a Congress of the representatives of the various states, with a view to the formation of a code of international law."

Henry Richard then entered the tribune, and moved:

"That the thanks of this Congress be presented—

1. To the Burgomasters and Senate of Frankfort, for the hospitable readiness with which they have granted permission to the Congress to assemble in this free city.

"2. To the Frankfort Local Committee, for the admirable skill and indefatigable earnestness and activity with which they have co-operated with the English deputation in making all the necessary preparations for the Congress. And

3d. To the Lutheran Consistory, for their kindness in granting for the use of the Congress the magnificent building in which it has been our privilege to meet."

The resolutions having been carried by acclamation, the following was proposed, spoken to by MM. Cormenin and Girardin, and carried unanimously:

"That this Congress would express its disapprobation of duels between individuals no less than fightings between nations, and that any member of the Congress who shall be engaged in any duel, shall be considered as losing his right of membership by that fact."

It was also resolved—

"This Congress recommends that the next meeting of the friends of universal Peace should be held in London in 1851.

A resolution respecting the printing and circulation of a Report of the proceedings closed the Congress.

REMARKABLE COINCIDENCE.

The writer of the following statement, as is known to many of the readers of the Freeman, is the assistant or clerk in the anti-slavery office. His story is a striking one, and will be read with interest.

Anti-Slavery Office, ?

Philadelphia, Aug. 8th, 1850. }

MR. J. M. McKIM.

Dear Sir.—As you desired that I should make a statement of some of the most prominent facts in relation to the late wonderful discovery of one of my lost brothers, I submit the following brief account.

On the 2d inst., two men came into this office, one of whom I recognized, the other was an entire stranger. My acquaintance introduced the stranger to me by the name of Peter Freedman, of Alabama. The object of Peter's visit was merely referred to by my acquaintance, when Peter commenced his own story in an earnest and simple manner. Peter said that he was from Alabama. His visit here was for the purpose of seeing if he could gain some information or instruction how he might find out his people. He stated that he and an older brother had been stolen away from somewhere in this direction, 41 or 42 years ago, when he was a boy only about six years old. Since that time he had been utterly excluded from all knowledge of his parents, having never even so much as heard a word from them or any of his relatives. I enquired what course he expected to pursue in order to gain the information he wished. He replied, that it was his intention to have notices written and read throughout the colored churches of this city. I then inquired of him if he knew the names of his parents? To which he replied that his father's name was Levin and his mother's Sidney; he did not know their last names. By this time I was much surprised and interested at the remarks made by the stranger, and continued to put such questions to him as I thought would most likely throw light upon the subject. I perceived that a most wonderful story was about to be disclosed; anxious to have my impressions verified by facts that could not be contested or disproved, I inquired of him if he knew the name of no other person, except those already mentioned? He answered that he knew a white man by the name of S. G. who lived near his parents—recalled of playing with this white man's children, &c. When the name of the white man was announced, the fact was confirmed to my satisfaction, that an own dear brother whom I had never before seen was before me. There was no evading the evidence; all the names rehearsed, and the circumstances connected therewith, were familiar to me, having heard my parents speak of them frequently. Besides I could see in the face of my new found brother the likeness of my mother. My feelings were unutterable, and I was obliged to exert all my mental powers in order to conceal them. Thought after thought crowded my mind in relation to the past history of my parents, especially in conjunction with the interest felt for the two lost boys. After I had been convinced that Peter was my own brother, so sudden was the occurrence that I at once concluded to keep the whole matter to myself, until after I could get the chance of consulting with my sister, which I intended to do that evening. But after a moment's reflection my mind changed, as I could see no good reason for withholding the secret from him any longer. I was then anxious for the friend who came with Peter to leave, as I preferred to be alone when I divulged the secret of my discovery to him. I told my acquaintance that he need not wait any longer, that I would take charge of Peter, &c. At least one hour had elapsed before I revealed to my brother one word of what I had discovered. After my acquaintance left the office I took Peter and seated myself by his side, and commenced to make a brief explanation of what had been to us both a few moments before a profound mystery. I told him that I could tell him all about his kinsfolks. At this expression he seemed surprised, but not at all excited; I continued by telling him that he was an own brother of mine, and gave him the names of my parents, &c. To relate the particulars of our interview is quite unnecessary.

That you may better understand the story, I must go back and tell you what I never mentioned to you before, that my parents were once slaves. They lived in the State of Maryland, but feeling a strong desire for liberty they were not slack in taking measures to procure it. My father deliberately (as I have often heard him say) resolved that he would rather die than live a slave. By demonstrating his disposition to his owner, he was allowed the privilege of purchasing himself rather low, and by the earnings of his own hands he soon paid the sum demanded, and of course obtained his "free papers." At this time my father was only twenty-one years of age. In the mean while he was married to my mother, who was a slave. My parents had four children, and the desire of freedom rested so heavily upon the mind of my mother, that she in concert with my father concluded that their only hope of enjoying each other's society, depended altogether upon mother's making her escape. Their plans all being laid they soon found themselves in the State of New Jersey. But before mother had long enjoyed what she had so eagerly sought after, and what she prized so highly (liberty) she and all four of her children were pursued, captured and carried back to Maryland, from whence they had fled. For a while after my mother was kept confined of nights in a garret, to prevent her from making a second effort for freedom; but it was all to no purpose. Before she had been back three months she made a second flight, taking her two youngest, which were girls, and leaving her two oldest children, Levin and Peter. I shall never forget hearing mother speak of the memorable night when she last fled. She went to the bed where her two boys, Levin and Peter, were sleeping—kissed them—consigned them into the hands of God and took her departure again for a land of liberty. My mother's efforts proved successful, though at the heart rending consideration of leaving her two boys to the disposal of slaveholders. Those unfortunate boys were sold soon after my mother's escape.

All that she ever heard of them afterwards was, that they had been sold far south. I doubt not but you will be interested to know something of the early career of Levin and Peter.

Peter related to me the following circumstances in regard to himself. He recollected to have missed his mother, and wanted to go to her.

They said he should go to her—that they were going to take him and his brother to her. This deception was used in order to quiet them, of course. But instead of being placed in the hands of their mother, when at their journey's end, they were placed in the hands of a slaveholder in Kentucky. Thirteen of their youthful years were passed in Kentucky, in a manner that I have no need of describing. They were then sold into the State of Alabama, where they were subjected to the painful necessity of passing through the hands of several owners. Levin died about nineteen years ago, and was buried by his surviving brother Peter. Within the last two years Peter, through much entreaty, prevailed upon a gentleman to purchase him, with a view to let him work out his freedom. The price was $500. Through his industry and economy, by working of nights and using all possible activity in doing extra jobs by day, he managed to accumulate the whole amount required. As soon as he had accomplished the arduous task of paying the last dollar for himself, the life long wish of his heart prompted him to make enough money to defray his expenses on a tour in search of his people, for whom he felt the warmest affection; although he was so young at the time when separated from his parents as not to know even their last names. He had also endured the burthens of slavery with all its ills for forty-three long years, yet he had not yielded his hopes of seeing the land from whence he had been sold, nor of again greeting that mother who gave him birth. The distance he travelled was about 1500 miles. He arrived in this city on the first of this month, on the 2d he found his brother in the place and manner above mentioned; on the 3d he was conveyed to my mother's in New Jersey, by two of my sisters who reside here. He found his mother, five brothers and three sisters.

I shall not attempt to describe the feelings of my mother and the family on learning the fact that Peter was one of us; I will leave that for you to imagine. You are probably aware that my father has been dead for seven years. Unfortunately brother Peter has a wife and three children in slavery. He has gone back to Alabama with the earnest hope of being able to liberate his wife and children, by purchasing them, that being his only chance. His attachments to his family are so strong, that when I intimated to him—if he could not get them, I supposed he would leave them and come North—he instantly replied that he "would as soon go out of the world as not to go back and do all he could for them."

There are two very remarkable incidents connected with this development, which I must state to you before I close my letter, viz.: The name of the white man referred to, and remembered so correctly by my brother Peter, was that of his original owner, though the boys were too young to know that fact. The name of my mother had always, after her escape from slavery, been kept concealed, and she was known only by a different one, for reasons which will readily occur to you. When I glance over those wonderful circumstances connected with the history of these unfortunate brothers, I am utterly astonished. But I cannot stop now to tell you the feelings of my heart in reference to those enslaved brothers and the enslaved in general. I have already said more than I had intended; still my account seems but brief. But you are too well acquainted with slavery and its woes not to be able to judge in reference to what I have been obliged to omit.

Your obedient servant.

WM. STILL.

THE MORMONS AND THEIR CITY OF REFUGE.

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

Between four and five thousand feet above the ocean level, on the eastern rim of the Great Basin, in whose unexplored deserts the waters of the Rocky Mountains and Sierra Nevada of California are lost, an inland salt sea stretches north-westerly from latitude 40° to 42°, and between 112° and 114° of longitude. Up to the year 1843, little was really known of this vast body of water, its shapes and tributaries, as the accounts given by half-breed hunters and wandering Indians, in their visits to Fort Hall and other trading posts on the route from Missouri to Oregon, had been as vague and unsatisfactory as they were marvellous.

It was reserved for the adventurous Fremont to explore, with something like scientific accuracy, these strange regions. Following the windings of the Bear River—its principal tributary—through a wild maze of Mountains, of the vast Utah Range, on a gusty September morning he looked down upon the great object of his toilsome exploration, the Sea of the mountains. Checkered with the shadows of clouds, and broken here and there by rocky islands and mountain headlands, it stretched westerly beyond the limit of vision. The annals of modern discovery have nothing of more exciting interest than the partial exploration of this unknown sea, by the young adventurer and his companions, in a frail and ill-constructed boat of India-rubber cloth. The Indians whom they encountered had never launched a canoe upon the lake, and, as it had no apparent outlet, they imagined there was a great whirl-pool in its midst, which swallowed up its surplus waters. Our travellers were the first to visit its mysterious islands, and break with the cheerful sound of human voices its long solitude and silence.

"They were the first that ever burst Into that silent sea."

The lateness of the season rendered the stay of Fremont brief, and his explorations imperfect. After spending a night on an island in the Lake, listening to the roar of the salt-surf beating on the rocks, and making two or three day's marches along its marshy borders, and having settled the latitude and longitude, and taken some notice of the characteristics of the soil and vegetation of the valley in which it lies, he left, regretfully, this strange and interesting region, to pursue his journey to California, along the skirts of the Great Basin, and across the Snowy Sierra. For two or three years, nothing further was known of the Great Salt Lake.

In the mean time, the Mormons or Latter Day Saints, as they love to call themselves, had been expelled by mob violence from Illinois. A city of some twenty-thousand inhabitants was left untenanted; and square miles of ripened grain were abandoned to the sun and rains of autumn and snows of winter. The wretched exiles had little leisure for preparation for their long, uncertain journey into the wilderness in search of a new home, out of the reach of civilized humanity. Bearing with them their aged and infirm, their sick and dying, they passed in mournful processions through the streets of Nauvoo, and through their cornfields and orchards; the fruit of which they could no longer gather. Pausing on the swell of the last wave of prairie from whence the gilded spire of the great Temple was visible, they bade farewell forever to their homes, hearths, and altars, and then set their faces resolutely towards the setting sun:

"Some natural tears they dropped, but wiped them soon;
The world was all before them, where to choose
Their place of rest, and Providence their guide."

The last sad cavalcade left Nauvoo in the autumn of 1846. It had been preceded by several others, who had engaged to prepare the way for those who should come after. Delayed by sickness and want of the necessary vehicles and teams for their journey, and desirous to unite the numerous bands of exiles, scattered from the Mississippi to the Missouri, the early summer of 1846 found the pioneer encampment at Council Bluffs, near the Pottawattomie Indian agency.

On the hills of the "High Prairie," which here crowd upon the river, and on the broad alluvial flats below them, the tents of the modern Israel were pitched. A traveller, Thomas L. Kane, Esq. of Philadelphia, from whose graphic and brilliant "Discourse before the Pennsylvania Historical Society" we have derived many of the materials of this sketch, has described their appearance as he first reached them, on a bright June morning. Each hill was crowned with its great camp, white with canvass and alive with occupants. The smoke of a thousand cooking fires streamed lazily upwards. Herd-boys were dozing on the slopes, with sheep and oxen, cows and horses, around them, numbering many thousands. Children, almost as numerous, were playing about the camp. Women were washing clothes along a little creek; blacksmiths, tailors, and shoemakers, were busy in the open air, or under the shade of tents. Great arbors made of poles and brush, and wattled with willow and birch, served them for places of religious worship and halls of council. It was here that the famous Mormon battalion for the Mexican war was recruited. On the eve of its departure, a farewell all was got up in primitive style, under the shelter of the largest arbor. Grave Elders and Chiefs of the High Council led off the dance, which was kept up with great animation until the sun had dipped behind the sharp outline of the Omaha hills. "Then," says the writer to whom we have referred, "silence was called, and a well-cultivated mezzo-soprano voice, belonging to a young lady with fair face and dark eyes, gave, with quartette accompaniment, a little song, a version of a text touching to all earthly wanderers:

"By the rivers of Babylon we sat down and wept,
We wept when we remembered Zion!"

There was danger of some expressions of feeling when the song was over, for it had begun to rain; but, breaking the quiet with his hard voice, an Elder dismissed the gathering, and asked Heaven to bless all who, with purity of heart and brotherhood of feeling, had mingled in that society." After the departure of the battalion, the exiles moved on, organized in companies of tens, fifties, and hundreds, all under the direction of the High Council of the Church. Upon the rich but unhealthy delta between the Nebraska and the Missouri, they again pitched their tents, and waited for the straggling emigrants of their faith to overtake them. Deebated by sickness, the winter found them still in the border regions of Missouri and Iowa, where, divided into several encampments, they were enabled to sustain themselves and a considerable portion of their cattle. Early in the spring of 1847, a body of one hundred and forty picked men, with seventy wagons, started, under the direction of the members of the High Council, in search of a favorable location for a permanent settlement. They carried with them little save seed and farming tools, it being their aim to plant crops at the place selected. Crossing the South Pass, they struggled through the defiles and over the spurs of the Rocky Mountains, forcing their way over the rugged Utah range, sometimes creeping along the stony bed of torrents, and sometimes cutting their way through heavy timber. At length, in midsummer, they reached the valley of the Great Salt Lake. The High Council, after a careful survey of the country, decided that the Land of Promise had at last been reached, and that the Tabernacles of the Mormon Israel should be set up. Late as was the season, roots and seeds were planted, from which a partial harvest was obtained. They were soon joined by other detachments from the main body, and also by a part of the Mormon Battalion from California. They sowed large fields of grain for the next season, built themselves houses of sun-dried brick, artifying themselves with walls and block-houses and safely passed the winter of 1847-48. In the spring of the next year, the residue of the Nauvoo emigrants reached the valley, loaded with grain raised on the plains of their encampments on the Missouri and Nebraska. A detailed history of this remarkable Exodus would exhibit in strange alliance the shifty enterprise, practical energy, and shrewd calculation of modern utilitarianism, and the undoubted faith of the middle age, unshaken by manifest inconsistency or detected imposture; the enthusiasm of the old Crusaders and the fanaticism of Musselmen propagandists; an Oriental drama acted over in the New World, by men and women of Yankee origin, united in stout belief in a prophet-martyr who could only be properly characterized as a cross between Sam Slick and Mokanna of Khorassan. It would do more than this. It would contain the record of a persecution as cruel and remorseless as that which hunted the Huguenots from France, and the Jews from Spain, endured, for the most part, with a patient firmness and heroic persistence under circumstances of suffering and danger, which go far to reconcile liberal and generous minds to those absurdities or novelties of worship and faith, which were made the excuse of a new Christian crusade on the part of the blackleg and nomadic masculinity of the Mississippi valley. In the language of the author of the "Discourse" before us, it would tell of "a people whose industry had made them rich, expelled by lawless force from the comforts and luxuries of refined life, into the Great Wilderness, seeking an untried home, far away from the scenes which their previous life had endeared to them, moving onward, destitute, hunger-sicken, and sinking with disease, bearing with them their wives and children, the old, the poor, the decrepid; renewing daily on their march the offices of devotion, the ties of family, and friendship, and charity; sharing necessities and braving dangers together, cheerful in the midst of want and trial—of men who, menaced by famine, and in the midst of pestilence, with every energy taxed by the urgency of the hour, were building roads and bridges, laying out villages, and planting corn-fields, for the benefit of the stranger who might come after them, their kinsman only by a common humanity, or, peradventure, by a common suffering—of men who have renewed their prosperity in the homes they have found in the desert; and who, in their new-built city, walled round by mountains like a fortress, are extending pious hospitalities to the destitute emigrants from our frontier States."

As yet we can scarcely form an accurate idea of the geographical peculiarities of the new Territory. We only know that, hemmed in by successive chains of rugged mountains, and by vast unexplored deserts, it combines within its limits the most inconsistent characteristics of other countries. The climate of its mountains is more severe than that of Switzerland; descending towards the great valley, the varied climates of Italy are successively encountered. Barren salt wastes—desolate and unlighted as the shores of the Dead Sea—alternate with valleys of extraordinary fertility and beauty. Streams strongly impregnated with salt flow down from the mountains in close proximity with others of the purest and sweetest water. Hot springs, and ice-cold ones, are found in the same neighborhood. The resources of the country, in an agricultural point of view, were not overlooked by its first explorer. "The bottoms," says Fremont "are extensive, the water excellent, timber sufficient, the soil good, and well adapted to the grains and grasses of an elevated region. The lake furnishes abundant supplies of salt. All the mountain sides are covered with a valuable and nutritious grass called bunch grass, which has a second growth in the fall; its quantity will sustain any amount of cattle, and make this truly a bucolic region." On some of the best lands it appears that irrigation is necessary to secure the full advantage of the rich virgin soil. Fifty bushels of wheat may thus be raised to the acre, and in the present price current of the country, it is $4 the bushel. Proximity to the gold region secures a ready and sure market for all kinds of produce.

The city of the Salt Lake, if we may credit the statements of recent travellers, now numbers from 15000 to 20,000 inhabitants. The houses are of sun brick, generally of one story, with gardens distributed over an area as great as that of New York city, and surrounded by square miles of wheat fields. There are several other settlements, extending forty miles north and two hundred miles south of the great city.

"It is to these homes," says the author of the Discourse, "in the heart of our American Alps, like the holy people of St. Bernard, they hold out their welcome to the passing traveller. Some of you have doubtless seen in the St. Louis papers the reported votes of thanks to them of companies of emigrants to California. These are often reduced to great straits after passing Fort Laramie, and turn aside to seek the Salt Lake colony in pitiable plight of fatigue and destitution." The route from the Oregon road to the Salt Lake is one of great difficulty, over mountains, and through deep and narrow ravines. The poor struggling emigrant at length comes abruptly out the dark pass into the lighted valley of the Mormons, on a level terrace of its high table land. "No wonder if he loses his self-control here. A ravishing panoramic landscape opens out below him, blue, green, and gold, and pearl; a great sea with hilly islands, rivers, a lake, broad sheets of grassy plain, all set as in a silver-chased cup, within the mountains whose peaks of perpetual snow are furnished by a dazzling sun. It is, less these, however, than the foreground of old-country farms, with their stacks, thatchings, and stock, and the central city, swarming with its working inhabitants, and smoking from its chimneys, that tries the men of fatigue broken nerves. The Californians scream, they sing, they give three cheers, and do not count them, a few pray and more swear, some fall on their faces and cry outright."

Several hundred emigrants, in more or less distress, have, during the past year, received gratuitous relief from the Mormons, whose indomitable industry has enabled them to exercise to the fullest extent the rites of hospitality. They boast that they have no loafers, idle gentlemen, or vagabonds. Their glorious valley must be the grand central station of the future railroad which is to unite the two oceans, and to open to us the golden stream of oriental traffic by the way of California. The peculiarity of their religious faith and customs may have the effect to divert from them some of the emigration which would otherwise flow towards so inviting a region; but even this cannot essentially retard their growth. Fifty thousand of their own order in Great Britain are already preparing to join them. They have shrewd, intelligent men at the head of affairs, and are evidently losing a great deal of the fanaticism of their early time. They have a regularly organized Government, and all accounts agree in representing them as an orderly and peaceful people. The author of the "Discourse" before us, denies emphatically the charges which have been preferred against their habitual purity of life, integrity of dealing, their toleration of religious differences, their regard of law, and their devotion to constitutional government.

In the dispute now going on in respect to New Mexico and California, the Territory of Utah has been measurably forgotten. But its importance cannot be overlooked much longer. Slavery has already, like the serpent of old, stolen into the Garden of the Mountains. Senator Seward, in his late speech, stated that he had positive information that slaves are now held in Utah. Hon. P. R. Thurston, the delegate from Oregon, in his late letter to a member of the Massachusetts delegation, gives it as his opinion, that the working of slaves in Utah, under the existing circumstances of a great and increasing demand for labor, and the probability of the discovery of valuable mines, would be profitable to the masters. He is well acquainted with the country, and sees no Providential enactment of the Wilmot Proviso in its soil, climate, or "Asiatic formation." Here, then, should New Mexico and California take their places in the Union, with their respective Constitutions and boundaries, the contest will be renewed. The policy of the inhabitants, thus far, has been to blink the subject of slavery, hoping thereby to propitiate the Southern propaganda. How far this policy has been successful may be seen in the unceremonious rejection of their delegate, by a more decisive vote than that which denied a seat to the delegate from New Mexico, although the latter made no secret of his hostility to the institution of slavery, and although the anti-slavery Constitution of his constituents was on the desks of Congress, and the question of his admission was complicated with the claim of Texas. This timid, indecisive policy on the part of Utah, while it has failed to secure the favor the South, has awakened suspicion and doubt on the part of the North. No possible good can come of it. Let Utah take her stand by the side of California and New Mexico as a free state, and, like them present herself, at the door of the Union with the Declaration of Independence embodied in her Constitution. This will settle the question more effectually than twenty compromise bills. It would not be possible for the ultra slave faction to resist the united will of the inhabitants of the entire acquisition from Mexico. The three-fold cord could not be broken. Besides, it becomes the people of Utah to consider that, in their peculiar circumstances, the religious faith, for the quiet enjoyment of which they have made so many sacrifices, will be justly held responsible for their action in this matter. Toleration of slavery will not be likely to facilitate the popular recognition of their claim as Saints of the Latter Day. The condition of many of the older sects in this country, rent and divided on the question of slavery, should be an effectual warning to them to meet the evil at the outset, and exclude forever from their community an element of perpetual contest and disturbance. The time for action has fully come. A decision between freedom and slavery is pressed upon them. God grant that it may be made in accordance with sound policy and the claims of humanity.

CONVENTION OF FUGITIVE SLAVES.

This novel convention, called by the New York State Vigilance Committee, was to assemble yesterday, the 21st, in Cazenovia, N. Y., and continue through to day. We trust that the meeting has gathered a host of strong-hearted refugees from American tyranny, and of such other freemen as dare to obey God instead of the American Constitution; who dare to follow the instincts of their own hearts, and the counsels of Jesus Christ, instead of the instructions of slave-catching Senators and Reverends. We hope that a spirit has animated every heart, and given tone to all the proceedings of the Convention, which will make its voice felt throughout our country. The great struggle between Humanity and Despotism is apparently but just begun. The question is yet to be tested in this enlightened and Christian America, whether "mercy is a crime," and whether inhuman cruelty and ferocity are virtues. Our dungeons and penitentiaries are becoming peopled with the generous and intrepid men who have risked their own freedom to give liberty to the flying bondman. Christian men are seized as felons, dragged before Courts, harassed with vexatious prosecutions, and finally stripped of their property, for deeds of hospitality which an Indian savage would scorn to refuse to the meanest wretch of earth. In our nation's capital two worthy and noble men have been for worn out weary years, in the National prison, and another, a distinguished citizen of New York, has just been thrown into the same prison for extending to our "Hungarians" the sympathy and aid which would have been honored and applauded, if exhibited towards the Ujhazi, Dembinskis and Kosuths from abroad. Yet our statesmen, not satisfied with the worse than barbarian inhumanity of our present laws and practice, are demanding more severe legislation against compassion for the suffering and oppressed; denouncing and reprimanding the popular reluctance to act the part of kidnappers, as an unworthy "prejudice" which must be "conquered;" and our clergy join them, with text and commentary to prove the example of patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and Jesus himself, to be for slavery and slave catching. Never was such a convention more needed. It could not be more needed. It could not be more timely; and if conducted in the right spirit, and wise in its action, it cannot fail to exert a wide and wholesome influence in deepening sympathy for the slave, and the resolve that, spite of laws or constitutions, statesmen or priests, the fugitive slave shall never lack friends, shelter, or protection. It is time for every friend of justice and lover of right to give his testimony in unequivocal terms to the supremacy of the Eternal Law, and the individual conscience, over governments and legislatures. It is time for a voice to go forth from the Northern people, demanding the repeal of our cruel prohibitions of help to the needy.—Pa. Freeman, Aug. 20th.

A COLORED LAWYER.

"Robert Morris, Esq., of Boston, was admitted to practice in the United States Circuit Court. The recommendation of Morris by the Boston Bar was unanimous. Mr. M. is the first black man admitted to the bar in the United States, and the first lawyer of the proscribed race admitted to a Federal Court."

The above is from the Anti-Slavery Bugle. Here is a colored young man, who, by patient industry and virtuous conduct, has so far triumphed over American prejudice as to be admitted to practice at the bar of the United States Courts. Yet encouraging as is the fact just stated, this same distinguished gentleman may not even now go into the District of Columbia without being liable to be sold into slavery as a fugitive slave; nor may he claim exemption from insult from any low white ruffian who may be disposed to offer it.

A great step, however, has been gained. When colored men are found doing the same things—all the same things, that white men do, and doing them as well as white men do them, there will no longer be any prejudice against the colored man to combat.—North Star.

FIRST ARREST UNDER THE NEW SLAVE ACT.

The first arrest under the powers of the act passed on the 18th of the present month, was made this morning by Mr. Brown, one of the Deputy Marshals of the United States, who captured a fugitive slave in the neighborhood of Water and Pearl streets. When the fugitive was taken into custody, he gave a signal, upon which a large number of colored men congregated around them, and but for the precaution taken to have several policemen in readiness, an attempt would have been, doubtless, made to rescue him. Mr. Brown lifted his prisoner into a carriage, and conveyed him to the Marshal's office, where an examination will take place immediately.—Evening New York Herald.

The Journal of Commerce gives a lengthy account of the arrest and examination, but makes no mention of the above stated call for a rescue. It is no doubt, therefore, imaginary, or a gross exaggeration. The Journal says that the fugitive was a colored man named James Hamet, the slave of Mrs. Brown, of Baltimore, who ran away from her about two years since. He was arrested by the U. S. Marshal on the claim of Mrs. Brown's agent, and in a few hours afterwards was examined. Mr. Asa Child appearing to protect the rights of the slave. Mrs. Brown's son and son-in-law testified that this man was the slave of Mrs. B., left to her by the will of her husband, which was produced in evidence. Mr. Child cross examined these witnesses, but elicited nothing to contradict their testimony, and then said that he believed that all the forms of law appertaining to the case had been complied with. Mr. Gardiner, U. S. Commissioner, before whom the examination was held, then decided that the slave should be given up to the claimants' agent, and signed the necessary certificate authorizing his removal by force back to Maryland.

Mr. Clare, the slave owner's agent, then demanded that the Commissioner would, in accordance with the law, give him a sufficient force to conduct the slave back to Maryland.

Mr. Gardiner then informed him that he must make affidavit that he feared an attempt would be made to rescue the slave on his way from this State to Maryland, and that on his making such affidavit, a sufficient force would be given to prevent it.

Mr. Clare then made the necessary affidavit, and the United States Commissioner ordered the slave into the custody of the United States Marshal, with directions to him to provide a sufficient force to guard the slave on his way back. The United States Marshal immediately deputed a sufficient number of his officers for the purpose, accompanied by whom, and his owner's agent, the slave was immediately taken from the city on his way to Maryland.

THE LATE HON. DANIEL P. KING, M. C.

He was one of the "fourteen" who voted against the act of the 13th of May, 1846, recognizing the existence of war with Mexico. Upon that question he made a speech. During this speech he used the famous words that "the object desired by our country was not peace with Mexico, but a piece of Mexico." Mr. Badinger, of Virginia, on one occasion, attempted to cast obloquy upon the fourteen who voted against the war. He said they were "destined to be famous in story," and so far as his own fame and reputation were concerned, he (Mr. B.) would "rather be the poor volunteer, whose bones mouldered on the banks of the Rio Bravo, with no stone to mark his grave but the wild bird's shriek and the howling winds, than the mightiest whig or tory, who thundered forth his denunciations of the war."

Mr. King said, in reply, and the words will be read with interest at this time: "Now I am no orator, as the gentleman is; and about the manner of living or dying, and burial, there may be a difference of taste; but rather than be pierced or stabbed (perhaps in the back) by a Mexican sword or spear, or hacked by an Indian tomahawk, on that savage shore,

"At once dispatch'd,
Cut off even in the blossom of my sin,
Unhousel'd, unanointed, unaneal'd,"

I should prefer, after having enjoyed all life's blessings, and performed all life's duties, to wrap the drapery of my couch about me, and without braggart boasting or unmanly fear, await my last solemn hour. I would that my friends should drop a few natural though unavailing tears, and then that they should carry out my bier to some sequestered spot, where over-arching trees might drop their autumnal leaves; and there, if the hand of affection should ever raise a stone, let it have only this inscription: "A lover of Peace, of Liberty, and of his country—he voted against the Mexican war."

"Give me the liberty to know, to utter, and argue freely, according to conscience, above all liberties. Though the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth, so Truth can be in the field, we do injuriously, by licensing and prohibiting, to misdoubt her strength. Let Her and Falsehood grapple; who ever knew Truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter."—Milton.

THE USE OF TEARS.

BY LORD MORPETH.

Be not thy tears too harshly chid,
Repine not at the rising sigh;
Who, if they might, would always bid
The breast be still, the cheek be dry?
How little of ourselves we know
Before a grief the heart has felt!
The lessons that we learn of woe,
May brace the mind as well as melt.
The energies too stern for mirth,
The reach of thought, the strength of will,
'Mid cloud and tempest have their birth—
Through blight and blast their course fulfil.

Love's perfect triumph never crowned
The hope unchequered by a pang;
The gaudiest wreaths with thorns are bound,
And Sappho wept before she sang.
Tears at each pure emotion flow,
They wait on Pity's gentle claim,
On Admiration's fervid glow,
On Piety's seraphic flame.
'Tis only when it mourns and fears,
The loaded spirit feels forgiven;
And through the mist of falling tears,
We catch the clearest glimpse of Heaven.

THE HOUR OF PRAYER.

BY EDITH GREY.

Come to thy God! oh weary wand'rer come;
Thou who has been in many a devious way,
Far from the pleasures of thy childhood's home,
Come to thy God, and humbly kneel and pray.
Come to thy God, oh sinner, lift thy prayer,
Thou who has wandered, far from virtue's ways,
And fallen oft within temptation's snare,
While sin and folly sung their sweetest lays.
Come to your God! ye weary care-worn hearts—
Wearied with sin, and all the world's vain strife:
Come where his power, both peace and rest imparts,
Come drink the waters of Eternal life.
Come to thy God! oh bruised and bleeding heart—
Come, while the poisoned arrow rankles there;
He sees the wounds, the bitter tears that start,
He'll give thee balm, and heal thy heart's despair.
Come to your God, all ye who vainly seek
For rest, or aid, for hope, or healing balm;—
Come with pure faith, with spirits trusting, meek,
He'll hear your prayer, and all your anguish calm.
Come to thy God! thou who hast home and friends,
Who never know of suffering, want or care;
Oh for the blessings, that thy Father sends,
Kneel down and praise Him in an humble prayer!
Let us all kneel! without one doubt, or fear,
To Him, whose love hath blessed us every day;
Our fervent praises, and our prayers He'll hear,
And guide and bless us in our onward way!

COMMUNICATION.

Newcastle on Tyne, England, Oct. 12, 1850.

To the Editor of the Non-Slaverholder.

I am happy to inform you that our good cause is increasing daily in importance to the minds of the British people. The willingness which they manifest to hear the subject, has surprised even the most sanguine of our friends. No one pretends to say that we are wrong, and therefore we have only to arouse the generous feelings of the people, and convince them of the practicability of our measures, and we see them mustering into our ranks with such alacrity as to assure us that success awaits us. Very many who heretofore had placed the slave system in foreign countries far beyond their reach, are beginning to see how they may remove some of the chief pillars from the concern, and are prepared to act in consistency with their convictions. Our meetings are invariably crowded, and we have the satisfaction of seeing much spirit and determination in the formation of "Free Labor Associations," which is usually attended to in meetings more private and social. Already with four weeks labor we have formed eight flourishing Associations, which are connected with the Ladies' New Castle Anti-Slavery Society.

The following is a brief statement of our movements:

Sept. 13. We commenced our Anti-Slavery campaign. The first meeting was held at Wallsend. It was well attended, and our cause was warmly received.

14th. At 2 o'clock I addressed a large concourse of children at Tuthill Stairs, Baptist chapel, New Castle, and impressed upon the minds of my little hearers, the condition and claims of the slave children of America.

16th. A large and spirited meeting was held in the evening at Gateshead. Rev. Mr. Anderson presided—the large school belonging to the Methodist chapel was crowded.

17th. Went to South Shields, called the "Heart of Old England." We were welcomed to the house of Thomas Scott, a gentleman much devoted to our cause. The meeting was held in the Wesleyan chapel, the largest house in town. Robert Ingham, Esq., ex. M. P. presided, and made an able address. Mr. Ingham is one of the most popular and beloved gentlemen in this part in the country. The church was filled to overflowing, and we were informed that many were compelled to leave the doors, not being able to gain admittance. It is estimated that more than 1200 were present. Mr. Wm. Harper did much towards the meeting. He is a ship owner, but will not employ his vessels in any way that will promote slavery. The venerable Dr. Winterbottom could not attend the meeting, but sent word that "he had a black man's heart"—the precise language used by the venerated friend of the oppressed, Gerrit Smith Esq.

18th. Attended a private meeting at 11 o'clock, at the Wesleyan chapel, and formed a large and influential Association. At 3 P. M. joined a "Tea Party" at Rev. Mr. Pottenger's Baptist chapel, in Tuthill near New Castle. It was an Anti-Slavery gathering—and all the delicacies were free labor of course. The meeting was in every way cheering and grateful to the hearts of the friends of the cause.

19th. Spent a part of the day with Jonathan Priestman, an esteemed minister of the Friends' in New Castle. In the evening attended a Free Labor Tea Party, kindly given me by the Wesleyan ladies at the Blenheim street chapel; a large number of gentlemen and ladies were present. The meeting was in every way delightful. Several speeches were made after the tables were cleared.

20th. An enthusiastic meeting at North Shields. The Mayor, Capt. Linskill, took the chair, and made a warm and able speech, approving the measure. Dr. Pennington joined me here and took part in the meeting.

27th. Met a private gathering in Gateshead, at the house of Mr. Brady to form a Free Labor Association. Several high-minded and influential persons were present.

30th. At 7 o'clock, went to our meeting at Smyrna chapel in Sunderland, and found the house filled, and scores standing around the doors. We entered, and were welcomed by a hearty greeting. The Union chapel some hundred rods distant was opened to receive the surplus congregation, and it was soon filled. Both Dr. Pennington and myself spoke in each meeting. We never saw more enthusiastic meetings. The next morning a large Association was formed.

Oct. 1. Attended the second meeting at South Shields, which was even larger than the first. The Wesleyan chapel was kindly opened. The meeting was full to overflowing.

2d. Went to Hartlepool, and found the friends not expecting a good meeting, but was agreeably disappointed. Next morning a good Association was formed.

3d. Held a meeting at Friends' meetinghouse at Stockton. The house though large was crowded. There we also formed an Association.

4th. Spoke at Middlesburgh in the Town Hall. The house could not hold the people who desired to hear. The next day we saw a good society started.

8th. We reached the beautiful town of Darlington. This place has several of the most "stately homes of England." The residences of several "Friends" are lovely beyond description. I would mention those of the Peases and Backhouses. We had a warm and cordial reception, and really our hearts were cheered to see those whose opulence and distinguished names give them so much influence joining in this infant Reformation with such spirit. Our meeting was held in the Central Hall, which was quite full. An association was formed the next day.

10th. Attended another meeting at Blagdon, which was not a whit behind the others for interest.

In most of these meetings at which associations were formed, we were aided by our friend A. H. Richardson. The demand for free labor articles is increasing daily. Help us, dear friends in America, to satisfy that demand.

H. H. GARNET.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, ELEVENTH MONTH 1, 1850.

"YEARLY MEETING HOUSE," MOUNT PLEASANT, OHIO.—In a notice of the Annual meeting of the Ohio Free Produce Association of Friends, last month, we alluded to the fact that a proposition to hold it in the Meeting house at Mount Pleasant was not united with, after a long discussion in the Yearly Meeting. An article, headed "Yearly Meeting House," and signed "A Member of O. Y. meeting," has since appeared in The Friend, intended as a justification of those who closed the doors of the meeting house against their fellow members. The writer says:—"The use of the Yearly Meeting house at Mount Pleasant, Ohio, for the purpose of holding a meeting of the Free Labor Produce Association, though composed of members of our religious society, was objected to by a number of Friends, because it was not strictly of a religious character; for if such were its bearing, it ought to be the concern of the body at large; and not detached portions of the Society to act separately from the body; and as the Yearly Meeting was asked for it, these viewed the granting leave as an encouragement of such action."

It seems to us an extraordinary assumption—at once unjust and groundless—that the Association of Friends alluded to, is not strictly of a religious character. We have always believed the Association to be founded on that testimony against slavery, which is recognised as religious in the discipline of Ohio Yearly Meeting; and we presume every member of the Association believes he is acting on religious grounds and motives. John Woolman refrained from the use of the products of slave-labor, under a deep conviction that it was wrong to partake in the "gains of oppression;" and from his day down to the present time, there has been a succession of the most eminent and worthy as well as obscure members of the Society of Friends who have adopted the same principle. It has also been recognised as a religious concern by the "body at large." In the year 1844, the Yearly Meeting of New York referred the subject of trafficking in and using articles produced by the labor of slaves, to the attention of the Meeting for Sufferings; and this body prepared a minute which was adopted by the Yearly Meeting in 1845 and sent to the subordinate meetings, exhibiting in a most lucid and convincing manner the religious duty of avoiding such traffic and use. In New England Yearly Meeting, the present year, the subject received serious consideration, being introduced and treated as a religious concern.

To show distinctly the position of Friends' Free Produce Association in Ohio, we may quote two of its fundamental principles;—

"That abstinence from the use of the products of slavery is essential to a pure and consistent testimony against that unchristian system;" and

"That we are called to this abstinence by a two-fold consideration, first to clear our hands and our conscience from a participation in the unrighteous gains of that system of oppression, against which we profess to bear a religious testimony; and secondly, because it is a principle which, as it is embraced, must exert a potent influence on slavery itself, and ultimately remove this greater crime, with all its attendant evils and corruptions, from the earth."

It must, we think, be clear to every unprejudiced mind that the character of this Association is strictly religious; but the "member of O. Y. Meeting" says:—"If such were its bearing, it ought to be the concern of the body at large; and not detached portions of the Society to act separately from the body;" &c. We are decidedly of the opinion that the subject of abstaining from the buying, and selling, and using the fruits of slavery, ought to be the concern of Ohio Yearly Meeting, and of every other yearly meeting, as it has been that of New York; but, if it were so, we are very far from believing that it would be improper for Associations of Friends—incorrectly termed "detached portions of the Society"—to act separately from the body in accomplishing the objects of the Free Produce Association.

We have Associations of Friends to supply Bibles to those who are destitute: to furnish Tracts where they may be useful in spreading the principles of the Society; to afford the means of imparting literary instruction to the children of Friends and others, and to restore health to the minds of those who may be deprived of the use of their reason. One of the objects of the Free Produce Association is to "adopt means for obtaining a supply of such articles, the productions of free labor, as are not readily to be procured by individuals through the ordinary channels of commerce or manufactures."

All the associations above mentioned, excepting the last, hold their meetings in Friends' meeting houses, and at least two of them, we believe, meet in the house at Mount Pleasant. We are utterly unable to perceive that they are more strictly religious in their character than the Free Produce Association, and it may well be asked, why Friends should not enjoy equal privileges when they associate for the purpose of supplying themselves and others with the products of free labor, that they may not be under the necessity of providing their tables and their wardrobes with those things which are truly and emphatically the fruit of robbery and the price of blood!

It is not the least remarkable feature in the case before us, that only in Philadelphia and Mount Pleasant, has the discovery been made that Free Produce Associations of Friends are not sufficiently religious in their character to be allowed the use of the meeting houses of the society. Whether it be that in England, New England, New York, North Carolina and Indiana, the Society has become "degenerate and corrupt," "blind to the truth and unable to distinguish between thing and thing," it is certain that in all those Yearly Meetings, Friends enjoy the privilege of using their meeting houses when they associate for the purpose of adopting measures to bear a practical testimony against slavery, as well as on other occasions of promoting their religious testimonies.

If the objection advanced by "a number of Friends" against the use of the meeting house at Mount Pleasant was the real ground of their refusal, we cannot but hope that a candid re-examination of the matter will induce them to withdraw their opposition.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING. DISUSE OF SLAVE-LABOR PRODUCTS.—The accounts received from our Correspondents in Indiana, relative to the proceedings of the late Yearly Meeting of Friends in that State, are of a highly interesting and gratifying character.

The Report of the Committee on the people of color, known as the African Committee, showed a large amount of labor for their protection and improvement. We give, in another place, an account of the rescue of a colored man from slavery in Texas by the joint exertions of two branch committees.

In one of John Woolman's essays against slavery, he inquires:—"Whence is it that men who believe in a righteous, omnipotent Being, to whom all nations stand equally related and are equally accountable, remain so easy in it, but that they do not discuss this matter with that candor and freedom of thought, which the case justly calls for?" Much of the indifference existing amongst Friends and others in relation to a prevailing custom—the use of the products of slave labor—upon which depends the existence of slavery, arises, we believe, from the same neglect. It is, therefore, with no ordinary feelings of pleasure that we record the important and encouraging fact, that on the evening of the 5th ult. a large meeting was held in the meeting house, at Richmond, on the subject of the disuse of slave labor products.

At a meeting of the "African Committee" during the afternoon of the 3rd ult.—the day on which the Yearly Meeting commenced its sittings—a member remarked that he believed our testimony against slavery incomplete while we were using, indiscriminately, the proceeds of slave labor. This sentiment being approved by several others, our friend Enoch Lewis, Editor of "Friends' Review," an Elder "worthy of double honor," rose and remarked, that Friends of several other Yearly Meetings interested in this subject had found time, during the sitting of their annual assemblies, to meet together and discuss the matter, and he would be pleased if Friends of Indiana could find a time, before their Yearly Meeting concluded, to convene for a similar purpose. His suggestion was approved by a large number of Friends—the expression of unity being unusually great and without dissent—and six o'clock in the evening of the following Seventh day was agreed upon for the proposed meeting.

An assembly numbering between 1500 and 2000 persons convened at the appointed time, and at the request of the meeting, Enoch Lewis introduced the subject to be considered, beginning with a sketch of the origin and progress of the slave trade, and noticing some of the most important events connected with its history, and that of slavery, up to the present day, together with the efforts which have been made to suppress it, and its present extent and unutterable barbarity. He then showed that the whole system, from its beginning, has been sustained by the market for the productions of slave labor. Benjamin Seebohm, Nathan C. Hoag and many others addressed the meeting. It is not to be supposed that all who were present held the same views in regard to the duty of avoiding the use and consumption of the fruits of slavery, yet the proceedings were marked by entire unity and harmony of feeling.

There were probably individuals who feared disastrous results from the assembling of a large number of Friends to deliberate upon this, mis-called, "exciting subject." We think there was no real ground for their fears, for whenever any difficulty has arisen from the introduction of this subject into committees or meetings, it has been the result, we believe, of unreasonable opposition. Our beloved friend Benjamin Seebohm stated in the meeting, that having attended many of the African committees in various parts of the Yearly Meeting, when the free labor subject had been introduced, it gave him great pleasure to be able to say that he had never on a single occasion heard it spoken of in a way that gave him pain or uneasiness. William Hobbs also expressed his belief that all who were favorable to this subject, wished to move in such a way as not to hurt the feelings of those who differed from them.

We have found nothing, in our experience, of an exciting character in the doctrine and practice of abstaining from the productions of slavery, and we believe all who adopt the testimony on moral or religious grounds will find the path into which it leads to be the "way of the Cross." So far from this movement having a tendency to disturb the harmony and good feeling which happily exist among the members of Indiana Yearly Meeting, we entertain the firm belief that it is eminently promotive of a restoration to unity and membership of those who seceded a few years since, and assumed the name of "Anti-Slavery Friends."

Our western friends who feel bound to maintain their testimony, in its fulness, against slavery, will, we hope, be encouraged and strengthened in faithful and zealous perseverance. A writer in a recent number of The Friend, after relating an anecdote of the late Jacob Lindley, who was an eminent Minister of the Society of Friends, makes the following comments, which we commend to the special attention of those who are disposed to throw impediments in the way of the Free Produce Cause, and to think its friends too warm in their zeal:—

"In pleading for the rights of hospitality or the rights of humanity, he (Jacob Lindley) felt it consistent with Christian meekness and gospel love, to be earnest and zealous. On one occasion, when a number of Friends were assembled to consult on a matter, Nicholas Waln is reported to have said, 'Friends, I hope we shall be favored to feel a little warmth.' A degree of right warmth is always desirable, and but little good is ever effected without it. Especially is it so in cases where opposition and hindering things, are continually arising to obstruct right progress. Yet this warmth of feeling is not to control, but to be subject to the judgment; not to direct or warp it, but to give efficiency to the actions it has sanctioned. When the judgment is convinced as to what is right, and the mind is prepared for action, it is then a favor to feel a warmth which will enable us earnestly and heartily to engage in the performance of our duty."

A FREEMAN RESCUED FROM SLAVERY IN TEXAS.
—In the Report of the African Committee to the recent Yearly Meeting of Indiana, we find the following interesting details of a successful effort to rescue from slavery a man who was legally free. It should not be forgotten that, in this land alone, three millions of men, women and children, as much entitled to freedom as this man, are yet held as slaves.

"In the 11th month last, our branch was informed by the members of Union Branch, that a colored man by the name of Eli Terry, that was seduced away from his father's house near Indianapolis, in the 10th mo. 1842, had lately been heard of in Red River County, in the State of Texas.

Although the neighbouring citizens used considerable exertion at the time, in his case, and Friends made much inquiry on the subject, the following year, yet no information could be obtained where he probably might be found; till in the summer of 1849, John Ryman, a citizen of Lawrenceburgh, on business at Orleans, obtained the information from a citizen of Red River county, Texas (there on business also;) he in a casual conversation relating the wretched condition of a colored man in slavery, on an adjoining plantation to his own, who said he was a free man, and that he had free parents living near Indianapolis, Indiana.

Upon hearing said information, our branch appointed a committee to unite with a committee of Union branch, to examine the accounts further; to take legal counsel thereon; and propose to a subsequent meeting such measures as they might think best.

At a subsequent meeting, called for the purpose on the 3rd of the 12th mo., 1849, upon hearing the report of the committee, it was agreed to employ an efficient lawyer and two competent witnesses, to go the long journey of something over 2,500 miles, to endeavor to regain his freedom, and bring him back.

Accordingly a few Friends were set apart to make said engagement, and on the 4th of 12th mo. (being time of our Supreme Court,) the aforesaid John Ryman, attorney at law, as agent, and Thomas Council and Parish T. Harrison as witnesses, were employed to go after the said colored man. They were also furnished with several depositions of different persons who were acquainted with the family; and some of the incidents relative to his abduction which were certified by the governor; and the State Seal affixed as a kind of corroborative evidence. Accordingly the deputation left Lawrenceburgh on the 11th of 12mo., and on the 30th of the same, they arrived at Clarksville, Red River County, Texas. They there had to encounter some difficulties, the informant having moved away, and the said colored man having again been sold. But after prudent delay, till they could find a person that they could confidently trust, they at length obtained information where the colored man in question was, and his present master's name:—and forthwith our attorney caused a writ of habeas corpus to be issued, on which the said Eli was taken and brought before a judge; and his master summoned to appear, and show cause if any, why he should not be set at liberty.

When the parties were ready, the case came to a hearing, and after being fully argued on both sides, the judge declared himself fully satisfied with the proofs, and ordered the said colored man to be discharged from all manner of restraint, with liberty to go wheresoever he would. Our attorney gives a just tribute of credit to the judge, for the firm and impartial manner in which he discharged his duty, though a Southern man with strong southern views. And early in the 2d mo. 1850, they all arrived home in safety, and restored the said colored man to his father's home, to their great mutual comfort, as well as to the satisfaction of their friends.

The whole cost was $677 20."

THE FIRST SLAVE CASE IN PHILAD'A. UNDER THE NEW LAW.—A colored man named Henry Garnett, was seized on the 17th ult. near this city, under authority of a warrant issued by Judge Grier, of the U. S. Circuit Court, before whom he was immediately taken. At the solicitation of persons who felt interested in the welfare of the accused, the case was postponed till the next morning. He was then attended by able counsel, and his claimant failing to produce the requisite proof, Henry was discharged, to the great joy of thousands who had collected to await the decision.

Several officers attempted to re-arrest him, immediately after he left the Court House, tearing his clothes from his body and striking him severe blows on the head with their maces. He was, however, rescued by his colored friends and taken to a place of safety.

James Hamlet, the fugitive slave mentioned in our last number, as having been seized in New York and taken to Baltimore, has since been ransomed and restored to his wife and children.

THE HOME SLAVE TRADE AND COTTON CULTURE—WHO SUPPORTS THEM?—We take the following advertisement from a Kentucky newspaper, which copied it from a paper published at Memphis, Tenn. Husbands and wives, parents and children, are separated in Virginia and dragged to Alabama, "to work the next crop of cotton" for the professed friends of the slave to buy, and manufacture and wear in the Northern States and Great Britain! "The children gather wood, and the fathers kindle the fire, and the women knead their dough, to make cakes to the queen of heaven, &c."

"NEGROES! NEGROES!!

One hundred Virginia Negroes will be in our mart about the 25th of February next. Our partner Thos. Dickens, started from Richmond on the 1st inst. We say to our friends and customers, if they will have patience and not buy until the drove arrives, they shall have the best negroes, to WORK THEIR NEXT CROP OF COTTON, that have ever been purchased in this market. Among the lot there is a few choice house servants and cooks for the city trade. Our motto is, quick sales and short profits.

We also will pay the highest market price for Negroes brought to our market for sale. Persons visiting our city with negroes will do well to see us before selling.

"CONSIDERATIONS ON THE USE OF THE PRODUCTIONS OF SLAVERY."—At the suggestion of a friend, we insert a portion of this little work, intending to give the remainder next month. It was prepared by the Editor, and first published in 1844. To a considerable extent, he availed himself of arguments and observations found in some previous publications, and in a manuscript correspondence, which led to the recurrence of nearly similar ideas and the variety of style observable in the compilation.

HENRY HIGHLAND GARNET.—It will be seen by the communication for which we are indebted to our friend H. H. Garnet, that he is actively prosecuting his mission in Great Britain. We have also copied from our English papers, short extracts from his public addresses, and those of his coadjutor, J. W. C. Pennington, at Sunderland and Newcastle.

Samuel R. Ward, a relative of H. H. Garnet and well known as an eloquent speaker and the Editor of the Impartial Citizen in Boston, recently published a letter from H. H. G., with the following observations—true and appropriate in themselves, and, coming from the source they do, highly gratifying:

"Of the safe arrival of Mr. Garnet in Europe, our friends have already been apprised. But it is our privilege to publish a letter from him this week. In a private note, Mr. Garnet offers to write a line for the Citizen frequently. Most heartily do we thank him for the proffer of such a favor.

The Free Produce cause is justly entitled to the earnest consideration of all the enemies of slavery. The Liberty Party of which we are a very humble member, has quite frequently said as much in its resolutions. In this country, it is well known that the pecuniary patronage given to slavery is the great support upon which it rests. Indeed, but for the invention of Whitney's cotton-gin, it is reasonable to suppose that the slavery of the six Southern, as well as that of the seven Northern of the original thirteen States, would have become too profitless to be maintained. It is the pecuniary connection with slavery, which corrupts the merchants of New York, Philadelphia and Boston, so much as to make them but little, if any, better than the Southern slaveholders. Their pecuniary connection, too, has much to do with the political and ecclesiastical control which the abominable institution has obtained.

Now, to do what we can to counteract this influence is alike the dictate of good principle and sound policy. Our own mind needs no convincing on this point. The inconvenience of getting supplies in the interior, where we have always lived heretofore, and the still greater inconvenience arising from not being able to purchase any considerable amount of free labor goods at one time, operate against the practical working of the principle, in some parts of the country. But should pedlars traverse the country with such goods, many could be supplied who now find it difficult to obtain them.

The English, who have, at the expense of $100,000,000, freed the negroes of the West Indies, were recreant to their own principles, if unwilling to give a preference to the proceeds of their toil over that of the stolen products of American man-stealers and woman-whippers.

No one knowing Mr. Garnet will be surprised to learn how he is appreciated in England."

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE BILL.—Instead of "Peace, Union, and Harmony," resulting from the passage of the Compromise Bills, as seemed to be anticipated in some quarters, a wholesome agitation has arisen in the Northern States, which we earnestly hope will never cease until not only these unchristian laws but slavery itself shall be abolished. It is true that some of the newspapers in Northern cities, particularly such as are connected with Southern commercial interests, advocate the Fugitive Slave law and urge its faithful application, yet generally, the Press in the free States condemns it in the strongest language. Various religious bodies have also officially condemned the law, and, as specimens of their action, we give the following resolutions adopted at a meeting of the New York Evangelical Congregational Association held at Poughkeepsie:—

"Resolved, That we cannot recognize this law as of any binding force upon the citizens of our country. 1st. Because it is contrary to the express command of God. Deut. 23: 16, 17—"Thou shalt not deliver unto his master the servant which is escaped from his master unto thee. He shall dwell with thee, even among you in that place which he shall choose in one of thy gates, where it liketh him best: thou shalt not oppress him." 2d. It is in opposition to the great law of Christian benevolence, which requires us in all things to do unto others as we would that others should do unto us. 3d. It conflicts with the provisions of our National Constitution. 4th. It prostrates those two great safeguards of human liberty, habeas corpus and trial by jury. 5th. It is revolting to the spontaneous promptings of humanity. 6th. It brings upon our Nation the reproach of injustice and inconsistency, and impairs our influence upon the world for good. 7th. In short, this law outrages every principle of human feeling, of humanity and religion; and thus, so far as the principle is concerned, it endangers the liberty of every man.

Resolved, That while we recognize the obligation to obey the laws of the land, we make an exception in the case of all such provisions as contravene the "higher laws" of God.

Resolved, That we advise all persons to render every needful aid and comfort to fugitive slaves, just the same as if there were no law in the land forbidding it."

The Free Will Baptist General Conference, held at Providence, R. I., unanimously adopted the following:

"Resolved, That we do deliberately and calmly, yet earnestly and decidedly, deny any and all obligation on our part to submit to the unrighteous enactments of the aforesaid Fugitive Slave Bill. Also, that regardless of unjust human enactments, fines, and imprisonment, we will do all we can consistently with the claims of the Bible, to prevent the recapture of the fugitive, and to aid him in his efforts to escape from his rapacious claimants.

Resolved, That as 'we ought to obey God rather than men,' (Acts v. 29) in disobeying a cruel and wicked human law, and patiently submitting to its unrighteous penalties for such disobedience, we are 'subject unto the higher powers, the powers that be,' (Rom. xiii. 1.) in the highest and holiest sense of that Divine command; that is in the same sense in which the Apostles, primitive Christians, and the subsequent Christian martyrs, obeyed it when they disobeyed the Jewish, heathen, and Popish laws.

Resolved, That we do most deeply sympathize with those who, after having escaped from human bondage, are now in great fear, anxiety, and distress, on account of the passage of the Fugitive Slave Bill. We also recommend them to use all the means to preserve their liberty that religion, conscience, and reason will justify under their harassing and distressing circumstances.

Resolved, That the conduct of slaveholders and their abettors in procuring the annexation of Texas in order to afford security to slavery; their efforts to establish the unmerciful institution in the free Territory acquired by the war caused by that annexation; also their violent opposition to the admission of California into the Union as a free State, and their threats to dissolve the Union if they cannot be permitted to carry slavery where they please, are developments that afford increasing proof of the deep inherent depravity of American Slavery, and likewise call loudly for continued and increasing Christian and constitutional efforts for its abolition.<sup>11</sup>

The Editor of the National Era makes the following remarks, introducing the above resolutions and the debate upon them:

"Every day's mail from the North brings startling accounts of the deep excitement produced by the Fugitive Slave Bill. The religious feeling of the community is aroused, and things are rapidly assuming a threatening aspect.

The following report, furnished us by a careful reporter, of the action of the General Conference of the Free Will Baptists, will be read with profound interest. For the first time we confess to some apprehension for the Federal Union. How it can be maintained amid such a conflict of feelings and purposes on questions of vital interest, unless the slaveholders can be induced to relax something in their demands, is not exactly clear to us.

It is but fair that our Southern fellow-citizens should know on what grounds the bill, which they seem to think of so much importance, is opposed in the North. The action of the Conference referred to is a fair indication, we presume, of the views of the religious community generally in the free States."

"THE VIRTUES OF COTTON."—We have long entertained the belief that any influence the "Compromises of the Constitution" may exert in supporting slavery, is of a secondary character; that Commerce in the products of slave labor constitutes the foundation upon which the whole system of slavery, with all the political power and arrangements emanating from it, is built, and that the use and consumption of those products, being the corner stone of the monstrous fabric of iniquity, should be repudiated by all true Christians.

The article below, strongly confirmatory of these views, appeared, a few days since, in the "Daily Times," a Democratic newspaper of this city. We commend it to the especial consideration of those abolitionists who condemn the "Compromises of the Constitution" and advocate a dissolution of the American Union, and yet promote, by their daily practice, the great evil which neither the Union nor the Compromises could sustain without such aid.

"The following remarks, from a cotemporary, give the clue to most of the political movements which have been and are now agitating the country, both North and South:—'All property is essentially conservative, but cotton especially so. Every cent a pound additional on cotton, adds a hundred dollars per head to the value of its cultivators. A stout, hardy 'nigger,' who is dull at six hundred dollars when fair cotton is but ten cents, goes quick at eleven hundred when cotton is stiff at fifteen cents. Then cotton politics are fashionable throughout the great Northern cities, as well as in the South. Then the right of slave-breeding planters to hold their human 'property' in any of the National Territories is vehemently affirmed at the South, and blandly regarded at the North. Then compromises are fashionable on the Eastern seaboard, no matter what is compromised nor who. Then the blessings of union and peace are trumpeted and sung, while freedom, justice, posterity, eternity, are practically treated as of small account. Then the Federal Constitution is regarded with awe and admiration as a contrivance especially for catching and holding fugitive slaves. Inestimable are the virtues of cotton, especially when stiff at fifteen cents per pound.'"

AMERICAN FREEDOM OF THE PRESS!—Jesse McBride, has been tried at Greensborough, North Carolina, on the charge of circulating a pamphlet in which it is shown that slaveholders violate the Ten Commandments. He was declared guilty and sentenced to one year's imprisonment, to stand in the pillory one hour and to receive twenty lashes! He has appealed to the Supreme Court.

In the 7th number of our present volume we copied from the New York True Wesleyan an excellent letter written by Jesse McBride, introducing an Epistle issued by North Carolina Yearly Meeting of Friends on the subject of slavery. We understand he is a worthy minister amongst the Wesleyans.

A person named Crook was also tried for the same offence and acquitted.

MEETING OF THE PENNSYLVANIA ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.—Pursuant to the call of the Executive Committee, this meeting assembled at West Chester on the 15th ult. and continued its session until the afternoon of the 17th. Large numbers were in attendance, and the position of the anti-slavery cause, arising from the recent action of Congress, gave an unusual interest to the proceedings. Our limited space will only allow the insertion of a few of the resolutions adopted by the meeting. Those in relation to the Fugitive slave bill were as follows:

“Resolved, That the present Congress of the United States has stamped itself with indelible infamy by the passage of the fugitive slave bill, and that every member who voted for it, and any man who aids in its execution, is guilty of treachery to humanity, and treason against God.

Resolved, That as friends of the slave and lovers of liberty and right, we are bound to repudiate and resist, by all righteous means, this infamous statute, and that we hereby solemnly pledge ourselves to each other, to the flying bondmen, to our country, and to our God, that we will neither obey nor regard it; that, though fines and imprisonments be our only alternative, we will not ‘bewray him that wandereth,’ nor ‘deliver to the master the servant who hath escaped from his master unto us.’

Resolved, That our warmest sympathies are with our persecuted brothers and sisters, in our midst, who are particularly exposed to the cruel workings of this bill; and that, although, according to the doctrines of the Declaration of Independence, and the practice of the great majority of professed christians, our colored friends are fully justified in resisting its execution by force of arms; this Society recommends them to resort to Christian measures only, for deliverance out of the hands of their enemies.”

The following resolutions on the subject of abstinence from slave labor products, were unanimously adopted:—

“Resolved, That we recommend to all enemies of Slavery to abstain, as far as practicable, from the consumption of the productions of Slave labor, as an endeavor after personal purity, and a testimony against the robbery of the Slave by the Slaveholder.

Resolved, That the efforts made by the Free Produce Association for developing the resources which exist on this Continent and elsewhere, for the supply of free goods, and to meet the increasing demand for them, have our thankful acknowledgements, with our earnest wishes for their continuance.”

“The Fugitive Slave Bill: its history and unconstitutionality; with an account of the seizure and enslavement of James Hamlet, and his subsequent restoration to liberty.”

This is the title of a pamphlet of 36 pages, published at the office of the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 61 John St. N. York. It is not printed for profit, but to do good at this crisis, and should be found in the family of every citizen of the free States. If immediate application be made it can be furnished in any quantity at $2 a hundred, for cash. Orders should be directed to Wm. Harned, 61 John St. New York.

SELECTIONS.

CONSIDERATIONS ON THE USE OF THE PRODUCTIONS OF SLAVERY, MORE PARTICULARLY ADDRESSED TO THE RELIGIOUS SOCIETY OF FRIENDS.

In the early settlement of America, when there was little known of the manner in which slaves were procured in Africa, and the purchase of them here was deemed favourable to both master and slave, Friends not only purchased and held slaves, but even engaged in the foreign slave-trade. At a very early period a few Friends were enlightened to see the sinfulness of this trade, and after long and arduous labours with their brethren the practice was condemned. Our worthy forefathers, however, continued to hold their slaves in bondage, because they had not sufficiently examined the subject in the light of Truth: for when in the course of a long series of years they became convinced that this practice also was wrong, they united in abolishing it. Our Society having thus cleared itself of the sin of owning slaves, yet finds that millions of them are held in cruel bondage by our fellow-citizens and by the inhabitants of some other countries; and now, the very serious and awfully important question arises—whether in our commercial intercourse with these, or in paying the slaveholders for, and partaking of, that which they cruelly and wrongfully exact from their slaves, we are in any degree encouraging the atrocious system or enjoying its fruits.

That deeply instructed and faithful servant of Christ, John Woolman, declared “the trading in or frequent use of any produce known to be raised by the labours of those [slaves] who are under such lamentable oppression, hath appeared to be a subject which may yet require the more serious consideration of the humble followers of Christ, the Prince of peace. After long and mournful exercise, I am now free to mention how things have opened in my mind, with desires that if it may please the Lord farther to open his will to any of his children in this matter, they may faithfully follow him in such further manifestation."

It is well known that John Woolman declined the use of the productions of the labour of slaves, and that from his day down to the present, the same testimony has been upheld by many of our most prominent and worthy members. Believing that the time of which he spoke has arrived when this subject demands our "most serious consideration," and that the present state of slavery and the continued horrors of the foreign and domestic slave-trade loudly call us to faithfulness in this matter, we feel concerned to address our brethren in relation to it.

"Deep-rooted customs, though wrong, are not easily altered; but it is the duty of every one to be firm in that which they certainly know is right for them." "As men obtain reputation by their profession of the Truth, their virtues are mentioned as arguments in favour of general error; and those of less note to justify themselves, say, such and such good men did the like." "Customs generally approved, and opinions received by youth from their superiors become like the natural produce of a soil, especially when they are suited to favourite inclinations; but as the judgments of God, by which the state of the soul must be tried, are without partiality, it would be the highest wisdom to forego customs and popular opinions, and try the treasures of the soul by the infallible standard, Truth."—Woolman.

In reference to slavery itself, John Woolman inquires, "whence is it that men who believe in a righteous, omnipotent Being, to whom all nations stand equally related and are equally accountable, remain so easy in it, but that they do not discuss this matter with that candour and freedom of thought, which the case justly calls for?" and this, we believe, is one great reason why so many now remain easy in a custom which is the main support of slavery—the use of its productions.

"Christ, our holy leader, graciously continueth to open the understandings of his people, and as circumstances alter from age to age, some who are deeply baptised into a feeling of the state of things are led by his Holy Spirit into exercises in some respects different from those which attended the faithful in foregoing ages"—"and from a clear conviction, may see the relation of one thing to another, and the necessary tendency of each; and hence it may be absolutely binding on them to desist from some parts of conduct, which some good men have been in."—Woolman. Thus it was in regard to a participation in the slave-trade and in slavery, and thus it is as respects the support of slavery by using its productions.

"Under a solemn sense of the awful load of guilt which is impending over our beloved country, and of our share in the responsibility, may we seriously and impartially examine what is required at our hands." "If our hearts are softened and expanded by the love of God, we shall be prepared to view these oppressed people as children of the same Almighty Father, equally with ourselves the objects of His divine regard, and of that salvation which comes by Jesus Christ; and thus be enabled to enter into a lively feeling of the miseries and hardships they endure; to put our souls in their souls' stead, and in singleness of heart to follow every clear opening of duty in their behalf, whatever sacrifice it may cost us, either of worldly treasure or popularity."—Yearly Meeting Minutes, 1839.

Let us then inquire by what means the vast and atrocious system of slavery is maintained, and upon whom the responsibility of its continuance rests. The whole system is composed of parts necessarily connected with and dependent upon each other:—viz. man-stealing; slave-trading; slave-holding; buying and using the productions of slavery. We all acknowledge that a tremendous load of guilt rests somewhere. Is it upon the poor, ignorant, heathen Chief in Africa, who attacks a neighbouring tribe and seizes his miserable victims for the slave-trader? Is it upon him who in performing his share of the dreadful business, furnishes the slaveholder with "human chattels?" Does the slaveholder in retaining them in bondage, incur the whole guilt of the system? For what does slavery, with all its abominations, exist? Its gains. What supports slavery? The use of its productions. If, therefore, there was no contributor to its gains—no purchaser of its productions, it would of necessity cease. Is he guiltless who furnishes the incentive for its continuance and the means of its support?

In this view of the subject, how plain is the course which our duty as Christians points out! "Cease to do evil;" "do justly;" "thou shalt be far from oppression;" "be not partakers of other men's sins;" "cleanse your hands, ye sinners;" "all things, whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them."

If, indeed, slavery is the most monstrous evil of the times, wicked in itself, and dreadful in its consequences—depriving, in this country alone, nearly three millions of human beings of their right to act out the ends for which an all-wise and bountiful Creator formed them; stifling His spirit in their hearts, and when through darkness it manifests itself, disabling them from following its requisitions; making, as far as human enactments and customs can make, the slave-master the slaves' God, and the slave, not a man created in God's image, but a chattel, a brute, a tool—not his own, but his master's;—if, indeed, slavery thus tramples under foot the highest principles of moral obligation, ought not all to avoid upholding it? And should not Friends especially, who, above others, profess to be very delicate in their perceptions of right, and firm in their adherence to it, refuse to sustain it by any means?

In a "Minute on Slavery," issued by the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1839, we find the following paragraphs: viz.—"The close connexion and intimate intercourse which are maintained between the different sections of our common country, through the diversified and widely spread channels of commerce and business, may, unless we are very watchful, blunt our sensibilities to the cruelties of slavery and diminish our abhorrence of its injustice. We wish tenderly to incite our dear friends to an individual inquiry, with a single eye to the pointings of Truth, how far they are clear in these respects; and should such an examination awaken serious apprehensions as to any part of their traffic, that they may be willing to forego every prospect of gain, arising from the prosecution of business, which is incompatible with the purity of our religious profession."

What connexion and intercourse are here alluded to? Those with slaveholders. What part of their traffic is it that Friends may seriously apprehend is incompatible with the purity of their religious profession? That composed of the productions of slave labor. Here then is the principle distinctly recognized by our Yearly Meeting, that a traffic in the productions of slavery tends to blunt our sensibilities to its cruelties, and diminish our abhorrence of its injustice, and may be found incompatible with the purity of our religious profession; how then can the use of these productions be consistently indulged in or advocated? What difference exists in principle between our purchasing a bale of slave grown cotton, or a hogshead of slave made sugar, to sell it again for the support of our families, and our purchasing the same article to be used in them? Does the turpitude of the transaction consist in our selling to another that which we may innocently use ourselves?

"Seed sown with the tears of a confined, oppressed people—harvests cut down by an overborne, discontented reaper, make bread less sweet to the taste of an honest man, than that which is the produce or just reward of such voluntary action as is a proper part of the business of human creatures."—Woolman.

If our moral sense would revolt at holding a slave ourselves, it should also revolt at another's holding one.

If it would revolt at using the unpaid toil of him we might so hold, it should also revolt at using the unpaid toil of him who is held by another.

It is no argument for our partaking of the fruit of crime, that if we do not partake of it others will; and as therefore our abstinence will not arrest or mitigate the evil, we may innocently derive from it a good to ourselves. We do not know the premises to be true. God has made us moral instruments, and we are to act as the medium through which His ends are to be accomplished. So far as our means extend, we are to combat evil as if its extirpation depended on our individual action. Does slavery exist for its gains, and would it cease if there were no purchaser of its productions? If the answer be affirmative, could I, let each of us inquire, morally be the purchaser? Could I innocently hold up one end of a system which the slaveholder at the other would in vain attempt to sustain without me? Does the circumstance that several join me in the purchase, make it right for me to do that connectively, which to do singly was wrong? Do numbers annihilate responsibility, and make me a virtuous partner in the mighty aggregate of wickedness?

That the slave-trade and slavery exist only by reason of the use of the produce of slave labor—to obtain which is the sole end of the slave-trade, whether foreign or domestic, and of slavery with all its abominations—is so plain to every understanding, that it may be assumed as self-evident. Indeed, it is universally acknowledged that as respects manufactures, and the products of the earth raised by the labor of whites, the consumer who pays his money for such articles is the great supporter of those productions; and of course, the same rule must be admitted in respect to the productions of the labor of blacks.

If the institution of slavery were now to be commenced, knowing its character as we do, men of pure minds would revolt instinctively at using the productions of the labor of a fellow being seized to be a slave, and retained in that condition for the sake of giving existence to these productions. They would just as much refuse to connect themselves with the end proposed by such an outrage, as they would the beginning of a purpose looking to that end. Habit, the foe or friend of virtue, according to the direction it takes, may blind us in some degree to the wrongfulness of this use, but it can never make the use right, or justify us in the mal-practice whilst there is left to us the moral faculty of recurring to first principles, or putting ourselves feelingly into the condition of the sufferers whose woes and bonds the use occasions and continues. Without bringing the question nearer home than would be presented by the case of the poor Indian with whom we sympathise—let slavery be added to his existing wrongs; let, not his lands only, but also his soul, mind and body, be taken to the use of the usurper—under whatever solemnity of law—and no sophistry could disguise from us his crime who would consent to use the avails of that crushing tyranny. When the cupidity of the whites shall have seized on the last hunting grounds of our red brethren, and, in accordance with the popular doctrine that “two races cannot co-exist on the same soil but in the relation of master and slave,” the remnant, which the vices and the swords of the intruders may have spared of the hereditary owners of the American soil, shall be doomed to slavery, will Friends shake hands with the oppressor, or shall we spurn from us the productions of the new and horrible robbery? If, as we believe, they would with one voice be rejected, how can we now receive and use productions of exactly the same character?

But it is objected:—“God blesses the produce of the slave’s labor, and therefore in refusing to partake of it we do wrong, and call in question His goodness and His mercy.” It is true His rain descends upon the just and the unjust; are we therefore to be partakers of the sins of the unjust? His light guides the robber to the work of evil—the murderer to the deed of death; are we hence to conclude that the robber and the murderer are right, or that we may innocently partake of the fruits of their deeds?

The inference from God’s blessing the slaves’ labor, if just, would be more comprehensively expressed thus: God has blessed the labor of slaves, therefore the holding of slaves is right! But the rice, cotton and tobacco plants, the sugar cane and all other plants which are cultivated by slaves, grow in accordance with a law which was established by the Almighty when he said, “Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit tree yielding fruit after his kind, whose seed is in itself upon the earth.” Now His laws of nature are unalterable, except by His special intervention; and are we to conclude that because He does not thus interpose, and by a miracle blast all the plants cultivated by slaves, He therefore regards their labor with His especial favor and blessing! And because He does not send down fire from Heaven to destroy the oppressor—the slaveholder—that therefore he blesses slavery! God blesses the labor of all, both freemen and slaves, in contemplation of His having benevolently given to the cultivator of the soil, the production of the sweat of his face. God changes not: it is man who perverts and misuses his blessings. “When the earth is planted and filled, and the fruits brought forth are applied to support unrighteous purposes; here the gracious design of infinite goodness, in these his gifts, being perverted, the earth is defiled, and the complaint formerly uttered becomes applicable, ‘Thou hast made me to serve with thine sins, thou hast wearied me with thine iniquities.’” —Woolman.

We assert for man an ownership in the production of his own toil, unless alienated by his direct or implied consent; the exception being an affirmation of the doctrine. The freeman cannot raise his arm to do an act of labor but that he feels the truth of this ownership. The christian cannot read the history of man’s fall and the accompanying promises, without perceiving that in the sentence which connected labor with his condition,—“in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread,”—the fruit of it was given him. Thus both natural and revealed law accord to man the produce of his labor. It is true that man in society parts with some of his rights that others may be the better secured; and thus is the primitive law rightfully modified by parties to the social compact, and is so modified in the matter of labor: though the justice of natural law is often affirmed in the granting of specific liens on workmanship performed. But shall the slave’s right be mystified by the plea of having surrendered some of his rights that others may be assured to him? Who is he? An outlaw! What is he in contemplation of the social law? A chattel! What are his rights in that relation? He has none—not even the right to complain of being treated as the beasts that perish! He has no lot in the social arrangement. The fruits, then, of the sweat of his brow belong to him, and he that takes them from him commits a robbery: not the less true or monstrous because sanctified by law. What, in this view of the case, are the rights of the slaveholder to the produce of the slave's labor? Can he create ownership to it by selling it to us? Can we honestly buy it?

ANTI-SLAVERY MEETING IN NEWCASTLE, ENGLAND.

On Thursday evening, a large and influential meeting of the friends of freedom was held in Salem chapel, Hood-street, to afford Dr. Pennington and the Rev. H. H. Garnet, two gentlemen of colour from the United States, an opportunity of addressing the inhabitants of this town, on the wrongs and sufferings of their fellow-countrymen. The Rev. J. C. CRUCE presided.

The Rev. H. H. GARNET, who spoke first, was received with loud applause. He had, he said, been accustomed to meet his esteemed brother Dr. Pennington in his own land, and he was truly glad to have an opportunity of meeting him in this country, to advocate the cause of freedom. Since he came to this country, his heart had been cheered by seeing the cordiality and warm-heartedness with which the principles he had advocated had been received. A day or two ago, the news reached them that the great battle, which has so long been in progress in the United States, between freedom and slavery, has at length been terminated, at least for a season. Since December last, when the Congress was opened, a struggle had been going on, which for fierceness and determination was unprecedented in the history of the country. On the one side there were those in favor of the propagation of slavery over the whole American territory; and on the other side were the friends of freedom, few in number, but bold and persevering, sustained by the good men of the country, and by the smiles and approbation of that God who ever takes the side of the oppressed and looks with indignation on the oppressor. The struggle had at length terminated; and though they had some reason to lament that New Mexico had been admitted into the Union without a prohibition of the introduction of slavery, yet they could rejoice that California, the modern land of Ophir—and indeed, according to the opinions of some, the ancient land of Ophir—attracting by its gold and other treasures, the people from all parts of the world, had unfurled the banner of freedom, and declared that slavery should not exist. Another part of the intelligence overwhelmed him with grief. The famous Fugitive Slave Bill had passed both houses of Congress, and become law.

There was nothing in the annals of tyranny that surpassed such an outrage as this. It was tempting the whole race to depart from the principles of peace, and when that bill was under discussion, men of christian character and feelings began with the greatest alarm to make preparation for the event, if it should transpire. He had seen men calmly look on all the consequences, and declare that never should their domestic tranquillity be interrupted by the steps of the slaveholder, without resistance: the black men were even now arming themselves, the seeds of civil war had been scattered, and he expected soon to receive the intelligence that some dreadful conflict had taken place in the United States. He hoped God would bring light out of this darkness, and that the friends of freedom would be stimulated to greater exertion, to hasten on the day when slavery should be abolished, and liberty proclaimed. By this bill, also, if any person opened the door of his house to a fugitive slave, he could be thrown into prison, and the full amount of that slave charged upon him. The question seemed to arise, will Britain extend an arm to help the slave, and use her influence to roll back the dark tide of slavery? He could go to Virginia, or any other of the slave markets, and by consulting the market price of slaves in those places, tell what is the state of the cotton market in Liverpool, or he could go to Liverpool, and by ascertaining the state of the cotton market there, could tell the price slaves were selling at in America. He was convinced that the only way by which slavery could be effectually abolished would be by discouraging the use of slave-grown produce, and giving the preference to free-grown. Brother Jonathan did not keep slaves merely for the pleasure of keeping them, but for the profit derived from them, and so long as he was convinced that it was a paying matter to keep his brethren in slavery, so long would he keep them. Mr. G. produced considerable sensation in the meeting by exhibiting a slaveholder's whip, the thong of which was three yards long, and which, he said, had been in use, and been made red with the blood of men, women, and children. He also produced some chains made for the necks of slaves, not in America, but in Birmingham, and remarked that this showed how the whole trade was linked together, and how the system upheld in one country was supported by another. He concluded an eloquent and earnest address by exhorting the meeting to substitute free-labor for slave-labor produce, and not to refrain from carrying out what they considered to be right, merely because the great masses of the people had not at present adopted their views.

Dr. PENNINGTON, who was enthusiastically received, expressed the great pleasure he felt in again appearing before a Newcastle audience. The system of slavery was ensnaring men, and was a great stumbling block in the way of human progress. He had been surprised and somewhat alarmed at the number of cases of Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Irishmen, who have been ensnared and entrapped, and tempted from their fidelity by American slavery. The reverend gentlemen mentioned the case of a man now living in London, who, a few years ago, went from this country to New Orleans, the Babylon of America, and after making a fortune by engaging in the slave trade, returned to London, where he still lives upon the labor of his American slaves. It was a subject which concerned every nation on the face of the earth which traded with America, or sent emigrants there, and he presented this case as an answer to the question—"What have we to do with American slavery?" To show the manner in which the fugitive slave law might be expected to work, he related two or three affecting cases, where the slave, rather than lightly surrender his hard earned liberty, had resisted the attempts of his tyrants to secure him, feeling that if he lost his life in the struggle, it would be preferable to returning into bondage. He should be ashamed of the Americans, if they persisted in bringing down on their country the consequences that would ensue from the carrying out of the new bill. He spoke advisedly when he said that human nature could not bear much more; he felt proud in the conviction that they had given to the world evidence of their endurance, forbearance, and long suffering under abuses, and if America drove them to extremes, he believed that in the judgement of the civilized world, they would have the advantage of her when this case was decided. This measure would arouse thousands and thousands of Americans to a decision upon this question, and he had no idea that the thousands who professed the principles of abolition would be by any means what-ever coerced into the measures proposed by this bill. In many parts of the country it was a non-entity before it had gone through the Congress, and could not be enforced. In reference to the practical proposition brought before the meeting, he believed they had a powerful case, and one of the best cases of the age, and they were resolved to work it in earnest. He could tell them that gold was the sinew of slavery's framework, and that the slaveholder's notions of civilization are measured and tempered according to his ideas of gain. All they asked was that as they could furnish a considerable amount of free-labor goods, that the people of this country should give an expression of their abhorrence of slavery, by giving the preference to them. A free-labor association had been formed in Philadelphia and New York in furtherance of the object, and on this side of the water many persons were now supplying free-labor goods. He had lately visited Manchester, and he found that some of the ablest spinners in that region were taking up the subject, and saw the propriety of cultivating cotton on the free soil in the British dominions. If associations were formed in different towns, and a bona-fide demand created, there would soon be a bona-fide supply. He concluded by appealing more especially to the ladies to exert themselves in this cause.

The meeting separated, powerfully impressed with the horrors of slavery, and apparently determined to use their utmost efforts for its extinction.

SLAVERY AND CHRISTIANITY.

Anxious for some reform in their legal code, the legislature of Georgia requested the Hon. James H. Lumpkin, Chief Justice, to make a report on the subject of Law Reform, making such recommendations as he should deem advisable. His report is published in the January number of the United States Law Magazine for 1850. He advises many alterations and amendments, which he particularizes, and which in the main seem to be salutary and useful. But on the subject of the slavery code he says—"In the present state of the Union and of the world, the law of slavery should undergo the most thorough examination, and its various details and provisions be made to conform to the exigencies of the times. If duty to ourselves, as well as to our slaves, requires increased severity, [I wonder what duty to them could require it,] by way of security, let it be imposed, regardless of the hypocritical cant and clamor of the fanatics of our own or other countries. If, on the other hand, it shall be found that existing enactments may be relaxed or ameliorated, without prejudice to our safety or rights of property, let us not be deterred from doing what is right and just as Christian masters.

We need not fear that our motives will be misapprehended or misrepresented. Our position has been taken, and is well understood everywhere. The conscience of the whole South, after having been thoroughly aroused to the most earnest and intense investigation of this subject, by the remorseless and unrelenting assaults of our relentless foes, has become thoroughly satisfied that this institution, like government itself, is of God. That being recognised and regulated by the Decalogue, it will, we have every reason to believe, be of perpetual duration. That it subserves the best interests of both races, and that we will preserve and defend it at any and all hazards."

LETTER FROM JUDGE JAY ON THE FUGITIVE SLAVE BILL.

From the N. Y. Evening Post.

BEDFORD, 2d OCTOBER, 1850.

Gentlemen: In pursuance of instructions given you by a meeting of colored citizens, you ask me, in your letter of the 27th ult., my opinion, first, "of the constitutionality and binding force" of the late act of Congress for the seizure of fugitive slaves; and, secondly, of the course most proper to be pursued by our colored citizens in reference to the personal jeopardy in which they are now placed.

Many years since I endeavored to prove, in an argument published at the time, that Congress has no constitutional power to pass any law whatever respecting fugitive slaves. I find from Mr. Webster's speech of 7th of last March, that such is also his opinion. But the Supreme Court has otherwise determined, and hence Mr. Webster advised the Senate to exercise power which the Constitution, in his judgment, had conferred exclusively on the States. The law in question appears to me as palpable a violation of the Constitution, as it certainly is of the principles of justice, the rights of humanity, and the obligations of the religion of Jesus Christ.

Of the "binding force" of this law, in its practical operation, I entertain no doubt. It is said, I know, that it is too atrocious to be executed, that public opinion will not endure its enormities. Be not deceived. There was indeed a time when such a law would not have been thought of, much less enforced at the North. Some years since, as I was directing a fugitive as to the route to Canada, he told me, to my surprise, that he wished to go to Massachusetts. On asking him why, he said he had heard Mr. Adams say at Washington, that if a slave once got into Massachusetts, there were not twelve men in the State who would give him up. Little did Mr. Adams anticipate the recent developments of Boston gentility and Andover divinity.

The slave-catching law is a boon granted by the North, not a measure fastened upon us by the slaveholders. It is a law passed through Massachusetts' influence, voted for by the Representative from Boston (!!) and approved and applauded by a very large number of politicians. A presidential election is approaching, and the result will be decided by Southern votes. Hence our politicians will seek to propitiate the slaveholders by zeal and diligence in slave-hunting. The law will be executed in all the plenitude of its diabolism, or, to use the words of Mr. Webster, when pledging his support to the bill, then before the Senate, "to the fullest extent—to the fullest extent."

If you ask my opinion, of the "binding force" of the law, in a moral sense, I answer that its binding force is precisely the same as was that of the law of Nebuchadnezzar, commanding the multitudes on the plain of Dura to fall down and worship his golden image—of the decree of Darius, forbidding prayer to God for thirty days—of the order of the Jewish magistrate to Peter and Paul "not to speak at all, nor to teach in the name of Jesus"—of the commands of the Roman Emperors, that Christians should cast incense on the altars of idols—of the edicts of Louis XIV., requiring Huguenots to embrace the faith and practice the rites of the Church of Rome. This accursed statute requires us to become active instruments of treachery, cruelty and oppression to the persecuted but innocent fugitive—to set at naught the law of Jehovah, to do justice and love mercy—to trample under foot the great commandment of our blessed Redeemer, to love our neighbor—regardless of his authority, to do to others what would fill our souls with anguish if done to ourselves. Let us with our families, enter the dungeons which Northern politicians have prepared, rather than hazard our souls by rendering obedience to the requirements of this wicked law.

Most deeply do I sympathize with you in your unhappy state. With your wives and children, you are now placed at the disposal of any villain who is ready to perjure himself for the price you will bring in the human shambles of the South. With less ceremony and trouble than a man can impound his neighbor's ox, you may be metamorphosed from a citizen of the State of New York, to a beast of burden on a Southern plantation. On leaving your house in the morning, you may be enticed into another, where one of the newly appointed Commissioners, after reading one affidavit made a thousand miles off, and another that you are the person named in the first, or on the bare oath of the kidnapper himself, may inform you to your amazement and horror, that you are a slave. The fetters previously prepared are placed on your limbs, and in a few minutes you are travelling with railroad velocity to a Southern market. Never again will you behold your wife and children, nor will any tidings from them ever reach your ear. The remainder of your life is to be one of toil and stripes. In this war against human rights, "the law's delay" is utterly unknown.

The Commissioner is commanded to despatch the affair "IN A SUMMARY MANNER." The oath of the wretch who has seized you, and who expects to clear eight hundred or a thousand dollars by your sale, is of itself all sufficient and abundant proof that you are his property, while your own oath to the contrary is excluded by law. The act gives you no right to demand a postponement of the hearing, allows you no process to command the attendance of witnesses, no time to send for counsel. However essential these privileges may be to your restoration to freedom, to family, to happiness, you must beg them as favours to be granted or denied at pleasure, from a creature who has accepted the office of a slave-catching judge, and who is to be paid ten dollars if he dooms you to slavery, but only five if he sets you at liberty. And who is this Commissioner? Heretofore he was a person appointed by the United States Courts to perform certain acts, as taking affidavits, &c. Now he is elevated to the office and dignity of a Judge, and the Courts are expressly commanded "to enlarge the number of Commissioners, with a view to afford reasonable facilities in relation to fugitives from labour." Hence the judges are to be appointed for the express and only purpose of catching negroes, and the amount and condition of their reward, indicate the character of the men who it is expected will accept the infamous office.

From the decision of one of these men, given under the circumstances I have described, there is no appeal to any court in the United States. Yet this man, whose judgment is too sacred to be reviewed, and in whose awful presence the trial by jury, the habeas corpus, and all the forms of the common law devised for the protection of liberty, are but as things of nought—this high and mighty judge, who sits in judgment upon the right to the souls and bodies of immortal beings, made in the image of God, is deemed unworthy to decide on the title to a horse. Such a question is referred to a higher court! And how are these omnipotent slave-catching commissioner-judges appointed? No popular vote invests them with their tremendous powers—no President and Senate are responsible for their learning, wisdom and integrity, notwithstanding the Constitution entrusts to them the appointment of the federal judges. Among the wonders of the times, is this discovery of judicial generation. By virtue of this new law, judges procreate judges at pleasure, for the convenience of the slaveholders!

Our commissioner-judges are to have a force at their command to maintain their dignity and execute their behests. They are authorized to appoint an unlimited number of slave-catchers, and each of these miscreants is empowered, by law, to roam through the whole extent of the State, executing warrants, seizing alleged slaves, white or black, ordering out the posse comitatus, calling the citizens from their employments and commanding them to join in slave-hunts. Should any dare to refuse obedience to the satanic mandate, a fine of $1,000 and imprisonment for six months will vindicate the insulted authority of the slave catcher. When the chase is ended, and the MAN is taken, he may be guarded and transported to the slave region, at the expense of the NATIONAL TREASURY. Thus have our dough-faces—whigs and democrats—in taxing their constituents, to give jobs to slave-catchers, and to rivet the fetters of the bondsmen, fallen down in the dust, and licked the very feet of the slaveholders.

You ask me how you shall secure yourselves from the kidnapper. God only knows. May He have mercy on you, for our law makers have had none. Rumors have reached me, of an intention on the part of our colored citizens to carry arms in self-defence. If I have earned any title to your confidence, may I not ask you to ponder my advice, to abandon such intention? Most freely do I confess my utter ignorance of any system of morals founded by divine authority on the color of a man's skin. Whenever, and for whatever cause, God permits a white man to take life, I believe he equally permits a black man, in similar circumstances, to do the same. Some, I know, maintain that life may never be taken in self-defence, but it is not on this ground that I urge you to abstain from the use of deadly weapons. I implore, I beseech you, not to attempt the life of the kidnapper, first, because his death will not secure your safety, and being therefore unnecessary, it would be morally wrong; and, secondly because such an act of violence would prove the source of great evil to yourselves, and to your brethren.

The facilities afforded by this law to the kidnapper are so great, the means of converting you into a slave are so plainly prescribed, the physical force furnished him for perpetrating the outrage is so abundant, that the whole villainy will be done "according to law," and under circumstances rendering resistance vain. The fraudulent affidavit will be regularly verified, warrant duly issued, the seizure strictly legal. Hence, should death occur by your resistance, you would in law be deemed guilty of murder, for having slain an officer in the legal discharge of his duty. Think you, that at a time when parties are sacrificing truth and honor for southern votes, and their leaders openly scoffing at the "higher law," that you would be permitted to escape with impunity? There would be a mighty struggle among our politicians who should make the most southern capital out of the slaughter of a slave-catcher. The pro-slavery papers of New York and Boston would be seized with a fit of horror and indignation against the blood thirsty negroes, and of admiration for the patriotism of the departed martyr, and for that lofty devotion to "the compromises of the constitution" which had cost him his life.

The occasion would, moreover, be embraced for rendering new homage to the slaveholders, by urging the forcible expulsion to Africa of all such negroes as unhappily have no masters to take care of them, and control their savage tempers; and not unlikely hints would be thrown out that, before long, self-preservation would require the re-establishment of slavery at the north. Such an act would furnish an excuse for armed bands of slave-catchers roaming through the country, insulting and terrifying our citizens, and picking up negroes at pleasure; for you will recollect, they may be seized either with or without a warrant.—Leave, I beseech you, the pistol and the bowie knife to southern ruffians and their northern mercenaries. That this law will lead to bloodshed, I take it for granted, but let it be the blood of the innocent, not of the guilty.

If anything can rouse the torpid conscience of the north, it will be our streets stained with human blood, shed by the slave catchers. * * *

This very slave-catching law has a direct and powerful tendency to beget in our people a reckless contempt for the rights of individuals, a disregard for the usual conservatory forms of legal and judicial proceedings, and a selfish indifference for the claims of humanity.

For years, most strenuous efforts, prompted by commercial and political views, were made to deprive the opponents of slavery of their constitutional privileges by lawless violence. The right of petition was suspended—the freedom of debate interrupted—the sanctity of the post office violated—public meetings dispersed—printing-presses destroyed—furious mobs excited—churches sacked—private houses gutted, and even murder perpetrated. All this violation of rights was regarded with complacency by many who had much at stake, so long as abolitionists alone were its victims. But the spirit of aggression thus raised and fostered, is seeking new subjects on which to exercise its power. "Gentlemen of property and standing" are now beginning to feel alarmed about socialism, anti-rentism, agrarianism, &c. Hence, of late, we hear so much of the importance of conservatism, as it is called. The political movements of the last few months seem to indicate that our land-lords, and our cotton-lords, and merchant princes, regard an alliance with the aristocracy of the south, as at least in some degree a security against the violation of vested rights, sequestration of rents, oppressive taxation, unequal laws, &c. &c. To the influence of gentlemen of this class, the late slave law owes its passage.

And is it indeed believed, that the rights of the rich will be protected by familiarizing the populace with the practice of injustice and cruelty towards the poor? Will the sight of innocent men seized in our streets, and sent in fetters to till the broad fields of great land owners, increase the reverence felt for land titles? Is it wise to give the people practical lessons in the demolition of all the barriers raised by the common law for the protection of the weak against the strong? Is it true conservatism to obliterate, in the masses, the sense of justice, the feelings of humanity, the distinction between right and wrong? No man looks with more loathing than I do, on the destructive and disorganizing theories of the day; but I have no idea of counteracting them by the extension of human bondage and the example of ferocious injustice in hunting innocent men and robbing them of all the rights of humanity. The only conservatism to which I look for the protection of my rights and property, is the inculcation of that "HIGHER LAW," which, with the authority of Deity and the sanctions of the invisible world, says to each individual, high or low, rich or poor, DO JUSTICE, LOVE MERCY—DO TO OTHERS AS YOU WOULD THEY SHOULD DO TO YOU.

But, alas! this law is sneered at by men whose all depends upon its observance. The vindications of property in MAN, which are poured forth from the pulpit, the forum and the press—the maintenance of caste in the church—the apathy with which the oppression of three millions of countrymen is viewed—the permission given to introduce slavery into our new territories, with a pledge to receive them as slave States—the broken faith of many of those by whom the permission and pledge were given—the contempt expressed for the scruples of conscience, and the horrible iniquity of the fugitive law—are all combining to break down those barriers of justice, humanity, and the fear of God, which, under our popular form of government, can alone stay the flood of spoliation and anarchy. Well may we tremble lest God should apply to our nation the maxim of his moral government towards individuals "whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Yours respectfully,

WILLIAM JAY.

SOUTH CAROLINA BAPTISTS ON SLAVERY.

The Southern Baptist, organ of the Baptists in the State of South Carolina, makes the following declaration respecting their opinions on slavery:

"So far from believing Slavery to be a sin, they believe it to be an institution sanctioned by God, and the best relation of the servers and served that can exist."

DENMARK AND THE DUCHIES.

To the Members of the late Peace Congress at Frankfort.

You are, perhaps, generally aware, that on the morning of the last sitting of the Congress, a gentleman of high respectability from Berlin, applied to the Bureau for permission to present a memorial, signed by several distinguished individuals of that city. This memorial requested the Congress to investigate the merits of the controversy now pending between Denmark and the Duchies of Schleswig-Holstein. On consideration, it was decided that such an investigation could not be entered upon without violating one of the rules which had been adopted for the regulation of the proceedings, and which proscribed any direct allusion to the political events of the day. Nevertheless, many of the members of the Congress were inspired with an earnest desire that no favorable opportunity should be lost for interposing pacific counsels, with the hope of preventing the further effusion of blood, and of promoting an amicable adjustment of the differences.

Entertaining this hope, and disclaiming all intention of entering on the merits of the case, we ventured, solely on our own responsibility, to proceed to the theatre of the contest, for the purpose of entreating the contending parties to refer the whole question at issue to the decision of enlightened and impartial arbitrators, and thus to spare themselves the further infliction of the calamities and horrors of a war, which could never satisfactorily settle the matter in dispute, and which is contemplated with pain and sorrow by the friends of religion and humanity throughout the world.

In order to prevent any misapprehension in regard to the object of our voluntary mission, we embodied the views expressed in the preceding paragraphs in a written statement, intended to be presented in the first place to the authorities of Schleswig-Holstein. We arrived at Kiel in the evening of the 2d of September, and the next day waited upon the President of the Representative Assembly and several members of that body, upon the Burgomaster, persons connected with the University, and other influential individuals, representing different classes of the community, and explained to them the object of our visit. Although a fixed determination was manifested to resist force by force to the last extremity, yet, without a single exception, they expressed their willingness to leave the whole question at issue to impartial arbitration.

On the following day, we proceeded to Rendsburg, the principal fortress in Holstein, and then the seat of the Schleswig-Holstein Government; and waited upon the Stadtholders and other members of the Government. They received us with the greatest courtesy, and listened with serious attention to our written statement, and to the consideration and arguments which we urged in favor of arbitration, as an equitable and practical mode of settling the existing difficulty. They replied that it was quite impossible for the Government of the Duchies to make any proposition, and that we must distinctly understand, that we had no mission from them to the Danish Government. But they added,

That they should be willing to refer the claims of the Duchies to the decision of enlightened and impartial arbitrators, provided Denmark would also submit its claims to the same tribunal, reserving for eventual arrangement the appointment, composition, and jurisdiction of the Court.

We reduced this reply to writing, and afterwards submitted it to their examination, when they assented to its accuracy.

Having obtained this declaration from the Government of the Duchies, we left the next morning for Copenhagen, where we arrived on the 10th inst., after having been detained several days in quarantine.

We readily obtained separate interviews with the Prime Minister, and with the Minister of Foreign Affairs, who received us with great cordiality and kindness. We presented to them a written statement of the object of our mission, and of what transpired at Rendsburg. We invited their especial attention to the Treaty of Alliance between Denmark and the Duchies, bearing date 1533, which was renewed in 1623, and confirmed at Travendahl in 1700; by which "the contracting parties bound themselves mutually to assist each other, and, with respect to any differences that might arise between them, they agreed to adjust them, not by means of arms, but by means of councillors constituted as arbitrators, on the part of each, and disengaged from their oath of allegiance." We concluded our statement in these words:—

"We come as private individuals, invested with no political authority. But we know that we represent the convictions and sympathies of millions, both on this and the other side of the Atlantic; and we entreat the Danish Government, in the name of our common Christianity, to arrest the farther slaughter of those to whom God has united them, not only by the ties of the universal brotherhood of man, but also by close affinity and neighbourhood, and whom they even consider their own countrymen. We earnestly appeal to them to put an end to this unnatural and deplorable war, and accept a mode of settlement which shall recognize and establish the just rights of both parties, and heal the breach which the sword has made between them." We added a few verbal remarks, and among others to the effect that Denmark, by this mode of settlement, would release herself from those obligations to foreign diplomacy which might obstruct the full development of her free institutions.

Both the ministers expressed their desire to effect a satisfactory and pacific arrangement. They said they were sensible of the evils of the war, and were anxious to bring it to a speedy termination, by an amicable mode of adjustment. At our last interview with the Minister of Foreign Affairs, he said substantially, that if the Government of the Duchies would authorize a plan or basis of arbitration, the Danish Government would take it into immediate consideration. We subsequently received the declaration, that they accepted the principle of arbitration to the same extent, that it was accepted by the Schleswig-Holstein Government at Rendsburg.

Having received this reply, we returned to Kiel, to communicate it to the Government of the Duchies, and to endeavor to induce a direct negotiation on the composition, appointment, and jurisdiction of the Court of Arbitration. On the 23d and 24th inst., we met the Minister of Foreign Affairs, who authorized a plan of arbitration prescribed by the treaty between the two countries, to which we have referred. He also appointed a gentleman to meet any one the Danish Government should be willing to commission, for the purpose of agreeing upon the measures requisite to carry this plan into effect. Steps have been taken to bring these parties together as early as possible; and one of our number (Elihu Burritt,) will remain at Hamburg, for a few weeks, with a view of doing all in his power to facilitate and expedite this preliminary stage of negotiation.

Although you were in no way responsible for our voluntary mission, yet as it originated in the Memorial addressed to the Peace Congress from Berlin, and knowing the deep interest felt on the subject, we have deemed it right to lay this statement before you. There may yet be difficulties in the way of a final and satisfactory settlement between the contending parties; but we have great confidence that those with whom it now rests, will be able to bring it to a speedy and successful conclusion. And, indeed, it has filled us with astonishment as well as sorrow, that this unnatural war, in which brother is arrayed against brother, and even father against son, should ever have been declared, or have continued so long, with men at the head of both Governments, who appear to feel strongly those obligations of humanity, and of the religion of Christ, which impose upon them the solemn duty to settle the difference by reason and justice, and not by an appeal to brute force. If such an arrangement be not now effected, we believe that it will be mainly attributable to the interference of the great European Powers, contrary to the wish of one of the contending parties, as indicated in the London Protocol of the 2d of August—a document which has excited strong dissatisfaction in the minds of the inhabitants of the Duchies, and in which millions in other portions of Europe largely participate.

If the steps now in progress shall result in a pacific solution of this aggravated difficulty, we hope that the friends of peace will be encouraged to labour, with renewed zeal and activity, to substitute, in every case of international controversy, the arbitration of reason, justice, and humanity, for the cruel and barbarous decision of the sword.

Hamburgh, September 25th, 1850.

From the Sunderland Herald.

H. H. GARNET AND J. W. C. PENNINGTON,
AT SUNDERLAND, ENGLAND.

A public anti-slavery meeting was held in Smyrna Chapel, on Monday evening last. The Rev. John Parker presided. Long before the time appointed for the services of the evening, the chapel was crowded to excess; and as it was thought desirable that none who had come interested in the prosperity of the movement should be disappointed, it was resolved to open Union Chapel for those who could not obtain admittance into Smyrna. In a few minutes that chapel was also crowded. When Dr. Pennington and the Rev. Henry Highland Garnet, gentlemen of color, and once slaves, but now ministers of the Gospel, the former in the city of New York, and the latter at Geneva, State of New York, entered the chapel, the immense assembly rose, and in the most welcome and enthusiastic manner greeted them as brethren. It was then agreed that they should each address both meetings. The Rev. James Muir presided over the meeting in Union Chapel. The addresses of the gentlemen were eloquent, persuasive, and thrilling, and were received with expressions of the highest approbation. Many of their statements filled the audience with horror, and drew from them the deepest sympathy. They showed that the history of slavery on the cotton fields of America is the very epitome of human misery. The slaves are treated like beasts of burden—their family ties are disregarded—they are constantly worked under the whip—even the women being flogged unmercifully, when they fail in accomplishing their appointed task. Should they attempt to escape, they are hunted with bloodhounds, and not unfrequently shot down like wild beasts. They exhibited American slavery as they had seen and felt it; they showed its debasing character, injustice, and impolicy, even in a temporal light; the oppression, cruelty, and wretchedness of the fugitive slave law, lately passed by both houses of Congress, and which is now the law in operation in that country. They also pointed out the means by which the system may be entirely suppressed, viz., by using free labor produce, and refusing to touch, or taste any article produced or manufactured by slaves. In the United States, Brazil, and Spanish colonies there are seven millions of slaves who produce cotton, sugar, rice, tobacco, and coffee, which articles are consumed in large quantities by the British nation. They give the slaveholders their money or manufactures in exchange for the products of the blood-stained fields, and thus furnish the means for continuing the atrocious system. The remedy is apparent—abstain from their produce, and slavery must cease. A whip of a slave-driver was shown, which has often been wet with the blood of the oppressed slave. This whip was nine feet in length, a fearful weapon to be applied to the punishment of a human being. Manacles for the legs and necks, which had been manufactured in Birmingham, were also shown, and produced sensations of the most intense nature, and cries of “shame, shame.” Both meetings were most enthusiastic. The Rev. James Pringle, from Newcastle, Revds. S. Watkinson and John Morris, with Mr. Wakinsbaw, took a part in the proceedings of the evening. A vote of thanks was given to the strangers in the same expressive manner as they had been greeted when they entered the meeting. A collection was taken for aiding the good work commenced; it was liberal, and showed the intense feeling of the meeting. After prayer, by the presiding gentleman, the meeting separated. On Wednesday morning at 11 o’clock, a most respectable meeting was held in Union chapel, for forming a Ladies’ Anti-Slavery Association, for promoting the sale of free labor produce. The Association was formed with all its office-bearers; and a considerable number of ladies have become members. There is a something about these movements that leads us to contemplate the day as not far distant when slavery shall be no more.

ELIHU BURRITT'S VISIT TO HUMBOLDT.

During Elihu Burritt's tour of preparation for the Peace Congress at Frankfort, with Henry Richard of London and M. Visschers of Brussels, they visited the celebrated Baron Humboldt. The following account of this interview, we find in Burritt's Christian Citizen:

"Monday, July 22, was the most important and interesting day of our operations and enjoyments in Berlin, and its vicinity. At 8 A. M. we took the railway train for Potsdam, for the purpose of waiting upon the celebrated BARON VON HUMBOLDT. Immediately on our arrival, at that metropolis of palaces, we repaired to one of them, in which he was residing as chamberlain to the king. It was to me one of the most impressive incidents of my life, to appear in the presence of such a man, whose greatness and glory will outlive the memory of all the kings that ever sat upon the Prussian throne. All was simple to a rigid degree—the servants, the rooms, &c. Nothing indicated the residence of ostentation, pride or luxury. The servants took in our cards, and immediately returned and conducted us into the presence of the distinguished sarant. He received us with that easy, unaffected affability and kindness which makes one at home with men of true eminence of mind and character. He is now more than eighty, but comparatively active, and full of vivacity in his conversation. His head which inclines a little forward, could belong to no one but a Humboldt, and his countenance is full of benevolent expression. Mr. Visschers immediately introduced the subject of our interview in a few happy remarks in French; when the venerable man commenced with the very beginning of the Peace movement, and alluded to all the early writers on the subject, both in Germany and France, and in other countries. He spoke with great rapidity and animation, sometimes in French, then in German, and occasionally in English. Owing to my distance from him, and the continual rattling of wheels in the street, I lost much of what he said. Having glanced rapidly over the history of the individual and organized efforts to promote peace, he frankly stated his views of the obstacles and difficulties which oppose the realization of the idea. He had seen too many Congresses to expect any very practical result from them. The whole history of the world, for the last 60 years seemed fresh in his memory, and the shadow of the past, embodying periods of moral darkness, violence and bloodshed, appeared to eclipse the sunlight of that better future which dawns upon a less extended experience. The want of respect to the first and fundamental principles of justice, which marked the conduct of nations, he thought would be a serious impediment to any arrangement which should prevent them from resorting to arms to settle difficulties which had excited their passions and prejudices. To illustrate this, he referred to the example of the United States in the war with Mexico, and to the transactions which led to that war. Still he said he could not permit us to go away with the impression that he was unfavorable to our enterprise. Far from it. His heart was with us in the work; and he wished us abundant success. He was too old to go himself to the Congress, but he would write a letter giving his full adhesion to its objects, and without stating the difficulties which he had enumerated. I then addressed to him a few words, in reference to the profound veneration which was felt for his name and character in the United States, and to the importance which the friends of peace in that country would attach to his adhesion to our great movement. He then spoke, with a great deal of feeling, of his interest in American institutions; of his sojourn in the United States; of his acquaintance with Jefferson, and other great men, saying that he felt and called himself a citizen of the Union. But the more he was attached to the country and her institutions, and the more he hoped from them for the world, the more he was grieved at the reckless spirit of aggression and conquest which produced and sanctioned the war with Mexico, and the Cuban expedition, for more slave territory. If Russia, or any European monarchy had done this, it would not have been such a matter of surprise; but in the United States, from which the world expected so much, it was a matter of astonishment and sorrow. He regarded slavery as the great evil of our country—the black spot on our national reputation, to which despotic governments and dynasties love to point their subjects, as an illustration of the first fruits of democracy. Still he could understand and appreciate the difficulty, and perhaps danger, of the immediate and unconditional emancipation of the slaves in the United States; but he could not understand the eager avidity which was manifested to extend the institution to new territory, and to seize that territory by violence. These were hard truths for an American to hear and digest; and I feel deeply, what every honest American must be made to feel in Europe, how completely the existence of slavery paraly-

zes the moral influence of our great nation upon the Governments and peoples of the Old World at this important transition moment. I however made a few remarks in reply to his observations, admitting their truthfulness and propriety, but suggesting that the struggle which he had observed in America, to extend the territory and domination of slavery, was a struggle for its existence in the old states; that slavery must die, unless a constantly expanding territory is provided for its extension; that the Southern States see, feel and assert this; hence their determination or desire to acquire new territory to cover with slavery. But, I observed, the anti-slavery sentiment in the Northern States was becoming stronger and stronger every day, and the determination more fixed, not only to prevent the further extension of slavery, but to exterminate the institution in the old states in which it exists, by all the moral and legitimate means which could be employed. I found that he was perfectly acquainted with the movements in America, with the deliberations and proceedings in Congress, and with almost every phase of our politics. He adverted also to the invaluable contributions to science; to the astronomical observations and investigations made by the citizens of the United States, of which he spoke in high terms of commendation.

Our interview lasted nearly an hour, and we took our leave of the distinguished savan, more impressed than ever with his vast knowledge and experience.

ANTI-SLAVERY MEETING IN BARBADOES.

A highly interesting anti-slavery meeting was held in this island on the 1st of August last, the Chief Justice presiding. Our space will only permit us to give an outline of the proceedings.

W. H. Austin moved the first resolution—"That this meeting rejoices, with gratitude to Almighty God, at the successful abolition of slavery in these colonies, and the extinction of much wickedness and woe attendant on that monster evil, and ardently desires the universal abolition of the slave trade and of slavery."—That slavery was a "monster evil" was known by the personal experience of most in that room. He gave some illustrations of what he had himself seen, but declared that, bad as it was, it was better than in the foreign colonies.

The Rev. J. L. Badham, in an eloquent speech, seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

Joseph Hamilton moved—"That the disuse of slave produce being a potent auxiliary to the great anti-slavery movement, this subject is earnestly pressed on the considerate attention of the friends of freedom, that, as far as practicable, they may try the experiment, and thus promote the good work, and enjoy the satisfaction of using the produce of free labor only."—The disuse of slave produce, he said, as far as practicable, by every friend of humanity, would tend, he believed, to diminish in a great degree the amount of such produce in the markets, and thereby give a moral check to the abominable traffic, by which no less than about 150,000 of their poor suffering fellow-creatures were stolen and torn from their homes and carried into distant countries, where they were worked as beasts of burden. He considered that the Sugar Act of 1846 had given an impetus to the traffic. It had increased the amount of slave labor—prolonged the existence of slavery itself in the colonies of Spain and Brazil—and promoted the feeling of cupidity for gain in the breast of the slave dealer, who has no more right to the unrequited labor of his fellow-man than the purchaser of stolen goods has to the articles of which he is found in possession. But he hoped that something would soon be done by the Government and Parliament of Great Britain to remedy this great moral evil.

J. Y. Edgehill, in seconding the resolution, showed that the disuse of slave produce, and not the British squadron, was a grand means of rendering slave labor unproductive, and thus suppressing the African slave-trade. Here was a practical mode of evincing their sincerity in the anti-slavery cause. This island had contributed, for the last five years, some £16,000 or 17,000 sterling towards the perpetuation of slavery in Brazil and Cuba, by using the sugar of those countries, sent hither from the refineries of England. How much they had helped the slaveholders of America by the use of rice, tobacco, &c., &c., he was not able to say, from the late hour at which the resolution had been put into his hand. If they cried in one breath against slavery, and in the other asked for refined slave sugar, and rice produced by slave labor, the slaveholder would laugh at them. Their life and practice must be consistent with their preaching. Barbadoes could reject those articles from daily use, and substitute for them her own free produce, and the fault was in the inhabitants themselves if it were not done. He was for abolishing slavery by all moral means, and here was one which was within the reach of all. If the people of England had adopted it when that country supported the slave-trade, it was not too much to ask, or expect, the people of Barbadoes to adopt it now.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

S. J. Prescod moved the third resolution—"That the friends of freedom in the United States of America were entitled to, and are hereby assured of, the hearty sympathy of the anti-slavery people of Barbadoes; and that the practice which obtains in the Southern States, of arresting and confining in prison the free colored subjects of Great Britain, should be protested against by every class of her Majesty's subjects in this hemisphere."—He paid a handsome tribute to the abolitionists of America, who were second only to our own Clarkson and Wilberforce. That they were entitled to the sympathy and the prayers of the friends of freedom, was well known to those who had any acquaintance with the iniquitous system that prevailed in the States. To the second part of the resolution he spoke at considerable length. He mentioned two cases of natives of Barbadoes being confined in prison in Charleston, and dwelt upon the case recently published in England, and brought before the House of Commons by Mr. Cockburn. At Lord Palmerston's reply he expressed himself very indignantly. It was clear that in America a man, for no other crime than having African blood in his veins, might be taken from under the British flag and subjected to imprisonment, or even reduced to slavery. Lord Palmerston had recently endangered the peace of Europe to obtain for Englishmen their property that had been invaded, but he coolly told the British subjects of these colonies that their liberty would not be protected by him. He (Mr. Prescod) should never place himself in circumstances to be put in prison in America; but he did not know what accident might compel him to put in there; and if he ever found himself in any of the Southern States, he should be conscious that he was not to expect protection from England's Minister. In those circumstances he should rely only on his own resources, and remember that it was better to die a free man than live a slave.

A. Barclay briefly seconded the resolution, which was carried unanimously.

After thanks to the chairman, the meeting separated.—Anti-slavery Reporter.

AFRICA.

What a wonderful continent is this rounded, smooth-shored Africa, known from the earliest dawn of time, yet so unknown; the granary of nations, yet sterile and fruitless as the sea; swarming with life, yet dazzling the eyes with its vast tract of glittering sand! North America, first seen but the other day, has been probed from end to end: its gallant and restive Philips, Tecumseh, and Montezumas, have been bridled and broken by the white man; but Africa has seen no Cortez, or even a De Soto or La Salle, "wringing favor from fate." Some solitary Mungo Park, or faithful Lander, or persevering Burckhardt alone has tried to read the secret of the mother of civilization, the gray-haired Africa.

If we seek a land of romance and mystery, what quarter of the globe compares with that which holds the pyramids; the giant Theban temples, one roof of which clusters a modern village; the solemn hewn mountain cliff of a sphinx; the ruins of Carthage; the Nile with its hidden sources; the Niger with its unknown outlet; the heaven-bearing Atlas; the dimly-seen Mountain of the Moon?

There, reader, the slave rose romantically to be the ruler of millions; there Moses floating in his cradle, is saved by a king's daughter, and, like the hero of some earlier chivalry, breaks the bonds of his people, and founds a new and mighty nation. There was the home of Dido, of Hannibal, and the scene of Scipio's triumphs and Jugurtha's crimes; there lived Tertullian, Athanasius, and Augustine; the romance of the Moors dwelt there; the last breath of Louis of France was drawn there.

Africa is the home of the leviathan, the behemoth, the unicorn, the giraffe, the slight antelope, the earth-shaking elephant, the unaccountable lion, the all-conquering buffalo. It is the home too of the mysterious negro races, yet lying dormant in the germ, destined perhaps to rule this earth when our proud Anglo-Saxon blood is as corrupt as that of the descendants of Homer and Pericles.

The past, present, and future of Africa are alike wrapped in mystery. Who can tell us of the childhood of dark-browed Egypt, square-shouldered and energetic?—Carthage, the England of the world's rulers, has not even a romancing Livy, still less an unwearied Niebuhr, to explain her rise and untangle the mysteries of her constitution. Of all the vast interior, what do we know more than the Punic merchants, who, like us, dealt there, taking slaves, ivory and gold?

And what can we hope hereafter to see in those immense, unknown lands? The European has driven the North American, step by step, toward extinction, and has given a great continent the full development and trial of whatever permanent power the Caucasian race possesses; but Africa is preserved—for what?—For future contest? For an imported foreign civilization, to be entered through Liberias and Cape Colonies? France and Britain are watching each other now along those burning sands, as they once watched by the icy rocks of Canada and Arcadia: is it to end in the same subjection of the aboriginal owners to one or both of these? Or does the dark race, in all its varieties, possess a capacity for understanding and living out the deep meaning of the world's ruler, Christianity, as the offspring of the followers of Odin never did, and never can, understand and act it.

If the old Egyptian Sesostrius had paused to contemplate the illiterate wanderers of Greece, to whom Cadmus was just striving to make known the letters of Phœnicia, would not Plato and Aristotle have seemed as impossible to him as the existence in Africa of a higher Christianity than has yet been seen, seems to us? Would not the present position of the Teutonic race have appeared equally incredible to the founder of the Parthenon, or the loungers in the gardens of the Academy?—Foreign Review.

DRAYTON AND SAYRES.

Drayton and Sayres are still in prison at Washington, for befriending certain fugitive slaves in their attempt to escape awhile since. They are ill clothed and fed, poor, needy, and in distress! Shall they be neglected and forgotten? The Editor of the National Era receives donations.

POETRY.

From Bueritt's Christian Citizen.

THE NEGRO FUGITIVE'S APPEAL TO HIS WHITE BROTHER.

[Especially addressed to those who have signed the Pledge of Universal Brotherhood.]

Brother! 'tis not every white man
That my sable hand would clasp,
They would shrink, as if polluted,
From a negro's friendly grasp.
But our holy pledge assures me
Thou wilt look, with pitying eye,
On my race, despised, degraded,
Held in Christian slavery.

Christian! nay, 'twas profanation
To pollute that sacred word,
Linking it unto a system
Hateful to the Christian's Lord.
No! the slave-gang and the auction,
Cruel whip and burning brand,
Tell us of a fiend-like system,
Fit for darkest heathen land.

I have 'scaped through countless dangers
From the man who claimed my soul,
Mind and body, as his chattels,
Subject to his full control.
I have crossed Niagara's wave,
Canada is now my home;
But for dear ones still in bondage,
Brother, unto thee I come.

I have left an aged father,
But no wife is at his side;
Oh! my mother! ere we lost thee,
Rather would I thou hadst died.
Where thou art, alas! I know not,
Know not where my sisters dwell,
And where my younger brother pineth,
None the fugitive can tell.

Scattered in that Southern land,
Which is Christendom's disgrace,
Hopelessly they toil and languish,
'Midst the millions of our race;
Who, if they but knew the power
Sleeping in their fettered arm,
Even in one little hour
Could their tyrant's might disarm.

Yet I would not, e'en for freedom,
They should strike th' avenging blow;
Nor should slavery's bloody altar
Meet with bloody overthrow.
Rather let the hideous monster
Vanquished be by truth alone;
As the midnight darkness fleeth,
When the glorious light steals on.

Brother! such my simple story—
Thousands more could tell the same;
With such added scenes of horror
As would blanch thy cheeks to name.
Be 'No Compromise' thy watchword,
Pledge thyself to freedom now,
And to ceaseless hate of bondage,—
Then through life redeem thy vow.

The Quaker of the Olden Time.

BY JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER.

The Quaker of the olden time!—
How calm and firm and true,
Unspotted by its wrong and crime
He walked the dark earth through!

The lust of power, the love of gain,
The thousand lures of sin
Around him, had no power to stain
The purity within.

With that deep insight, which detects
All great things in the small,
And knows how each man's life affects
The spiritual life of all.

He walked by faith and not by sight,
By love and not by law;
The presence of the wrong or right,
He rather felt than saw.

He felt that wrong with wrong partakes,
That nothing stands alone,
That whoso gives the motive, makes
His brother's sin his own.

And, pausing not for doubtful choice
Of evils great or small,
He listened to that inward voice
Which called away from all.

Oh! Spirit of that early day,
So pure and strong and true,
Be with us in the narrow way
Our faithful fathers knew.

Give strength the evil to forsake,
The cross of Truth to bear,
And love and reverent fear to make
Our daily lives a prayer!

PROSPECTUS.

The NON-SLAVEHOLDER has been suspended for two years, and the class of community among whom it circulated has sustained a loss. A strong desire for its resumption has been evinced by numbers, on both sides of the Atlantic, and the present Editor finds himself in an unsought position, which he would by no means consent to occupy, did he not hope thereby to be of some service to his fellow-men, and to the cause of Truth.

As the present is a specimen number, it will, in some degree, exhibit the intended character of our journal. Our object and principles are identical with those so well set forth in the first number of the former series, and maintained with so much ability and in so christian a spirit throughout the five years of its course. Primarily, we aim at bearing a temperate but most uncompromising testimony against Slavery, and, in doing so, to enforce the fine idea embodied in our motto.

The thralldom of INTEMPERANCE, the tyranny of PARTY, the system of WAR, and the DEATH PENALTY, ("the crime of law") shall be considered legitimate objects of attack;—whilst we shall be willing to diversify our pages, so far as our space will admit, with the flowers of literature, to relieve, for a moment, the eye of the pained and overtaxed moralist, when his

"Soul is sick with every day's report
Of wrong and outrage."

We enter upon our new and unexpected engagement with diffidence, yet with a degree of confidence.

The NON-SLAVEHOLDER, is to be issued on the first Fourth day in each month, at the terms stated at the head of this page. When taken in clubs of eight, the price (25 cents per annum) will be little more than nominal. It will be cheaper to the subscriber than to the Editor and Proprietor. The cash system forms an essential part of our arrangements, and payments must invariably be made in advance. Our friends are requested to forward their subscriptions, in current funds, post paid, with explicit statements of each subscriber's Post Office address, to the Publisher, George W. Taylor, N. W. cor. Cherry & Fifth Sts., Philadelphia. Editors disposed to exchange will direct to "Non-Slaveholder, Burlington, New Jersey."

WHO ARE THE SLAVEHOLDERS?

A MORAL DRAWN FROM "UNCLE TOM'S CABIN."

Let us fancy ourselves in a pleasant country place, named Fernbrake, situated in one of England's midland counties. It is a village of the genuine old English stamp; in other words, a collection of houses of all shapes, sizes and conditions, not set in close rank and file, but standing as though dropped at random from the clouds into a region of orchards, gardens and rickyards; the roads between them so delightfully irregular as to remind one of "Knickerbocker's History of New York," the streets of which city, he says, were planned by the cows making a track among the bushes, and the early inhabitants building houses by the side of it.

The western end of this long rambling place abuts upon an extensive plain, and the last house in the village is the residence of the Stanfields, the worthy family with whom we have to do. The building is one of those "homesteads warm and low," which give such an air of comfort to an English landscape. It is built in the Elizabethan farm-house style, with mullioned casements and pointed gables. The house fronts southward into a garden, in which ornament and utility are pleasingly combined. The windows are fringed with jessamines and Chinese roses, and the old porch is overhung by a magnificent vine which presents its purple clusters most temptingly. Behind the building, and at a respectful distance, is the farm-yard, flanked by a noble array of corn-ricks, the harvest being just completed. Our business, however, is within, and the time of our visit is the evening, soon after the tea-things have been dismissed. We have gained admission to the antique sitting room, with its wainscot panelling and huge carved mantelpieces. Mrs. Stanfield is one of those sensible people that like to make themselves and others comfortable; and, as the evenings are cool, she has a moderate fire in the grate, just sufficient to diffuse a genial glow through the apartment. The master of the mansion sits ensconced in his arm-chair; the labors of the day concluded, he is prepared to enjoy himself with his family, which consists of half a dozen happy-faced children, between the ages of four and fourteen, who, with their mother, are seated at a round table, occupied with various light handicrafts and amusements. For several successive evenings they had spent the hour after tea in listening to that beautiful and affecting tale, "Uncle Tom's Cabin," read aloud by the elder children. Where is the Christian family that could stand the brunt of such an onset? Mrs. Stowe had swayed their minds as though she played upon a musical instrument. They had laughed and wept, despaired and exulted, melted into tenderness, and burned with indignation, as the narrative proceeded. They had trembled with Eliza in her elopement with her doomed child; laughed at Sam's devices for retarding the pursuit of the fugitives; sympathized with Aunt Chloe when her "old man" was torn from her; and cried "shame!" at the brutal Haley as he put the fetters upon Uncle Tom. They had been delighted with Tom's good fortune at New Orleans, and enraptured with little Eva his guardian angel. They had admired the dashing amiability of St. Clare, while they scouted the heartless selfishness of his wife. They had marvelled at the military tactics of "friend Phineas," and rejoiced at the downfall of Tom Loker. They had smiled at the hobgoblin of Topsy, and shuddered at poor Prue's horrid death. They had wept by the death-bed of the infant evangelist; melted under the heartfelt prayers of Uncle Tom; mourned the cruel fate of St. Clare, and deprecated the avaricious policy of his widow. They had traced poor Tom from the palace to the auction-block; accompanied him to Legree's plantation; execrated the proceedings of that fiend incarnate; thrilled with horror over Cassy's story; agonized with Uncle Tom in his sufferings, and boiled with indignation at his cruel martyrdom. The whole party, from the eldest to the youngest, had hung upon the narrative with intense interest; and it had left upon their hearts a deep and vivid impression of the heinous character of American slavery, suggesting the inquiry so natural to all well-regulated minds, "Can we do anything for its mitigation?"

"I am glad we are not slaveholders," said little Frank.

"And so am I," "And so am I," echoed other five juvenile voices.

"Right, my dears," said Mrs. Stanfield: "it is a pleasant thought that our country has washed its hands of slavery by the noble act of emancipation."

"What," said Lucy, the eldest of the group, "were Englishmen ever so wicked as to hold slaves?"

"Yes," replied her mamma, "it is not yet twenty years since, that, after a long and arduous struggle, the fetters of the West India slaves were broken, and twenty millions sterling paid to their masters to compensate them for an act of justice."

"And so lately as when I was a boy," said Mr. Stanfield, "Englishmen were engaged in the atrocious slave-trade; they did not scruple to burn down the huts of the poor Africans, then drive their wretched captives to the coast, crowd them into the pestiferous slave-ships, and, after delivering a third or one half of their human cargo to the sharks, they sold the survivors to the planters of the West Indies, who worked them like beasts of burden in their cane-fields."

"All too true," rejoined the lady, "and therefore, we should be the more thankful that it is done away. 'Slaves cannot breathe in England,' nor in all the wide dominions of Queen Victoria. Our seamen, instead of engaging in the slave-trade, now bravely risk their lives for its suppression, while Canada stands open to receive the hunted fugitives of American slavery, and secures them an asylum beyond the reach of the Fugitive Slave-law, and where the baffled master does not dare to follow them. Thus, not only are we no slaveholders, but our influence is altogether on the side of the slave. We have renounced all connection with the accursed system; and surely this is cause for thankfulness."

"So it would be if it were really the case," said Mr. Stanfield; "but 'do not let us crow till we are out of the wood.' What if I could prove that we are all slaveholders?"

This was a puzzler for the young people, who immediately commenced a round of busy speculations.

"Pa a slaveholder!" exclaimed George, the eldest boy; "why, that's a new idea entirely! I wonder where he keeps his whips and fetters! Perhaps we should find them in the barn if we were to look?"

"And I wonder where papa's slaves are to be found?" said Lucy. "Are they in the kitchen, do you suppose? Is the cook a slave, who threatened to leave her place last week because 'ma would not allow her lobster to make sauce for the boiled salmon? But here's Betsy with the coal-scuttle: perhaps she can tell us. Betsy! papa pretends he is a slaveholder: are you one of his slaves, or do you know of any he has about the premises?"

"Oh! Miss Lucy, you are joking me now! I am certain master has no slaves in the kitchen: what he may have in the stable-yard, I cannot say; but I, for one, never saw any there."

"I think I've got it," said little Frank; "he means the dumb animals about the place. You know the horses are sometimes lashed with a good stout whip, and the cows are driven to the pasture. I have seen Charlie beat them very hard with a hazle stick, when they sauntered on the way."

The idea was immediately enlarged upon by little Ellen, who sprang from her seat, and shouted to the dog and cat upon the hearth-rug, "Dash! are you a slave? Puss, are you?" Dash wagged his tail in denial of the imputation, and Pussy purred an emphatic "No!"

"Your guesses are all wide of the mark," said papa.

"Do tell us what you refer to," said Mrs. Stanfield: "we are all anxiety till we know what you mean."

"First, then, I will ask you one question, my dear," responded her husband. "If we are the means of holding our fellow creatures in bondage, does it make any difference whether they work for us on our own premises or 4000 miles away?"

"I should think not," rejoined the lady.

"And now, George, a question for you. Can you tell me how many families reside in this village of Fernbrake?"

"If I remember right," said George, "at the last census, we had a population exceeding a thousand, and if we reckon five people for each house, it will make rather more than 200 families."

"Well, then," said his papa, "If I could take you into the quarry, and show you thirty slaves, men, women, and children, toiling for the people of Fernbrake; brutal overseers amongst them with huge cart-whips, flogging them every time they venture to take a rest; and savage bloodhounds at their heels, to pursue the poor wretches if they should run away, would you not be horrified, and scandalized at the sight?"

"So we should." "We should, indeed," cried the children, with much emphasis.

"And mamma has just told us," continued Mr. Stanfield, "that if we really employ slaves, it is all one whether we have them at home or abroad."

"There can be no doubt on that head," said George.

"Well, then, although we, the people of Fernbrake, have no slaves at work for us in the stone-quarry, I have no doubt there are at least thirty human beings toiling for us under the terror of the lash elsewhere. If I had a telescope that could spy round corners, and the knowledge necessary to point them out, I might show you, probably, a dozen slaves, toiling on Spanish and Brazilian plantations, labouring in crop time (which comprises, at least, four months of the year,) for more than 18 hours a day, raising sugar for the people of Fernbrake! I might show you, perhaps, a dozen or more, working on the cotton plantations of America, exposed to all the miseries and hardships which are but too prevalent in these dens of cruelty. I might show you husbands torn from their wives, and children from their parents; poor people forbidden to learn to read, kept purposely in a state of brutal degradation, and shut out from the light and consolation of the Gospel; all these sufferings endured; all this wickedness perpetrated in raising cotton for the inhabitants of Fernbrake! I might tell you that these dozen cotton growers would all be killed off in eight or ten years, and a dozen more brought in to take their places; to toil, and suffer, and die like their predecessors; and that thus, in the course of one man's lifetime, about a hundred human beings would be murdered in raising cotton for this one village! Again, I might show you women, wading in the swamps of Carolina, companions of snakes and lizards; haggard and forlorn as Lapland witches; childless, friendless, comfortless; pining under miasma, bowed with rheumatism, shivering with ague; their existence but a living death, its only consolation that it soon must end; all this to produce rice for the inhabitants of Fernbrake."

"These are doleful pictures, indeed, dear papa," said Lucy; "and I am quite as well pleased that your wonderful telescope is not forthcoming. The mere description is enough for me."

"What made you say there were thirty of these poor creatures toiling for Fernbrake?" inquired George. "Have we any means of ascertaining the number?"

"It is of course but a vague estimate," replied Mr. Stanfield, "arrived at, I suppose, by considering the total amount of slave-produce brought into this country for home consumption, and from this data, calculating the number of slaves likely to be employed in raising it, and then dividing the whole population of Britain by the number so obtained. The result has been said to indicate that every five families in this country employ one slave; but in order to be quite safe, I have called it seven families, and if, as you calculate, we have above 200 families in Fernbrake, we must furnish employment to about thirty slaves."

"But how do you know, my dear, that we, in this house, are parties to these oppressions?" inquired Mrs. Stanfield anxiously.

"Did I not see in your last bill from the grocer's, an item for Porto Rico sugar? Is not the rice, so often on our table, and which is so large, and white, and pulpy, unmistakably the Carolina? And are you not aware that the material of your printed calicoes is American cotton, and that this, with a very small exception, is all slave-produce? More than half of the entire crop of American cotton comes to England, which thus becomes the main prop and bulwark of American slavery. So intimately are we connected with the cruel system, that the money value of a slave, in New Orleans, is said to be regulated on the Exchange of Liverpool: that is, when cotton rises rapidly in Liverpool, the price of slaves rises in America: when cotton falls, slaves fall. Nay, so deeply are we implicated, that some, who have excellent means of information, assert that American slavery could not possibly exist without the money support it derives from Britain."

Such was the decisive reply of Mr. Stanfield; and it drew from his feeling wife the rejoinder, "Well, I see we are self-convicted.—You have brought the evil home to our own doors. We must try to do better."

"But," continued Mr. Stanfield, "what if I say that worse remains to be told? I have shown you how the English people support slavery unconsciously; but, also! there are Englishmen to be found, men, too, of high respectability and standing, who support the slave trade with their eyes open! If I had the wonderful telescope of which I spoke, and were to direct it to the continent of Africa, I might show you long lines of miserable slaves on their route to the coast, linked together by chains manufactured for the purpose at Birmingham, or Wolverhampton. I might show you these poor creatures arrived at the barracoons, and bartered for flimsy calicoes and other fabrics termed 'coast goods,' got up for this trade in the looms of Manchester and Glasgow. I might show you them again, writhing and gasping in the hold of a slave ship, fitted out by the aid of British capital, and landed, in the form of living skeletons, in Cuba or Brazil, to raise an article for the British market—the sugar which sweetens our tea and coffee, our pies and puddings. Englishmen, perhaps, have too much refinement and good taste to engage in the awful slave-trade themselves, besides it is against the law of this country; but it appears to me that, by our conduct, we say virtually to the Spaniard and Brazilian, 'We have no taste for the slave-trade; we dislike to see human suffering; but we are fond of sugar, and must do business. We will supply you with piece goods, trinkets, and chains, as many as you require; we will discount your bills, and thus enable you fit out and man your ships, and we will buy your sugar as soon as it is ready. It is true our squadron is in the way. You know we must save appearances; and if 'Britannia rules the wave,' she must have a large navy, and some excuse for keeping it up. But this need not deter you from the adventure; for you know very well that you can afford to lose three vessels out of four, and have a good profit left. You have the savagery and we have the capital: between us it shall be done, and we will divide the spoils.' In a similar strain we address brother Jonathan: 'We abominate cruelty, but our looms and spindles cannot go without cotton; therefore, you do the whipping and hounding, and we will be your best customers.' Our gold is the bribe which the slaveholders look to as the reward of their oppressions."

"I see your argument, papa," said George: "you wish us to understand that the planters do not keep slaves from the love of slavery, but for the money which it brings them; and if it were not for the support afforded by customers, slavery would cease. No doubt, this is quite true; but as it is impossible to make every one think so, and as there are many who, if they saw it, have not the conscience to act upon it, but would still go to the cheapest market, it seems to me that the slaveholders would yet find customers if half the houses in England were closed against their produce."

"Remember, George, it is our own deeds we shall have to answer for, and not those of others; at least if we have done our duty by them in laboring to induce them to act differently. If a thief were to come and offer you some stolen goods, or a smuggler were to tempt you with some cheap silk handkerchiefs, would you consider yourself warranted in saying to yourself, 'Well, if I do not buy them my neighbor will; I may as well have a good bargain for once?' or would such an excuse hold good in the eye of the law, which condemns the receiver of stolen goods as well as the thief? It would be far more noble to take a different course and say, 'Let others do as they may, as for me, I will do what is right. If all the world conspire to uphold slavery, I am determined it shall have no support from me, although my opposition should be but as a drop in the bucket. You shall not find me amongst those who cry out against an iniquity and then revel in its fruits.' Mrs. Stowe, I think, states our principle in her 12th chapter, where she says, speaking of the slave-dealer Haley, 'He is a shocking creature, isn't he—this trader? so unfeeling! It's dreadful, really!.... But who, sir, makes the trader?—Who is most to blame: the enlightened, cultivated, intelligent man who supports the system of which the trader is the inevitable result, or the poor trader himself?' I only wish the same able pen had pressed this doctrine home on the consumers of slave produce. If all right-minded people in England and America would but withdraw their commercial support from the slaveholders, and transfer their custom to the free-labour cultivators, who pay wages to their work-people, like honest men, the weight of such a practical testimony would be incalculable, even though it failed in exerting any direct influence on the market."

"I wonder, my dear," said Mrs. Stanfield, "that when you feel these things so deeply, you have never spoken of them before. You know I am always ready to carry out your wishes; and besides, I shall now consider it a matter of duty to do what I can to patronize free-labor. But you must tell me how to proceed."

"I am conscious of my fault," replied Mr. Stanfield; "but although I have long had a glimmering of this principle, it is the affecting exposure of slavery in Mrs. Stowe's book that has driven the subject home, and compelled me to look at it seriously. Our connection with slavery is so ramified in this country, that total and immediate abstinence from its produce is impossible; but we may, to a great extent, avoid the staple articles on which the system depends for its support. Sugar, coffee, and rice, the produce of free-labor, may be procured by inquiry at almost any grocer's. It is true you may sometimes have to put up with an inferior article, but those who are earnest for a principle must be prepared to make some sacrifice. When your sugar happens to be a shade or two browner than you would desire, call to mind the example of the good William Allen, who abstained entirely from sugar for more than 40 years, and only recommenced its use on the day of the West Indian emancipation. Remember, too, that Clarkson has computed that, in the course of the arduous struggle against the slave-trade, 300,000 in this country, denied themselves the use of sugar rather than be found supporting the horrid traffic. With them, it was disusing sugar altogether; with us, it is merely preferring the free to the slave grown. The article of cotton is more difficult to deal with, as comparatively little of good quality, besides American, is brought to market. By a considerable effort, however, the friends of the slave have succeeded in bringing out a variety of articles, manufactured from cotton warranted the produce of free-labor. Other fabrics may be usefully substituted in linen at a very moderate price. Gradually, I hope, the difficulties in this department will be overcome, and then we may have the great satisfaction of dismissing slave-produce altogether from our houses. In the mean time, let us do our duty by increasing the demand, in order that the happy day may be hastened. If a large and unmistakable demand were once established, we might leave it to British enterprise to provide the supply."

The conversation, which had been listened to by the children with the deepest interest, was now interrupted by the nursemaid, who came to summon the two younger ones to bed; but, from that day forward, there were stationed to keep watch over Mrs. Stanfield's table and wardrobe, six of those little cruisers, which, according to Elihu Burritt, if established in every family, would be more effectual for the suppression of slavery and the slave-trade than the largest squadron in the world.—Newcastle [England] Anti-Slavery Series, No. 1.

A GOOD EXAMPLE.—At a recent election in Scotland the following was issued in a large placard about two feet long:—

"Bribery at Elections! Electors and Non-Electors!—Gentlemen, it is mean to be bribed with money! It is mean to be bribed with place. It is meaner, more degrading still, to be bribed with strong drink. Frown down the contemptible offer of strong drink as payment of a vote, and let the man who opens a public house, be shut out of the House of Commons."

To labor for a perfect redemption from the spirit of oppression, is the great business of the whole family of Christ Jesus, in this world.—J. Woolman.

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, FIRST MONTH, 5, 1853.

It is scarcely needful for us to inform the intelligent class from whom we hope to obtain our readers, that the SLAVE TRADE, though denounced as piracy, is still clandestinely abetted by citizens of the U. States. Witness the case of the Lady Suffolk, built and launched at Baltimore. A correspondent of the Herald says of her—

"She has sailed with her crew of 70 men for Africa. She is commanded by a notorious slave captain, who has hitherto been very successful as a slave trader, and who boasts of having murdered a boat's crew belonging to an English man of war, who attempted to board him on the coast of Africa."

We invite serious attention to the consideration, who gives the motive?

We have read, with interest, the "First Annual Report of the Walthamstow, [Eng.] Free Produce Association." It is an important document. Strong positions are clearly set forth, and enforced by resolutions. Witness the following—

"That a comprehensive train of religious thought, if brought to bear upon this subject, does not harmonize with and sanction the consumption of slave-labor merchandise—but does harmonize with and sanction the use of that which is freegrown." * * * "That the preference of free to slave labor merchandise, when the opportunity of choice between the slave and free labor article is open to the purchaser, is, emphatically, the christian preference."

PROHIBITORY LIQUOR LAW AMONG THE CHEROKEE AND CHOCTAW INDIANS.

We have highest authority for the statement, that excellent things, hidden from the sagacious expedientists, are "revealed unto babes"—and we not unfrequently find that, among savage or half civilized nations, the simple truth is arrived at by the same short and direct process which childhood employs.

We have before us, (the loan of our friend Dr. Butler, son of the honored and time-worn Missionary) a rare and valuable volume of "CHEROKEE DOCUMENTS"—in which we trace a series of Acts, commencing thirteen years ago, in which the course of entire prohibition is adopted, in reference to the traffic in ardent spirits. Similar laws had been enforced among them at least since the year 1823, but the following is the first Statute upon the subject, in the collection referred to.

AN ACT to prevent the introduction and vending of Ardent Spirits.

Be it enacted by the National Council, That the introduction or vending of Ardent Spirits, in this Nation, shall not be lawful; and any and all persons are prohibited from bringing or engaging in the traffic of ardent spirits within five miles of the National Council during its Session, or one mile from any of the places designated for holding Courts, during their session, or one mile of any public meeting or gathering in the Nation under penalty of having the same wasted or destroyed by any lawful officer or authorized person, by the sheriff, for such purpose.

Tah-le-quah, Cherokee Nation, Sept. 28, 1849.

W. SHOREY CONLEY,

President National Committee.

Concurred, YOUNG WOLF,

Speaker National Council.

DAVID CARTER,

Clerk National Council.

Approved, JOHN ROSS, Principal Chief.

After two years, we find this act substituted by a much more stringent one, with penalties annexed of from ten to five hundred dollars for each violation. Another Act in 1843 enforces the last one, and authorizes "the sheriffs or lawful officers of the several districts to procure search warrants, authorizing the entering and examining of any house when there is good reason for believing that spirituous liquors are therein concealed."

These enactments were not suffered to be a dead letter, but were strictly enforced. Nor did the sheriff wait for evidence that SALES had been made or contemplated. The liquor was evidence against itself, and was summarily "wasted." The paths leading from the white settlements were watched, and suspected persons were examined. As women had greater facilities for concealing the forbidden article in their robes, they were searched, and the spirit, if found, was promptly "wasted." The sale within the neighboring States being beyond the control of the Cherokees, the following resolutions, which ought to put the white man to the blush, and to stimulate him to action, were jointly passed by the National Committee and National Council.

Whereas, The use of ardent spirits, and other intoxicating liquors, is productive of the most demoralizing and otherwise degrading and mischievous effects; and

Whereas, The laws of this Nation prohibiting the introduction and sale of ardent spirits, are rendered inoperative to a great extent by the existence along the line within the States of Arkansas and Missouri, of distilleries, groceries, and tipping shops; from which those deleterious articles are issued to the Indians;

And whereas, Murders and other crimes of the most atrocious and alarming character, the very rehearsal of which is revolting to humanity, are clearly traceable to the still-house and the groceries as their source, Therefore

Resolved by the National Council, That the Principal Chief be, and is hereby requested, through such channel as he may deem proper, respectfully to ask of the Governors of the States of Arkansas and Missouri respectively, such co-operation, and the exertion of such influence as in their wisdom they may deem proper, effectually to put a stop to the traffic in ardent spirits along the Indian lines of their respective States.

Tah-le-quah, C. N., Jan. 10, 1851.

JOHN DREW,

President National Committee pro tem.

Concurred, A. CAMPBELL,

Speaker Council, pro tem.

Approved, JOHN ROSS,

In 1843, it was enacted by the General Council of the Choctaw Nation,

"That no person or persons shall be permitted to bring any whiskey or other ardent spirits into this Nation; and he or she so offending shall have the whiskey or other ardent spirits destroyed by the light-horsemen or any one of them; and the Captains and their warriors, of the several districts, shall have the power, and be bound to exercise the duties of the light-horsemen in assisting to destroy any whiskey or other ardent spirits which may be brought into this Nation."

The same act further provides for the protection of officers, who shall in self-defence kill any one who shall resist the destruction of his liquors; and attaches the penalty of death to any offender who shall in such resistance cause the death of an officer, or of any one engaged in the enforcement of this law.

Did our space admit, we would gladly transfer to our columns various specimens of wise and humane legislation—as, provisions for public schools, orphan schools, &c. One Act appropriates $30 per annum "for the benefit of Ke-ti-keski, a decrepid and destitute citizen of this Nation"—another entitled "AN ACT for a Pension for blind TARCHURSA" provides for him a like annuity and appoints for him a guardian. Another and subsequent Act, makes the same provision for all destitute blind citizens of the Cherokee Nation. It is to be deplored that in reference to the holding of Slaves, these Indians are little if any better than their white neighbors.

Many of our readers are aware that the Society of Friends, in Great Britain, some time ago, under apprehension of religious obligation, addressed to the governments of the world, a Christian Expostulation respecting Slavery. This address has been separately presented by deputations to most of the governments of Europe; to several of them, by that veteran minister of Christ, William Foister, and lastly, to the sovereign and officials of Portugal, by our valued friends Jno. Candler and R. W. Fox. This truly christian mission has, so far, been most cordially received. A letter from the Marquis de Bemposta to the Friends last named, says—

"Having received a copy of the manifesto addressed to the Sovereigns of Europe, and of the world, who profess Christianity, which you lately presented to her most Faithful Majesty the Queen of Portugal, and which has not only excited attention but admiration, and finding that we are working in the same vineyard, I cannot but express my cordial approbation of your mission," &c. &c.

John Candler and wife and Wilson Burgess are now about consummating a similar mission to Brazil. J. C. writes—

"I feel more and more satisfied that the religious concern of our Yearly Meeting is a right one. We do not look for very early truth from its labors; it is a work and walk of faith, but we already see that the Address, which we continue engaged to circulate, meets with a response in the hearts of some persons of influence abroad."

There have been incidents of surpassing moral beauty connected with this extended mission, with which we would seek to enrich our columns, did we not hesitate to violate the privacy of correspondence.

There are in Philadelphia ONE THOUSAND SEVEN HUNDRED AND TWELVE licensed Tavern keepers. It were easy to demonstrate in figures an immense pecuniary cost to the community resulting from this wholesale license to make drunk; but these statistical exhibits, though so startling, lose, by familiarity, their full effect upon the mind, though backed by a knowledge of a far more astounding amount of moral evil. There has been a degree of supineness upon the subject, resulting from the inefficiency and the failure of all restrictive measures. The present policy, however, of PROHIBITORY LAW, not only theoretically desirable, but practically benificent, and proved to be so by the experience of several Commonwealths, has inspired the patriot and the philanthropist with fresh hope. Let these be faithful and diligent in their efforts, by all Christian means, to enlighten the popular mind, and, by petitions and otherwise, to obtain a distinct and strong expression of popular sentiment in favor of the Maine Law, or its equivalent. Especially, let every prominent Temperance man carefully watch the course of Legislative action in his own State. Years of delay are not so much to be dreaded, as the tricks of wily politicians in the formation of law, as in the case of New Hampshire, where the statute was loaded with exonerations (not chargeable upon Temperance men,) for the apparent purpose of making it unconstitutional, of furnishing texts to its opponents, and of preventing its well-working and its perpetuity.

Considerable efforts have been lately made for the establishment of a wholesale Warehouse in London, for the supply of Free Labour goods. We are not advised of the result.

LITERARY NOTICES.

"THE SLAVE; HIS WRONGS AND THEIR REMEDY—Slavery is maintained by the purchase of its productions.—If there were no consumers of Slave produce there would be no Slaves."

The above is the title with the mottoes, of a very spirited and commendable monthly sheet, published in London, from which we could profitably make extracts did our space permit.

"HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, written according to the principles of Peace, by MARY MURRAY." This is a book which meets an absolute necessity of the age. It has our hearty commendation, with our desire for its general adoption in Schools. The following are among many notices which it has received.

Extract of a Letter from Judge Jay.

"I have read your book carefully, every page of it, and thank you for sending it to me, but still more for writing it. It is incomparably the best compendium of American History I have met with. It is remarkable for fulness, condensation and lucid arrangement. It is admirably adapted for use in common schools, and I wish it might be universally introduced into them. It is also a very convenient book for reference, the dates being so constantly and so conspicuously given."

WILLIAM JAY.

"An excellent book. Not only is it written, as all history ought to be, in the true spirit of Christianity, but has many other qualities which strongly commend it to general use in schools and families. It is lucid in arrangement, and brief, simple and perspicuous in style. It is of necessity little more than a full synopsis, within so small a compass, of our entire national history, yet sufficiently comprehensive for its purpose, and well deserves to be adopted as a textbook in our seminaries of learning. We wish our land and all Christendom were full of such histories, and only such in their moral tone. Every wise Christian parent will desire such a book for his children."—Advocate of Peace, Boston.

THE AFFECTIONATE AND CHRISTIAN ADDRESS of many thousands of the Women of England to their Sisters of the U. S. A.—This is a most christian and lady-like exposition on the subject of Slavery, and is now in circulation for signatures. We have but one criticism. It admits danger in immediate emancipation. The Word of the Lord through Isaiah (I. 16, 17) gives the true and safe order of Reform. "Put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes; cease to do evil—learn to do well."

THERE IS JOY IN HEAVEN OVER ONE SINNER THAT REPENTETH.

When to the lyre of Heaven
Another string was given,
The angels saw it glisten,
And hushed their harps to listen.

And when from Chaos first
Our mighty system burst,
The stars of morning sang
Till the high concave rang.

They saw new Heavens unfurled—
A re-created world—
The universe more wide—
Its Maker glorified!

And there was higher joy
Where bliss had ne'er alloy,
As the angelic choirs
Struck their resounding lyres.

And when, from endless death,
By penitence and faith,
Through HIS redeeming grace
Who loved our guilty race,

A sinner leaves his ways
And learns the voice of praise,
Washed in atoning blood
And reconciled to God,

Each high intelligence
Gains added bliss from thence,
And there is joy in Heaven
O'er one reclaimed, forgiven!

When sinful mortals bow
In self-abhorrence low,
With penitential tears,
With trembling and with fears,

Then countless seraph throngs
Raise their rejoicing songs,
And o'er ten thousand spheres
Are hailed those burning tears!

Oh, then, if angel eyes
Lend us their sympathies,
If God's unmeasured love
Is shared by all above,

Not unto Earth be given
Hopes which belong to Heaven!
Be it our aim to share
The high rejoicings there;

The banquet of the skies!
The untold ecstasies—
The ceaseless voice of praise
Which ransomed spirits raise!

be sent to the Publisher in Philadelphia. Exchange papers and communications for insertion should be addressed to "Non-Slaveholder," Burlington, N. J. (the residence of the Editor).
Our contributors are requested, in consideration of the smallness of our paper, to observe brevity and condensation. Should our subscription list warrant enlargement, we may add to the number of our pages. Will not our friends, in various places, form clubs of eight or more?

We have numerous gratifying expressions of welcome to our little Periodical. We extract from a few letters of valued correspondents, whom we cordially recognize as our Agents and co-workers.

WEST OREGON.—"I am glad that the Non-Slaveholder is resumed. I enclose $2 for eight copies."

SALEM, OHIO.—"I send $8 for the Non-Slaveholder, which please send to the following addresses. * * * I intend to obtain more as soon as possible. I am not aware of there being an agent in this place; if not, the writer would offer his services."

STARKSBORO', VERMONT.—"Having received the first No. of the Non-Slaveholder (New Series) I may acknowledge that the regret which encumbered my mind for its discontinuance, has given place to feelings of joy.
I fully believe that the Non-Slaveholder is altogether the best auxiliary, (in proportion to its amount of matter) in the cause of equal rights, of any Periodical that has come under my observation, and I offer my aid, feeble as it is, in serving as Agent. * * I send the enclosed, for copies to be sent as directed."

Among numerous letters of a like gratifying nature, we were cheered with an approving one from the large hearted Lewis Tappan, and one from our long loved friend, J. G. Whittier, whose continued failure of health saddens the hearts of thousands as they receive the tidings.
We quote a passage from his welcome favor:

"I am glad to see that thou hast undertaken to continue the NON-SLAVEHOLDER, believing as I do, that such a paper is needed. It touches a point of especial interest to the religious Society with which we are connected;
and in inculcating the particular duty of abstinence from the products of an oppressive system, it leads us also to inquire more closely of ourselves, how far, in our business, our habits of living, and in our general intercourse with our fellow men, we are directly or indirectly giving countenance to other evils, or other forms of oppression. I was pleased to see in thy first No. a notice of Mary Murray's History. I have carefully looked over the book, and fully concur in the favorable estimate of it which Judge Jay has so well expressed. It ought to be introduced into all Friends' Schools, and I should be glad to see it in all others."

THE CONSISTENT PLEADER.

"The Slave, the Slave, hath many wrongs,
Who might his pleader be?"—Lucy Hooper.

Not they who, in the expressive language of Holy Scripture, "join in affinity with the people of these abominations," and partake of the fruits of the oppression. It is an interesting fact, and strongly confirmatory of the truth of the doctrine which forbids the use of the products of slave labor, that a large proportion of those who, from a state of apathy or opposition in respect to the abolition of slavery, have become thoroughly convinced of the sinfulness of the system and earnestly desirous to plead the cause of the slave, have also felt a deep consciousness that, so far as they were partaking of the fruit of his forced and unpaid toil, their hands were contaminated and their moral power weakened. The "first love" of many has indeed waxed cold, and their tender consciences become seared, and their clear perceptions darkened and obscured through the influence of interest, or from considerations of convenience and policy.

Another large class of abolitionists err in this matter from "want of thought." A lady, near London, writing recently to a friend in Newcastle, on the subject of abstaining from slave labor products, said—

"If people had these things set before them and explained to them, many who exclaim loudly against Slavery would act up to their talk a little more than they do. It is often not want of feeling, but want of knowledge. Even many who appear true and sincere Christians encourage the crowning enormity of a guilty world, by their thoughtlessness, though they would discountenance it strongly in conversation. It is not enough in this, our present state, to talk. Let us work for the time is indeed short." * * * It is extraordinary how very few people have the slightest idea, that each, individually, can help to put down Slavery, not by the force of arms or the blockade, but by merely refusing to buy the produce of iniquity. The ignorance that prevails on this subject is marvellous. Many will tell you that they think Slavery a dreadful thing, and that they fear it is impossible to put it down, yet, when told they themselves are encouraging it every day of their lives, look at you with astonishment and displeasure."

True policy, not less than sound principle, points to non-participation in the avails of slavery as one means of extirpating the evil. A friend in Boston, W. J. Bowditch, whose voice and pen are, of latter time, powerfully employed in pleading the cause of the slave, wrote to me, as follows, under date of 26th April—

"Will you have the kindness to send to me any documents which will give me information on the following points connected with free produce? The numbers of free producers; in what States they are; how often the travelling agents visit them, and in fact every information which can be had in a printed form."

"It seems to me that though the Free Produce movement may produce but little effect on slaveholders directly, it has, or may have, a very salutary effect on the non-slaveholding whites. If we encourage them to labor as freemen, and continually increase our demands on them, we gradually create an antislavery nucleus in the very heart of the South—indirectly, it is true, but none the less surely—and this is of the very greatest moment, for it is to the non-slaveholders that we are to look for co-operation. Unless we can instil into them antislavery sentiments, our labor will be in vain."

We are often referred to John Woolman as a noble pattern of an advocate for emancipation, but, alas, how few can plead, as he did, consistently, for the slave! He deeply regretted, in his day, that "the number of those who decline the use of the West India produce, on account of the hard usage of the slaves who raise it, appears small, even among a people truly pious; and the labors in christian love on that subject, of those who do, are not very extensive." In reference to a traffic with slaveholders, he said, "that complaint of the Lord by his prophet, 'They have strengthened the hands of the wicked,' hath very often revived in my mind;" and on his death bed, he refused to take any medicine which came "through defiled channels or oppressive hands."

With such an example before us, and feeling in ourselves an evidence of the truth of the principles which he faithfully maintained to the end—remembering, too, the vast increase of the iniquitous system since his day—how can we shrink from our duty? S. R.

For the Non-Slaveholder. ACTING BY OTHERS.

Qui facit per alium facit per se.

Lines suggested by reading an article in "Friends' Review," under the above caption.

What means that awful piercing wail
From Africa's far distant shore,
That, borne upon the midnight gale,
Comes blended with the ocean's roar?

What means that sudden lurid glare
Athwart the dark vault of the sky?
What mean those shouts that reach the air—
The savage yells of victory?

The trafficker in human flesh
Has moored his vessel to the strand—
For him the warm blood flows afresh;
For him destruction wastes the land.

What means that fearful dying groan
Within that slaver's stifled hold—
Now mingled with the tempest's moan,
Now hushed in death's embraces cold?

Lo! the dark cargo closely prest
In one dense mass on oaken bed,
With foul air choked, with thirst distress,
The living hand-cuffed with the dead!

But see, a sail from Albion's isle
Bear down upon the "stripes and stars?"
They strike their flag with artful wile
And shout "ahoy" the British tars.

With fearful speed and foaming prow
The fierce avenger draweth near:
The bursting bomb and cannon now
Strike the pursued with dread and fear.

The traders in the souls of men
Brug from the hold their shackled slaves,
Who wildly shriek in terror when
They cast them chained into the waves.

The greedy sharks devour their prey,
And mix with gore the briny flood:
The guilty wretches speed their way
Through mangled limbs and seas of blood.

Again, what means that shriek of woe
From Mississippi's turbid wave—
Borne on the breeze so mournful, low,
The plaint, the anguish of the slave?

It comes from canebrake solitude;
It comes from tortured manhood bound;
It comes from ravished womanhood,
And infants dying on the ground.

And with it comes in thunder peals
A voice unanswerably true,
That on the heart the maxim seals—
WE DO WHAT WE BY OTHERS DO.

Yes, we who use the proceeds of
The Negro's unrequited toil,
Are guilty of his wrongs, and prove Ourselves partakers of the spoil.

For as the slave-ship plows the main;
For us the hapless hamlet burns;
For us the life-blood dyes the plain;
For us the childless mother mourns.

And when this voice the dead shall wake—
"WHERE IS THY BROTHER?" O how vain
Will be the plea the guilty make—
"Am I my brother's keeper?"—then.

When inquisition's made for blood—
The blood now crying from the ground—
What shall we answer unto God,
When on our skirts the stain is found?

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, SECOND MONTH, 2, 1853.

THE FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS OF OHIO YEARLY MEETING.

There is much encouragement in the history of this Society, which was organized in MOUNT PLEASANT, in the autumn of 1846, by a few individuals, who had been led to see the inconsistency of professing a testimony against Slavery, whilst sustaining it by a free indulgence in the use of its products. For the space of three years various difficulties prevented a general meeting of the Association, but, during this period, the Board of Managers maintained a healthful vitality, and an extensive correspondence. In the first month of 1848, the Managers, with a full understanding of all the difficulties to be encountered, took measures, and opened a subscription for the formation of a Joint Stock Company, to establish a Store, for the sale, exclusively, of products of Free Labor. A Company was started, with a capital stock of $2500, which was subsequently increased to $3000. This Association, now numbering about 150 members, is vigorously sustained, and has, within the last two years, published and circulated upwards of eighty thousand pages of Free Labor Tracts; in which the obligation resting upon Christians to abstain from the patronage of Slavery, and from supplying the motive, was clearly set forth.

ALUM CREEK FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS.

We learn with satisfaction that such an organization has been formed within the limits of Alum Creek Q. Meeting, a branch of Indiana Yearly Meeting. The Secretary is Griffith Levering, Birmingham, Morris Co., Ohio.

As we have expressed, the formation of such Societies is a satisfaction to us. Nor is it easy to perceive therein, any cause for displeasure or uneasiness to any sincere friend to human freedom. It involves, of necessity, no aggression, or denunciation. It is a quiet, unobjectionable let alone policy. It offers, to those who desire to keep themselves entirely separate from the unclean thing, a business channel, through which they can supply their necessities, without being implicated in a system which is, in itself, a great sin against God and man, and which may fairly be said to include every variety of crime. We commend these Associations, and the various FREE PRODUCE STORES, to the support of those, who, (to quote the words of one of our predecessors) "believe that the maintenance of a pure conscience leads to the avoidance of all connection with evil, simply because such connection is wrong, and that abstinence should be primarily founded on a sense of the duty of individual purity, independent of its ulterior effects, just as Honesty is to be pursued apart from a consideration of its policy." We hope, however, in the course of our publication, to lay before our readers frequent illustrations of the further sentiment of the Editor just quoted, "that it is abstinence only which can rightly concentrate, direct and give force to every other anti-slavery operation."

MAINE LAW MOVEMENT IN NEW JERSEY.

—A noble Temperance Convention, attended by thousands, was holden in Trenton on the 26th and 27th ult. Among the speakers were NEAL DOW, to whom so large a debt of love is due from us all, Dr. Jewitt, and John R. Gough. On the 27th, the Petition, with nearly Fifty Thousand signatures, was presented to the Legislature.

THE TAVERNER'S PROCLIVITY TO SIN.

We transcribe the following curious testimony against taverns from an ancient work "translated out of French by Samson Lennard," and printed in London, 1624. It is entitled—

"LVTHERS FORERVNNERS: or a CLOUD OF WITNESSES DEPOSING FOR THE PROTESTANT FAITH. Gathered together in the history of the Waldenses: who for diuers hundred yeares before Lvtther successufully opposed Popery, professed the truth of the Gospell, and sealed it with their blood: being most grievously persecuted, and many thousands of them martyred, by the tyranny of that Man of sinne, and his superstitious Adherents and cruel instruments."

DE LA TAUERNA.

Of the excesses and disorders which are commonly committed in Tauernes.

A Tauerne is the Fontaine of sinne, the School of the Diable; it works wonders, fitting the place. It is the custom of God to shew his power in his Church, and to work miracles; that is to say, to give sight to the blinde, to make the lame to goe, the dumbe to speake, the deafe to heare, but the diuill doth quite contrary to all these in a Tauerne. For when the Drunkard goeth to the Tauerne, hee goeth vpright, but when he cometh forth hee cannot goe at all, and hee hath lost his sight, his hearing, his speeche. The Lectures that are read in this school of the diuill, are Gttonies, Oathes, Perjuries, Lyings, Blasphemies, and diuers other villanies. For in a Tauerne are quarrells, slaunders, contentions, murders, and Tauerners that suffer them are partakers of their sinnes, and that wickedness they commit. For hee that would speake as much euill of their Parents, as they suffer men to speake of God, and the glorious Virgin, and the Saints in Paradise, and all for a little gaine by the sale of their wine, they would neuer endure it so peaceably. And therefore it is said in Ecclesiasticus, that the Tauerners shall not be freed from sinne.

The passage in Ecclesiasticus above referred to is rendered in our version (xxvi. 29) "A merchant shall hardly keep himself from doing wrong: and a huckster shall not be freed from sin." The word tauerne, which in this country is often confounded with inn, properly means merely a tippling shop, though Webster gives the derivation from tab, the root of table, a board,—and Sax. arn, place."

In the Romish Bible, the word "haberdasher" is, I think, given where we read "huckster." An ancient version gives it, "a retailer is not without sinne." In an old Bible lodged at Friends' Bible Depository, "imprinted at London by the deputies of Christopher Barker Printer to the Queen's Majestie, Anno 1595," we read,—"There be two manner of things which mee thinke to be hard and perillous: A merchant cannot lightly keep him frō wrong, neither a tauerner himselfe from sinne."

A translation by Thomas Matthews, in 1537, differs from the above only in the orthography. "There bee two maner of thyngs, which me thinke to be hard and perillous. A marchaunt cannot lightly kepe hym from wrong nyther a tauerner hym selfe from synne."

Being curious to know how far the Greek text would warrant these renderings, we consulted a friend who is a linguist, and received the following reply.

"It seems to me, that, whether tauerner, or huckster, be the rendering of the word in Ecclesiasticus, the point is the exposure to sin that there is in trade; and especially, in retail trading. 'A merchant shall hardly keep himself from doing wrong: and a huckster shall not be freed from sin.'—And, the parallel place: 'As a nail sticketh fast between the joining of the stones, so doth sin stick fast between buying and selling.' The Greek word rendered huckster means exactly that; a dealer in various things in a small way.

"The word tauerne, though so simple in its origin—the place where a board is—soon obtained a bad sense. And, so, tauerne. We find it in Chaucer in the very worst company; as well as the word from which it comes.

"In Flanders, whilom, was a compaynie
Of yonge folk, that haunteden folie,
As hazard, riot, stewes, and *tauerne*es."

PARDONER'S TALE.

and again

"And up they start, as dronken, in this rage,
And forth they gon towardes that village;
Of which the tauerne had spoke before,
And many a grisly ooth, than, have they sworn."
Imm.

And in a translation of Pliny, made by Philemon Holland in 1600, we read: "But this and such casts were derived by hucksters, vintners, and *tauerne*ers, after the wines were laid up in their cellars."

Whatever may have been the meaning of the author of Ecclesiasticus, it is certain that there is a strong proclivity to sin, on the part of the Tavern-keepers, and of other vendors of intoxicating beverage. We would exercise great caution in denouncing particular classes of men, yet, both our reason and our observation force us to the conclusion, that there is something peculiarly heart-hardening in the avocation. More than once have we known the Tavern-keeper to reject, with brutality, the wife and the child, who with tears besought him not to sell his bane to the one, who, though now the occasion of horror and degradation, would be, if sober, their pride and their support. We have known the recent inebriate, in the midst of earnest and well-known efforts at reform, enticed to the Tavern and made drunk,—and, when his money was exhausted, expelled with violence and personal injury. We have known such persons to come to us with tears of agony, remorse and despair;—we have known them to "resolve and re-resolve," and finally to pre the victims of snares purposely laid for them. Are these extreme cases? Alas, we could tell of many heart-rending ones, without going beyond the reach of our own individual knowledge, and we long ago adopted the sentiment of the homely translation of the honest Waldenses. We have no unkindness towards the Tavern-keeper—we desire his prosperity, his happiness and his salvation—but we wish his business at an end forever; the world over. Inns are needed,—but the wedlock of "Inns and Taverns" is an unholy alliance. Hail to the Star in the East! THE MAINE PROHIBITORY LIQUOR LAW! And let all the people, from Madawaska to Palo Alto, and thence to Cape Flattery say Amen.

27-1

We rarely witness a greater forfeiture of self-respect for the sake of obtaining custom, or one more certain to produce the contempt of those to whom the price is paid, than the movement among New York Merchants, to remunerate the owners of the Lemmon Slaves, for their loss consequent upon the recent decision in the case. It is a naked and shameful business advertisement. The names of those who contributed to the fund, and also of those who decline, are published in papers circulating at the South;—that the business houses of the former may be patronized, and those of the latter avoided. Some pleasant instances have occurred of Southern Merchants seeking the stores of those who would not put their principles into the Market. We commend to those who are wise, and to those who are susceptible of shame, a passage from a Poem of the revolution, written by TRUMBULL, (the American Hudibras,) in 1775.

"And are there, in this free-born land,
Among ourselves, a venal band;
A dastard race, who long have sold,
Their souls and consciences for gold;
Who wish to stab their country's vitals,
If they might heir surviving titles;
With joy behold our mischief brewing,
Insult and triumph in our ruin;
Priests, who, if Satan should set down,
To make a bible of his own;
Would gladly for the sake of mitres,
Turn his inspir'd and sacred writers;
Lawyers, who, should he wish to prove,
His title to his old seat above,
Would, if his cause he'd give 'em fees in,
Bring writs of entry sub dissimulation;
Plead for him boldly at the session,
And hope to put him in possession;
Merchants, who, for his kindly aid,
Would make him partner in their trade;
Hang out their signs with goodly show,
Inscribed with "Holzschuh and Co."
And judges, who would list his pages,
For proper liveries and wages;
And who as humbly cringe and bow,
To all his mortal servants now?
These are; and Shame, with pointing gestures,
Marks out the address and protesters;
Whom following down the stream of fate,
Contempts ignominious await;
And public infamy, forlorn,
Dread hate, and everlasting scorn."

A letter from a lady at Munich, in Bavaria, states that 29 editions of Uncle Tom's Cabin have already been published in the German Language, and that even in the remote villages of the Tyrol, (where she had been visiting) "a powerful feeling of sympathy for the Slave has been awakened by this graphic and touching picture of Slave life." In view of the wonderful circulation of this Book, we have had our attention on the alert, to note any evidence that it had induced in its readers a relinquishment of the products of slave labor. The graphic and true picture therein presented, has excited the painfully intense sympathy of hundreds of thousands; of persons enough to affect the slave interests materially, if they would all make the sacrifice for which Humanity calls. The philanthropy which spends itself in a mere excitement of feeling or ebullition of words, will not open the prison doors: the tears shed over the pages of Uncle Tom, will not rust away the chain of the Slave, nor give deliverance to the captive. From "THE SLAVE" (published at Newcastle upon Tyne), we clip the following paragraph, written by our immediate editorial predecessor.

From an anti-slavery correspondent at Philadelphia, dated 11 mo. 29, 1852.

"I am clearly of the opinion that your effort to raise funds for the redemption of the Weiss family will be useful to the anti-slavery cause. It can only be through action, ultimately, that the wonderful popularity of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" can benefit the slave. The sighs and tears expended over the book will soon be evaporated; and if the moral influence of the readers be not directed towards some definite action or object, slavery will continue prosperous and triumphant. I have always regretted the position taken by leading members of the Pennsylvania Anti-Slavery Society on this subject. I do not believe one of them would refuse to redeem a parent, brother, sister, or child from Indian Algerine bondage. Friends in England raised a large fund for the ransom of members of our Society, who had been seized and held in slavery by the Algerines; yet, in that case, the redemption was a direct encouragement to the taking of new prisoners. Here, the case is totally different. The ransom of an American slave does not occasion, but may prevent, the birth of another; therefore lessens, and cannot increase, the number of slaves."

We notice in "The Slave" an interesting letter from H. H. Garnet, dated in 11th Mo. at Madeira, whither he had been driven by unfavorable weather. He says, "We shall spend the day on land, and expect to start to-morrow once more. We have 100 passengers and as many men. Several passengers are respectable persons of colour. I rejoice to know that if we never reach our destination, we shall all be together: we shall not be separated." We since learn with pleasure that he and his family have arrived at Jamaica.

We referred in our last to the Address of the Women of England to their sisters in the U. S. of America, and objected to its admission of danger in immediate emancipation. There were not wanting in England persons of quick and true perception, to detect and point out this error. Samuel Gurney, Joseph Sturge, Sir E. N. Baxton and G. W. Alexander corresponded with the Earl of Shaftesbury, the reputed author of the Address, suggesting another form which they enclosed to him. The following is his reply:

"Gentlemen—I am much obliged to you for the kind letter I have had the honor to receive from you. I am fully aware of the great zeal and exertions of that party who assert the necessity and safety of immediate abolition, nor do I deny that they formed their opinion on very strong and elegant arguments.

But our present purpose is less to discuss the question of the time of abolition than the mode by which we can obtain it at all. It is a sad thing that we should appear to be disunited. We are not so in fact. We all alike abhor and denounce that iniquitous system of slavery which disgraces and desolates so many regions of the civilized world.

My own views, as far as I am able to form any, and those of many with whom I am associated, are very moderate. An interval of these years would be ample to make all necessary preparations for the admission of the slave to every right and enjoyment of a freeman. I heartily approve the course you propose. Obtain as many signatures as you can to your address, which requires immediate abolition. We will do the same by ours, which admits that it should be progressive. Both of them may then go together, for, with the exception of one passage, the addresses will be identical,—identical in spirit, sentiment, and expression, and differing only in the subordinate consideration whether a short interval, or more, should be allotted for the purpose of preparation. I am, gentlemen, your very obed't s't.

SHAFTESBURY.

FREE TRADE.—Much satisfaction is felt in the approach to Free Trade on the part of Great Britain, both from principle and on account of its well-working. An honored correspondent expresses his agreement with this feeling, "not so much through argument, or even result, as because I deem it consistent with Bible doctrine and Christian wisdom: tending to prove that the whole Earth is the Lord's—that all men are brethren:—and destruction of warlike tendencies." We shall not differ from our correspondent, or from the views of many English Philanthropists, when we except, from our general approval, the patronage given to Slavery by the introduction without distinctive duty, of Slave Produce, respecting which Act of retrogression Lord Stanley declared in the House of Lords, that they "would thereby add to the profit on every Slave engaged in the cultivation of sugar!"—asserting also that "an increased demand in this country [Great Britain] would have a tendency to stimulate Slavery." We would have Free Trade applied to every traffic which it is becoming for Christians to countenance, but we would gladly pile obstacles as high as Olympus, between Slavery and its Market; because "We feel that wrong with wrong partakes:

That nothing stands alone:
That whoso gives the motive, makes
His brother's sin his own."

The trial of the kidnapped RACHEL PARKER, on her petition for freedom, after her varied sufferings incident to her seizure, imprisonment, &c. and after the murder of her protector and chief witness, JOSEPH C. MILLER, resulted on the 12th ult. in the abandonment of the case, as hopeless, by the Prosecuting Attorney, before it was submitted to the Jury; and, consequently, she is acquitted, before the world, of the crime of being or of having been the property of Luther A. Schoolfield. But as each inhabitant of every State where the pecu-liary institution is sustained has as clear a title to her as ever Schoolfield had, we cannot guarantee her exemption from future annoyance. We are not aware that any person will call in question the cruel injustice of this case; yet how much deeper is the hardship, and the injustice, endured without redress in this life, by each one of the millions who are actually held as slaves. Reader! could'st thou pay thy money to a Schoolfield for the product of the labor of a kidnapped Parker, and then wear or eat it? And what better claim than that of a kidnapper (if you trace the title back) can any slaveholder exhibit? "Every thing else," says Channing, "may be owned in the universe; but a moral rational being cannot be property. Suns and stars may be owned, but not the lowest spirit. Touch any thing but this. Lay not your hands on God's rational offspring. The whole spiritual world cries out FORBEAR! The highest intelligences recognize their own nature, their own rights, in the humblest human being."

SAMUEL GURNEY the distinguished English Philanthropist, in a recent letter which we are permitted to quote, says, in reference to American Slavery,—

"How heartily do I desire that such a noble country as the United States would clear itself of such abomination, the great preventive, in my judgment, of her rising to her full and highest destiny. How can she hold up to the nations of the Earth the great cause of religious and civil liberty, at the same time having within herself, and maintained by her laws, the most flagrant system of tyranny existing in the civilized world. With such a people, I do think the cause of emancipation must grow and strengthen."

We notice briefly for unqualified condemnation the recommendation of Governor Bigler to allow slave traders to bring slaves into the land of PENN. The A. S. Bugle has a caustic editorial of much force. We can only clip a paragraph from its midst.

"The recommendation would seem at first blush to be something of a sacrifice to the spirit of comity and good neighborhood, inasmuch as it denies to Pennsylvanians the privilege of holding slaves in the commonwealth, which it grants to those of a foreign state. But if the Governor will look at it, he will see that his recommendation needs amendment: that it falls decidedly short of that 'comity' which can alone save the Union. Is it not a most discourteous rebuke to the chivalrous emigrants with their stolen women and babes, that it forbids its own citizens to imitate their patriotic example, and buy children and flog men and women? It is a tacit, uncourteous and cowardly rebuke of the system, against which the Union will hardly be able to sustain itself. It subjects these wandering patriarchs to great inconvenience, often preventing their sale of stock to Pennsylvania planters. It is an invasion of their rights. Why may they not sell a foot-sore woman or a sick babe, at half price, to an innkeeper, to pay a bill,—like drovers of other stock? It can't be that the accommodating Federal Constitution, when it proposed to regulate commerce meant to prohibit this traffic, and if it did, that 'comity' which permits Ohio drovers to sell sick calves and lame pigs, should certainly grant it to these merchant princes, who speculate in human souls and sinews."

We also notice the introduction of Bills for this purpose into the Legislatures of Pennsylvania and New York. These bills are disgraceful to their framers and advocates, whom we may fairly though sadly conclude to be themselves slaves, "servants to him to whom they obey." It is no new thing to see activity on the part of the advocates of evil. Shall the friends of goodness and of right shame their professions by supineness? These pro-slavery deeds should prompt to faithful efforts, not only to arrest the progress of such outrages, but to clear our own hands of participation in the monstrous crime of slavery while we labor for its extinction.

"Up then, in Freedom's manly part,
From gray haired old to fiery youth!—
And, o'er the Nation's naked heart,
Scatter the living coals of Truth!"

In a day when so much is said respecting the "perpetuity of the Union," we would call attention to the true source of real danger, as depicted in the following lines by a popular Poet,—as also to the true remedy, which must consist, not in compromise measures for the recapture of fugitives, but in a practical observance of the precept given by Daniel to Nebuchadnezzar: "WHEREFORE, O KING, LET MY COUNSEL BE ACCEPTABLE UNTO THEE, AND BREAK OFF THY SINS BY RIGHTEOUSNESS, AND THINE INIQUITIES BY SHEWING MERCY TO THE POOR."

THE WARNING.

BY H. W. LONGFELLOW.

Beware! The Israelites of old, who tore
The lion in his path,—when, poor and blind,
He saw the blessed light of heaven no more;
Shorn of his noble strength and forced to grind
In prison, and at last led forth to be
A pander to Philistine revelry,—
Upon the pillars of the temple laid
His desperate hands, and in its overthrow Destroyed himself, and with him those who made
A cruel mockery of his sightless woe;
The poor, blind slave, the scold and jest of all,
Expired, and thousands perished in the fall!
There is a poor blind Samson in this land,
Shorn of his strength, and bound in bonds of steel,
Who may, in some grim revel, raise his hand,
And shake the pillars of this commonweal,
Till the vast temple of our liberties
A shapeless mass of wreck and rubbish lies.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE ANNUAL MONITOR FOR 1853. London.—This is an annual "Obituary of the Society of Friends in Great Britain and Ireland." It has been conducted for 40 years and, as the present Editor remarks, "it will be readily admitted that for many years it has occupied a useful place, and exercised, in a religious sense, a 'sanitary' influence in our society." The introduction to the present volume, is, in itself, a valuable treatise, from which we should copy at length, were it not that our limits are too small, and that having been republished in the FRIEND'S REVIEW, it is accessible to a large number of our readers. We insert a single paragraph, not without a fear that we mar its excellence by separating it from the context. The sentiments, though not new, are happily expressed. It should never be forgotten that the Church of Christ is not sectarian: that an honest Church organization "has no sectarian purposes to answer." And it is unspeakably important that Christians, whatever their name, their peculiarities of belief, or their stage of progress and degree of enlightenment, should continually seek, by example, by precept, and by wrestling in prayer, to draw souls away from sin and unto Christ; that the building up of a sect is not the mission committed to any Church by the glorious Head from whom all authority is derived; and that the travail of all regenerated souls should harmoniously tend to speed the coming of the day when there shall be one fold and one Shepherd.

"As a Religious Society, we have no sectarian purposes to answer, we have no party interests to support, 'we preach not ourselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord,' our mission is, in the highest and truest sense, a Catholic one;—its simple aim is the exaltation of the cause of our God and of his Christ, and the government of His Church and the individual members thereof, by Himself, through the Holy Spirit, in accordance always, as that cannot but be, with the inspired words of the sacred volume. In surveying the present state of professing Christendom and of the world, it cannot but be cause for humble thankfulness, to the reflecting mind, that it has pleased our Heavenly Father, in His infinite wisdom and love, to grant us both; and to the members of our religious community, it must be matter of peculiar satisfaction and gratitude, that both have been and are so fully recognized amongst us; so that, whilst we firmly and practically hold to the great scriptural doctrine of the immediate, the direct and perceptible influence of the Holy Spirit, we have never hesitated, as a people, and do not now hesitate, to bring all the doctrines we believe, and all the practices we allow, and all the testimonies we consider it right to bear, to the test of the Holy Scriptures; and those principles which have long united us together in the bonds of Christian fellowship are still found efficacious, both to equip the servant of Christ for the active duties of life, and to prepare him for the honest hour of death."

"THE SIXTEENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE ASSOCIATION OF COLORED ORPHANS" is before us. We have several times visited their Asylum on Fifth Avenue, New York, and it would be difficult for us to convey in words our high appreciation of this noble Institution. We extract the following touching notice of the decease, in 5th month last, of an excellent colored teacher, who had been engaged in the establishment three and a half years.

"The decease of M. A. Bodee, announced at our last meeting occurred on the 29th of 5th month (May) last. She had been subject to a weakness of the chest for several years past, and had repeated hemorrhages of the lungs.

"It was not until six days before her decease, although quite indisposed, that she was induced, by the earnest entreaty of the Matron, to discontinue her indefatigable exertions in the school, and retire to her room after commencing the duties of the day.

"The cold which she had taken, resisted all the efforts of the physician; and as she carefully watched the failure of the applications intended for her relief, she repeatedly remarked, 'It is not the will of God that I shall recover—He does not intend that I shall,' and with a cheerful resignation would exclaim: "The will of the Lord be done. He knows what is best." Still, as the separation from her children occasionally presented itself the conflict was severe. "What a struggle, what a trial," would she say, "to leave my poor fatherless children, orphans in the world!"

"She expressed to one of the Managers the assurance she at times felt, that her prayers had been heard and answered; and remarked that the blessings of religion were first experienced by her in this Institution. Her heart seemed filled with the love of God, and with the voice of prayer and praise she oft proclaimed his goodness."

"The condescension of her Saviour, and the love and faithfulness and goodness of God, were oft referred to by her. As she was beloved in an unusual degree by the different members of the family, their attentions to her were unwearied, for which she evinced the warmest gratitude, and manifested great patience under acute suffering."

"Being asked a little before her death, if she felt herself approaching the eternal world, she replied she did; and if it were the will of God to take her to himself, could she resign her children into his hands? With the utmost calmness and composure, she answered, that she had done so several days since. Soon after this her three youngest children, inmates of the Institution, were brought to her bed-side; and turning herself, she reached forth her hand to little Panny, the eldest present, embraced her in the warmest manner, and wept over her in the tenderness of a mother's love. Then, after a solemn pause, she slowly raised her feeble hand, and placed it on the head of the child, saying: "Fanny, I resign you to God and to Mrs. F——, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." As she moved her hand, her daughter retired, and Edward, the next in point of age, approached his dying mother; and in the same solemn and affecting manner did she resign this dear boy and his still younger brother to the care of the Managers of the Asylum."

"She then took an affectionate leave of the Matron, teachers, and friends present. The children belonging to her school were permitted to pass through her room and to take her hand; to some of whom she was enabled to address a few words of advice. Some of the larger children were next allowed to pass before her and took a last farewell. Her eye then turned upon her own dear children and she exclaimed: "Is it possible that I have been sustained in this trying hour? Yes, yes, verily; praise the Lord! Glory! glory! glory to God, who has given me this victory! Father! they are thine, and I am thine. The sting of death is sin, and the strength of sin is the law—O death where is thy sting! O grave where is thy victory?" Her last words were, "O that my death may be a warning to many!" With one convulsive struggle the spirit was released, and the love of God, which had carried her through the gates of death, calmly settled on her countenance, which was radiant with a sweet and heavenly smile."

"PEOPLE-DIPLOMACY: OR THE MISSION OF FRIENDLY INTERNATIONAL ADDRESSES BETWEEN ENGLAND AND FRANCE."—A London pamphlet of 24 pages fraught with moral beauty. Would that we could lay it before our readers. It is the modest report of Elihu Burritt, &c., who went to France on behalf of the People of England, the bearers of about fifty people letters, full of peace and good will, from British cities, to cities in France selected in reference to points of similarity. London, Edinburgh, Glasgow and Dublin, each addressed an epistle to Paris. The first was signed by four members of Parliament, by officers of various societies, and upwards of 1500 respectable citizens. Glasgow sent about 2000 signatures. The address of Liverpool to Marseilles was adopted at a large public meeting and bore 2500 signatures of adult men. A belligerent attitude towards France seemed to be assumed by Great Britain. The foremost Journals abounded in stinging epithets and imputations. But a popular counter-movement arose, instigated, doubtless by the lovely spirited Elihu Burritt, whose movements in the cause of Truth and Humanity we admire in common with philanthropists generally, whilst, personally,

"We find in his heart something dearer than Fame."

The reception of this mission of good will in the several French cities, by the officials, by the public Journals, and by the People, was most happy. One official in his speech of acknowledgment said:—"that the idea of fifty of the most important towns in the United Kingdom addressing such people-letters to fifty large towns in France, appeared to him a magnificent thought and act." The "Journal de Maine et Loire," (Angers) says—"It seems to us difficult not to show ourselves grateful."

* * * If we had to reply to their friendly manifestation, we should do it in a real French fashion; and we should say to them:—"Our very dear friends, you have won our sympathy, and to prove it, we invite the signers of the address to a monster banquet, at which we will fraternize each other." It is impossible for us to do justice to the pamphlet; but it is calculated to clinch the conviction of our Universal Brotherhood, and to make us love, for the Eternal Father's sake, the People of Britain and the People of France.

Extracts from our Correspondence.

MASSILLON, OHIO.—Our ancient and valued friend, Isaac Bowman of this place, writes:

"I am glad the Non-Slaverholder is again published. I enclose $— * * * I am getting to be an old man, now in my 78th year. I feel desirous to assist the distressed African race. I was well acquainted with Thomas Clarkson in 1795; and I obtained from the use of West India Sugar to bring about the abolition of the African Slave trade. Cotton was not so much used at that day."

UNION COUNTY, INDIANA.

"I rejoice that the Non-Slaverholder is resuscitated, and I have sent thee eight subscribers, and $3. I shall try to send more money. I believe that the cause has suffered by the suspension of the Non-Slaverholder, but hope that it will now advance."

COLEMAN COUNTY, OHIO.

(With 25 subscriptions, the same effective Agent having previously sent a larger amount.)—"The surplus money of $800, which I send, is designed to aid the Free Labor cause. Purely from this motive, I have prevailed upon several to pay a sum additional to the price charged for the paper." Another friend of the same county writes—"I was glad to receive the first No. of the Non-Slaverholder, and enclose $3 for 12 copies."

CHESAPEAKE COUNTY, N. Y.

"I fully agree with the Editor that the class among whom the Non-Slaverholder circulates, has sustained a loss by its discontinuance."

RUSH COUNTY, INDIANA.

(With 9 subscribers.)—"There has certainly existed a vacuum on the question of human slavery since the Non-Slaverholder was suspended. If my humble efforts would be acceptable to the Editor, I would be willing to act as Agent in this section."

An esteemed correspondent in Ohio, in sending subscriptions for 25 copies, writes:

"Thou wilt see that I have obtained them all at the club price, which I think is high enough for 25 small papers."

So we thought, and therefore we placed the price so low. Yet we hope to make some of our single numbers fully worth the whole price for a year, and it is quite certain that our publication will be a pecuniary loss unless we have a large subscription list. But if our free labor friends, generally, will do as well as this correspondent, and send us "club price" for 25 subscribers, at each of their respective post offices, we shall aim at increasing, perhaps doubling the size of our sheet. We are obliged to omit a large amount of valuable matter, which we would gladly spread before our readers. [This friend has since furnished us with 25 additional names.]

WAYNE COUNTY, INDIANA.

(With 8 subscribers.)—"I shall make up another company soon. I am much pleased with the first No. of the paper. The article, 'Who are the Slaverholders,' alone is worth the subscription for a year."

LYNN, MASS.

(With 12 subscribers.)—"We are rejoiced to see that there is feeling enough on the subject to send forth the Non-Slaverholder again. I sincerely hope thou wilt find sufficient patronage to encourage thee to persevere in so good a cause."

DUTCHESS COUNTY, N. Y.

(With an enclosure.)—"It is gratifying to discover that the Non-Slaverholder is resuscitated. The cause which it was designed to promote has lost none of its excellence by lapse of time, and the influence it was calculated to exert is none the less called for."

MONKTON, VERMONT.

(With a list of subscribers.)—"In the course of my rambles I have seen a copy of the new series of the Non-Slaverholder, and heartily glad was I to see its face once more. * * * Allow me to say that I was much pleased with the Editor's resolve to treat the subject with moderation. I suppose it is his desire to convince and not to upbraid. It is true the apathy manifested by many who claim to be regarded as anti-slavery par excellence is distressing, and this coldness on the subject does not dissolve the guilty partnership existing between the slaverholders and the consumers of slave grown productions, nor ought it to check free expression from those who see and feel."

"That who gives the motive, makes his brother's sin his own."

"I hope never to forget the impression made upon my mind by witnessing a coffin of slaves, in the prime of life, marching through the streets of Richmond, Va. How could I suppress the conviction that they were on their way to the cotton field, to be hustled up in the production of an article which the slaverholders feel well assured will meet with a ready market amongst thousands at the North; notwithstanding the petitions they had signed, the prayers they had uttered, and the addresses in favor of emancipation which they had circulated. However careless the patrons of slavery may be as to where they bestow their patronage, have we not unquestionable evidence that the Slaverholder clearly understands that they who buy his cotton, are his indispensable supporters."

JEFFERSON COUNTY, OHIO.

A valued friend and hearty co-laborer expresses a desire that our Journal may be filled with "matter of fact, and not of fiction"—having reference to the English tract in No. 1. We receive the hint kindly, as it is meant, and, while we had not thought of objecting to the article in question, we are opposed on principle to every deviation from truthfulness, and we do not favor the employment of fiction as the medium of Truth. We have wished to express our views upon this subject, and hope, ere long, to find space for their insertion. Our friend pertinently adds, "I believe the Truth has owned the cause, and will sustain it." In the town in which he resides we have 50 subscribers. In Salem, Ohio, 88. This is owing to disinterested efforts made for the cause' sake. There are many other cities and towns where still larger results would follow similar efforts. Will not persons be found willing, for the promotion of the Truth, to canvass their neighborhoods, at the club price, and thus increase the circulation of the Non-Slaveholder, prevent it from being a loss to those engaged in it, and enable us also to enlarge its dimensions?

CLINTON COUNTY, OHIO.

(With 8 Subscribers and prospect of more.)—"There has been much loss sustained by the Non-Slaveholder being suspended so long. There is a great advance in the free-labor cause in these parts. I think there are many who would rather make use of free produce (if they could be certain that it was such) than the slave grown: and some who were much opposed seven years ago, now think it right to sustain."

NEW GARDEN, OHIO.

"I have obtained 33 subscribers, and enclose $8, and may say I have a prospect of obtaining a few more."

BOON COUNTY, INDIANA.

"I have received, and read with interest, two numbers of the Non-Slaveholder, and have obtained 11 subscribers. I was a subscriber for it so long as it was published before, and much regretted its stopping, as we are apt, if we have not something to stir up the pure mind to duty, to grow cold respecting things which we know to be right."

WASHINGTON COUNTY, INDIANA.

A much valued friend writes:—"Having received the first number of the Non-Slaveholder, I feel anxious to encourage its circulation among our own members, and others, believing it calculated to do much good, particularly here, where we are within thirty miles of a Slave State. It has not yet been convenient to see many of our friends. Should some of those whose names I send be unwilling to pay me, I am willing to circulate it gratis. The members of our Monthly Meeting are generally taking the Review, yet I hope a considerable number of them will take the Non-Slaveholder. It is a publication which every member of our society should, as I believe, feel an interest in promoting the circulation of. I have full confidence in the abilities of the Editor and Publisher to conduct the paper in a consistent manner."

[We would not offer our paper to any one as a substitute for Friends' Review, but would always be glad to let it accompany that able and excellent journal, the Editor of which has probably done more for the cause of Human Liberty, than any other living writer in the Society of Friends, unless we except J. G. Whittier. The beloved friend from whom we have just quoted, is one whose words of encouragement are peculiarly strengthening to us.]

CEDAR COUNTY, IOWA.

An order for 12—with promise of more.

ONTARIO COUNTY, N. Y.

(A second order from this friend.)—"I have just received the 2d No. of the Non-Slaveholder, and am so well pleased with it, as well as with the former, that I have made out a list of eight persons at a neighboring Post Office, who I think ought to take it, for which I send you $2.00 at once. If any of these do not choose to refund the subscription when I inform them, I can pay for them. Would not Agents generally find this the best way?"

WARRICK COUNTY, INDIANA.

(Eight subscriptions.)—"Five or six of the above are persons who have not heretofore been readers of the Non-Slaveholder, but have rather stood aloof, regarding the plan therein advocated as impracticable: just such names as I was most desirous of procuring, as they are candid, intelligent, orderly Friends. For, if the succeeding numbers should be as well prepared as the first, I think they can hardly fail to become convinced and enlisted in the cause. I expect that there will be a considerable number of subscribers from this county. The cause of Freedom and Humanity,—the principles of genuine Republicanism and Christianity, seem to be gaining advocacy in this vicinity."

RUTHERFORD COUNTY, N. Y.

(With 24 subscribers.)—"A large portion of the persons in this subscription list feel a deep interest in the causes of Peace, Temperance and the Abolition of Capital Punishment, and hope to see those subjects treated in your paper according to the Prospectus, as well as the Anti-Slavery cause."

For the Non-Slaveholder.

"The law of the LORD is perfect, converting the soul: the testimony of the LORD is sure, making wise the simple: the statutes of the LORD are right, rejoicing the heart: the commandment of the LORD is pure, enlightening the eyes." Psalms xix. 7, 8.

"Who is blind, but my servant? or deaf, as my messenger that I sent? who is blind as he that is perfect, and blind as the LORD's servant?" Isaiah xlii. 19.

In the belief of these truths I stop less to enquire what was the mind of the servants in the utterance of the following discipline of Friends, than to seek to know what was the mind of the Spirit in its enunciation. That knowing, it should be our desire to bring to its fulfilment no lame offering. The rule is one touching impartially every case coming within the sphere of its comprehensive principle, and pronouncing all such described support of Slavery as immoral. Are we in no wise concerned in purchasing, disposing of, or holding mankind as slaves, when by using the products of slavery we give the motive for so purchasing, disposing of, and holding them? Do we by no means encourage or countenance a traffic in slaves, when we use commodities resulting from, and which it was the direct end of the traffic to procure?

"Hear ye deaf; and look, ye blind, that ye may see." Isaiah xlii. 18.

"It is the sense and judgment of this meeting, that if any in membership with us are in any wise concerned in purchasing, disposing of, or holding mankind as slaves, or shall by any means encourage or countenance a traffic in slaves, they should be treated with as for any other immoral, unjust, or reprehensible conduct; and if they are not brought to such a sense of their deviation from the law of righteousness and Christian equity, as to condemn the same to the satisfaction of the monthly meeting, they should be disowned.—1774, 1834."—Discipline of Philadelphia T. Meeting, p. 128.

Do any exclaim, in view of the involved principles and ultimate remedy, "This is an hard saying; who can hear it?"—let them bear in mind that when Friends, generally, shall wash their hands in innocency of the slave's wrongs, when, only, they can put the remedy into operation, that remedy will be as little needed to maintain fully the perfect law as it is now to suppress the acts which are recognized as infractions of it.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

IMPORTANCE OF CHRISTIAN CONSISTENCY.

Unhappily too many while they may be industriously engaged with one hand for the removal of an evil, are inconsiderately contributing, with the other to its permanence. Has not this been the case in respect to most of the labor performed for the liberation of the Slave.

The evils of Slavery in the United States, having become so conspicuous and so odious, especially within the last thirty years, have claimed the attention, of the more considerate, and Philanthropic part of the community, and some of both sexes, have entered the field of labor for its extinction. Associations have been formed, to enlighten and correct the public mind,—Legislative bodies have been memorialized, to prevent its growth; the press, (that mighty engine), has been employed, to some extent, in exhibiting the wrongs of the Slave.

These labors, however well directed, and well intended, have met with much opposition, which, although applied with the greatest solicitude, in Church and State has proved insufficient to prevent a growth of anti-slavery feeling. Anti-slavery advocates are now to be seen in much larger numbers, (compared with thirty years ago), in Legislative bodies, in newspaper articles, and in the membership of religious societies and of direct Anti-slavery associations. The influence upon Slavery of these Laborers, and their co-workers of other countries, may be estimated from the amount of hostility called forth, and the desperate means resorted to for the protection of the system. Witness the fugitive slave law of 1850, and kindred enactments of latter times. Thus it must be evident, to all who have, even to those whose information on the subject is limited, that in 30 years the cause of the Slave has materially gained ground, and has attained a position, so intimately connected with the prosperity, or adversity of the country, that the Slaves rightful claim to liberty can never be again smothered into silence. And such is the case with many religious denominations; so large a number of their members, having become awakened to a sense of the slave's wrongs, they cannot with a clear conscience, permit their respective sects as quietly to slumber over the oppression of the Slave as in time past.

These results are the more encouraging, when we reflect that they have been achieved by a merely one handed labor, since, in most abolition efforts, the efficiency of the labor of the one hand, has been crippled by the aid given to the system with the other, through the inconsistency of participating with the Master in the products of the slave's unrequited toil. As it is for the produce of his labor he is first enslaved, it is undeniable and self-evident that the purchasers of these products furnish the inducement for a continuation of his bonds. Judging then from what has been effected, may we not infer, that, if this aid to the system had been withheld by all who loathed Slavery, the stain would ere this have been removed? How much remains to be accomplished!—Yet how quickly the finishing stroke might be given, by laying the axe to the root of the corrupt system.

Little does the Slaveholder regard the arguments and remonstrances of the Abolitionists, so long as he gives him the aid he wants for holding the Slave. In this way the Abolitionists have more than half neutralized their own labors. They proclaim the injustice and sin of slaveholding, (and they do well); and at the same time publish to the world a practical acknowledgment of the right of the master, by paying him for the proceeds of the slave's labor.

The master for good reasons, is at a loss how to make any distinction between the principle, which governs him, in procuring the products of the slave's labor direct from his own hands, and that principle, by which the Abolitionist voluntarily possesses himself of these same products, with some intervening agency to pass them over from the slave to him. In brief, the master does not comprehend the difference in principle, between doing an act by the hand of another, and doing it himself. "Qui facit per alium, facit per se."

The merits of the cause in which the advocates of emancipation are engaged, imperatively demand consistency, and that we do not practice upon a principle which we condemn in the slaveholder. Let us then, as Christians, treat the slaveholder, as an erring brother, with kindness and due regard; but, giving him no countenance in his error and injustice, let us practically condemn the principle by which a fellow man is deprived of his liberty, and reduced to merchandise, for the purpose of depriving him of the fruits of his labor. Such a consistent Christian course pursued by the friends of emancipation, would in a short period, produce in many slaveholders such a sense of their own injustice, as would speedily cause the removal of the last fetter from the suffering bondman.

Quaker Hill, 12th of 2d mo., 1853.

From "Love to God, considered as a preparation for Heaven."

Reader, if, notwithstanding the name of a Christian, thou art still a votary of this present world, following the vain devices and desires of thy own heart—pause, I beseech thee, in thy mad career, and meditate for a few moments on the heights of heaven, and on the depths of hell. The curtains of the night will soon close around thee, and thy mental and moral condition, thy happiness, or thy woe, will be fixed forever. Repent of thy transgressions; bring all the burden of thy sins and cast it at the feet of Jesus. "Behold the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world." Wash thy polluted garments in the blood of his atonement; and cease to restrain the influence of his Holy Spirit. Embrace, in good earnest, the faith, the hope, and the virtue of the Christian, and live forever!

Reader, if thou hast already made covenant with the Lord, to be his child and servant—if though hast already been taught of the Spirit to love him—who first loved thee—persevere. Fight the good fight of faith, and lay hold on eternal life; go forward on thy march towards Zion; give thyself wholly to the disposal of Him who died for thee and rose again; count nothing too near or too dear to part with for his name's sake; follow the guidance of the Comforter in all things; watch unto prayer; be humble, be faithful, be diligent; and all will be well. Christ will continue to be thy all-sufficient portion here; and soon, very soon, it will be thy blessed lot to exchange his cross on earth for a crown of righteousness in heaven, immortal, incorruptible and full of glory. #### THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, THIRD MONTH, 2, 1833.

As this humble periodical is not conducted with a view to emolument, in funds or in fame, it would be a cheerless task without the prospect of our object being in some degree attained. Our aim is to strengthen the tie of human brotherhood; to waken dormant sympathies, and to stimulate those in danger of waxing cold; to encourage our readers to break off from participation in evils which they loathe; and to remind them that, although the monster we would attack is an "abomination of desolation," and truly "standing where it ought not," yet, as George Fox was often heard to say, "God's power is over all," and it is the province of his rational creatures to be, without assuming anything to themselves, co-workers with him, by a dutiful avoidance of what ever is contrary to his pure and perfect will. He who is truly concerned to be thus passively submissive to the Divine Will, and to do nothing against the Truth, will not be a drone in creation, but will be made, in some manner, an active agent, and an instrument in carrying out the glorious motto given from Heaven at the Messiah's advent: "Glory to God in the highest! on Earth Peace, and Good will to Men!" In a moral warfare, the greater the magnitude of the evil to be overcome, the stronger the necessity of blamelessness in the mode of attack; "Men of clean hands shall wax stronger and stronger." We have, it is true, inherent in ourselves, no power at all. For the removal of slavery, intemperance, war, or other evils, we can neither appoint nor even know the time or the season "which the Father hath reserved in his own power." We know that

"God doth not need

Either man's work or his own gifts," but is eternally all-sufficient for His own blessed purposes towards a race, which, though fallen and degraded, is to be made subservient to His glory. These considerations being devoutly arrived at, will not induce supineness. Their legitimate effect will be, a humble persistent effort at conformity to the true standard of right. The kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ is not to be established by the workings of the feverish excitement, the passionate opposition to wrong, which the writers among FRIENDS significantly style "creaturely activity," in contrast with that ready zeal which is the offspring of the divine Spirit, and the labor of which is "not in vain in the Lord" if pursued in that wisdom from above, which is "first pure, then peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits." But, "if there first be a willing mind," we believe that there is for each one a field of labor, and an application of the Apostle's words: "God is able to make all grace abound toward you, that ye, always having all sufficiency in all things may abound to every good work."

It has been a satisfaction to us to receive words of approval and encouragement from many valued correspondents, which evince that the labors of the former Editors of this Journal have been appreciated, and have left the right impression upon the minds of their readers. We give, on another page, extracts from a few of the letters received.

We gladly make room for the communication from PENNINGTON, although received by mail after this number was nearly ready for the press. We recognize the authorship of a valued Friend, whom we have long "delighted to honor," and one who was, (if our memory serve us faithfully,) one of the Committee upon the last revision of the Discipline of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting; when the clause which he has recited was condensed more than one half, and rendered a more emphatic and stringent testimony against all who should, "by any means encourage or countenance a traffic in Slaves." The next paragraph in the "Rules of Discipline of the Y. M. of Friends for Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, and the Eastern parts of Maryland," contains so righteous a testimony against the traffic in slaves, that we introduce it in this connection:—

"It appearing that, notwithstanding the many afflictive dispensations with which Divine wisdom has seen meet to visit this land, many of its inhabitants are so deaf to the language of the rod, as to continue in the nefarious traffic for slaves to the coasts of Africa, and that the introduction of them into the United States is, in some places, still connived at; this meeting, considering such a conduct as a bold and impious defiance of the Ruler of nations, and pregnant with the most alarming consequences to our country, earnestly recommends to the meeting for sufferings, to embrace every suitable opportunity for advancing our testimony in this respect, and for calling the attention of the public mind to this awfully interesting subject."—1786, 1787, 1805, 1834.

Other passages in the same book of Discipline provide against Members of the Society of Friends "acting as executors or administrators to estates where slaves are bequeathed," "doing anything whereby their bondage may be prolonged;" and directs, (after due labor for their reclamation) the excommunication of members who hire slaves and pay the compensation for their services to those who assume to be their owners, unless such payment is to be applied to their liberation. Members are earnestly desired "to promote the instruction of the people of color, as objects of the common salvation, in the principles of the Christian religion; as well as in such branches of school learning as may fit them for freedom, and to become useful members of civil society. Also, that Friends in their several neighborhoods, advise and assist them in the education of their children, and common worldly concerns."

Another clause, referring mournfully to "the practice of enslaving mankind" as a shameful one, exhorts members

"to be no way accessory to this enormous national evil, but to discourage it by all the justifiable means in their power; it being obvious that wherever it prevails, it tends to corrupt the morals of the people, so as not only to render them obnoxious to the displeasure of the Almighty, but deaf to his warnings, and insensible and regardless of his impending judgments."

JOHN CANDLER.—We noticed, on page 7, the Anti-Slavery mission to Brazil of our beloved friends John and Maria Candler and Wilson Burgess. A Friend in England writes, under date of 1st Mo. 30th:—

"We have information of the arrival of our dear friends John and Maria Candler from Brazil. Their mission appears to have answered its purpose. They were well received by the Emperor, who expressed his wish to see the slave trade abolished every where. They had interviews with many of the principal inhabitants, and the general feeling appeared to accord with that of the Emperor. Their address was introduced into the principal newspapers, and they met a society who have for their object the abolition of the trade."

RICHARD NEAL'S ABDUCTION.—When a case of this sort has filled a large space in most of the daily and many of the weekly journals, we may fairly conclude that it has come to the knowledge of our readers. To do full justice to the outrage now before us, would more than fill a whole number of the Non-Slaverholder, and the character of our present engagements precludes our making such a condensation as will be satisfactory to ourselves. We find Richard, on fourth day morning, the 25th of 1st month, "with good will doing service" in the stable of his employer, our esteemed friend Townsend Sharpless, of Philadelphia, whose confidence and generous kindness he had secured by a course of good conduct. He is called to the stable door, on a treacherous pretence of business, and, on presenting himself, is arrested by two persons claiming authority as officers. This wicked and cowardly deed was done so secretly as to be unknown to the family for some hours. He was hurried in a carriage to Chester, whence he was to be despatched to Baltimore in the night train. Leaving him there, in the custody of cruel men, and in an agony of suspense, we will give a few leading facts of his previous history. He was held as property by James Cheston, of Maryland, a benevolent man who, whilst his judgment on the Slavery question appears to have been a mistaken one, was a humane master, and anxious to provide for the welfare of his laborers; as may be seen by these words from his will:

"I commit my servants to my sons; not as property, but that they may make such disposition of them as shall most conduce to the benefit of said slaves."

This will, through defect of evidence, could not be admitted to probate, but the heirs, true to the instincts of humanity, and to the dictates of "higher law," executed papers of manumission. Richard fell to the share of Dr. Caspar Morris, who promptly liberated him; but his wife and children (having no connection with the Cheston Estate), were held as slaves by a certain Isaac Mayo (who has, prefixed to his name, a title which signifies his connection with Slavery's unlovely sister, WAR.) Richard, after a while, removed to Philadelphia, where he labored for the means of emancipating his family. At length, without his connivance, (though we are far from regarding such connivance as anti-republican or anti-christian) the wife and children, desperate from their experiences of the workings of the "peculiar institution" as carried on by "Patriarch" Mayo, absconded, were recaptured, were sold by Mayo (whose ownership or whose right to sell them was, as we opine, no stronger than that of any of our readers) and, through the kindly efforts of Dr. Morris and others, were purchased for liberation at a cost of more than $2000. He engaged himself, as coachman, with T. Sharpless, and has, in his employ, as heretofore, sustained a reputation more enviable than that of Commodore Mayo. This Mayo, after a lapse of years, resolved to charge Neal with having aided the escape from grievous oppression of her to whom he had promised love and faithfulness till death, and of the children whom God had given to him, and had not given to Isaac Mayo. Of this conjugal and paternal aid Neal has however established his innocence:—but Mayo, on the testimony of one of his slaves, obtained, from the Gov. of Maryland, a requisition which was readily responded to by a warrant from Gov. Bigler, whose zeal for the re-introduction of Slavery will, we presume, be appreciated, rather than respected at the South. That Gov. Bigler is much to blame in this case, appears certain. Whether his error extended deeper than carelessness, we care not to enquire. His pro-slavery message has made a blot upon his name, which must be washed out, before this one will be very conspicuous. A small blot, however dark, is not so much noticed upon a greater one of the same hue. A writ of habeas corpus was obtained, and an officer, with two citizens, proceeded with it to Chester, having no certain knowledge that they were upon the right track. "Unarmed," says Dr. Morris, "except in that divine panoply in which 'he is thrice armed who has his quarrel just,' they reached Chester just in time to prevent, by the interposition of this writ, the further abduction of Richard." It was now nearly midnight, and the emissaries of slavery might have said in their hearts, "Surely the darkness shall cover me." They were waiting to enter the cars as the messengers of mercy and deliverance landed. The writ was read, but was disregarded. The two friends of humanity held the arms of the intended victim. The representatives of the adage "might makes right," also seized and strove to drag him toward the train. The whole time for stopping at the station was five minutes. "Michael and his angels fought, and the Dragon fought and his angels." "It became" (to quote the Pa. Freeman,) "a question of muscular strength." The kidnapper was frantic in his puny wrath, as the engine whistled shrilly, and the "iron courser," breathing out a long train of something which looked like fiery indignation, rushed onward with a lumbering noise which was no sweet music to the ears of Mayo. "To feel that one has sold himself to the enemy," says Whittier, "is no pleasant matter, but to mourn over the loss of the purchase money is still worse." Is it a dream? Does Satan leave his allies in the lurch, at the very moment of their extremity? Is it really the departing train after which Mayo's dilated optics strain? He became ridiculous in his fury. "I WILL GIVE A HUNDRED DOLLARS IF THE CARS WILL STOP ONE MOMENT!" In vain! There is something very impeccable in steam. A steam engine has what is called a governor, but we never heard of its accepting a bribe. Save thy hundred dollars, Isaac Mayo, thou mayest need them yet! Richard Neal, with his enemies and his friends, were still in the land of Penn. Said we that Satan had left his minions in the lurch? Nay, he was still present with them, as they evinced by murderous menaces, and gestures of assault. One of the friends of Richard received, through his coat, under his arm, a cowardly stab from behind, but was unhurt, and, "armed strong in innocence," they demeaned themselves with a calm heroism, indicative of so good a cause. Next day, Richard was by legal process removed to Philadelphia, where he was imprisoned for trial, and, after some unwarrantable detention, and several hearings of the case, the warrant of William Bigler being withdrawn, and the parties to the arrest finally failing to appear, Richard Neal was discharged; and although he has been deeply wronged, he is somewhat complacent in the reflection, that even at the South, where dark skin is at a discount, he kept better company than did the Commodore.

A KIDNAPPER UNDER ORDERS TO SUPPRESS KIDNAPPING.—The cause of the absence of Isaac Mayo from the proceedings before the Supreme Court in the case of Neal, was stated thus: "He is under sailing orders in the African squadron." There is a very trite adage which is severely applicable.

The case of Neal has excited some attention in the Senate of Pennsylvania; and he has entered complaint for violent assault and battery, against Charles Tapper, one of the Marshal's police, who was held in $500 bail.

CHARLES WEELEY.—It is sickening to keep "posted up" respecting the continually occurring cases of wrong and outrage. Charles Wesley, a boy "held to service" till he should attain the age of 21 years, escaped from Delaware, was re-captured at Philadelphia, and delivered to the oppressors. "At the final hearing of the case," says the Freeman, "the Bulletin reports the following as a touching little episode between the calling of the case and its conclusion"—

"A colored man, of modest demeanor, and considerable intelligence, but evidently an enthusiast, arose and asked permission to say a few words. Permission was granted him by the Commissioner.

He began as follows: I feel impelled by the spirit of the Lord to speak in this case. I do not claim to represent Him, but His Spirit, which dwelleth within me. I came here to raise my voice in behalf of the oppressed. I feel that I can exercise little power over men's actions, because I am one of the oppressed. I can only pray that a scratch of the pen will not be given to paper against the oppressed. If it shall be done, we will come to every one concerned in it, for the army of the oppressed is now led on by the Lord in person. That same mighty Power which led your armies under Washington, when you were oppressed, now leads ours. Therefore, I say again, Woe! Woe! if you add to your oppressions!

These words were uttered in a plaintive tone of voice, and with much emotion. They had a very visible effect upon every one present, and the strictest decorum was manifested by every one present throughout the whole hearing of the case."

A SIGNIFICANT FACT.—Although several hundred persons died of cholera in Rochester during the past summer, it is stated by the Rochester Journal that not one of the members of the different Temperance societies in that city was included in the number.—Philadelphia Sun.

Statistics like these are worthy to be quoted, though not in presumption: not to inspire in the man who obeys the laws of his physical nature an overweening confidence in his hold upon life; but to extend to others the caution which Paul gave to the jailor, "DO THYSELF NO HARM."

PROHIBITORY LIQUOR LAW IN N. JERSEY.

It is to be:—but when? A talented correspondent under date of the 8th ult. playfully, and not very reverently, writes us from Trenton—"To-day our bill is to be presented in the Legislature. Ah! what a slow shell full of snails is this present forum of 'wooden heads'! They will perhaps find out ten years after their adjournment, what it was that God and Humanity asked of them. 'War's me!'" The bill was reported: attempts were made by puzzled Politicians to maim it by treacherous amendments;—but the final action will be after this number is in type. Some members are thoroughly right: others most sincerely desire to do what will be most popular. Let them make THE RIGHT their standard, and they need not waver.

LITERARY NOTICES.

LIFE OF ELIZABETH FRY, BY SUSANNA CORBEE. London pp. 600, 8vo.—We find by the London Friend, that this work is in the press. It is there stated to "merit a place in the library of every Friends' family." We need no words of commendation, as the name of the beloved Friend who has undertaken (at the request of the relatives of Elizabeth Fry) this labor of love, prepares us for the sentiment expressed, that she has "executed her task with great judgment, and with a fine and true appreciation of the subject of her memoir."

THE CHAPEL OF THE HERMITS, and other Poems, by JOHN G. WHITTIER. Boston: Ticknor, Reed & Fields. pp. 118.

"Whittier is certainly one of our greatest poets! The terminations of some of his lines sound like thunder!" Thus exclaimed the venerable Christian patriarch John Cox, on the appearance of the first authorized collection of his poems. From such a man, (as know all those who knew him,) words of praise were high praise: for he belonged to the select class of gifted spirits "whose verdict is prophecy, and whose applause is fame." But there were many minds, and minds of power, too, but unfortunately conservative, aristocratic, cold, and with a strong yet unconscious proclivity to expediency, who could not perceive Whittier's full dimensions, until a waste of evidence was forced upon their notice—until, in sooth, a recognition of his greatness came to them, from quarters where "fanaticism" was not deemed to exist. Such as these would, at times, condescendingly lessen him by very faint and haughty praise; yet somehow his fame spread without their aid, and ten thousand intellects were influenced, and, to a considerable extent, moulded by his wizard spell. It is no idle boast, but literal fact, which his soul is made to speak in that glorious poem, "MY SOUL AND I."

"I have wrestled stoutly with the Wrong,
And borne the Right
From beneath the foot-fall of the throng
To life and light.
Wherever Freedom shivered a chain,
God speed, quoth I;
To Error amidst her shouting train
I gave the lie."

When the first unauthorised collection of his verse came forth in humble guise, a rustic, uneducated back-woodsman, as he listened to page after page, walked the floor with rapid strides, till, filled with just appreciation of the sentiments which had been given to the generations that should walk the earth, he enthusiastically exclaimed: "I tell you what! THAT WORK WILL BE A TEXT BOOK OF LIBERTY IN AFTER AGES!" This unlettered man was a better critic than the learned cynic or the wise expedientist. Whittier is now in "life's mid span;" though, alas, with health enfeebled, and "overworn at noonday," he has too good reason to call himself

"A tired on-looker through the day's decline."

And yet few harda ever accomplished so much in their own life time. He has impressed the popular mind of his country; he has given forth couplets and stanzas which are already incorporated with the language; and we can scarcely open a literary, philanthropic or even political journal which is in the least degenerated with the idea of reform and human progress, without meeting passages from the Poet of Amesbury. Scattered through his voluminous works, we find some literary blemishes, as in Burns; some carelessness in grammar; Yankeeisms not a few; but he is a glorious bard, and as Poet of humanity he has not a living peer. Like Bacon, he may well trust his fame with "TIMES SUCCEEDING;" like him, he can afford to "leave his name and his memory to foreign nations, and to his own countrymen, after some time be passed over."

From the volume before us we will not make selections in the present number. We have little sympathy with the taste of him who, knowing that a new volume by John Greenleaf Whittier has been issued, would not desire to possess it, and who would not, if needs be, almost sell his garment to buy one.

In the press, and will shortly be published; "THE AMERICAN SLAVE CODE, in Theory and Practice: its distinctive features shown by its Statutes, Judicial Decisions, and Illustrative Facts." By WILLIAM GOODELL, author of the "Democracy of Christianity," "Slavery and Anti-Slavery," &c. New York: American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, 48 Beekman street. This work will contain above 400 pages, 12mo, neatly bound in cloth, and will be sold for cash at 75 cents the single copy, $6 per dozen, and $45 per hundred. Also, in paper covers, at a deduction of 10 cents per copy from the above prices.

Orders may be forwarded to LEWIS TAPPAN, 48 Beekman street, New York.

The following is an extract from a letter addressed by Judge Jay to the author—

Your analysis of the slave laws is very able, and your exhibition of their practical application by the Southern Courts, evinces great and careful research. "Your book is as impregnable against the charge of exaggeration as Euclid's Geometry, since, like that, it consists of propositions and demonstrations. The book is not only true, but it is unquestionably true."

We annex the table of contents, by which our readers may perceive the important range of subject matter.

To CORRESPONDENTS.—Several communications are too late for examination in reference to the present number. It is always desirable that essays designed for insertion, be accompanied by the name of the writer. Our paper is small. A talented correspondent writes us: "It bids fair to be interesting: that is very important: do not let it be heavy." With this view, we desire each month to present due variety,—which can hardly be done if essays should be prolonged to treatises. Our friends are invited to practice the virtue of condensation. It will benefit their style and save room, if they will express their thoughts without redundant words. The motto is a good one; "Long or short, still hasten to a close." One unknown friend asks us to condense, and alter freely, a closely written article, which would fill two pages of the Non-Slaveholder. To do this without risk of injustice to the writer, would consume much more time than to pen the same amount of original matter. We hope that contributors will be amiable if we sometimes seem to slight their favors. We may have reasons for omitting essays which we value, and if we err in our judgment, it should be remembered that we are at times too much harassed to bring our judgment fully to bear.

Passages from our Correspondence.

A valued correspondent in Pennsylvania, in a letter not designed for publication, makes the following suggestions, which we prefer to give in his own words.

"At some time, I should wish to see exposed in the Non-Slaveholder, in a kind yet truthful manner, the great danger, if not great sinfulness, and sometimes the great untruthfulness, of pleading a want of light from the Holy Spirit, in justification of any practice shown to be immoral by sheer common sense and convictions of the natural mind. The persons who, continuing in a course which their reason condemns, professedly wait for a higher illumination, may reasonably expect to receive it when the admonition shall cease to be true. "They have Moses and the Prophets; let them hear them. If they hear not Moses and the Prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." To run behind the Holy Spirit as a cover for indulgences, is, at the best, highly irreverent; and it is not "a sin unto death," yet we may well conclude, is a sin which continued in will, by its death-doing consequences, materially impair our moral and religious well-being.

The plea adverted to, though not a true result of the doctrine of Friends, is almost peculiar to members of that society. The latter circumstance may render the discussion of it in a public journal, somewhat difficult, though not the less needful if Truth demands it.

Whilst Friends certainly believe that "the manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal," it by no means belongs to their principles to reject the assistance of the natural powers in the exploration of moral and practical religious truths. They ordinarily reason "of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come," as do other Christians—perhaps with better success in some respects than they—yet after the same manner; and they claim the work of their great apologist to be an unanswerable argument. They reason of all the affairs of life; and they hold themselves bound to give an answer to every man that asketh a reason of the hope that is in them. In treating with offenders, they admit of no plea of their wanting super-human light, though they crave it for them.

I offer these notes with the hope of drawing thy attention to the important subject—believing it could be more advantageously treated of, editorially, should the way open in thy mind so to do, than by a mere communication."

RICHMOND CO., MAINE.—[With eight subscriptions.]—"We have felt for some time that the cause is good, and that we cannot be justified in using slave labor goods. The subject is increasingly one of serious inquiry this way, and we hope the day is not very distant when all Friends will feel bound to cast their mite of influence into the available scale."

MONKTON, VERMONT.—[With $3.00, making, with a previous order, 16 subscriptions to one address.]—"While soliciting subscribers for the Non-Slaveholder, I am asked, in reference to the plan of operation against Slavery therein advocated, 'What good will it do?' To which I generally answer, that I apprehend it will do an amount of good, fairly corresponding with any other testimony faithfully and consistently borne against any other evil. Friends are advised in the discipline of New York Yearly Meeting 'not to unite with any, directly or indirectly, in a way calculated to promote the spirit of war, or which may encourage or strengthen them therein; to avoid engaging in any business tending to promote war, underwriting on armed vessels; or being concerned in any company where such insurance is made, or in shipping or ordering goods shipped in armed vessels.' They are thus advised, not so much from a belief that their testimony against it will be the means of bringing it to an end, as from a deep-rooted conviction, that as war is in itself absolutely at variance with Christian principle, Christians must not implicate themselves with it. Friends, in this view, refuse to speak well of it, voluntarily to sustain it, or to make money by it; and in this manner an inconsiderable amount of testimony against war has been borne. Still, though war has not come to an end, their testimony against it is as much required of them as ever. And so with Slavery. "Friends are advised to avoid any act by which the right of Slavery is acknowledged." Their testimony against it springs from the same root—its incompatibility with Christianity; hence, too, the necessity for a faithful and consistent testimony, and when they have become in earnest, in refusing their voluntary aid, by word or deed, in support of it; declining emoluments through any connection with it, then our testimony against Slavery may be regarded as at par with our testimony against war.

Such objectors mostly lose sight of the question, "where is the foundation for my right to use the fruit of another man's labor, without his recompense or consent?" Others who unite with the sentiment so happily expressed in the motto of the N. Slaveholder, require an assurance that they can obtain "bona fide," the free labor productions for which they pay. To such it is not always sufficient to say,—"I have confidence in the integrity of those, through whom the goods have come." The confidence so much to be desired, might be sensibly increased in them, were they in possession of the information thou couldst give them of the "business channel," through which the cotton, in particular, has passed from the plantation of the free man to the wholesale merchant in Philadelphia, or elsewhere.

The Anti-Slavery Law has passed the ordeal of the ballot-box, and we hope to see it in operation in due season. There has been much well applied labor expended in its favor, and, as a matter of course, a corresponding amount of opposition, but for less disturbance of the public quiet, than one would anticipate in such a struggle between principle and appetite, combined with selfish interest. Surely, it may be accepted by the friends of "progress," as proof that they are laboring in a right cause, and in a right spirit. It is greatly to be desired that the law may find calm and faithful administrators, and that other States may be encouraged to follow the example.

H. M.

AN ENGLISH FRIEND, writes:—"How do your American ladies feel generally, respecting our 'affectionate address' about slavery? They have published at New York a very ill-considered 'reply,' with too much of truth in it; but a considerable portion of it is not true. The condition of our poorer classes here and in Ireland, is very much improved and improving. And, after all, they are free and many of them happy in rags and in dirt;—far dearer to them than those whom they love, nor beaten, nor assaulted, nor abused with impunity."

"I'VE QUIT SMOKING IT."

[The Anti-Slavery Reporter has a narrative of David Holmes, a fugitive slave from Mecklenburg Co., Virginia, extremely interesting in its detail, but much too long for the Non-Slaveholder. David is safe in the British dominions. We extract the concluding portion of the narrative, commencing with a conversation, which took place between him and the Editor of the Reporter, on the 3d day of last 12th month.—Ed.]

"And so you smoke tobacco, David?"
"Yes, Sir. I've smoke it ever since I was that high," indicating by a sign, the height of a little boy of eight or ten years old.

"Did it ever occur to you, David, where and how that tobacco is grown?"

"Well, we raised a lot in Virginia."

"Yes: where you were a slave, and where you have left many of your brethren in slavery."

"Yes, Sir."

"What do you think becomes of all the tobacco, and cotton, and sugar, and rice, that is grown by slaves, David?"

"I guess it's a good deal of it sold: most all I should say."

"Well don't you see how the buyer, the consumers of slave produce, help to keep up slavery? It is because the slave-owners find a market for the products of their slaves' labour that they keep them in slavery. You smoke tobacco. That tobacco has been grown by a slave—perhaps by some one you know. But if there were no one to buy it when it was grown, what use would there be in growing it?"

"I see that, Sir. I never thought of that before."

"Well, David, now you have it before you, turn it over in your mind, and next time you come, let me hear what you think about it?"

And so David went away, very much perplexed, but evidently pondering. In about twelve days, he came again. He had procured a situation as fire-man on board a West-India steamer, at fifty shillings a month wages. He came to thank us, and to tell us how he meant to do his best to keep his place: how he intended to learn to read and write: how he should try to get a better place, and to save money, and be "like a white man."

"And how about the tobacco, David?" said we.

"It's very hard, Sir," he said; "I can't a'most do at all. I've been used to it so long."

"Yes, David. I'm sure what you say is true. But I'm asking what you think about—you know—smoking tobacco that is grown by slaves."

"Well, Sir, I do think it's right down wicked; raley now."

"I'm glad to hear you say so, David. And what do you think then you ought to do?"

"I can't say I'm sure, Sir. But I'll tell you what I have done."

"What's that David?"

"I—I've—I've quit smoking it," sobbed David, but with such a brightened countenance, that we felt it had been with him a conscientious act.

And we believe David Holmes will keep his word.

We have related this anecdote to several of our friends, amateurs of the Nicotian weed, who have since renounced Cuban and Virginian and such kinds of tobacco, for Turkish and other sorts that are not tainted with slavery.

When the physician walks with an anxious tread about the bed of his patient; when all his skill and energy are put forth to relieve and save the sufferer; does not this tell us that he fears dissolution? Do we not read the fate of the expiring man in the anxious countenances of his friends, in the thoughtful and despairing look of the physician? And such is the case with American Slavery. Its friends are every where guarding it with even paternal solicitude; statesmen watch about its dying bed with an anxiety that betokens the intensity of their fears; doctors of divinity gather around the scene, and offer up their prayers for its restoration to health; but, alas! the hurried step, the trembling hand, the multitude of physicians and the earnest inquiries, all proclaim that the disease is mortal.

From "The Slave—his wrongs and the remedy."

THE REMEDY.

In our former numbers, we have considered the Free Labour in its moral influence on the slaveholders. If the world might but behold the spectacle of a great nation, its quays piled with the rich products of slave regions, yet refusing to enjoy them—the sugar of the Spanish West Indies—the coffee and cocoa of Brazil—the rice and cotton of America—all this heaped in profusion on the strand of Britain, and British hearts turning from it with loathing—British hands stamping this produce of slavery with the brand of public reprobation, and then refusing to touch, taste, or handle it, as an unclean thing—if such a spectacle were happily exhibited; were any considerable fraction of our people to unite in this practical process against slavery, the slaveholder would be compelled to ponder his position; he could hardly fail to have his eyes opened to the fact, that there must be some intrinsic heinousness in a system of which Christian men thus repudiated the fruits.

But there is another point of view in which we are desirous to have this movement considered, viz., its influence on ourselves. We are exhorted in Scripture to "consider those that are in bonds as bound with them;" and surely nothing is more likely to furnish us with a perpetual remembrance of the slave, than the principle which refuses to participate in the blood-stained produce of his toil. Those who have adopted this principle, have the wrongs of their sable brethren brought vividly before them from day to day. Seated at the breakfast table, the aromatic odours of the coffee-pot

A MAGNANIMOUS MEMORIAL.

"To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled."

The memorial of the undersigned, citizens of Pennsylvania, respectfully represents; That they regard the existence of slavery in the Southern States of this Union as injurious to the prosperity of the nation, destructive to the harmony of the several sections, incompatible with the great principles of liberty and the rights of man as set forth in the Declaration of Independence and the Federal Constitution, and eminently calculated to retard the progress of those principles among other nations;—that while acknowledging that their right of direct legislation for the abolition of slavery rests exclusively in the people of the Southern States, your memorialists yet believe that inasmuch as the citizens of the Free States, through their commercial relations with the South, participate in the profits of slave labor, and have thus become partners with the slaveholders in the great business of Slavery, it is the duty of the National Government, whenever the Southern States may be disposed to adopt legislative measures for the purpose, to aid them in establishing universal freedom. And your memorialists, therefore, respectfully, but earnestly, ask of Congress the enactment of a law which shall provide that whenever any State, by its Legislature, shall pass an act emancipating the slaves within its limits, an assessment shall be made by Commissioners appointed under the authority of the Governor of the State, and the President of the United States, of the losses sustained by the slaveholders individually, and the aggregate amount to be paid out of the National Treasury into the Treasury of such State for equitable distribution.

LEGAL PROGRESS.

The Christian Moralist, after strenuous efforts to induce legislation in accordance with what he believes to be the Divine will, often droops his head in disappointment. Yet is he sometimes cheered by unexpected changes in statutory enactments, which, though often prompted by personal sympathy or other inferior motive, tend toward a more perfect code.

Smuggling, and the varied evils arising from high tariffs of duties, act powerfully in breaking down these barriers to a brotherly reciprocity among the nations.

The voters of California were laborers; and because Slavery degraded and depreciated labor they excluded it by constitutional provision.

The recent legislature of this State, (New bring to their remembrance the claims of the negro—the rice which so often accompanies their mid-day meal, carries them off in thought to the swamps of Carolina, where slave-women are pursuing their killing drudgery—and when the curtains are drawn, and the hissing urn summons them to the social pleasures of the tea-table, the sparkling sugar again implies them to "remember them that are in bonds." Nor are the wardrobe of abstainers less eloquent of suggestions for the relief of torn and bleeding humanity. In drawing on a stocking, or adjusting a frock, they are reminded to seek their own comforts without destroying the happiness of others; they are again silently, but impressively exhorted to "remember them that are in bonds." It was a beautiful thought of Edgar Bennett's, when he compared the children of an anti-slavery household to the African squadron for the suppression of the slave-trade. And surely the comparison holds good, though the former operate by more Christian means. Think of the sweet little cherubs cruising round the table, watching, with keen-eyed vigilance, lest any product of the blood-stained system should invade their righteous blockade; or standing sentry over the wardrobe, and challenging every article of clothing, that seeks admission to its shelter! Establish such a blockade as this in Europe, and the African squadron would be soon dismantled; for the moral influence of such a warfare would be far more potent than that of shot and cannon.

It is an axiom in moral science, that to excite the feelings by repeated tales of woe, without affording the opportunity for corresponding action for its relief, is liable to induce a morbid state of mind; and does more harm than good. This is the great objection to many works of fiction, which barrow up the soul by tales of imaginary suffering, that cannot be reached. We fear the advocacy of the anti-slavery cause is too often liable to this impulsion. Our feelings are worked upon by the description of scenes of horror, unhappily too real; but we are not pointed sufficiently to any practical method of obviating the suffering which we deplore. The free-labour movement supplies this desideratum. It points to a field in which none need be idle, and where even the feeble child may labour with effect. Here then surely is another reason why the friends of the slave should be the patrons of free-labour. The sacrifice it involves is but small in money-value, so small, indeed, that it must be estimated in fractions; but it does involve some sacrifice of thought, some consideration for the rights of others, and a little trouble not to reach upon their happiness. We reverently believe that such a sacrifice, made in a right spirit, and with an eye to the glory of God and the good of our fellow creatures, will not be in vain; but that, while others are blessed through our humble instrumentality, we shall be well repaid with the peaceful satisfaction of having done what we could.

As Harts, o'er dreary mountains chased,

Pant for the water brooks below;

So should we ever thirst to taste

Those which from Moses' fountains flow.

Nor shall they disappointed be,

Who, leaving Earth's delusive heights,

Convert, in humble trust, to thee

Oh well-spring of unmix'd delights.

GEORGE DUNN ET.

Jersey) refused to enact a prohibitory liquor law, but they evinced their sense of the evils of the rum trade, by passing one to place the property of habitual drunkards under the care of Commissioners, as in cases of lunacy. May we not hope that, by another year, they will be sufficiently enlightened to eradicate drunkenness, by stopping the sale of intoxicating drinks?

A few years ago considerable effort was made to induce the legislature of N. Jersey to abolish capital punishment, and a powerful speech by G. P. Mollison it was hoped would secure it. But it failed. Public sentiment however, has advanced beyond the law, and the horror of taking human life, has so operated on juries, that, in accordance with the roused sympathies of large audiences, that they have in several instances brought in verdicts of "insanity," instead of "murder in the first degree," when the latter had been clearly proved. During the past winter a bill was passed authorizing the Court of Pardons to commute a sentence of death into imprisonment for ten or more years, or for life—the commuted sentence to be irrevocable. To this law it was objected that it was but the entering wedge for the abolition of capital punishment; that sympathies would be excited in the Court of Pardons in behalf of every man convicted of murder, and that no one, however guilty, would be executed. The opposition was strenuous, but the bill passed 37 to 18. Four days after it became a law, the life of a poor unhappy man who had murdered an acquaintance in a fit of intoxication, was saved by its operation!

Light does advance—will advance! "There's a good time coming!" S. A.

For the Non-Slaveholder. FREE PRODUCE.

The Society of Friends has taken the lead of all other religious societies, in bearing a testimony against Slavery. It has long since, by its discipline, declared that no member can be a slaveholder, and has continued from time to time, to publish to the world its views and principles on the subject. But while, as a society, we are holding up to view such a noble standard, are we not, individually, countenancing and supporting by the free use of its products, the very system which we publicly condemn? After taking such a noble stand against slaveholding as to clear ourselves from its reproach, have we not too much settled down at ease, as if all that was necessary had been accomplished? While slavery continues, I believe it will be required of the members of the society of Friends, to continue to bear testimony against it; and I know of no way to do so more effectually, than to abstain from the use of its products.

Our public declarations are less effectual from the fact, that individually, our hands are not clean. We must acknowledge that the beam is in our own eye, as long as we continue to buy and use the products of slavery; then how can we see clearly to cast mote or beam out of our brother's eye? I rejoice to believe however, that there is an increasing interest felt on this subject, and that there is a more general desire among our members, to procure and use, the products of free labor. But there are so many difficulties in the way, that many cannot conveniently accomplish what they desire. Our members are scattered over a wide extent of country, and the places for obtaining free goods are few, and far between.

In advancing the standard as far as it has been done, much labor has necessarily been performed; and in carrying it forward, much labor will be required, and a unity of action is necessary. I am willing therefore, to suggest the propriety, and necessity, for Friends, in every neighborhood, or meeting, to form themselves into an association for the promotion of this desirable object. They can thus devise ways and means for doing collectively, what cannot be done individually. By uniting their orders, and appointing one agent to obtain their goods, the difficulties that have heretofore been in the way, will be much lessened, and but small excuse left for inaction.

I believe that all we say, or write, or publish, on this subject, will be of little avail without action, and I am also aware of the necessity of a right concern, to produce the right kind of action; yet I think we are generally convinced of its propriety, but need to be often reminded of our duty, as a stimulant to its performance. Individual faithfulness on the part of our members, would again place our society in its true position, in regard to the important subject of slavery. W.

[We have no idea, (nor do we attribute such view to our correspondent,) of urging the plan of abstinence from Slave Produce as binding merely upon Friends. We wish to show to all candid men and women, that our principle is a true one, and then, by the universal brotherhood of man, and by the fatherhood of God, we would exhort all members of the family who perceive the right, to act it out. We dearly love the Society of Friends, and we wish its standard to be always pure, and always faithfully elevated. But we do not conduct this Journal from any view which is restricted by sectarian limits. "Let every one that nameth the name of Christ, depart from iniquity." Ed.]

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, FOURTH MONTH, 6, 1833.

RUNNING BEHIND THE HOLY SPIRIT AS A COVER FOR INDULGENCES. The remarks upon this subject, on our first page, under the caption of "Passages from our correspondence," are from a Friend, whose consistency of life and weight of character entitle him to a candid hearing. The theme is indeed a delicate one for "discussion in a public Journal." We do not intend to make, or to admit into the Non-Slaveholder, attacks upon religious societies, much less upon the one, whose principles and whose members are unspeakably dear to us. But we agree with our correspondent that the "plea" which he exposes is no "true result of the doctrine of Friends." A belief in the unspeakable gift of the Holy Spirit which illuminates the mind and conscience of man, and which, if fully received, will lead into all Truth, is essential to theologic soundness. But if such belief be made a pretext for rejecting ordinary and valid evidence and argument,—if any willfully remain in known error under plea of waiting for a spiritual guidance into Truth,—if, with sight and light sufficient to perceive a moral enormity, any refuse to admit it to be such, on the pretension that they must have first a spiritual revelation, we do not hesitate to say, that there is no Quakerism in such a position. We think it no unfriendly act to administer to those who are snared with such delusion, a fraternal hint that they are not fairly carrying out the great and precious doctrine which they desire to support, but that, by getting off the track, they are running it into vanism, the probable tendency of which would be the failure of a true belief in the doctrine itself. But of some who professedly wait for evidence, we would kindly ask,—have they not seen? Has it not often been evident to their understandings, that to give the motive to the slaveholder is to be implicated in slaveholding? Are they sure that in such perception there was no divine illumination to help the infirmities and the darkness of their intellects? "Whatsoever doth make manifest is light"—and "God is light"—and "of Him are all things." When a moral position is seen, albeit dimly, yet with certainty, is there no irreverence in saying to Him that formed the eye, "give us more light, or we cannot recognize this truth?" "Unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness!"

We make no charges. We would bear hardly or uncharitably on no one. The letter of our esteemed correspondent supposes the existence of a class to whom these considerations apply. To such class we commend them.

The metrical effusion, "MOVING BEFORE THE BODY," was inserted seven years ago in the first volume of the former series. A firm supporter of the Non-Slaveholder requests its re-insertion, with which we comply, as it has also a direct bearing upon the subject treated of in the letter referred to.

PROPOSED INCENTIVE TO EMANCIPATION. We invite the attention of our readers to the Memorial of Samuel Rhoads, Enoch Lewis, and others. We regard the suggestion as a wise one, based in magnanimity and justice. Whilst we hold the title of the Slaveholder in his slave to be utterly nought, yet it cannot be truthfully denied that the North has been partner with the South in the profit and in the guilt of the system. It is proper that we of the North should share in the sacrifice which in many cases must be made in the abolition of slavery. We do not yield an inch of our former ground. We would not justify the Master in holding his fellow man as property for one moment, in the prospect of compensation. We believe that in many thousands of cases the pecuniary interest of the master would be promoted by immediate and unconditional emancipation. But we believe the sin to be a national one, involving the whole country in guilt; and we would gladly see a National sacrifice upon the altar of Right. Whilst we regard the Southern master as implicated directly in a great crime, (in which we are perhaps assuredly, though indirectly implicated) we do not exclude him from our sympathy; nor ought we to hesitate to make any pecuniary sacrifice by which we might aid him to put away this grievous curse.

THE PROHIBITORY LIQUOR LAW IN VERMONT, has been sustained not only by an overwhelming popular vote, but also by decision of the Supreme Court of the Green Mountain State. The majority in favor of the law was 1121,—the whole vote polled being 43,500. "This decision," says the Christian Repository, "embraces and sustains several of the most important principles of the Vermont Liquor Law; such as the right of search and seizure without warrant in certain cases; the right to anticipate and prevent evil in society; the right to destroy property in cases where the public good required it."

IN NEW JERSEY, sixty thousand people petitioned for a law equivalent to that of Maine, and an Act in conformity with the wishes of the memorialists, and prepared with great care, was reported to the Legislature, but was voted down in the Assembly by a large majority.—We believe this course to have been altogether without excuse. The license system was founded in a deep sense of the evils resulting from the sale of ardent spirits as beverage, and was designed to lessen the evil by restricting it. The experience of successive generations has shown that system to be much worse than useless, and that all restrictive laws upon the subject are utterly futile. The people of New Jersey are convinced of this, and they asked of their Representatives in the Legislature a law which would save, even in the course of the brief time that must elapse before better men can be elected, an immense amount of property, and a vast number of human lives and probably of human souls. It would lessen greatly the pauperism, the misery, and the crime in New Jersey. And all this is well known to the men who have so grossly violated their duty. We may, and we do, look into the future with hope; trusting that a Good Providence may put it into the hearts of the citizens to elect better men who will enact better laws. But alas for the good that has failed to be done! Alas for the loathsome crime and fearful misery which must be charged upon these legislators, who might have prevented it, but did not. Alas for the responsibility and the guilt incurred by these men who were faithfully advised and enlightened and would not obey the light! It seems to us that if they could look intelligently upon the results of their unfaithfulness, if they could see passing before them in hideous procession, all the drunkards whose reformation they have prevented, all the widows, the orphans, the criminals, the convicts, the bankrupts, the paupers who will have become such through their misdeeds; if they could behold the injured children, the maltreated wives, the premature death beds,—and hear the death howls and see the "writings of impenitent Remorse," as the spirit of the inebriate (unreformed through them) is passing out of this beautiful world, and frantic with the consciousness that the drunkard has no promise of a better;—could the members who voted with the majority see all this, surely some of them would exclaim, "it were better for us that a mill-stone were hanged about our necks, and we cast into the sea."

"unannounced, unannounced,

With all his imperfections on his head,"

GENUINENESS OF FREE LABOR GOODS.—We cheerfully respond to the request of our Monksien correspondent, though we cannot in this number afford much space to the subject. The proprietor of the Free Produce Store in Philadelphia, has a list of names of growers of free cotton, in MISSISSIPPI, WESTERN TENNESSEE, ALABAMA, TEXAS, and ARKANSAS. The list was furnished by our late friend NATHAN THOMAS, whose conscientiousness, shrewdness, and efficiency were beyond doubt, and who visited them on their plantations. The same stationary agents, reliable men, who were appointed years ago, are still employed. It is important to state further, that, after ascertaining the fact that these planters do not own Slaves nor hire them, they are required on delivery of the cotton to give certificates, on their affirmation, that this cotton has been raised and ginned entirely by white people, and that they neither own nor hire Slaves. It is not enough that the particular parcel of cotton in question is raised by free hands: but it must be raised by persons who employ no Slaves. Again:—no temptation to deceive is extended to the planter in the way of a premium or higher price. The extra expense of the free goods results from the cost of separate manufacture. We trust that this explanation will be entirely satisfactory. The business arrangement for producing free cotton, through all the stages from the plantation to the Wholesale Store, is completely organized. There is no deception or mistake. Let all country dealers and country consumers be equally careful in assuring themselves of the character of the produce which they procure.

STATUTIZED BUT NOT LEGALIZED.—The Legislature of Illinois has passed an unlawful law which affords a melancholy demonstration of the depravity of its supporters. The new Editor of the Freeman appropriately declares, that "it is a bundle of atrocities: Every section of it is a fresh outrage." We would rather trust in the tender mercies of Free Labor than of these Legislators, who would seem to have studied carefully what things are wicked, that they might statute them. We have neither space nor patience, to give even a synopsis. The authors and abettors of this loathsome iniquity, will spread their own infamy, and our readers will hear of it, and will, we doubt not, join with us in craving for the perpetrators penitence and forgiveness.

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER.

The Liberator in noticing the new volume of Poems by this author, to which we referred last month, uses the following language, which, as a testimonial, is all the weightier and more striking, from the fact that the Editor of that Journal, and the Bard of Amesbury, have of late years differed in their creed and their policy as Abolitionists. The impartial tribute is creditable to both parties.

"Nothing trivial or common-place comes from the pen of Whittier. He is one of the world's noblest poets, and has done great and everlasting service to the cause of universal Freedom and Humanity. We find it difficult to say what is lacking in his poetry. Wit, humor, pathos, gentleness, energy, purity, womanly modesty and low-hearted courage, love of the beautiful and sublime, intense abhorrence of oppression, the deepest sympathy with earth's groaning millions, reverence for the higher law, spiritual insight, philosophical acumen, and absolute trust in God,—all these blend in the effusions of his glorious genius, and with almost faultless taste, judgment, and skill. Of the value and power of his spirit-stirring poems, in the tremendous struggle for the overthrow of slavery in this land, we know not how to speak. They have served to quicken and inspire thousands of minds, in times of imminent peril, to stand by the slave at whatever cost; and they have carried dismay into the ranks of those who are seeking to eternalize the impious system of chattel servitude. No other poet has ever so allied himself to a world-wide struggle for the freedom of man as man, or uttered such daring testimonies against the desecration of the image of God. For the last five years, his health has been growing more and more delicate, and hence his withdrawal from the active participation in that struggle, which, at an earlier period, made him so conspicuous."

It is always cheering to perceive, in those who earnestly dissent on topics of absorbing and intense interest, a hearty appreciation and cordial acknowledgement of each other's good points. Magnanimity is a noble trait, and certainly ought not to be dispensed with by philanthropists. We well remember the words of Whittier, when, in 1840, the separation in the anti-slavery ranks took place.

"The thing which I have greatly feared has come upon us. The original cause of the difficulty, a disposition to engraft foreign questions upon the simple stock of immediate emancipation, I early discovered, and labored to the extent of my ability to counteract. That in so doing I have been compelled to dissent from the views of some of my dearest personal friends, has been no ordinary trial to me. Whether a due degree of forbearance under injury and unmerited reproach, was manifested by those who have separated from the old American Society, I am, perhaps, not in a situation to decide. But the separation has taken place, and I can now only hope that both parties will go forward, each in its own way, steadily and without turning aside to assail each other, to promote the great and good cause to which they stand pledged before the world."

And we would commend to all who seek the welfare of the Slave and of the African race, (too many of whom have been found, to the scandal of our cause,

"Unto one another giving in the darkness blow for blow.")

the sad and pathetic outpouring of exhortation, with which five years later he called upon Abolitionists to "bury all their idle feuds in dust."

Ye with heart and vision gifted

To discern and love the right,

Whose worn faces have been lifted

To the slowly growing light,

Where from Freedom's sunrise drifted slowly back the muck of night—

Ye who through long years of trial

Still have held your purpose fast,

While a lengthening shade the dial

From the western sunrise east,

And of hope each hour's denial seemed an echo of the last—

Oh, my brothers! oh, my sisters!

Would to God that ye were near,

Gazing with me down the vistas

Of a sorrow strange and drear;

Would to God that ye were listening to the Voice I seem to hear!

With the storm above us driving,

With the false earth mined below—

Who shall marvel if thus striving

We have counted friend as foe?

Unto one another giving in the darkness blow for blow.

Well it may be that our natures

Have grown sterner and more hard,

And the freshness of their features

Somewhat harsh and battle-scarred,

And their harmonies of feeling overtasked and rudely jarred.

Be it so. It should not swerve us

From a purpose true and brave;

Dearer Freedom's rugged service

Than the pastime of the slave;

Better is the storm above it than the quiet of the grave.

Let us then, uniting, bury

All our idle feuds in dust,

And to future conflicts carry

Mutual faith and common trust;

Always he who most forgiveth in his brother is most just.

From the eternal Shadow rounding

All our sun and starlight here,

Voices of our lost ones sounding

Bid us be of heart and cheer,

Through the silence, down the spaces, falling on the toward ear.

Know we not our dead are looking

Downward with a sad surprise,

All our strife of words rebuking

With their mild and loving eyes?

(Shall we grieve the holy angels? Shall we cloud their blessed skies?)

Let us draw their smiles o'er us

Which have fallen in our way;

Let us do the work before us,

Cheerily, bravely, while we may,

Ere the long night-silence cometh, and with us it is not day!

LITERARY NOTICES.

SOME MEMOIRS OF THE LIFE OF JOHN ROBERTS; WRITTEN BY HIS SON, DANIEL ROBERTS. Phila.; H. Longstreth, 347 Market street, pp. 108.

This is a very neat re-print of a deservedly popular book. It ought to meet with a ready sale, for the promotion of which we cheerfully insert the PUBLISHER'S PREFACE to the present edition.

If an apology be needed for issuing a volume from the press, the Publisher is at no loss for one in the present instance. This little book has passed through frequent editions, and is now out of print. Moreover, it is one which most of those who have perused it would willingly possess. It is the simple and graphic record of one who commenced his career of manhood with the deeds of a warrior, and, literally, "with garments rolled in blood," but who, through Divine Mercy, was soon enabled to understand "a more excellent way," to enlist under the banner of the Prince of Peace, and sturdily and valiantly "to fight the good fight of Faith,"—enduring hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ.

"Even Quakerism had its apostolic jokers and drab-coated Robert Halls," said an eminent Reviewer, in a parenthesis, in an incidental allusion to the subject of this Memoir; and the same writer, in another treatise, says of him, "Roberts was by no means a gloomy fanatic; he had a great deal of shrewdness and humor, loved a quiet joke; and every gambling priest and swearing magistrate in the neighborhood stood in fear of his sharp wit." There are some persons (and our friend was one of them) so constitutionally mirthful, that even whilst steadily pursuing their heavenward way, bearing their daily cross, alive to the solemn responsibilities of existence, and surrounded by "many tribulations," they meet the fiercest assaults with a vein of pleasantry and wit, and compel the very enemies of Truth to laugh at their own errors and absurdities. Nor is it to be supposed, (though some disciples of a more sorrowing turn of mind may wonder that any one can laugh when life is so earnest and so solemn, when Heaven is to be lost or won, and the broad way is so thronged with sinners,) that temperaments such as these, are without their important uses in the economy of Providence.

"God hath many aims to compass, many messages to send, and His instruments are fitted each in some distinctive end."

And well fitted for a distinctive end, honest John appears to have been. His boldness and his ready wit often enabled him to introduce important truths in such a way that they could not be resisted or eluded. When Justice George officially and sternly undertook to let him and his friends know "that we must all be of one church," John, with ready coolness, told him that he ought them "to be well assured that it be the right church," reminding him that if he should "force a man against his conscience to conform to a wrong church," he could not in the day of account indemnify that man for so conforming. And who so well as he, could have cooped, again and again, with Bishop Nicholson, bringing him at last to beg for his forgiveness, and heartily to promise never to wrong him more? "Good old Bishop Nicholson," says Whittier, "it would seem, really liked his incorrigible Quaker neighbour, and could enjoy heartily his wit and humor, even when exercised at the expense of his own ecclesiastical dignity. He admired his blunt honesty and courage. Surrounded by flatterers and self-seekers, he found satisfaction in the company and conversation of one who, setting aside all conventionalisms, saw only in my lord Bishop a poor fellow-probationer, and addressed him on terms of conscious equality."

But though he had wit and humor always on hand for ready change, they were with him only subservient to the highest aims of an immortal soul. John Roberts was not a man of trifling or levity. He understood the idea that "cheerfulness is an acceptable hymn unto the Deity," and his heart sent up this hymn when one of a different temperament might have bewailed his lot, even in the midst of hottest struggles for resignation. And the reader of our little book will find the wit to which we have referred, to be but a pleasant seasoning to strong meat and wholesome food.

For the Non-Slaveholder. "MOVING BEFORE THE BODY."

There is a pure inspiring voice and competent to teach,
Whose counsels if thou wisely heed, thy inmost need will reach.

There is a light—observe it well—no lan is future ray—
Mistake it not—it came from Heaven and shows the heavenly way.

And yet when light beside is given, and Duty's course is clear,
And selfishness alone creates what obstacles appear.

By seeking miracles to teach what was already known,
Or waiting further lights, were want of Faith's obedience shown.

*Twere weak, presumptuous, vain, to seek a special revelation
To show what stands in bold relief and courts thy observation.

Oh bring not thou in dispute the doctrines we revere,
By pleading them for selfish aith, mere pretexts insincere!

There's deference due to those who long have walked in Wisdom's ways,
Whose feet are hallowed in those Courts, whose entrance gates are praise;

But if on man too much thou lean,—pierced by the broken reed—
The Lord may take away thy staff* in thy extremest need.

With reverent view the Church and own with awe its holy Head,
Its councils never yet have erred, when He those councils led!

Wholesome and binding its decrees forth in His power when given;
What thus is bound or loosed on Earth is bound or loosed in Heaven.

But take not for the Church's voice thine dictum, whose example
Was money-changers of old (time or renders in the Temple)—

Nor with the mystic body that associate mass confound,
Who, on a catalogue enrolled, by common rules are bound.

The Body owned by Christ the Head, in Him alive remaineth
A Church composed of names enrolled, some halt and blind retaineth.

And if supernally thou should'st sit at earthly Temples' porches,

It may be thou wilt miss the Voice which speaketh to the churches,

Accountability to God must ever be direct—
It is not through the medium of society or sect.

Summon up the ghost of Luther with Melancthon at his side!

The Waldenses, who, for the Truth their Church rejected, died—

And Fox—from the blind leaders of the blind who nobly turned—

From the true and living Witness the way of life who learned—

And Woolman, who in gentleness pursued the narrow way,
Nor for the fellowship of man, nor for the Church could stay,

Who bore the hoodman's burden, upon his prayerful heart,
Till in his exercise of soul the Church at length bore part;—

Ask these if Truth would dictate that you close your eyes on light.

Till a great awfully body can perceive the true and right!

Beware the enthusiast's ultra zeal! Unbidden haste beware!
In overweening confidence may lie thy fatal snare.

But let not bonds of sect keep back thy spirit from its goal,
Restrict thy feet from Duty's path and manacle thy soul!

Reposing on thy Church's breast, forget not those who dwell
In Slavery's shades, and look to them their tale of woe to tell!

By word and deed continuous plead the outraged hoodman's cause,
Nor implicate thyself in wrong for profit or applause.

Bind to thy heart the principles of thy most holy faith;
Sweep out from them in Fortune's beam or Persecution's wrath!

Bring all thy actions to the test of duty and of right—
Let all thy steps, day by day, be taken in the light.

But fail not when thy course is clear advancing steps to make,
Because a body too supine (slothful) rest may take.

Had Luther waited for the Pope and all his Priests to own
The truths which burned within his breast, where then were Luther's crown?

He who would act a faithful part the path of some must cross;

Had Woolman waited for the Church, the Church had suffered loss!

But moving in the light of Truth the enlightening influence spread,—

The sluggish body followed on, where faithful ones had led.
They waited for the opening way—but when the way was clear,

They pressed right onward steadily in meek yet bold career.

Brave pioneers, like Joshua and old Jephthah's son,
Exploring realms of principle, to them by Faith made known.

And walking blameless in those paths they ventured to explore;
Abundant fruit like Eschol's grapes back to the camp they bore.

Press on thy individual course of duty and of love,
With conscience pure—after, before, or with the body move!

Act not from whim, caprice—but well persuaded in thy mind—

Nor harbor one ungenerous thought toward those who wait behind.

Passages from our Correspondence.

JEFFERSON Co., Ohio.—I think the fact that a preference for Slave labor is a direct participation in guilt and profits of the system, and that this preference is generally given in consequence of that profit, is one which should be forcibly and perseveringly pressed home upon Friends and upon Americans generally. The habit of using Slave grown produce, has been so long established, as almost to prevent attention being so directed, as to make apparent a fact which is most palpable, and which is truth.

"Stands in bold relief, and courts our observation."

WAYNE Co., INDIANA. (With eight subscriptions).—All wish to commence with the first number, so as to preserve for binding, an entire volume. The Non-Slaveholder meets the cordial approbation of the friends of free labor here. I should be pleased to see it reach a circulation equal to that of the National Era. I hope to obtain more subscribers in this neighborhood.

Another Friend from WAYNE Co., (with 8 subscriptions and promise of more,) after cordially welcoming the resumption of our paper, remarks:

"I trust it may prove a medium for promoting among Friends a deeper interest in the welfare of the African race, than, I fear, is the case in many places."

Another correspondent from the same neighborhood, mentions an interesting Free Produce Meeting, held about a month ago in Friends' School House, at White Water, composed of twenty-five Friends, including some of the most prominent members of the Monthly Meeting. It was concluded to form an Association, and a committee on organization being appointed, they adjourned to a specified time. Our friend writes:

"All seem fully aware what it will cost us to carry out the measure, yet none seem disposed to shrink.—At the close I mentioned the subject of the Non-Slaveholder, and a few additional subscribers were obtained."

MONROE Co., Ohio.—I perceive with peculiar satisfaction, that the Non-Slaveholder is revived. The choice of Editor could hardly have fallen upon a more suitable person. We are taking measures to furnish every family and part family in this Monthly Meeting with a copy of the work. We have already forwarded 60 names. * * * If Friends in other meetings would follow our example, I think the paper would not only be sustained, but a revolution would soon take place in our Society, in regard to the use of slave labor produce."

This letter mentions the annual meeting of their Free Produce Association, numerously attended by Friends of the first standing, who took much interest in the movement.

COLUMBIANA Co., Ohio.—(With eight subscriptions.)

"I think it might be well to publish some information ere long, respecting the channel through which Free Labor Goods are obtained, as some seem to doubt its being confidential." [See This request was anticipated on page 30.—Ed.]

HOWARD Co., INDIANA.—An order for 16 copies. This Friend was a subscriber to the old series, and failed to forward his name upon the supposition that the old subscribers would, as a matter of course, be considered as patrons to the Non-Slaveholder. It is quite probable that many of them have been waiting with similar impressions, and would promptly subscribe on being asked. The first No. of the present series was sent, as we believe, to all former subscribers. We could not send out an agent to solicit patrons, but have to rely upon the efforts of those who are interested in the principles which we advocate and desire to promote. Acknowledgments are due to many Friends for disinterested and successful efforts, whilst the supineness of others has prevented our list of readers from being greatly increased in some neighborhoods.

HAMILTON Co., INDIANA.—A Friend, sending us 12 subscriptions, expresses a sense of loss sustained by the suspension of this Journal, and says:

"There is quite an interest manifested by Friends here in the Non-Slaveholder, and I trust they will be stimulated to action on the subject of abstinence from slave-grown produce."

CLINTON Co., Ohio.—(With 12 subscriptions).—I am glad the Non-Slaveholder is resumed, and hope that the Editor will be favored to conduct it in the same Christian spirit; which is well calculated to carry conviction to the heart. I hope to see the paper enlarged."

BY LYDIA H. SIGOURNEY.

A solemn group had gathered round the bed
Of youth and beauty. Unexpected shafts
Stood quivering in a bosom late so warm
With health and joy.

Yet cheering words she spoke
When the dire fever failed, with messages
To friend and pupil, and the glorious hope
In that Redeemer who had been her strength
From early days.

But to the Mother dear,
She whose whole life, inwoven with her own,
Had grown to one close tissue, more intense
In trust and sympathy, each passing year,
She calmly whispered,

"Haste thee, to put on The pure white robe!"
And then, she fell asleep.

Oh stricken mourner! may thy soul be wrapped
In the chief Shepherd's love so perfectly,
That by such garment He may know ye both,
Mother and Daughter, 'mid his flock above,
And lead ye to the same unchanging home
In those green pastures that can never fade.

CONSISTENCY.

It is peculiarly satisfactory to the advocates of immediate emancipation from the yoke of American Slavery, to be continually finding their opponents decidedly availing the principles, which necessarily involve the duty of such emancipation, when other subjects are the topics of consideration.

A notable example of this, is presented to the Nation, in the Inaugural Address of our President. In a retrospective view of "the new-born nation" he remarks—

"It was upheld by a broad and intelligent comprehension of rights, and an all-pervading purpose to maintain them, stronger than armaments."

"The men of that day—with a firm and fearless step, advanced beyond the governmental landmarks, which had hitherto circumscribed the limits of human freedom," &c.

"The oppressed throughout the world, from that day to the present, have turned their eyes hitherward, not to find those lights extinguished, or to fear lest they should wane, but to be constantly cheered by their steady and increasing radiance. In this, our country has, in my judgment, thus far fulfilled its highest duty to suffering humanity. It has spoken and will continue to speak, not only by its words, but by its acts, the language of sympathy, encouragement and hope, to those who earnestly listen to tones, which pronounce for the largest rational liberty."

"No example, be it remembered, can be powerful for lasting good, whatever apparent advantages may be gained, which is not based upon eternal principles of right and justice."

"No apparent advantage can be purchased at a price so dear as that of national wrong," &c.

In reference to the individual's rights, it is admitted to be the duty of the President to "see that no rude hand of power or tyrannical passion is laid upon him with impunity."

"I believe that involuntary servitude, as it exists in different States of this confederacy, is recognized by the Constitution—and that the States where it exists are entitled to efficient remedies to enforce the constitutional provisions. I hold that the 'compromise measures,' are strictly constitutional, and to be unhesitatingly carried into effect—not with reluctance encouraged by abstract opinions as to their propriety in a different state of society," &c.

Here we find the noble principles of Abolitionists proclaimed to the Nation by its highest Executive. Not only is the immutable authority of these principles maintained, but every practical deviation from them is declared to be incompatible with the "lasting good" of the Nation, "whatever apparent advantages may be gained." This is the very bone and sinew of abolition doctrine, confirmed by "the Eternal Spirit," that "Righteousness exalteth a nation."

It is a serious question, whether or not, "a broad and intelligent comprehension of rights," which primarily induced the country to resist the oppression of Great Britain, has actually induced "an all-pervading purpose to maintain" those rights? No ambiguity attaches to the subject, demanding delay for a truthful answer. The numerous legal enactments declaring millions of our fellow men, made in the image of God like ourselves, to be chattels and things, "to all intents and purposes whatsoever," give the reply to the world, that we have violated the "intelligent comprehension of rights" in reference to our brother, and "are verily guilty concerning" him, being judged out of our own mouth. What a response did the clanking of the chains, and the heart-rending woes of the victims of American oppression send, on the morning of the inauguration, to the affirmation of the President, that our new-born country possessed "an all-pervading purpose to maintain" human "rights!" "All pervading!" "What mean then, those wailings of agony in the human market-place? What those piercing lamentations of husbands and wives, parents and children, brothers and sisters, separated from each other to meet no more! What those cries which succeed the lacerations of human flesh by cruel task-masters, and which 'have entered the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth!'"

Has not this "purpose," which indeed ought to be "all-pervading," been bounded by the "white man's interest! Has not our selfishness decreed, "Hitherto shall thou go, but no farther." Does not the fact of our "comprehension of rights," being "broad and intelligent," enhance our guilt?

The President commends our fathers, because, "with a firm and fearless step, (they) advanced beyond the governmental landmarks which had hitherto circumscribed the limits of human freedom." This is precisely what Abolitionists have done. How it can be proved that it was a noble act for our fathers to advance, far enough beyond British landmarks of human freedom, to connect the right of representation with the right of taxation, and yet that it is "fanciful," for some of the children to advance far enough beyond American land-

To the Editor of the Non-Slaveholder.

WHO PAYS THE PROFITS?

Pittsburgh, 2d mo. 12th 1853.

I have just returned from the wharf, or levee, on the Monongahela side, whither I had been led by the business that brought me to the city. The rivers are at a high stage, and the shores lined with steamers, whose capacious holds are mostly receiving or discharging the products of the extensive west. Amongst them are several delivering cargoes of sugar and molasses, direct from the plantations of Louisiana.

As I saw the hundreds of hogsheads spread out before me, and the draymen actively engaged in carrying them into store, I felt more forcibly than I had ever done, our close contact with the dark and dreadful process of oppression under which all this was produced. When I reflected that the demands of the country would, in a few months, carry the contents of all these casks, through the thousand channels of trade, into the daily consumption of the liberty and justice loving families of Pennsylvania and Ohio, (perhaps a few hogsheads are used up by my own friends and neighbors,)—I was more than ever impressed with the impossibility of escape from the guilt of encouraging and participating in that oppression, while we continued to partake of its fruits, and to divide its profits with the man who with his money bought the slaves, and with his own hands drove the victims to supply the market which we were offering him. I say divide the profits of that oppression, for if sugar can, by honestly paid labor, be furnished to the consumer in Ohio at 8 cents per pound—and this sugar, the product of a series of the most awful crimes against God and man, can be afforded at 6, are we not, by giving it the preference, sharers in the profits of the commission of those crimes, in precisely the amount of the difference? If we can believe the testimony of the planters, this is a per centage of profit fully equal to their own, although to each individual consumer of insignificant amount. And yet, how few, even among those who call upon the planters to be just—to let the oppressed go free—to deal with his laborers as with human beings, (when by doing so he would sacrifice his fortune, and perhaps for the present, his business,) are willing to sacrifice their share of the profits, amounting on sugar, to the trifling sum of two to five dollars per annum! Are the enormities of the slave system any the less real because they are committed beyond the immediate range of our vision? Are the sweat and blood—the crushing of humanity—the blotting out of intellect—the soul destroying marks of human freedom, to allow a man to say his soul is his own, is a problem we leave for the logic of the President to solve.

"The oppressed throughout the world." This includes the outraged African. Did the wretched tenants of the slave-ships, in their manacles, turn "their eyes hitherward not to find (Freedom's) lights extinguished," nor "to fear lest they should wane," during the twenty years of the legality of that infamous traffic? Have they been subsequently "cheered by (the) steady and increasing radiance" of Freedom's lights? Surely, if the condition of the sons and daughters of bleeding, outraged Africa, "from that day (of our own freedom) to this," had come within the scope of the President's mental or physical vision, he could not have made such an assertion. O that some wretched coffee had passed at the moment to test its truth! Would he not have demurred to utter the affirmation, that "our country had, in my judgment, thus far fulfilled its highest duty to suffering humanity?" How glaringly will the faithful historic page falsify the representation!

Let us briefly extend this examination. It is further affirmed, that the Country "has spoken and will continue to speak, not only by its words, but by its acts, the language of sympathy, encouragement and hope, to those who earnestly listen to tones which pronounce for the largest rational liberty." Thousands have listened, millions in the land, none "earthily listen" for these tones. Men and women made of the same blood, by the same Creator. What "words" fall on their ear! Let the "words" of the enactments of the Slave Code answer. O what sweet "language of sympathy, encouragement and hope!" What ample security "for the largest rational liberty." Its "acts" also, and "compromise measures," to save the Union, which righteousness only can save. What an admirable exemplification are these "acts," of our love and sympathy for "the oppressed throughout the world."

Does the Executive of the Nation declare the institution, which is the shame in the eyes of the civilized world, to be in accordance with the principle of universal righteousness and freedom which he advocates as essential to our "lasting good?" No, verily. But it "is recognized by the Constitution." So was the foreign slave-trade now denominated piracy. Will the framing of mischief by a law, save us from the curse of the Almighty Avenger of the poor and oppressed! The alternative is before the President; either to affirm that Slavery is "based upon eternal principles of right and justice," or to acknowledge that his recognition that the "compromise measures"—be unhesitatingly carried into effect, "is incompatible with the 'lasting good' of the Country, i. e. inconsistent with true patriotism. He has wisely determined, that 'national wrong' is a price too dear to pay for any 'apparent advantage' of any institution.

practices inseparable from the system which is now producing sugar at the lowest rate, a fiction of the imagination? Through the hands of how many Uncle Toms—of how many Solomon Northrups—of how many men and women of crushed spirits, of bleeding hearts and despairing souls—of almost obliterated intellects, driven on by how many Lagrees, and his more brutal Sambos and Quimbos, the identical hogsheds before me have passed, before they were, last week, rolled upon the steamboat, it is impossible to tell. But this we do know, that each process which has been employed in their production, has been carried on in violation of every principle of justice and humanity.

But yesterday, (since last autumn,) the cane which produced that sugar, has been cut and hauled, ground, and the juice boiled—the sugar packed and coopered up in these identical casks, from the cypress swamps, and taken to the landing by men and women driven to their tasks under the most cruel and revolting system of slavery ever practised by man.

The query, WHO PAYS THE PROFITS, WITHOUT WHICH THIS SYSTEM COULD NOT EXIST, is one that should come home to every honest mind, with an earnestness of demand not to be satisfied without a conscientious reply. M.

STOLEN GOODS.

"Thou shalt not steal."—Exodus xx. 15.

It is often difficult for the truth to penetrate through the thick mists of law and custom, interest, inclination and prejudice, which so closely envelop us, distorting our moral vision, and giving a false coloring to objects viewed by us through these media. Particularly is this a common case in relation to the character of the products of slave labor.

A worthy co-temporary, whose judgment and feelings are almost universally correct in relation to the system of slavery, uses the following language:

"Though fully convinced that a clear and consistent testimony against the holding of slaves can hardly be maintained by those who are in the free and unrestrained practice of using the products of servile toil, the editor would be far from placing the fruits of slave labor on the same platform with those of piracy and theft. In the scale of oppression there are various grades, and a just argument is never strengthened by confounding distinctions which are easily discerned."

Another co-temporary, also an opponent of *Our correspondent is here quoting from a wise veteran, who is perfectly sound in the faith, and is not often caught napping. His propositions are sufficiently tenable, and we rather suspect that the writer meant quietly to deduce from them the same conclusions to which Beta has arrived.—ED. NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

slavery, in reply to a correspondent on the subject of slave products, says—

"We think the comparison which he draws between using such produce and articles which we saw stolen from their owner, will not hold good, as could be readily shown, did it appear expedient to enter upon such a discussion in our paper."

If there are various grades of stealing, we suppose none would deny but that would be the highest, in which the robber is not satisfied with taking a portion of a man's property, and that perhaps only once from the same person, but steals the man himself, with all his goods, and the produce of his labor, past, present and to come. For as J. K. in his "Thoughts on Slavery," remarks, "He that purchases a man, were it not for the unjust laws which tolerate the practice, might be convicted of being an accomplice in theft or robbery of the most atrocious kind."

There are three degrees of participation in the crime of stealing, without being the actual thief.

1st. By the purchase, innocently, of stolen goods, in which case the purchaser is bound by law, as well as moral principle, on discovery, to restore them to their proper owner.

2d. When the purchaser knows at the time that the property is stolen. He is then accessory to the theft, and the law will punish him as such.

3d. When a tacit understanding exists beforehand between the thief and the receiver, that if the former will perpetrate the theft, the latter will be his customer. He then becomes accessory before, as well as after the fact, and party to the crime in the highest degree.

We are sorry to differ in sentiment from our friends above quoted, but we think we have shown good grounds for our belief, that, if there be any distinction, the moral turpitude of that species of theft which is by them considered the less, is the greater, and that the degree of our participation in it is of the superlative kind, if we are "in the free and unrestrained practice of using the products of servile toil."

If we are mistaken in our views, we would take it as a kindness if those who can so "easily discern," and "readily show" a distinction in the use of slave products, would bestow a little labor to convince us of our error, seeing that it is a testimony which is gaining ground, and involves no little self-denial, and some pecuniary disadvantage to uphold a practice consistent therewith.

BETA.

BARON MONTESQUIEU satirically said, "It is impossible to admit the negroes to be men, because, if we allow them to be men, it will begin to be believed that we are not Christians."

For the Non-Slaveholder.

HOW DO WE KNOW?

When abstinence from slave labor is insisted upon, we sometimes hear the objection, "It will do no good," advanced, even by those whose humane impulses would prompt them to do something tending to the downfall of the oppressor's power. Such think, perhaps, that an evil so great, can only be destroyed by some tremendous revolution, wherein the demand of "blood for blood," shall be the moving principle; that the slave's misery will not be brought to an end by a process which holds the remedy so remote as that does, in which a non-participancy in the products of his toil, is the course of action. A disposition thus to regard, or rather perhaps, to disregard the subject, will not enable us to plead not guilty, when the cause of blood-shed shall be searched out.

How know we that our refusal to aid the oppressor in his pursuit of unhallowed gain, will do no good? How do we know that the All Wise Ruler of the Universe does not design to bring about a termination of the wrongs which the slave has endured through long and wretched years, by increased faithfulness on our part, in extending anti-slavery principles to the point of non-participancy, by a prompt refusal, on the part of the community resident on free soil, to meet the slaveholders in the market to which he brings merchandise fraught with human sighs, tears, and life-blood? Let us remember that while we are not separated from traffic in the toil of slaves however far removed we may be from the scene of their sufferings in the physical world, in the moral world we are standing beside them, receiving from their wearied hands the supplies which so abundantly minister to our demands.

WHAT CAN BE DONE? is the question of the spirit burdened and anguished by thoughts of all the evils nourished up into rank vigorous life in the evil soil of slavery. To enter the region and strong holds of oppression, with brave protestations against cruel laws, and with urgent entreaties that mercy might be shown to the oppressed, would be productive of little effect upon the African's bondage, while the inducement to its continuance is deep laid in gainful schemes. We cannot compel the slave-master to lay aside his instruments of torture—to sever his victim's chains, that the toilworn may rest, the grief-worn, rejoice—the oppressed go free: but we may withdraw our aid from the support of the system which inflicts the torture and binds the chain. We may let the oppressed go free from that part of their unrequited service which our demands induce; and we may practice a little self-denial when our doing so may evidently influence the condition of the slave. If "to Africa's sable race, a fearful debt we owe," what blameworthy indifference does it indicate, to continue, while our years are speedily passing away, and the days, wherein restitution may be made, are gliding swiftly from us—to add to that "fearful debt"—to be instrumental in the support of tyrant power, which dooms thousands of human beings to a condition degraded and hopeless as can well be imagined. With a thought reaching to the time when "righteousness shall cover the earth as the waters do the sea," are we not ready to lament that in our actions and our influences, we make no perceptible advance towards that glorious event? If so, "let the time past suffice." Let not the slave pine in hopeless bondage, fettered in thought and limb," while we glide along the pleasant course of our lives forgetful of his griefs and sufferings. [Communicated.]

WHAT IS GLORY.

Is it glory to cause the widow's tears
To roll o'er her fading face?
It is glory to watch the orphan's grief,
And the cause of its sorrow trace!
Such glory is caused by the battle-plain,
Where the husband and father lie with the slain.

Is it glory to break a mother's heart,
And from her home to fear
The only one who cared for her
In this weary world of care?
Then carry her son to the battle-plain,
And bury him there 'mid the thousands slain.

Is it glory to drive the soul in haste
To a world of black despair,
Midst the dreadful din of cruel war,
Without one single prayer,
Then trample the youth amidst the slain,
And rejoice in death on the battle-plain?

Is it not glory to follow Him
Who said that brotherly love
Must reign in the breasts of those who wish
To dwell with Him above?
The Prince of Peace will smile on those Who the sword and the battle-field oppose.

GENUINENESS OF FREE GOODS.

The request of our friend of Columbiana Co., Ohio, (see passages from our correspondence on our first page,) which bears date prior to his reception of our last number, is a very proper one, and it is answered in No. 4—Page 30, under the caption "GENUINENESS OF FREE LABOR GOODS." We would recall attention to the explanation there given, and will take this occasion to add, that not only is the channel for obtaining free cotton a perfect one,—but a thorough care is also exercised to keep it unmixed in the process of manufacture. To secure this object an excess of free cotton is sent to the factory, a portion of which, at the beginning and end, being mixed with Slave cotton in the joining, (to avoid stopping the machinery) is rejected, and only the middle is received as free goods. The arrangement is perfect as regards the integrity of the free fabric.

We trust that Friends, (particularly those who reside within convenient access to this city,) will bear in mind the annual meeting of the Free Produce Association, of which notice is given in another page.—Friends, of both sexes, who are interested in the substitution of the productions of Free Labor for those of coerced and unrequited toil, are invited to attend.

DELAWARE CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

"'Tis Liberty alone that gives the flower
Of fleeting life its lustre and perfume;
And we are weeds without it. All constraint,
Except what Wisdom lays on evil men,
Is evil; hurls the faculties, impedes
Their progress in the road of science; blinda
The eyesight of discovery; and begets,
In those that suffer it, a sordid mind
Bestial, a meagre intellect, unfit
To be the tenant of man's noble form."

Would that these noble thoughts of Cowper had influenced the Delaware Convention, in connection with the still nobler sentiment and mandate of Him whose perfect will ought to be the basis of all human law: "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them." Would that James A. Bayard, (who appears prominent as a mover in the great iniquity) and the other members of this convention had pondered the precepts, and received into their hearts an infusion of the Spirit of the holy REDEEMER who "took upon him the form of a servant," who recognizes a brother in the negro whom their "amendments" would call a slave, and who has pronounced him only to be "free indeed" who is made so by his blessed Truth. Do James A. Bayard and his colleagues fancy themselves to be freemen whilst every one who holds in his hand the Bible may trace the pedigree of their ownership in Rom. vii. 16, and in John ix. 44. And do they think that by votes and amendments, they can take away the franchise of those whom Christ hath made "fellow citizens with the saints?"

"The oppressor holds
The body bound, but knows not what a range
The spirit takes, unconscious of a chain,
And that to bind him is a vain attempt Whom God delights in, and in whom He dwells."

It appears that the "amendments" of this Convention provide that "the Legislature shall have no authority to emancipate slaves without the consent of the owner or owners." A di-bolical provision, by which the amenders seem disposed to leave the world the worse for their having lived in it. Unworthy tenants of this beautiful planet, they repay its hospitality by seeking to deepen "the trail of the serpent." They prevent, on pain of fearful penalty, any free negro or mulatto coming into and settling in the State, impose a fine upon any person who shall employ him, and crown the impiety of the scheme with the pretence of benevolence, by appropriating monies thus wickedly obtained "for the colonization of such free negroes and mulattoes as may be inhabitants of the State at the adoption of this Constitution, and their descendants, who may be willing to emigrate."

In Delaware, we believe there is about one slave to every 45 freemen. The impolicy, the glaring folly here displayed are as apparent as the baseness.

WHO KEEPS UP SLAVERY?

The London Times, of 12th mo. 1st, a Journal not ranked as an Anti-Slavery organ, has the following candid observations, which we heartily commend to the notice of thinkers.

"We, of this free and happy country, are just the most extensive employers (indirectly, but not less really) of slave labor, in the world. Negro slaves, working under the lash in the mid-day sun, and keeping their toe well up to the mark," as Mr. Legree would say, produce the material of our gravates, our stockings, and the simple and comprehensive garment in which we take our repose. They supply the muslins and prints, and nearly all the other fabrics of our female costume, from the dress of the Sovereign to that of the poorest needlewoman. Slaves produce our coffee, and the sugar that sweetens it. By day and by night, sitting down and rising up, we are still encouraging slavery by consuming its produce. The prime agent who moves the wheels of southern slavery we are told, is the northern capitalist, who has his mortgage on the slave estate, or holds a bill of sale, and who secures himself, when necessary, by an order to his agent to sell off everything on the estate, slaves and all, for what they will fetch at the hammer. This man, Mrs. Stowe tells us, is really a guilty partner in the transaction, if not the most guilty—the most guilty because he supplies the strongest stimulus of the system, and compels the most violent measures. But if the northern capitalist pulls the strings of the southern planter, who pulls the strings of the northern capitalist? Most assuredly the merchants and brokers of N. York are mainly dependent on the British market. We use the slave cotton. We supply the slave capital. Our money buys the negro,—our money buys his works. It is an indissoluble union of interests and operations, of which the white slave of this country is at one end, and the black slave of America at the other end of the chain."

We do not, however, introduce the ingenuous confession of the London Editor, as a quietus to any American conscience. We are pleased with the paragraph, as showing that, even in the mind of the worldling and the politician, well applied common sense will recognize the truth which is the leading idea of our periodical. But, as Cowper says, "Truth is not local." Participancy (on whichever side the Atlantic it exist,) constitutes partnership. "It is an indissoluble union of interests and operations." We are pleased that our transatlantic brethren should see their accountability and would welcome them to the platform of non-participancy. And we would hail, with pleasure and with courtesy, every recognition of truth and freedom in any member of the human family. We do not like the disposition which some evince, to twit our English sisters with the oppression which surrounds them in their own homes (and which many of them long and labor to alleviate.) Oppression, any where, is good cause for remonstrance from any quarter. The man who sees, in any part of the world, a brother man oppressed, has the instant right to interfere by raising his voice in remonstrance. Should it appear that he himself is guilty of some phase of oppression—it follows—not that he should fail to take his brother's part—but, that he should preach the same sermon to himself and cease to do evil. And he to whom the rebuke or exhortation is addressed, ought to receive it in the spirit of meek self-investigation, and not seek to dodge its application by hurling it back upon an inconsistent fellow transgressor, who perchance may perceive our errors more readily than his own, or may think that the existence of a mote in his own eye is no reason for his omission to pluck out a scantling from ours. We clip the following from the Daily Register, because of its recognition of the same principle set forth in the above extract from the Times. We love our British sisters all the better for their laudable movement, and altho' we have not failed to perceive something of the frailty of poor human nature mixed up with holy motive, we by no means charge it with "miserable shallowness," nor "consider them open to the discourteous insinuations of singular self-delusion or a flimsy hypocrisy."

THE ENGLISH LADIES AND SLAVERY.

It appears by our files received by the Acme, that our American women are shortly to receive a mammoth address from their English sisters, on the subject of African slavery in this country. We are pleased to see that the world has arrived at such a stage of progress that the sentiment of humanity takes precedence of all others. But it is rather discouraging to see how blind and absurd it is in its way of getting at an acknowledged evil. There is no little self-righteousness and pride of supposed superior national purity at the bottom of the whole movement. We should have thought much more highly of the English ladies, had they sent their mammoth address to the cotton merchants at Liverpool, instead of to the Women of Maine, Pennsylvania, Michigan, &c.

Today bare the miserable shallowness of this whole feminine movement, we will use a short epigram. Why is slavery maintained? Because the sale of slave-labor products is profitable. What is the chief product? Cotton. Where is the great cotton market of the South? At Liverpool. Where is the great town for the manufacture of cotton? Manchester. It then, the buyers of cotton are chiefly in Maine for the maintenance of slavery, and the English are the principal buyers, it follows that the English are as justly chargeable with its maintenance as we. It would therefore, be more logical for the Duchess of Sutherland and her half million of coadjutors, to change the destination of their address, and send it to Parliament, adding a prayer for the prohibition of the purchase of slave-produced cotton. That would look like being in earnest. As the case stands at present, the whole business looks like an unfair attempt to shift on comparatively innocent persons the whole disgrace of an unpopular institution. So long as the English ladies shall show a disposition to lay the lash on the shoulders of American slaveholders, and spare those of the Manchester and Liverpool merchants who buy nearly all the cotton, so long shall we consider them open to the discourteous insinuations of singular self-delusion, or a most flimsy hypocrisy.

JOSIAH TATUM.—This beloved and valuable Friend "ceased to be mortal" on the 4th of Fourth Month, in the 63d year of his age. Of the very large and constantly enlarging circle of individuals who not only esteemed, but tenderly loved him, there is, perhaps, not one who has not felt afflicted, bereaved, "unready for the stroke." We do not question the perfect Wisdom which has called him from a life of blessing to a life of blessedness, yet there are many who sigh and exclaim "alas! alas!"

"Oh thy gentle smile of greeting,
Who again shall see?
Who amidst the solemn meeting,
Gaze again on thee?"

"Come before us, oh our brother,
To the Spirit land!
Vainly look we for another
In thy place to stand!"

Solemn as is the termination of an earthly existence, it is yet most glorious when the object for which it was given has been fully attained; when, as in the case of our dear friend, it is believed, that by the life thus bestowed, the glory of the Giver has been promoted, that the love of the Eternal Father has been evinced by continuous deeds of love to the human brotherhood, and that the now enfranchised soul has witnessed the efficacy of the one great sacrifice for sin, has been made white, and robed in white, and admitted within the gate, at whose portals all impurity is self-repelled. For such there is, in the very depth of mourning, a solemn joy; an unselfish and unworldly happiness which does not smile; and whilst

"In the shadow of a great affliction
The soul sits dumb,"

the language of the Amesbury bard is realized,

"Our Father's will
Calling to Him the dear ones whom He loveth,
Is mercy still."

We often drop a tear on the death of men of talent and goodness, whose place in general society and in the Church, can be in a great measure supplied by others. But we are at times bereft of those who leave a void which those who appreciated them, do not expect to see filled. By the removal of such, the world seems to become poorer, and to receive a sombre tinge from the withdrawal of light. Josiah Tatum was one of those singularly rich characters. He was a manly Christian. Of a strong yet humble mind. Firm, yet gentle, loving, and most genial hearted. Even, consistent, prudent, wise,—too steadily "watchful unto prayer" to be readily thrown off his guard; his conversation, and his language as a more public speaker, were rich with a peculiarity and raciness of expression, which gave a singular charm and currency to the sentiments expressed. And thus he "kept the even tenor of his way," "doing justly, loving mercy, and walking humbly with his God."

"So calm, so constant was his rectitude,
That by his loss alone we know its worth,
And feel how true a man has walked with us on Earth."

We are requested to announce the annual meeting of the American and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, to be held at the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, on the evening of Fourth day, the 14th instant.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

ANNA W. HINCHMAN.

We have stood where the Reaper was busy translating
For the garden of Eden a favorite blossom.

We have watched by the couch where the angels were Waiting

To bear a dear saint into Abraham's bosom.
We have seen what a brief fleeting dream is mortality.
We have seen that true Faith is a blessed reality.
We have seen how a Christian, from soul-stains all Washed,

In the arms of a Savior could fall unabashed—
Himself for her plea; and the death which he bore
Her claim for a share in his life evermore.
Every robe of her own as vile rags cast away,
His righteousness only her Spirit's array.

When her life tide was ebbing, her lips parched with Fever,

And all that is seen was receding forever,
For the stream which from under the white throne is Bursting,

For the River of Water of Life she was thirsting.
She panted, she listened, the accents to hear,
Of a Father whose voice to her spirit was clear;
And she longed in his presence to stand unreprieved
Whom, not having seen, she had tremblingly loved;
Unto whom, day by day, through Life's wearisome task,
She came for free pardon and mercy to ask,
And who turned not away from her agonized throes,
But made, in her sickness, her bed of repose,
And suffered no shade of Remorse to alloy
THE PEACE WHICH PRECEDES THE FULFILLMENT OF JOY.

How the spirit would sink with despondence and sadness

Were it not for the Faith that inspires us with gladness!
How the shadow of Death all our hopes would enshroud,

Were it not for the glory that strikes thro' the cloud!
That glory, dear spirit, it burst on thy sight,
And all Time's allurements were lost in its light!

That long, clear, intense, earnest gaze into Heaven!
For a vision like this was a human eye given?
Not often such glimpse is permitted to mortals
Till the spirit is entering Beatitude's portals.
That glance!—'Twas the last! and then closed in Death's blindness

The eye which met ours ever beaming with kindness.
And a niche was left vacant;—and tears fell like rain;—
And light fell away from our pathway of pain;—
And sadness and darkness seemed closing o'er all;
And the shadow of Death was Joy's funeral pall.

But praises, high praise for the victory given,
Robbing Death of his sting and the Grave of its gloom!
Whilst we mourn for ourselves we resign thee, and even

In the midst of our tears we rejoice o'er thy tomb.
Alas, we exclaim, as our sorrow comes o'er us,
And we groan for Instruction, Friend, Sister and Daughter;

Then we think of thee joining the heavenly chorus,
And Peace comes like oil upon Grief's troubled water.

And e'en while the tears from our eye lids are streaming,

Those drops as they fall are with gratitude gleaming.

We beheld thee when storms threatened fearfully, doing

The beautiful work which for thee was ordained;
We beheld thee, in conflict tho' faint yet pursuing.
The end of thy faith, now sublimely attained.

We have seen thee drink deep, and thirst still for learning.

Now all lies exposed to thy purified vision!
And, knowing as known, and the secrets discerning
Which the angels look into with rapture elysian.

Nothing there to obstruct the free spirit's expansion
From knowledge to knowledge, from glory to glory,
Thou wilt blend with delight, in that heavenly mansion,

With the souls who found rest in Christ Jesus before thee.

Oh, limitless treasure, and rivers of Pleasure,
And Peace flowing alway unstinted by measure,
No earth-soil defiling thy soul's gathered essence,
And confessed by the Son in the holiest Presence.

Dear Savior! To thee was our cherished one precious!
To her was thy offering for sin efficacious!
For her not in vain was thy holy side given!
For her not in vain thy great ransom was given!
For her nought could serve but the robe of thy merit,
And the boon thou bequeatest 'twas hers to inherit.

And when at thy footstool she knelt with heartbreaking.

Thy spirit for her intercession was making.
For her, all sufficient thy blest mediation!
For her everlasting thy perfect salvation!

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE PHILADELPHIA FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS.

In order to give in full this important and interesting document, without precluding space for our usual variety of matter, the present number is given to our readers, of double the usual size.

The interesting Report of the New York Association having reached us since the matter for this number was prepared, we gladly make room for it.

ANNUAL REPORT.

The return of another year has devolved on the Managers the duty of again presenting to the Association their Annual Report of the services accomplished or attempted, during the year that has just closed. On this subject the managers have to acknowledge that very little has been effected, by their instrumentality, since their last yearly report.

The great and primary object of our Association, we doubtless all remember, was to encourage and promote by a union of efforts, the production and distribution, untouched and unstained by oppression and wrong, of such articles of domestic consumption as are usually and chiefly extorted from the labor of slaves.
For this purpose a Store was opened in this city, several years ago, with the concurrence and encouragement of the managers, by our friend George W. Taylor. Efforts have been used, and continue so to be, to have that establishment supplied altogether through the instrumentality of free and compensated labor, with those tropical productions, which constitute the staples of slave cultivation. As the burden of conducting this establishment rests almost exclusively upon him, it is to that point that the attention of the managers within the past year has been chiefly directed. The goods which this store is designed to furnish, are of two very different kinds, and must be obtained from different sources; viz. cotton fabrics and groceries.

Cotton is well known to be extensively cultivated by the labor of slaves, in several of the southern states, particularly in Mississippi.
The market for cotton may be pronounced the main pillar of American slavery. The increase of cotton cultivation, consequent upon Eli Whitney's improvement in the mode of separating the seed, gave a new and powerful impetus to the internal traffic in slaves—that most odious feature of an odious system—and the continued demand for the article keeps up a demand for the labor that produces it; and consequently, where the producers are slaves, it sustains the traffic in their persons.

We frequently hear revolting reports of men, women and children sold at public sale, in the northern slave states, at extravagant prices; not to be employed in the neighborhood where they were born, but to be transported to regions further south; there to drag out a few, and but a few, tedious years, separated from all that nature and habit hold dear.
Let us then inquire what is the ultimate object of these cruel measures? It is not an in-imate love of cruelty that prompts the sellers or the purchasers of these heart broken victims of a brutalizing commerce. The proceeding is founded on a calculation of dollars and cents.
The planter, who purchases the husband and leaves the wife behind, expects to be remunerated for his trouble and expense, by the sale of the cotton which the purchased slave will extract from the soil; and the cotton goes to swell the profits of a shipping merchant of a free state who conveys it to a manufacturer in one of the middle or eastern states, or to a house in Liverpool, from which it quietly passes to whirl on the spindles of Arkwright.
The fabric is then thrown abroad over Europe and America, to supply the wants and increase the comforts of those who "Would not have a slave to till their ground,

To carry them, to fan them while they sleep,
And tremble when they wake, for all the wealth,
That sinews, bought and sold, have ever earned."

Cotton fabrics have indeed become so blended with our domestic supplies, that our habits must be greatly changed if we would deny ourselves their use; and happily we now know that cotton not only may be, but actually is, extensively cultivated in the United States, and various other places, by the labor of freemen. The cotton goods which G. W. Taylor procures and offers to the acceptance of his customers, are manufactured from cotton, untouched, as we are fully convinced, by servile hands. Of the character of those goods, and the difficulties attendant upon his efforts to secure a supply, he has furnished the following account:

"During the Spring and Summer of 1852 various fabrics, either wholly or partly cotton, were added to the stock, such as—

30, 33, 36 & 40 inch heavy Muslins,
6 cord Sewing Cotton,
32 and 36 inch fine bleached Shirtings,
A beautiful article of cotton and wool called Hungarian Faney,
An assortment of Nos. of Knitting Cotton,
Plaid Muslins, cord check muslins,
Glazed Jaconet, Silk & worsted Check,
Plain, printed, stripe and check Lustres,
Fancy silk stripe Crossover,
Satin stripe printed warp,
Satin stripe de Laines,
Dimities, Fancy Gingham,
Fine plaid and hair cord Gingham,
Solid stripe Gingham and Chambrays,
Tickings, printed linen Cambrics,
Sirocco Fancies, Dress Cord, Poplins, &c.

An increased variety of Goods was ordered for the Autumn sales, to be made of a large lot of cotton which had been sent to Liverpool. But through the carelessness of the consignees, it was sold beyond the reach of our free labour co-adjutors in England. The consequence was, a complete failure to obtain several articles of indispensable necessity. This gave rise to numerous complaints by consumers; but it was too late to procure more free labour cotton, when the loss became known on this side.

The want of more perfect arrangements for manufacturing continues to be a source of much perplexity to the Store-keeper, and of frequent disappointment in procuring articles needed by families depending on this medium of supply."

From this account, and a little reflection on the nature of the case, we readily perceive that to secure a regular supply of cotton fabrics, suited to the various wants of the public, altogether free from the taint of slavery, a concert of action and an amount of capital, only to be obtained by an extensive union of efforts, are indispensable. Though large quantities of cotton are raised, in some of the Southern states, entirely by free labor, yet this cotton, if bought in the general market, without special care in the selection, is likely to be blended with the products of slavery; and when brought to the doors of the manufacturer, it may be mixed with slave grown cotton in passing through the mill, unless provided in sufficient quantity to exclude the latter altogether from the factory. Hitherto means have not been found to secure a supply of free cotton goods, through the operations of factories on our side of the Atlantic. Recourse has therefore been had to the factories of Great Britain. This measure, of course, so far as American cotton is concerned, involves a double transportation across the intervening ocean, and consequently a loss of time and an increase of expense. The latter item, however, may perhaps be compensated by the cheapness of labor in England. It is however fully believed that if a sufficient amount of capital could be placed at the disposal of the dealers in free goods, to secure, by means of trust worthy agents, the purchase of free grown cotton, immediately from the planters, as soon as it was ready for the market; or to anticipate its growth by previous arrangement; in quantities equal to the demands of one or more factories, to the total exclusion of slave grown cotton; the market might, in a little time, be supplied with all the varieties which the habits of the community require, and upon terms as favorable as those of a promiscuous character.

Next to cotton, as a pillar of slavery, we rank the great staple of Louisiana and the West Indies, sugar. With regard to the means of supplying the demands of the public, with this article, G. W. Taylor remarks:

Free Labour Sugars, it is well known, are seldom brought to this market in the regular course of trade. I am therefore under the necessity of importing sugars from those places where they are known to be produced by the labour of free persons. Owing to the impossibility of procuring them at different times in the year, I am obliged to secure a year's supply of sugar and molasses during the season when only they can be had. When a lot of sugar is to be refined, in order to procure its being done in the best manner, by a refiner who will produce uniformly the best qualities, such refiners usually operating on a large scale, it is requisite to order a large quantity made at one operation.* These * Being transiently in the Free Produce Store, a short time ago, we noticed an illustration of this in a fresh lot of Refined Sugar amounting to $7000 (cash.) We concluded that if other items were in proportion, indispensable conditions involve the necessity for a large capital and spacious rooms and cellars for storage. In addition to the increased expense from these causes, from the impossibility of foreseeing how long a given quantity will last, and the circumstance that suitable free labor sugars for refining are not always to be had in sufficient amount, it will sometimes happen that the stock of those refined sugars becomes exhausted, and an interval of several days or weeks will occur when customers cannot be supplied however pressing their wants. This calls for the exercise of patience on their part, and is a source of anxiety and mental suffering, as well as loss, to the provider."

Here we see, as in the case of cotton goods, the necessity and importance of extended concert of action, and a larger capital.

Though cotton is doubtless the most efficient supporter of American slavery, yet, if we extend our view to the east of the Atlantic, and to the regions south of the United States, we shall probably find sugar entitled to the first place in this bad pre-eminence. The market for sugar kept up till lately the Brazilian slave trade; and it still maintains that abominable traffic in the Island of Cuba. Whether sugar from cane is produced, in any considerable quantity, in the United States, by the labor of freemen, is a question which the managers are not prepared to answer. We have however the satisfaction to know that the British, French and Danish West Indies, so recently the strong holds of slavery, are cultivated exclusively by the hands of freemen. Yet even there, after all that has been done, and all that has been paid by the government at home, to break the fetters of the slave, the evils of slavery have been too deeply impressed on the character and habits of the people, to be suddenly obliterated. To that quarter we must look for a supply of sugar: and may we not hope that the abuses which a vicious system has introduced, will eventually prove, merely as the workings of a sea,

Before a calm, which rocks itself to rest.

After the copious remarks on the interesting objects of our association, which may be found in our former reports, the managers deem it unnecessary to enter into any elaborate arguments to prove either the evils of slavery, or the rectitude of the course which we feel compelled to adopt.

Among the early labors of Friends, within Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, on the subject of slavery, we find their principal efforts directed against the slave trade; and they pro-

the business must be more burdensome than profitable, as quick sales would be necessary to prevent actual loss. Surely all friends of Freedom ought to give their patronage to the Establishment, and to recommend it to others.—Ed.

ably acted wisely in endeavoring first to stop the traffic to which the existing slavery was owing; but the penetrating mind of John Woolman was not long in discerning that to support a consistent testimony against the system at large, he must abstain from indulging his palate with the sweets extracted from the labor of slaves. So sensitive was he on this subject, that he declined the use of silver vessels for the ordinary purposes of life; and when stretched upon his dying bed, he requested his attendants, in case his disease should cloud his understanding, to avoid administering any thing to him, which they knew he had a testimony against. Had the example of this devoted christian been followed by all those who have adopted his sentiments on the general subject, there can be no reasonable doubt that the testimony of Friends against slavery would, at this day, have been more advanced than it is. The advocates of slavery, must have perceived that there was one society that maintained a consistent testimony against what they pronounced an unrighteous system. They must have seen that Friends were ready to make all the sacrifices which consistency required. But can that be said of Friends in general of our day? Our discipline does not permit any member to hold or even to hire a slave to assist in his business, however mildly the authority may be used; and yet many among us, use without hesitation, and trade without scruple, in the products of servile toil, though that toil may be urged with a rigor never maintained by any slaveholding member of the Society of Friends. Could a planter of Louisiana or Mississippi be expected to listen with feelings of compunction to the expostulations of a Philadelphia Friend, upon the cruelty and injustice of slaveholding, if that Friend was in the practice of purchasing the sugar or cotton obtained by the planter from the drudgery of his slaves? Such a planter, if acquainted with the sermon on the mount, might very possibly repay the kindness of his admonisher, by a quotation from that remarkable discourse. Matt. vii. 5.

We have, however, the consolation to believe that the conviction is spreading, both among Friends and others, that the true and effectual mode of assailing the system of Slavery, is to turn the stream of commerce into channels through which Slavery does not flow. The apparently self-evident proposition that Slavery, like everything else, must live by that which feeds it, appears to be arresting the attention of many on both sides of the Atlantic. Hence we frequently hear accounts of plans suggested for supplying the market with tropical products, without depending on the labor of slaves. The attention of Friends, in most of the yearly meetings on this continent appears, of latter time, to have been increasingly turned to this subject.

The Managers have the satisfaction to announce the revival, since our last annual report, of the NON-SLAVEHOLDER, in a reduced form, and at a diminished price. The cost in its present form is indeed so low that we may reasonably hope that it will obtain an extensive circulation; and thus be instrumental to an increase of interest in the momentous cause to which it is devoted. When we reflect on the efforts which are made, with an energy and perseverance worthy of a better cause, to enlarge the area, and to strengthen the influence of the Slaveholding interest, we must view with approbation, every endeavor, however humble, to diffuse correct information, and to promulgate sound principles of action, on this important subject.

In the earliest endeavors to clear the Society, on this continent, of the guilt and odium of Slavery, the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia appears to have taken the lead. It was to that Yearly Meeting that the subject of buying and keeping negro slaves was presented by our German Friends in 1688, and that meeting, eight years afterwards, issued advice to its members "to be careful not to encourage the bringing in of any more negroes, and that such as had negroes, to be careful of them, bring them to meetings, have meetings with them in their families, &c." The subject was again moved in 1711 by the Quarterly Meeting of Chester; then the most Southern branch of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. This was nearly five years before the subject was taken up by New England Yearly Meeting. Anthony Benezet and John Woolman, two of the most assiduous advocates of the colored race, of their day, were members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. In Philadelphia, where Friends probably exercised more influence than in any other city on the American continent, the first law was enacted that no more slaves should be born within the jurisdiction of Pennsylvania. But may we not now seriously ask whether Friends of this Yearly Meeting are likely, much longer to retain the position which our fathers attained? The managers institute no invidious comparison, but they can neither deny nor disguise the fact, that the free labor movements have not among us obtained the countenance and encouragement, which, they assuredly believe, their importance demands. This circumstance, however, though greatly to be regretted, furnishes no reason why the members of this association should relax their efforts. On the contrary, it presents a motive for more assiduous and persevering exertions to excite a livelier interest in the cause, both among our fellow members, and in the community at large.

The cause in which we have embarked is the cause of humanity and justice; the means proposed are wholly pacific in their character; and if they could be made general, would cause Slavery, with all its ramifications, to expire from exhaustion, and without a struggle.

Signed on behalf of the Board,

SAMUEL RHODES,

Philada. 5 mo. 18th, 1853. Secretary.

REPORT OF THE MANAGERS

Of the Free Produce Association of Friends of New York Yearly Meeting.

While the subject of abstinence from the products of the labor of Slaves seems to be eliciting fresh attention, and its advocates to be gaining strength and courage, not only abroad, but in distant sections of our own country; it is painful and humiliating to be obliged to chronicle among ourselves, an apparent decline of interest in this deeply interesting and important cause.

We would earnestly impress on the consideration of each one whom we address, the query, Why is this? Are we excusing our own individual efforts on account of the high ground which New York Yearly Meeting has taken, or have we altogether ceased to remember them that are in bonds as bound with them? The present is no time for supineness or indifference! The withering grasp of Slavery seems still stronger than ever in our country and her institutions. Even those who are released from its thrall, the free people of color, whose character and whose labor, it is one of our duties to elevate, are pursued by an unrelenting prejudice, and like a tribulated band of old, when persecuted in one State fleeing to another, too often finding no place of safety or of refuge, short of those blissful shores where all earth's weary pilgrims rest together, and the servant is free from his master.

The managers have continued to hold their regular meetings, but so feebly have their hands been upheld and so extremely inadequate have been the receipts into their treasury, to accomplish the ends in view, that with the exception of issuing a second edition of the Tract, entitled "Slavery and the Slave trade. Who is responsible?" they have been compelled to remain inactive during the past year. While, however, this has necessarily been the case, they have not failed to look upon the fields, and they believe they were never more white unto harvest than at the present time.

The Cotton Spinners of Manchester are turning their attention to every quarter of the globe for supplies, in order not to be dependent on the Slaves of America. On the Western Coast of Africa the Cotton plant is indigenous, and the few bales which are beginning to arrive from those parts, it is hoped may be but the precursor of more important supplies. A small quantity has recently been transmitted from La Plata, with advice that it was a sample of cotton growing wild on the banks of the Parana, where any quantity may be had for gathering. Efforts also continue to be made to increase the quantity, and improve the quality of the East India Cotton; but while these have yet led to no very promising results, brighter hope seems now to arise from another quarter. Over an extent of five hundred and fifty miles of the Australian coast, cotton of the best description perennially thrives. There is a river available for steam navigation every forty miles along this whole extent, and on the banks of these are millions of acres of the richest land in one of the finest climates in the world. And when the mania for mining shall have ceased, after peopling those immense tracts with hardy and industrious laborers, may we not hope that every ship which now reaches them freighted with the products of their father land, will return laden with cotton, the product of freemen. It is interesting also, to note that the Sea Island, the finest description of cotton, from which the most delicate goods are manufactured, which is grown in America along a very limited extent of coast in Georgia and South Carolina exclusively, and which we have never yet been able to obtain, the product of free labor, can be grown along the above extent of Australian coast, equally well with the shorter stapled variety.

Should these hopes be realized, and the little rills of free labor supplies of this important staple become swollen to a mighty torrent, the knell of Slavery will soon be sounded in our land. Let us arouse ourselves from our torpor and inactivity and do all we can in aiding a consummation so devoutly to be wished. It is an old saying that Slavery sits on a Cotton bale, and we believe it is the producers of this staple particularly, who should be made to realize the demand for the free labor article. The Managers have, from year to year, alluded to the thousands of bales of free labor cotton, now within our reach in various sections of the Southern States; and this quantity would, doubtless, steadily increase, were there a well regulated and practical demand for it. Our friends in England are urgent that it may be supplied to them, but naturally expect this to be brought about through our agency.

The arrangement, which, agreeably to our last report, was made with EZRA TOWNE, for keeping a supply of free labour goods, though very poorly remunerative to him, has worked to the satisfaction of the Managers, and if the supply of manufactured cotton goods has been poorer than could have been wished, it has been owing to causes beyond his control. He has recently removed to No. 207 Fulton street, where we trust all who feel interested in having a place for the supply of Free labour products maintained in this city, as well as for the advancement of the cause, will give him their liberal and substantial countenance. On account of the extremely limited demand for Free Cotton goods, great and increasing difficulties exist in the way of having them made in this country; in consequence of which the stores both in Philadelphia and this city have lately been mainly dependent on goods manufactured in England. There, however, the want of the cotton is greatly felt, and in furnishing it to manufacturers in that country, this Association would impart a valuable aid to the cause, as well as promote the surest means of more fully meeting the wants of our own stores and wardrobes.

The Managers may here inform the Association, that Merchants are not wanting, who, if guaranteed by us to a small extent against loss, would undertake the shipment of this cotton, with their own means, trusting to the possible profits as their only remuneration for the interest and use of their capital. It is believed that if two hundred and fifty to five hundred dollars could be raised for application in this manner, in connexion with similar amounts from other associations, the Board would, through this means, be able to report next year that a considerable quantity of Free Labour cotton has been placed in the Liverpool market, with at the same time quite a probability that the guarantee fund would remain untouched, and with its accumulation ready for a similar service the succeeding year.

The hopes that have been entertained, that Cotton prepared from Flax, by Clauson's method, would supersede the slave grown staple, do not now seem likely to be realized, yet the friends and consumers of the products of Free Labour exclusively, may be gratified to learn, that through improvements in converting the hemp and in machinery for manufacturing it, a much more abundant and cheaper supply of linen fabrics is now likely soon to be placed in our market.

The Managers during the past year have been so deeply discouraged and disheartened by the want of active co-operation and support from others, from whom it is indeed due, that they have, at times, thought it would be best to ask to be released by the Association from any further effort at service; but they have been encouraged in remembering that the Children of Israel, for a long time, compassed a mountain in the wilderness, before they were permitted to journey towards the promised land; and seven times did they pass around the walls of Jericho before the results of their faithfulness were made manifest. Let us all, therefore, press onward in doing what we can, relying on the correctness of the principles we advocate; not being too much disheartened by the absence of apparent fruit, but leaving the result to Him who will not fail to order it after the counsel of His own will.

Signed, by direction and on behalf of the Board of Managers,
ISAAC H. ALLEN, Secretary,

THE OBERLIN EVANGELIST.—We notice with great satisfaction the firm stand taken by this Journal against the use of Slave labor products. We always rejoice when an honest testimony to the Truth is borne; and the more so when, as in this instance, it is borne before a large audience. We are not prepared to tell the number of readers of the Evangelist, but it is to be stated in thousands, hence we may truly rejoice in its right-mindedness. The following article is stated in the Evangelist to be "an original article, recently spoken as College Exercise, in the regular monthly exhibitions, common in our College." We knew the fair child referred to, and truly her brief mission upon Earth was one of extraordinary beauty and efficiency, her strong and earnest intellect being devoted to the promotion of "Glory to God in the highest, peace on Earth and good will to men."—Her life was beautiful, made so by faith and love, and good works, and her passage out of time so glorious, that she might well be said "rather to have been translated than to have died."—[Ed.]

SLAVE LABOR PRODUCE.

In the town of F—, Ohio, lived a very respectable Quaker family, liberal in their political and religious opinions, and exhibiting in the harmony and happiness of their household, an illustration of the bliss of heaven.

But their peace was interrupted by the illness of the mother, who one day as she was lying sick, called to her bedside, a little daughter, and requested her to bring her some sugar.

Rebecca hastened to obey, but while she was absent, a thought came into her mind, as it were by inspiration, and returning with a sad countenance, she looked up to her mother and said:

"Mother, have not the poor little slaves labored to produce this sugar?"

"Slaves! my child!" said the mother; "it did come from the land of slavery; and perhaps the slaves have toiled and sweat over that very sugar."

The mother, whose heart flowed out in sympathy for the suffering bondman, felt that she could not consistently use the products of his unrequited toil, and thus support a system she so much abhorred. Rebecca, after a short life of much self-denial, died; but her mother recovered, and ever remembered the words of her little daughter. She had lived to sit at the tables not only of her surviving children, but of a large circle of friends, spread with the luxuries of free labor; and the ornament of that community, the rightly styled monument of Rebecca, is a flourishing free-labor store.

The course suggested by this simple story is one which we are aware, is regarded by many as impracticable, or if practiced, too inconvenient.

Others have not dared to investigate the subject, lest they should be convinced; but if, as we believe, it is a question of principle, it demands a serious investigation from every consistent Abolitionist, and every consistent Christian.

We speak and preach, pray and weep about slavery, and rightfully assert that every slaveholder who holds slaves in the blazing light of the nineteenth century, is in danger of hell-fire; and yet, do we not hold out inducements for him to continue his iniquitous practice; and are we not continuing to strengthen his hands, while he laughs at our professions?—Will he not tell us that the boasted anti-slavery men and fanatic Abolitionists of the North are his best consumers? That somebody must supply their constant demand for cotton, coffee, and other southern goods; and that he may do this and partake of the profit of slavery, as well as others the products of slavery! We do not tell the slaveholder to keep his slaves, that he may send us these articles as cheap as possible, but "actions speak louder than words," and if we would open our ears to hear, we might hear the response, or open our eyes to see, we might see it branded upon every barrel of southern sugar, "Support this our 'peculiar institution,' and we will send you these articles cheaper than you can obtain them in any other way."

Go to yonder store, and the products of oppression will stare you in the face. Look! and you will see the pro-slavery pictures there exhibited.

Here sits a Lorain Free Soiler, reading the Free Democrat, with his chair leaning back upon a hoghead of molasses—a very fit representation of the manner in which the slave power props up all minor parties that will accept its obligations. There sits the clerk reclining upon a huge pile of southern cotton, reading "Uncle Tom," and in comes a customer and asks for coffee. The clerk, who is a very good abolitionist, spreads out the article, which he says is very cheap, selling it nearly at cost; and then if the poor slave could speak though that coffee, he might say, "Yes, it is cheap, but it cost me many a wearisome day, and restless night; and I shall always carry the price of that hoghead of molasses on my back, and in my aching bones."

And how many slaves does it take to keep us? It takes no less than forty slaves at work all the time, for nothing but a scourging, to supply Oberlin with sugar, rice, and other southern luxuries.

It is said that a slaveholder is entitled to three votes for every live-slave. Yes, it takes five slaves to make three slaveholders, and about forty Abolitionists to make one slave.

And beware how you talk about abolition over a dish of hot buckwheat cakes, when the molasses mug is near. But how many of us do it, and roll these dainties like a "sweet morsel under our tongues," while the weary slave is toiling under the scorching sun of the South, to supply us with molasses to plaster the cakes of the next buckwheat harvest.

Some of our philanthropic and eloquent young men too, would exhaust their mental powers in pleading for the bondman; but every night they retire, and go to sleep in the very midst of the fruits of oppression, without even dreaming of inconsistency. And if these things be so, what shall we do! Is there no escape from such a dilemma! There is.

But we are met at the outset with the plea of necessity. "Total abstinence from slave products is an impossibility, unless we betake ourselves to the woods and live on roots and berries; free-labor goods too are so much dearer than slave-labor productions, that we could not keep up with the times and use the former."

But shall we forget that in just so much as slave-labor products are cheaper than free grown goods, just so much do we practically participate in the profits of slavery? And if it is necessary to use these articles, is not the necessity equally as great that there should be slaves to produce them? And if it takes so many slaves to supply the Abolitionists now; how much more slave territory, and how many more slaves shall we need to support all the young Abolitionists, and their families who, we flatter ourselves, will elect an Anti-Slavery President in 1856 or 1860! In anticipation, then, of such results, hear what the divine Revelator says:—"Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins; for her sins have reached unto Heaven, and God hath remembered her iniquities."

"But we cannot come out, we cannot get free-labor goods; and if we could, they would cost so much more than slave-labor goods, that we could not deny ourselves cheap southern luxuries."

With what degree of consistency, then, can we ask the slaveholder to let the bondman go free, while we, by refusing to make an insignificant sacrifice, are practically doing our utmost to rivet more firmly his chains—to stifle in his master's breast the promptings of humanity by paying him the wages of oppression! And how can we pray God to melt the hard heart of the slaveholder, that he may liberate his slaves and thus deny himself a fortune, while we are not willing to deny ourselves a few cents?

This plea of necessity is so large that it covers all slave-dom, and so small that almost every Abolitionist carries it in his pocket. But can free-labor produce be obtained to supply us? An agent was sent out in 1849, by the Philadelphia Free-Labor Association, and he among the southern planters, stated his business without fear of any one, and the slaveholders bade him God speed, and said that they had no confidence in the faith of the boasted northern Abolitionists. "But," said he, "reduce your professions to practice; go on." And he went on, and found seventeen hundred bales of free cotton in one neighborhood; and after spying out the goodly land, he returned, bringing with him the rich fruits of the abused Paradise of America.

And now if a few Quakers can sustain a flourishing free-labor store, what ought, or what can two thousand Oberlin reformers do?

You who are known the world over as foremost in reforms, and to whom were the tears and sympathy of yesterday credited in heaven; but is there nothing against us on the debtor side of God's book of remembrance? A little fugitive fled to us for refuge and died among us, but we had nothing but a slaveholder's shroud in which to wrap the little deceased wanderer, in which yesterday it was borne to the silent tomb; and now it lies in yonder grave-yard, wrapt in the products of oppression, from the cultivation of which it had fled. And these products sold by Oberlin merchants! Then what ought or what can Oberlin reformers do?

They can support two free-labor stores, and thus carry out their principles and reduce them to practice.

The merchants of the earth have waxed rich through the abundance of the delicacies of slavery, and will our merchants plead that "the Oberlin students are poor, and therefore we must furnish them with goods as cheap as possible"? As well argue that Oberlin students have no principle, and are not able to sacrifice a few shillings in defence of what they have got. A libel! Bring on your honestly-acquired goods, and if we have not money to pay for them, we are not ashamed to chop some out of the forest. And you, my sisters, you, whose sympathies are ever alive to alleviate the sufferings of the downtrodden, will you hold out inducements to support oppression, and thus subject your black, sable, yet comely sisters of the south to be sent to Natchez, where a market is held as public, and disgraceful as was ever a fair at Constantinople?

"Shall we walk in glistening raiment,
Through untold oppression gained,
When by blood, and tears, and sorrow,
Every thread is stained?"

Does the glorious gospel message
Nothing holier impart
With its works of love and mercy
Written on the heart?"

With its heaven-descended motto
Ever present to our view,
What ye would receive from others
That to others do!"

We would have the Free Labor principle applied to every kind of traffic in which it is becoming for conscientious Christians to engage, but we would heap barriers as high as Olympus between slavery and its market, for

"We feel that wrong with wrong partakes,
That nothing stands alone;
That whose gives the motive, makes
His brother's sin his own."

And what would be the result of refusing goods, contaminated by slavery?

It would create an anti-slavery nucleus in the very heart of the South, and if as many argue, slavery must be abolished by degrees, this could not fail to be one of the most effective and permanent agencies to rid our country of the most shameful sin. It would bring the non-slaveholders of the South into co-operation with us, and unless we can instill into them anti-slavery sentiments, our efforts to abolish slavery will be in vain. Then let the friends of freedom refuse all commercial intercourse with the workers of iniquity, until intercourse shall become congenial, and in less than half a century, slavery will be known only as a frightful monstrosity in our past history; and the fertile South will become the seat of agricultural, manufacturing and mechanical industry, and the home of happy freemen.

R. CRUTTENDEN.

CASSIUS M. CLAY.

We are sure many will hear with pleasure what we learned during a recent sit-down with our old friend and fellow-laborer, C. M. Clay, that the emancipation of his slaves, some eight years ago, has quite unexpectedly to him, proved a profitable operation. Having been an extensive stock-rearing farmer for many years previously, and being every way surrounded and hedged in by Slavery and Slave Labor, he naturally supposed that the liberation of his slaves would subject him to embarrassment and probably loss of his farming operations. But his experience has dissipated all apprehensions. He finds no difficulty in hiring White Labor according to his need and at reasonable rates; he hires a portion of his former slaves for wages mutually satisfactory; his farm is considerably improved and still improving in fertility and productiveness; he cuts more Hay, has better Pasturage, keeps more Cattle and keeps them in better order than formerly; and whereas his farm used to run him in debt, or at least yield him no profit he is now making money by it. So much for a single experiment in emancipation, made under the most discouraging and embarrassing auspices—with Slavery and anti-Abolition prejudice hemming it in on every side, and with the least possible diversification of Labor among the surrounding community.

Mr. Clay's farm is in Madison County, Ky. (Whitethall P. O.) and we earnestly entreat Southern gentlemen especially planters, who are willing to know the truth, to visit it, to see how it compares in appearance with the average of those round it, take the testimony of the neighbors, and draw their own conclusions. We know well that but a part of the benefits of Emancipation can be experienced while Slavery is still upheld by law and prevalent custom; and yet we feel sure that Slaveholding is so enormous and glaring a blunder, that Emancipation will demonstrate its own wisdom even without fair play—half a chance will answer. If the growing of Cotton, Tobacco, Rice and Sugar were not enormously profitable—twice as remunerating at present prices as business generally is—buying hands at $1,000 each for such growing would ruin most of those embarked in it. If the master mechanics of this City were obliged to buy their workmen at $1,000 each and then support them, giving them slave labor out of them, those masters could not live, and New-York would soon be as deficient in Manufacturing Industry as Charleston and New-Orleans. From the first hour that the successful working of the Steam Engine was undoubted, Slavery has been a mistake, a prejudice, an anachronism. If twenty capable planters would agree to liberate all their slaves and work their plantations instead with the most intelligent Free Labor that good wages would demand, using none but the best implements and machinery, we feel confident that most of them would succeed, while the truth that Slave Labor is more profitable than Slave Labor, even in Louisiana or Texas, would thereby be established.

A quiet old Quaker gentleman informed us that he saw the two systems fairly tried side by side, in the fertile grain-growing region of Western Maryland, (his life long residence,) and that there could be no mistake nor doubt as to the result. A plantation of 1,000 fertile acres was farmed with average science and care by a planter who owned one hundred and ten slaves, (old and young, male and female) who raised a large crop of Grain and made a large amount of Pork; but they (with the family) ate it all up and wore it out, so that the planter only brought the year round by selling off two or three negroes each year, while his farm rather deteriorated. A little distance from this fair specimen of a Maryland planter, lived a Northern farmer, working 250 acres of just such land, and employing on it six first-rate, intelligent white farmers, with the wives of two or three to do the housework—all paid good wages. This man realized a handsome profit from each year's operations, while his farm, under thorough culture and high manuring, grew steadily better and better. And thirty years hence will very probably see the slaveholder's plantation cut up into manageable farms, owned respectively by the sons of the Northern farmer, while the sons of the slaveholder, will be wandering and plotting in Venezuela or Guiana with a view to the re-annexation of said country in order to extend the power and blessings of Slavery.

Let all court and come to the light of investigation.—N. Y. Tribune.

FAITHFULNESS IN QUOTATIONS.

I notice in an American work, entitled "Historical Memoirs of the Society of Friends" (page 112,) that the dying words of James Naylor (breathing in so eminent a degree the heavenly spirit which they describe) are strangely abridged, without the insertion of stars or other marks to indicate the omissions. I noticed it with regret, because the original expressions appear to me to be quite free from unprofitable redundancy; and the passage in its mutilated form might be committed to memory or transcribed by many readers who would fail to become acquainted with its full beauty and excellence. I therefore transcribe from Sewell's History the complete paragraph, giving the rejected words in italics, that those who possess the MEMOIRS may make the correction for themselves:—

"There is a spirit which I feel, that delights to do no evil, nor to revenge any wrong, but delights to endure all things, in hope to enjoy its own in the end. Its hope is to outlive all wrath and contention, and to weary out all exaltation and cruelty, or whatever is of a nature contrary to itself. It sees to the end of all temptations. As it bears no evil in itself, so it conceives none in thought to any other: if it be betrayed it bears it; for its ground and spring are the mercies and forgiveness of God. Its crown is meekness, its life is everlasting love unfeigned, and takes its kingdom with equity, and not with contention, and keeps it by lowliness of mind. In God alone it can rejoice, though none else regard it, or can own its life. It is conceived in sorrow, and brought forth without any to pity it; nor doth it murmur at grief and oppression. It never rejoiceth but through sufferings; for with the world's joy it is murdered. I found it alone, being forsaken. I have fellowship therein with them who lived in dens and desolate places of the earth, who through death obtained this resurrection, and eternal holy life."

Whilst I admit the right, and at times the propriety of abridgements, I have long been impressed with the importance of faithfulness in quotation, that nothing be attributed to any person which such individual did not actually write or say. And as the sense may be greatly changed, in some cases destroyed, by omitting a part, such omissions ought to be so marked as that the reader may be aware that the sentences do not follow each other exactly as written by the author. Nor when this rule is adhered to can the liberty be possessed to abridge in such a manner as to change the author's meaning. Those who have read the pamphlet called "CALUMNY REPUDED," will have seen a full exposition of the evils which may result from giving way to the habit of mutilation.

By this practice, wide-spread breaches have been made in the Church in America, separating even chief Friends. Controversial pamphlets have dealt unfairly with writings which they professed to quote or to review, and these pamphlets, read with unsuspecting confidence, have produced impressions not to be eradicated. Again, in some republications in that country of the writings of our Friends, injustice has been done, for want, possibly of a full appreciation of the extent of an Editor's right to alter. To alter, I say, for so I consider it, when paragraphs or names are left out, which an author has deemed essential to a just record of his own life, unless, as before hinted, there are sufficient indications of abridgement. In the lives of T. Shillito, D. Wheeler, J. Barclay, and some others, as copied in the "Friends' Library," I have noticed these deficiencies, and regret them, as they lessen the value of a complete set of that otherwise invaluable series.

On this subject John Barclay, in a letter to a friend in Philadelphia, says (London, 2nd edition, page 263,) "With regard to cutting down some of our journals, &c., I have always looked upon this as a delicate or difficult matter to do unobjectionably. We are too apt, unconsciously to ourselves, to choose that which in our present state and turn of mind we are impressed with, or that which the present tendencies and exigencies of the times seem to us to call for; and possibly (for often it has been so,) to the unequal upholding of divine truth, or a partial exhibition of the character and line of testimony which a Friend in his life time maintained."

I have no doubt that many who have seemed to me to err in this respect have done so merely from a want of full reflection upon the subject in all its bearings; and therefore I am willing to embrace this occasion to call a little attention to it. To me it appears to be an obligation of morality, to deal justly with the words (written or spoken) of another man. Milton says, "almost as soon kill a man as kill a good book;" and I would add, almost rather kill the book than mutilate it, and pass it off for the production of the author. The rule I would imperatively lay down for making extracts from the writings of others, is this. Never bring together, to be read in continuity, sentences or words which were not placed together by their author. It is true that many a compiler may think himself able to retain or to improve the sense by condensing; but let such remember that many have thought themselves wise when they were not; and let me also ask, what right they have even to improve another's writings. The morality of the attempt is very questionable. When an author has passed away from earth, let him still speak for himself. Wrong him not by changing his words, when he is not here to take his own part. Two persons, of very different qualifications, but equally satisfied with themselves, may undertake the task of amendment. The bungler will suppose himself to have succeeded in his task. The more skillful workman would probably condemn him. The writer of these remarks would justify neither.

From An Essay on the Habitual Exercise of Love to God as a Preparation for Heaven.—By J. J. GURNEY.

A high sense of honour, even in men of a worldly character, ought by no means to be undervalued; for it is right in itself, and greatly promotes the happiness of mankind. Yet how often do we find persons, who are by no means destitute of this quality, working abundance of ill to their neighbours! Under the influence of their respective passions, the duellist, the gamester, and the sensualist—although they may all seem what they deem a breach of honour—have little hesitation in inflicting injuries on their fellow-creatures, which are utterly opposed to immutable justice. Hence we may perceive the true force of the apostle's doctrine, that all the laws which forbid our injuring other men, are briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." "Love," he adds, "worketh no ill to his neighbour;" therefore, "love is the fulfilling of the law." If this love had always prevailed among professing Christians, where would have been the sword of the crusader? Where the African Slave Trade? Where the odious system which permits to man a property in his fellow men, and converts rational beings into marketable chattels?

Love, indeed, imparts both eyes and wings to justice. It is when our depraved affections are rectified, that we take an enlightened view of the relations of our fellow-men towards ourselves, and of the claims on our justice, which those relations involve. Again, it is love which makes us swift to shun the evil which justice forbids, and to do the good which she demands. At the same time, it cannot be denied, that under the softening touches of religion, charity and mercy are sometimes found to be easier to frail man than the hardier virtue of strict integrity. This is a point of danger which requires a peculiar guard, and which is too often neglected, to the great loss and injury of the cause of Christ. Let it ever be remembered, that the unbending maintenance of the rule of right towards our fellow-man, is the first and most indispensable result of that holy law: "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself."

"A Southern Woman's" reply to the address of the Duchess of Sutherland and other English women.

This letter is published at length in the N. Y. Evening Post of the 18th ult., with a full editorial endorsement of the authoress as "one of the most respectable and influential ladies of N. Orleans and widely known for unassuming religion and active benevolence."—We regret that we have room only for extracts.

I have been waiting and watching to see who would respond to this address, or whether it would not be communicated to us in a more formal manner. Till, at length, my longing curiosity is satisfied by the appearance of the letter of Mrs. Julia Gardner Tyler.

This comes from the right quarter. She holds the highest position—the wife of an Ex-President—thus our constitution will admit of, and may with perfect propriety take the lead in replying to the address of the women of England to the women of America on the subject of African Slavery. It is happily, however, one of the beautiful features of our republican form of government, that—without any conventional grant—we are individually sovereigns, in matters of opinion, and may with equal propriety claim the same privilege of expressing them, that she is entitled to, with no other fears than the loss of popularity with those from whom we may be so unfortunate as to dissent. Acting, then, upon these principles, I shall venture to advance sentiments that will conflict with some of my countrywomen's views. Nevertheless, I am urged on to do it by the sure knowledge that there are very many of them—I think I may truthfully say a majority—some southern women—noble specimens—who feel with me a decided and unconquerable aversion to the system of Slavery, as it exists in these Southern States, and who would wish so to be represented, and who are deeply grieved to see the favor it obtains, not only from those on whose hearts the spirit of Christianity has not operated, but from professed followers of Jesus Christ, a portion of whom sustain it, most lamentably so, because, they say, on Bible principles.

We, then, embracing such portions of my countrywomen as coincide with me in opinion on this subject of African Slavery, acknowledged to have received your address in the same spirit of goodness in which we believe it was dictated. We do not believe that the "fingers of statesmen" guided it, or that political subtlety was its object. We are unwilling to attribute such unworthy motives to your husbands, fathers, or brothers, as to suppose that they would make you their willing dupes. We do believe that it was the honest dictation of sympathy for the sufferings and moral degradation of our Slaves.

As a nation, ladies, you are justly entitled to a large share of this guilt—the largest share of it—because you have fastened it on us. We appreciate your acknowledgment of it. Deeds have spoken it, as well as words. We also appreciate your hint of the enlightened age of the 19th century; for we do not believe in the doctrine, that we would have done right if we had not been admonished of doing wrong. We believe if the disposition exists to do right, that no misguided zeal of sympathizers would be able so easily to turn us from our purposes, (admitting it to be such;) such doctrine has been most successfully applied to the much hated and contemned abolitionists, to whom the slave owes his ameliorated condition. His physical condition has been much improved for the last twenty years. His spiritual condition is receiving some considerable attention from some quarters—with a strict guard upon his intellectual condition. We, who profess to wish their emancipation, are teaching them, as far as we can, within limits of law—some few go beyond it—and we are aiming to treat them kindly. We look to Liberia as the best home for them; but we do not prohibit any other, to which they would wish to go or stay. We here propose to those who favor the Liberian scheme for abolishing Slavery, (of which we think most highly,) to let us see them put it in practice. Let them go immediately to work, and teach them, prepare them for Liberia, and send them away. Then we will believe in their sincerity. But, alas! while we can see from one of our broadest streets, suspended from the tops of the houses, across the street, a person, bearing in large letters this inscription: TALBOT'S SLAVE DEPARTMENT—with the lower floor filled with men and women for sale—specimens of them at the doors—and the very high prices which these victims now command—we fear that Virginia and the other exporting States will send down more Slaves for Talbot, than free men for Liberia.

After a suitable appeal to northern and southern Christians, politicians, and mothers, a reference to the reluctance with which the framers of our Constitution introduced the clause "Persons bound to labor," &c., to the emancipation of his Slaves by "our model man, our loved Washington" and to enormities well known as of common occurrence, she proceeds:

Such things are not the alleged fictions of Uncle Tom's Cabin. They are undeniable truths! and because they are truths, we ask you, Christians, politicians, mothers, to think of them. Ponder over them, and lend your aid to abolish so horrid a system, which we believe to be, from a personal knowledge with it, in almost all its phases, what Pitt said it was. "A mass, a system of enormities, which incontrovertibly bids defiance to any regulation which ingenuity can devise, or power effect, but a total extinction." While I write this, my thoughts reach to the many scenes that would rival those delineated in Uncle Tom's Cabin; the truth of which delineations I dare not disavow, though romantically told. The very many exceptions of kind treatment which Slaves receive from very many families—which I am too happy in acknowledging—is no excuse for Christians to sustain a system, that puts it in the power of so many others, that are not disposed to treat them kindly, and who do treat them cruelly. Their physical sufferings even then, are nothing compared to their moral degradation.

The retort, to look at home and take care of your own poor, with which animadversions on your address to us so copiously abound, might have been more courteously said, notwithstanding it deserves attention. I am quite willing to think that, unduly, you do so; but for your government, ladies, I do not feel so charitably disposed; that is grasping, oppressive, conservative; guarding every avenue to wealth and power for one class, regardless of another; striking from giving any aid to struggling nations for freedom, though feelingly appealed to; supporting expensive armies out of the labor of the poor, with the bayonet ready to stop their mouths, should they complain too loudly; crippling the industrious classes by taxation, in whose keeping is the wealth of the kingdom, if they knew it—for labor is the capital of the kingdom; tacking on tariff after tariff, to make the rich richer, and the poor poorer; and last, though not least, the church monopoly. But, amidst all this mass of parliamentary action for maintaining aristocratic power, there is one redeeming trait: you have made the individual free; for there is an individuality in the act of one man's making another man his property, and using him as such, to all intents and purposes, that marks it distinctly, and attaches to it the just opprobrium of meanness, selfishness, cruelty and injustice.

We are not yet ready to think that we are in as deplorable a condition of sin and wretchedness, as the Israelites were when Josiah said to them, "None calleth for justice, nor any pleadeth for truth." We will yet call for justice! and we will plead for truth!

And now, ladies, we will make an appeal to you. It is for your intercession that we, our husbands, fathers, and brothers may all be directed so to think on this great question of African Slavery, as God would have us to think, and so act as God would have us to act.—And in reference to your own country, where many things exist that we are unwilling to think that you approve of, we will most cordially unite with you in the same petition.

A SOUTHERLY WOMAN.

The Southern Baptist Convention, recently held at Baltimore, appointed a committee to memorialize the government in favor of securing religious liberty to all Americans in foreign countries; declined co-operating, in the matter of domestic missions, with the Northern Baptists, because of the opposition of the latter to slaveholding in the church; rejected a memorial to encourage the education of slaves; and resolved to further the distribution of the word of God "in foreign lands." A Southern friend informs us that it is customary in the Baptist churches, in South Carolina, to solicit contributions from the slaves, in behalf of missions to the heathen. In the same State, it is, we believe, a penitentiary offence to teach a slave to read.—Daily Register.

MISSISSIPPI HUNTING.

Killing Property on Suspicion.—A Mississippi Paper, the Clinton Whig, gives with the simple dignified unconcern of mere narration, the following incident. We could wish that the Whig had so far relaxed its non-committal reserve as to intimate whether the transaction was to be considered a christian, a democratic or a humane one. The Freeman thinks that the picture will not be regarded as "abolition exaggeration." We are not so certain that the mere quotation of the paragraph by an abolitionist, will not by some be regarded as an "exaggeration." [Ed.]

Two citizens of Port Hudson, learning that a negro was at work on a flat boat loading with sand just below that place, who was suspected as being a runaway, went down in a skiff for the purpose of arresting him. Having seized him and put him in the skiff, they started back, but had not proceeded far, when the negro, who was at the oars, seized a hatchet and assaulted one of them, wounding him very seriously. A scuffle ensued, in which both parties fell overboard. They were both rescued by the citizen pulling to them with the skiff. Finding him so unmanageable, the negro was put ashore, and the parties returned to Port Hudson for arms and a pack of negro dogs, and started again with the intention to capture him. They soon got on his trail, and when found again he was standing at bay upon the outer edge of a large raft of drift wood, armed with a club and pistol. In this position he bade defiance to men and dogs—knocking the latter into the water with his club, and resolutely threatening death to any man who approached him. Finding him obstinately determined not to surrender, one of his pursuers shot him. He fell at the third fire, and so determined was he not to be captured, that when an effort was made to rescue him from drowning he made battle with his club, and sunk waving his weapon in angry defiance at his pursuers. He refused to give the name of his owner.

Precedent and authority, not Divinity sanctioned, are the refuge of a weak understanding. One sound argument is worth a thousand precedents.—Samuel Drew.

In forty cities and towns in Scotland, every 149 of the population support a dram-shop, while it requires 981 to keep a baker, 1067 to support a butcher, and 2281 to sustain a bookseller.—Edinburgh News.

THE MADIAI AND THE SLAVES.

In one of the Southern States, a few weeks ago, a small party sat down to supper, when one of the ladies related to the company the case of the Madiai, which now seems to be attracting the attention of Christendom.—About half the number of persons present were Anti-Slavery, and the other Pro-Slavery. All seemed to receive the account with deep feeling, and a part with high indignation, as the following colloquy (literally given) will show:

Pro-Slavery. Do you say those people were charged with no offence but reading the Bible, and, in consequence of that, leaving the Romish Church?

Anti-Slavery. I do.

Pro. Those people ought to be burnt.

Anti. Ought to be burnt?

Pro. Yes, those who imprison people for reading the Bible ought to be burnt.

Anti. But remember it is not the people, but the law, that imprisons them.

Pro. Then the law ought to be burnt; and if I was there I would burn it.

Anti. But recollect we have the same law here.

Pro. What do you say?

Anti. I say we have the same law here—a law that forbids a part of our population to read the Bible!

Not another word was spoken during the supper. After retiring from the table, another Pro-Slavery member of the company broke the very embarrassing silence, by saying, Well, that is a most abominable law; and the truth is, if I owned slaves, I would teach them to read the Bible in defiance of law.—A North Carolina Woman.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, SIXTH MONTH, 1, 1853.

THE AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY AND AMERICAN SLAVERY.

Under this caption the Oberlin Evangelist, of 5th mo. 11th has a good editorial, which, according due honor to the Society "for the much good they have done," treats with kindness, yet with Christian unreserve their policy respecting the subject of Slavery, and quotes the following paragraph from Judge Jay's letter to the Cor. Sec., in reply to an application for funds in aid of said Society.

"I know not that in the twenty-seven years of its existence this Society has published a line intended to touch the conscience of an American slave-breeder or trader. On the contrary, especial care has been taken to expunge from your reprints every expression that could even imply a censure on our stupendous national iniquity. The Society has no hesitation in condemning cruelty, oppression and injustice, but it shrinks with a fright at the very idea of acknowledging that it is cruel, oppressive and unjust to reduce a black man to the condition of a beast of burden, to deny him legal marriage, and to sell him and his children to the highest bidder, in company with the beasts of the field. This extreme sensitiveness is shown in the alteration of a passage in your reprint of Gurney's essay on the habitual exercise of love to God. Gurney says: 'If this love had always prevailed among professing Christians, where would have been the sword of the crusader?' Where the African slave trade? Where the odious system which permits to man a property in his fellow men, and converts rational beings into marketable chattels? (Page 142.) This was neat too strong for the digestion of the Society, and hence it was carefully diluted, so that it might be swallowed without producing the slightest nausea, as follows: 'If this love had always prevailed among professing Christians, where would have been the sword of the crusader?' Where the tortures of the Inquisition? Where every system of oppression and wrong by which he who has the power revels in luxury and ease at the expense of his fellowmen? (Page 190.) It was an ingenious thought to turn upon the Inquisition Gurney's application of his subject to slave traders and holders, and to lose sight of property in man in indefinite generalities."

We cannot, without sincere regret, direct a stroke of our pen against a Society which we have been accustomed to regard, and which we still regard, with affection; and, in the spirit of kindness, invoking upon the labors of the Tract Society that fullness of divine blessing which may be expected to attend perfectly honest efforts to promote the spread and adoption of the whole truth, we commend to their consideration the testimonies which their compromising policy has elicited from various quarters.

But, apart from our desire that, on all proper occasions, by all moral agents, an honest testimony may be borne against Slavery, we take this occasion to urge, on the ground of morality, a solemn protest against the existence of the right to mutilate the writings of an author, and, without his knowledge, to publish them to the world as though they had proceeded in such form from his brain, and from his heart. And the wrong may, perhaps, be said to increase in proportion to the excellence of the writer whose sayings are thus perverted, and is still deepened, when the author has ceased from his mortal labors and cannot therefore defend himself from the injustice. Joseph John Gurney was not only a christian, but he was also an eminent Christian. From a prominent and elevated position he addressed his fellow beings, the Spirit of Christ impelling him, the love of Christ constraining him to reason with them, and to exhort them concerning the things pertaining to their peace and salvation. Not only was he as a theologian "in doctrine uncorrupt," but he was complete in his moral code, and, in a world-embracing view of the prominent evidences of departure from "love to God," he could not have specified the Crusades and the Inquisition and omitted Slavery. To make him appear to do so, is weakening his testimony and lowering his standard: is wronging his memory, and is wronging the human race. But, if the liberty taken with his book consists not merely in an omission, but also in the insertion (as part of this admirable paragraph) of words which he did not write, it seems to us a sort of forgery, and recalls Major Downing's indignant outburst: "Any man who would put my name to his letters, I think would steal a sheep."

Nor is our objection, as at present urged, a mere abstraction. The injustice done is real, —practical. The Society's stereotyped edition of "Love to God as a preparation for Heaven," has absorbed the American publication of the work to the exclusion of reliable editions, and we regret to confess that we have repeatedly purchased it for circulation, entertaining no doubts of its integrity. We can scarcely conceive of a greater wrong to an author, than to alter his writings. Admit the right to do so, and who can estimate the extent to which this cushioning of the clubs designed for the bruising of the Serpent's head, may be carried. How insidiously might Truth be weakened in what were else her most impregnable defences! The writer of the book in question has been assailed by pamphleteers, who have attempted to sustain false charges of heresy on certain points (which he understood as fully as his assailants,) by mutilated and garbled extracts from his writings. But his works could be referred to, and honest and logical minds could judge for themselves. But if perverted and altered editions of his works are put into circulation as genuine,—not only may the religious reputation of the writer be impaired or misappreciated, but the testimony of an exalted christian, after he has gone to his eternal reward, may be turned against the truth which he advocated, and, by implication, seem to be given in favor of sentiments which he abhorred.

We introduce, in another column, as further illustrating this subject, an Essay on "Faithfulness in quotations," taken from the London Friend.

DON'T WANT TO BE FREE.

It is noticeable that a particular class of persons, after travelling southward, return with their testimony against Slavery mitigated. They have been entertained with flattering hospitality, and the darkest side of the picture has been kept as much as possible from their view:

"As Irish country squires, they say,
Whene'er the Vice-Roy passes nigh,
Compound with beggars by the way
To be shut up till he goes by,
And so send back his Lordship, marvelling
That Ireland should be deemed so starving."

We can almost judge beforehand, by the character of his mind, what sort of report a Southward-bound traveller will bring back to us from the land of oppression. But our present object is to introduce a passage from a long and admirable letter communicated by A. BARNARD for The Christian Press.

"I can bear testimony to the truth of 'Uncle Tom's Cabin,' at least, in so far as to say, that the picture has not been overdrawn. Indeed, no language can describe the horrors and abominations of Slavery. It did not fall to my lot to see a George Shelby, but I have no doubt there are some like him in the South. Legree has many 'counterparts.'"

I went there as a workman, and, consequently, had a good opportunity to see Slavery as it is. The slaveholder is not careful to hide from workmen the atrocities of his "peculiar institution," inasmuch as he considers them little above the slaves themselves. But he spares no pains to hide them from "strange gentlemen," especially those from the North. Hence, many are so deceived and hoodwinked, that they return home with a good opinion of Slavery. It is done in the following way: The slaveholder is very hospitable—will often help a stranger for days and weeks, free of cost, showing him all the beauties of his system, taking care that he does not see the "other side of the picture." He finally tells him that he may find out to his satisfaction, by asking the slaves themselves what they think of Slavery, &c. So the stranger goes to the "hands" and interrogates them as follows: "Well, boys, how do you like your work? O, berry well, massa." "Dont you have to work hard?" "O no, massa, we no hab to work hard; we berry well off, old 'boss' berry kind man," &c. "Wouldn't you like to be free?" "O, no, no, massa, we no want to be free, we lub massa too much to leeb him," &c. &c. This is all done with so much gravity and appearance of honesty, by the slaves, that the "stranger" goes away, convinced "that Slavery is not so bad after all," and by the time he steps over "Masons and Dixon's line" he is become a good apologist for Slavery, and is ready to run the soles of his shoes off at the call of that infamous Bill, to catch and drag back into hopeless bondage, those who 'don't want to be free!'

The secret of the matter is, the slaves are compelled to tell such falsehoods, in order to escape a terrible flogging. The master knows this, and therefore feels safe in sending a stranger to ask them. The slaves are afraid of all white men, and dare not tell any one how they look upon their wrongs. It was not until I had shown them, by many kind words, looks, and acts, that I was indeed their friend, that I gained their confidence enough to get the truth out of them on the subject. They then told me that they had been so many times betrayed by whites, that they dare not tell them their minds. I saw many hundreds of slaves and conversed with many, but no one who said he did not want to be free. I talked with those who had been brought from nearly every slave State in the Union, and of course had an opportunity to learn what they thought of Slavery, even in its mildest form. The result has been, no loss of shoe leather in chasing the poor fugitive back into remediless bondage, but contrariwise, in helping him on towards the land of freedom."

We make room for one further extract from A. B's letter, to show the conclusions at which he has arrived.

"Judging from the data I have, I am brought to the following syllogism. Whatever increases the market for the products of slave labor, tends to perpetuate Slavery. The use of the products of Slavery increases the market for the products of slave labor. Therefore, the use of the products of Slavery tends to perpetuate Slavery. Again, whatever tends to perpetuate Slavery is incompatible with abolitionism. The use of the products of Slavery tends to perpetuate Slavery: therefore, the use of the products of Slavery is incompatible with abolitionism."

FULL TESTIMONY FROM THE SOUTH.

A citizen of Alabama and native of Virginia writes over his proper signature the following letter to the Editors of the New York Evening Post. It is one of many testimonies by Slaveholders to the truthfulness of H. B. Stowe's picture. We are no apologists for novel writing, we think that there is truth enough in the world for all moral purposes, but we fully believe that the book referred to partakes much less of fiction than those who have not investigated its history suppose. Many of its narratives are absolute facts, with only a change of names; its pictures are drawn with fidelity, and at the same time in no accusing spirit, but with great liberality toward slaveholders; and let it be borne in mind that a great part of the power of the work consists in passages of fine and irresistibly impressive moral and religious sentiment, which are in no sense and in no degree fictitious; and which, as lovers of pure and holy truth, we may very safely admit into our hearts. We have avoided any commendation of "Uncle Tom," because we do not wish to give an indirect sanction to religious novels, nor to any departure from most perfect truthfulness for the advancement of the Truth. At the same time we have perused with regret and disapproval some notices of "Life among the lowly," in which some correct general remarks upon the subject of fiction, have been connected with really unfair and unjust remarks respecting the book in question. We give the Alabama letter, not as endorsing every expression (we would not be understood as endorsing all that we quote,) but because we believe it to be a candid and important witness against Slavery, such as is entitled to a hearing and to full credence. In a recent conversation between two citizens of Virginia, (one of them our personal friend) one of them remarked rather cautiously, that there was "a good deal of Truth in Uncle Tom after all."—The other responded, "Don't you know that every word of it is true?—Don't you know that every word of it can be substantiated, without going off this plantation?"

—, ALABAMA, May, 8th, 1853.
To the Editors of the Evening Post:

I have just finished a perusal of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." I read every word to my wife. I will not attempt to describe to you her feelings. We are slaveholders. The moment the steamer with George Harris and Eliza his wife touched the Canada shore, three shouts for liberty, to the tops of our voices, rent the air.

Every man, woman and child, white and black, in the southern states, can bear testimony to the truth of the portrait which Mrs. Stowe, God bless her! has drawn of slavery. One of not the least excellencies of the book is, that a Christian, of the highest style, standing side by side with Wilberforce and Miss Hannah More, leads the reader by the hand through the habitations of cruelty that lie before our eyes. He or she can then draw a contrast between the Christian and a mistress and mother, who was some years since a near neighbor of mine, who owned a little negro girl. She would heat the tongs, and pull the flesh off her body with them.

I durst affirm that if his Satanic majesty were put upon his voir dire he would confess that slavery is one of the works of the devil which Christ was manifested in the flesh to destroy.

In my opinion, "Uncle Tom's Cabin" is destined to have a greater influence for good than any one single book that has been published since the close of the canon of Scripture. * * * The reader at once penetrates the deep meaning of the parable of the servant that took his fellow-servant by the throat, who owed him a few pence; of the good Samaritan, and of Dives and Lazarus. Mrs. Stowe has ended her book just as she should have done. She has suggested no plan of emancipation further than the example of young George Shelby goes. She has left the duty and responsibility just where St. Paul, in his letter to Philemon, left it, on the slave owner.

Our warmest thanks and best wishes to Mrs. Stowe, whom generations unborn will rise up and call "Blessed."

Very respectfully, &c.,

Our English Exchanges give evidence of much activity in the British Isles upon the subject of Temperance. In the islands of Portland, Jersey, and Guernsey, important demonstrations are making. In the latter island the Bristol Temperance Herald notices seven "impressive and effective" addresses by a "Mrs. Theobald" to crowded audiences. Throughout England Scotland and Ireland a commendable zeal appears to prevail. Our well beloved Neal Dow is held in deserved esteem, and the Royal sanction has been given to a legal enactment; "THE NEW BRUNSWICK ANTI-LIQUOR LAW," which is designed to emulate THE MAINE LAW, but which, excepting malt-liquor and cider from its restrictions, must be very partial in its benefit.

The King of Sweden has communicated with the State of Maine, requesting information relative to the operation of the Prohibitory Liquor Law upon crime, pauperism and the general interests of that noble State.

SPIRIT RAPPINGS.—The New Jersey Reformer gives, under this caption, a goodly string of cases of effectual rappings upon the heads of Spirit Casks in different parts of the Green Mountain State, followed by a significant outpouring of the Spirit.

A friend of JEFFERSON COUNTY, OHIO, after expressing kind sentiments of approval of the course pursued in the Non-Slaveholder, bestows very just encomiums upon the Memorial of S. Rhoads, E. Lewis and others, given on page 27.—We quite agree with our correspondent that the proposition therein contained is fraught with magnanimity, and ought to be so accepted by our Southern brethren. Admitting as it does our partnership in the great business of Slavery, and frankly offering to meet the Slave States in their own time, and to share with them any losses to be sustained by Emancipation, proposing, moreover, a fair and unobjectionable mode of assessing damages, and of determining the sum to be paid out of the National Treasury,—the signers must be admitted to have extended the Olive branch so amiably, that no reasonable Slaveholder will be irritated or repelled. We think with H—that there is (to use the ancient orthography of a significant word) much of right-wise-ness in the proposal. We trust, too, that seminal truth has been thrown into soil in which (though the husbandman may wait long) it will finally germinate.

And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament,—and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever.—DANIEL xii. 3.

There is an order of intelligence
More high, more pure than man has e'er conceived:
When the Eternal Author first resolved
To people the dread loneliness of space,
Then He created beings, glorious, bright,
Worthy companionship in bliss with Him.
These are the STARS OF MORNING, who for joy
Sung at the extension of their Father's glory,
When they beheld our new created world.
It may be some of these have fallen from light:—
("Satan I saw like light'ning fall from Heaven")
And he, once bright among the stars of morning,
Found doubtless at Creation's dawn his birth;
But those who, through the inconceivable lapse
Of ages, have continued, until now,
From the beginning perfect,—even as He
Who gave them life's benevolent boon is perfect,
Must be most glorious of created beings,
Of nearest kindred to the Fount of Glory.
These, having never sinned, have never sorrowed,
Nor known an hour's abatement of their bliss.
The will divine has not been hid from them,
And quick obedience followed its conception.
Thus, with alacrity and eager joy,
Without a thought of compromise or doubt,
But rather with anticipating zeal,
His will is done in Heaven! Speed, speed the day
In thine own time, oh Thou who canst not err,
And make our wills subservient to thine own!
To them obedience constitutes delight,
And brings its own reward, for it has given
To blest existence still a heightened bliss!
Partaking of Divine benevolence,
Their bliss has increase as His Kingdom spreads,
And beings capable of happiness
Enlarge Creation's catalogue. And thus
They sang together, shouting in their joy,
When they beheld a world, which had become
"Formless and void," created o'er again,
And Heaven's high Architect pronounced it good.
And, at the extacy of their glad songs,
All Paradise with added rapture thrills,
When an immortal leaves his sinfulness,

Sheds penitent tears, and, in humility,
Assumes Christ's easy yoke and learns of Him.
His goodness how adorable, who placed Salvation's means within our reach, and gave
His angels, blest already, to rejoice
In man's acceptance of His terms of Grace!

Such are the high intelligences there!
And those on Earth who most resemble them
From kindred sources draw their chiefest joy.
They find it in performing Heaven's behest.
They find it, when the flood of gospel light
Spreads from the frozen North to South-Sea Isles,
From western Pagan lands to Moslem shrines.
They feel would urge that flood, and speed the day
When, as the waters spread o'er Ocean's floor,
So Righteousness shall overflow the Earth.

There have been holy men in every age
Whose chief employ in life has been to turn
Their fellow men to righteousness. The SKIR
OF RAMA,—and the SLEEPING PALMIST KING,—
SAMUEL,—and the valiant APOSTOLIC BAND,—
ERASMUS,—and MELANCTHON,—FENELON,— LUTHER,—A'KEEPS,—WHITFIELD,—strong in faith,— WESLEY,—and NEWTON and his brother Bard,—
FOX,—fraught with holy zeal and faith, and nerved
With strength from Heaven, anointed of the Lord
And girded for the combat,—who made war
With human pride, and held the standard up
Of the pure primitive gospel,—breaking down
Tradition's holds and Error's resting place,
And, noble in profound humility,
Leading, like teachable children, lofty men
To learn of Him the meek and lowly one;
And many, who, o'er mountain vale and plain,
Preach Christ's unsearchable riches, and proclaim
Glad tidings of great joy to all mankind.

When these shall put on immortality,
They shall be added to the firmament.
They shall be clustered with the stars which shone
From the beginning, and with them shall shine
Forever and forever. W. J. A.

AN APPEAL FOR THE BONDWOMAN,

TO HER OWN SEX.

BY ELIZABETH LLOYD, JR.

"The slave, the slave hath many wrongs—
Where might her pleader be?"—Lucy Hooper.

PART I.

MOTHER! pleading for the dumb,
Unto thee for aid we come;
For the captive and oppressed
We would break upon thy rest;
For thy suffering sex's sake,
In thy bosom we would wake
Sympathy so deep and strong
As should count thine own, their wrong.

Christian Lady, at thy gate,
Troubadour from far we wait;
Bend thine ear, and we will tell,
As we touch our light guitar,
Tidings woman loveth well,
All of Freedom's righteous war;
We will sing to thee and thine
Lays of Freedom's Palestine;
Pilgrim from the Holy Land
Where her brave crusaders stand
For the fettered lip and hand,
Messages to thee we bear
From the tried and faithful band
Who are doing battle there,
And through toil and weariness
To the Captive's rescue press.

Oh! their path is long and dreary,

And their feet are growing weary,—
Hearts of proof are almost failing,—
And their arms in dust are trailing,
As they still behold afar
Prison gates they would unbar.

Mother! they invoke thy aid!
Not to bear the battle blade,
Aim a spear, or break a lance,
For the slave's deliverance,
But to train thy little child,
'Ere the world shall have beguiled
From thy side the precious trust,
For the armies of the just.

If the Hebrew mother chanted
Israel's glory to her child,
Till the thirsting spirit panted
And the bounding heart grow wild
For the path her warriors trod,
Guided by the living God,—
If the Roman matron gave,
At her country's high behest,
To the camp or to the wave
All in life beloved best,—
Shall the Christian mother bind
Down to some low, narrow aim,
Warm young heart and dawning mind,
Till our country's deep'ning shame
To its children will be less Than the gains of selfishness?

Leader of the household flock;
By thy God ordained to stand
As the shadow of a rock
To a young depending band,
Can thine eye, undimmed, behold
Woman's agony and fear,
When the wolf hath tracked her fold,
And no rescuer is near?
Brooding o'er the household nest,
Canst thou calmly sit at rest,
Heedless of that robbed one's groan,
Of the childless mother's moan,
When her empty arms to thee
Are outstretched imploringly?—
By the daily blessings shed
On thy house and on thy head,
By the joys that crown thy hearth
As a holy spot on earth,
Happy, virtuous, and free!
In thy gratitude to God,
Who hath kindly dealt with thee,

Lent the staff but spared the rod,—
Teach thy little ones to feel !
Early let thy touch unseal
All those springs of tenderness
Given by our Father's love,
Every living thing to bless
In their path ordained to move.

If thou hast a noble boy,
Stealing ever from his play,
Picture-book and childish toy,
To some chosen haunt away,
Where he finds on ancient page,
Chivalry's departed age,
Warms o'er tale of knightly deed,
Hears the tramp of battle steed,
Trumpet call to "holy war,"
Clash of sword and scimitar,—
Tell him of those valiant men,
Conquerors by the lip and pen,
Warriors of the stone and sling,
Sent among mankind to bring Down the Philistine of wrong;
In their lofty purpose strong,
Calm of mind and brave of heart,
Teach him how they deal the blow,
Teach him how they speed the dart,
Truth's defyer to lay low.
If it be thy lot to guide
Hand in hand and side by side
With that spirit high and bold
One of Nature's softer mould,
Whose heart's windows will unclose
Only when the south wind blows,
When she seeks thy ready knee
In some pause of childhood's glee,
While the welcome form is pressed
To a momentary rest,
And the little fingers twine
Close and lovingly with thine,
In a gentle voice and mild
Tell her of the Captive's child,
Whose tiny form is uncaressed,
Whose lip in love is rarely pressed,
Who sits neglected day by day,
And wears its little life away,
With none to cherish, no one near,
To hush the wail or wipe the tear.

Oh ! if thou hast ever known,
How a mother's faintest tone
Lives upon the inward ear
Like no other sound we hear,—
If memory doth ever stray
From things of now and yesterday
O'er thine own childhood's guarded way,
If thou hast ever looked within
The foldings of a worldly heart,
To find, beneath its stains of sin,
And coverings of time and art,

The lines thy mother's pencil traced,—
Let every picture uneffaced,
To its own spotless surface given,
By her who with the undefiled,
Now sitteth at the gate of Heaven
To watch the coming of her child;
Let every clear and vivid line,
Which all thy better nature stirs,
Incite thee to bequeath to thine,
Such memories as live for hers.

HYPOTHETICAL FIRE IN BOSTON.

FROM H. B. STOWE'S "KEY."

But will it be said, "The abolition enterprise was begun in a wrong spirit, by reckless, meddling, impudent fanatics?" Well, supposing that this were true, how came it to be so? If the church of Christ had begun it right, these so-called fanatics would not have begun it wrong. In a deadly pestilence, if the right physicians do not prescribe, everybody will prescribe,—because something must be done. If the Presbyterian Church, in 1818 had pursued the course the Quakers did, there never would have been any fanaticism. The Quakers did all by brotherly love. They melted the chains of Mammon only in the fires of a divine charity. When Christ came into Jerusalem, after all the mighty works that he had done, while all the so-called better classes were non-committal or opposed, the multitude cut down branches of palm-trees and cried Hosanna! There was a most indecorous tumult.—The very children caught the enthusiasm, and were crying Hosannas in the temple. This was contradictory to all ecclesiastical rules. It was a highly improper state of things. The Chief Priests and Scribes said unto Jesus, "Master, speak unto these that they hold their peace." That gentle eye flashed as he answered, "I TELL YOU, IF THESE SHOULD HOLD THEIR PEACE, THE VERY STONES WOULD CRY OUT."

Suppose a fire bursts out in the streets of Boston, while the regular conservators of the city, who have the keys of the fire-engines, and the regulation of fire-companies, are sitting together in some distant part of the city, consulting for the public good. The cry of fire reaches them, but they think it a false alarm. The fire is no less real, for all that. It burns, and rages, and roars, till everybody in the neighborhood sees that something must be done. A few stout leaders break open the doors of the engine-houses, drag out the engines, and begin, regularly or irregularly, playing on the fire. But the destroyer still advances. Messengers come in hot haste to the "all of these deliberators, and, in the unselect language of fear and terror, revile them for not coming out.

"Bless me!" says a decorous leader of the body, "what horrible language these men use!"

"They show a very bad spirit," remarks another; "we can't possibly join them in such a state of things."

Here the more energetic members of the body rush out, to see if the thing be really so; and in a few minutes come back, if possible more earnest than the others.

"Oh there is a fire!—a horrible, dreadful fire! The city is burning,—men, women, children, all burning, perishing! Come out, come out! As the Lord liveth, there is but a step between us and death!"

"I am not going out; everybody that goes gets crazy," says one.

"I've noticed," says another, "that as soon as anybody goes out to look, he gets just so excited,—I won't look."

But by this time the angry fire has burned into their very neighborhood. The red demon glares into their windows. And now, fairly aroused, they get up and begin to look out.

"Well, there is a fire, and no mistake!"—says one.

"Something ought to be done," says another.

"Yes," says a third; "if it was't for being mixed up with such a crowd and rabble of folks, I'd go out."

"Upon my word," says another, "there are women in the ranks, carrying pails of water!—There, one woman is going up a ladder to get those children out. What an indecorum! If they'd manage this matter properly, we would join them."

And now come lumbering over from Charlestown the engines and fire-companies.

"What impudence of Charlestown," say these men, "to be sending over here,—just as if we could not put our own fires out! They have fires over there, as much as we do."

And now the flames roar and burn, and shake hands across the streets. They leap over the steeples, and glare demoniacally out of the church-windows.

"For Heaven's sake, do SOMETHING!" is the cry. "Pull down the house! Blow up these blocks of stores with gunpowder! Anything to stop it."

"See, now, what ultra, radical measures they are going at," says one of these spectators.

Brave men, who have rushed into the thickest of the fire, come out, and fall dead in the street.

"They are impracticable enthusiasts. They have thrown their lives away in fool-hardiness," says another.

So, church of Christ, burns that awful fire! Evermore burning, burning, burning, over church and altar; burning over senate-house and forum; burning up liberty, burning up religion! No Earthly hands kindled that fire. From its sheeted flame and wreaths of sulphurous smoke glares out upon thee the eye of that ENEMY who was a murderer from the beginning. It is a fire that BURNS TO THE LOWEST HELL!

Church of Christ, there was an hour when this fire might have been extinguished by thee. Now, thou standest like a mighty man astonished—like a mighty man that cannot save. But the Hope of Israel is not dead. The Saviour thereof in time of trouble is yet alive.

If every church in our land were hung with mourning,—if every Christian should put on sack-cloth,—if "the priest should weep between the porch and the altar," and say, "Spare thy people, O Lord, and give not thy heritage to reproach!"—that were not too great a mourning for such time as this.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

SLAVE PRODUCE AND STOLEN GOODS.

I am at a loss to conceive how a person "who is perfectly sound in the faith,"* can see so much difference between the "fruits of Slavery and those of privacy and theft."

Let us compare them. Suppose a trader should offer for sale two barrels of sugar: one of these, we will suppose to be the product of a sugar plantation in the South—the planter in from 6 to 10 years wears out one set of hands, and resorts to the coast of Africa or Virginia for a fresh supply. It would make little difference in the turpitude of the crime, whether such supply is the result of kidnapping in Africa or America, as we all agree that there can be no rightful property in man. Each laborer, (whatever his descent,) by the higher law of Justice is and will ever remain to be rightful owner of himself. The planter cannot possibly have any just right to him as property, whether he legally purchased him with money, or kidnapped him. It is only by the superior power of the planter and of his supporters, that he is enabled to force the laborers to plant the cane, and to make the sugar; and by so doing he robs them of themselves, and working them to death in from six to ten years he thus obtains the one barrel of sugar which he offers for sale.

The other barrel we will suppose to be made by paid labor in the West Indies, but to have been stolen amongst others from a wholesale warehouse in the city. If the distinction in crime represented by the different barrels of sugar can be so easily discerned, which would a consistent Christian regard as being obtained through the greatest crime? The former was obtained by robbing a man of himself and all he makes, and working him to death without regard to family ties or the demands of religion; the latter, by stealing perhaps from a wealthy merchant and leaving him abundance. The purchase of the one would encourage and support an extensive system of robbery and crime, while the purchaser of the other encourage an occasional nocturnal thief. Yet the former is advocated and practiced by professing Christians!! while the latter is condemned by all!!

It may be claimed that, in the former case, that the capital or land on which the sugar was made, properly belonged to the planter, and that hence he might have a probable right to part of the sugar. But let us enquire how the planter obtained this land. Was it not by the profits of his present or preceding laborers who were robbed of themselves and their earning? If so, when he shall have made reparation to humanity for all the wrong he has practiced, he will probably find that he has no just right to this land, but that it too is only the fruit of that vile system of iniquity which is directly supported by the purchase of its productions.

The above remarks are made without any unkind feeling, but merely with a desire to elicit the truth; if the views are incorrect, let them be corrected. Let truth prevail. H.

On receiving the above article from a respected Correspondent, we communicated it to the writer of the passage criticised therein and in the article on "Stolen Goods" on page 36 of this volume. The friend referred to is one at whose feet the wisest might sit for instruction in the Anti-Slavery faith, and who, from the age of 17, through 60 years of

"Faith, by daily striving And performance shewn."

has steadily kept in view the free produce idea. He promptly replied in the following observations, which may suitably close the discussion, respecting a passage which we understood as a simple laying down of tenable propositions.

[Ed.]

"Little did I imagine when I wrote the passage in question, that it would elicit the notice, or awaken the criticisms it has. But in reviewing it, I see nothing to retract. That in the scale of oppression there are various grades, will probably not be denied. The man who labors to preserve a conscience void of offence toward God, and toward man, will be less concerned to estimate the relative turpitude of crimes, than to steer clear of them all. Still a judicious advocate of justice and truth, will be careful not to confound cases which are easily distinguished. The pirate who plunders all who fall in his way, and murders those whom he plunders, on the presumption that dead men tell no tales, is universally regarded as an enemy of the human race. The thief, who pilfers the property without otherwise injuring the person of the sufferer, will hardly be placed on the same platform with the pirate. And perhaps if we were required to estimate the relative turpitude of crimes, we might find that all thieves ought not to be placed on the same platform.

With regard to Slavery, I hardly need, at this time of day, inform my friends, that I have long regarded it as founded altogether in violence and wrong; and believed it to be the duty of christians who understand its character, to get clear of it with the least possible delay. But if we undertake to advocate the cause of the oppressed by denouncing slaveholding in all its grades, as on a level with piracy and theft, we expose ourselves, in the view of those who behold it only in its milder forms, to just criticism. The seizure of victims on the African coast, their incarceration in the floating charnel houses on the middle passage, the systematic working of slaves to death in five or seven years, are hardly less criminal, perhaps they are actually more criminal, than the usual actions of pirates. And if this species of lingering murder should be deemed more cruel than the sudden massacre by the dagger or by drowning, to which pirates usually resort, the actors ought not to be located on the same platform.

If stealing a man, or compelling him to labor, without compensation, for the emolument of another, is more unjust and oppressive than stealing his property without encroaching on his personal freedom, then the actors ought not to be set on the same platform.

But an objection to the confounding of Slavery in general with those highest grades of crime, is this. It is well known that among the possessors of slaves there are many who have fallen into the possession by inheritance, without any agency of their own; who are really conscientiously desirous to promote the comfort of the servile class, and who would make considerable sacrifices of interest, to render justice to their slaves; and yet at the same time find themselves encompassed with difficulties, from the laws of the land, the habits of their education, and the ignorance of these objects of their solicitude, which appear nearly insuperable. Now, when persons of this description find themselves denounced as equals with pirates, they feel the injustice of the imputation, and reject even those parts of the arguments of their accusers, which are just and unanswerable."

THE METHODIST E. CONFERENCE.

Of New England, which recently closed its session at Ipswich, in this State, passed the following resolutions:

1. That as a Conference, we are as fully and deeply convinced as ever that all voluntary slaveholding, or the holding of slaves in bondage for the sake of gain, under any circumstances, is a flagrant sin against God and humanity.
2. That it is our deliberate and settled opinion, that no more persons guilty of the sin of slaveholding, should be admitted as members into our church.
3. That we are fully persuaded that if a proper discipline were duly administered, or if the spirit even of our present discipline were fully carried out, all voluntary slaveholders would soon be brought to repentance and reformation of life, or for the sin of slaveholding be expelled from the church.
4. That as there is a difference of opinion as to whether our discipline, as it now reads, would exclude such persons from our communion, it is the sense of this conference, that the discipline should be so altered and amended as to include a well-defined and clearly expressed rule, prohibiting their reception into the communion of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

For the Non Slaveholder.

"Are Friends careful to bear a testimony against Slavery?"

This plain and important query is answered annually in all the meetings, for discipline in Ohio Yearly meeting of Friends, and we suppose a similar one is answered in other Yearly meetings.

Let us enquire in what manner we bear this testimony: Whilst many of us go to the ballot-box and cast our votes for Slaveholders or proslavery persons to rule the nation, do we bear a testimony against Slavery? did not many of us vote for Congressmen who supported the fugitive Slave law, and for proslavery presidents and vice-presidents? In so doing, were we bearing a testimony against Slavery?

What is Slavery, and for what are the Slaves held in bondage? Slavery may be considered a cotton and sugar raising business, carried on to supply the people with cotton and sugar; and the Slave-trade is perpetuated to supply the planters with labourers to raise these commodities.

Suppose a vessel has returned from Africa with a cargo of Slaves, and they are purchased by planters in Carolina, who tell the kidnappers they will be glad to have another supply next Spring. Who will be held responsible for the kidnapping? The Slave-stealer, or the Slave-purchaser? Are they not both guilty? And is not the money which the planter will give for the Slaves the motive for kidnapping, and does not that place a very heavy portion of the crime with the purchaser of the Slaves? Again, suppose that the planter, by hard driving, produces cotton or sugar, brings them hither—offers them to us and we purchase them, telling him we would like to have a large supply next Spring; does not the offer of our money induce him to purchase more Slaves, and drive them hard to raise cotton and sugar for us, and are we not, therefore, very deeply implicated in the sin of Slavery, and through that in the African Slave trade? Are we, then, careful to bear a testimony against Slavery? Will we not rather, in the day of awful judgment, be called upon to answer for our participation in the crimes of Slavery and the Slave trade? Will not plundered Africa rise in judgment against us, will not the cries and groans of those thousands who have died in the holds of Slave ships, of those who are plunged alive into the sea, or whipped to death on the plantations, of women robbed of their virtue, and of thousands annually murdered and abused in various ways, rise also in the judgment against us?

But let us, for the sake of such, who, from prejudice and force of habit, do not appreciate these arguments, bring the subject nearer home. Suppose that here, in our midst there were two townships of land given to Slavery, one to raise cotton the other sugar. Suppose that all the women-whipping, baby-stealing, the family-rending, the man-murdering, and all other crimes usually connected with Slavery, were here perpetrated, under our own eyes, and all this for the purpose of supplying our wardrobes with cotton, and our tables with sugar? Suppose that in our own persons, and with our own money, we went and purchased our supplies, and told the planters the quantity we would probably want another season. Would we, in no wise, be connected with the crime? Would we be careful to bear a testimony against Slavery? How long would it take such testimony to induce them to set their Slaves free? Do we not all see that we are the persons for whom the Slaves are toiling? And is it not equally so, whether the labour be performed here or in Carolina and Louisiana? Will our distance from the Slaves exonerate from the crime of participation in Slavery? Evidently it will not. Let us, then, candidly acknowledge our connection with the system, and hastily withdraw therefrom.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, SEVENTH MONTH, 6, 1853.

AN APPEAL FOR THE BONDWOMAN.—We design giving to our subscribers, in the course of the present volume of the Non-Slaveholder, the whole of this chaste and beautiful Poem: and, in doing so, we consider that we make them a valuable offering and furnish them a sufficient inducement for preserving this Journal in a permanent form. The Poem was written some years ago for the Liberty Fair in this city, and a number of copies, presented in manuscript, sold rapidly at $2.00 each. To extend the benefit and to supply the demand, it was published in an elegant volume of 36 pages. It is addressed, in so many sections, to seven distinct classes of the more favored daughters of Eve. The first and longest section, to Mothers, which is given entire at this time, is full of tender pathos.

A political Journal, not chargeable with abolitionism, in a laudatory announcement of the volume, says: "It is speaking within modest limits to say that the volume before us is in every view thoroughly respectable; quite free from the fanaticism of Philanthropy, commending itself on the mere score of literary excellence, whilst it may well be styled a genial heart-gush from a fountain of pure and warm benevolence. We have seen effusions from the same pen before, and take to ourselves no credit for extraordinary sagacity, in having prognosticated that such merit, even though joined to shrinking delicacy, could not always be successful in keeping to the shaded walks of individual privacy. There is many a beautiful flower which seeks to hide its brilliancy beneath foliage of a larger growth, but the fragrance which is its perpetual breathing, floats upon the gale, and is a tell-tale of the loveliness that desires concealment."

H. B. Stowe's "KEY TO UNCLE TOM'S CABIN," a collection of most important "facts and documents," is well worthy of the vast circulation which it is obtaining. The Freeman calls it "a magazine of Anti-Slavery truth;"—a speaker at the Boston "Hale dinner" called it, "the KEY that shall yet unlock the prison houses, and let the captive go free." We would gladly find room for copious extracts;—but surely the book itself will be perused by most of our readers. The force of its application cannot be turned aside by any charge of fiction; and he who would controvert the book will find himself in the unenviable occupation of "biting a file."

PRESBYTERIAN (N. S.) GENERAL ASSEMBLY.—This body, in 1850, pronounced slaveholding, (with certain exceptions) a disciplinable offence. At its recent session a select committee on this subject reported resolutions re-affirming said action, and calling for a committee of one from each of the Synods of Virginia, Kentucky, Missouri and Tennessee, to investigate the number of slaveholding members and of slaves held by them; how far they are held by unavoidable necessity of law, by obligations of guardianship and humanity, &c; the extent of certain abuses, and sundry statistics; winding up with an exhortatory resolution. Several unusual subjects had been previously disposed of. The Tribune says: "The Assembly decided, with little or no dissent, that dancing by christians is wrong and sinful; that a man may not marry his niece; and that church members must not travel on Sunday except to and from Church, or on some errand of necessity. Each of these decisions doubtless, pinched some people's corns, but they hardly squirmed,—at least they never threatened secession. But the moment slavery was touched, a fearful agitation was evinced, seriously threatening the integrity of 'the Union.'" Considerable discussion ensued, and a member offered as a substitute, a preamble and 13 resolutions, of a retaliatory air, some of which, referring to Bloomer costume, hen-pecked husbands, &c., indicate a low sense of the reverence due to the Head of the Church in all attempts to transact the affairs of the Church. Yet some of them are strongly suggestive of considerations worthy the attention of Northern professors. We give a portion of them.

"That, with an express disavowal not to be inquisitorial, &c. a committee of one from each of the Northern Synods of ———, be appointed, who shall be requested to report to the next General Assembly:

1. The number of northern church members who traffic with slaveholders, and are seeking to make money by selling them negro clothing, handcuffs and cowhides.

2. How many northern church members are concerned, directly or indirectly, in building and fitting out ships for the African slave trade, and the slave trade between the states.

3. How many northern church members have sent orders to New Orleans and other southern cities, to have slaves sold to pay debts coming to them from the South. [See Uncle Tom's Cabin.]

4. How many northern church members buy the cotton, sugar, rice, tobacco, oranges, pine-apples, figs, ginger, cocoa, melons, and a thousand other things, raised by slave labor.

5. How many northern church members have intermarried with slaveholders, and have thus become slave owners themselves, or enjoy the wealth made by the blood of the slave—especially if there be any northern ministers of the Gospel in such a predicament.

7. What is the aggregate and individual wealth of church members thus descended, and what action is best to compel them to disgorge this blood-stained wealth, or to make them give dollar for dollar, in equalizing the loss of the South by emancipation."

The subsequent discussions and successive dispositions of the subject, are foreign to our present purpose. An esteemed correspondent, whose letter was received after the above was in type, writes as follows, respecting the resolutions just recited:—

"ECCLESIASTICAL AGITATIONS.—The subject of Slavery is of so intrusive a nature, that it not only insinuates itself into halls of political action, but also into the very Sanctuary, if I may be allowed by this term, without disrespect to it or to them, to express the various religious societies in this community, who stand in any degree affiliated with slaveholding. In some of these societies door-keepers have almost been literally appointed to keep out the agitating subject from disturbing their 'happy Union;' yet is Principle so ethereal that neither walls, nor vigilance can exclude it. There it stands in their midst, though their doors be closed for fear of the Jews, pointing to the hand-writing on their consciences, 'I will overturn, overturn, overturn, and it shall be no more, until he comes, whose right it is, and I will give it Him.' It often happens that the very men who most deprecate agitation are among the veriest disturbers of the quiet, and when not aggressively so, are yet utterers of wholesome truths, under the teachings of some of which Slavery ought to receive, and I hope may yet receive its death blow. These truths usually relate to the practical insincerity of those, unhappily by far the greatest part of the Anti-Slavery religious community, who profess to hold in abhorrence the chattelizing of human beings, and yet are unwilling to relinquish any of its unhallowed conveniences to themselves."

F. Douglass publishes a call for a National Convention of free colored persons, to be held in Rochester, N. Y. on the 6th inst. All societies, religious, literary, &c., of coloured persons, are entitled to be represented each by three delegates. One of the objects is stated to be, the establishment of a permanent NATIONAL COUNCIL. "In a word," says the call, "the whole field of our interests will be opened to enquiry, investigation and determination." Delegates are desired to prepare themselves with statistics respecting the condition of their people in the neighborhoods which they represent.

THE SURE, SURE FRUITS.

A prophet, who may have been regarded by his contemporaries as a fanatic and as an abolitionist, about 700 or 800 years before the advent of Him who left his glory in the Heavens to undo the heavy burden, to let the oppressed go free, to break every yoke, and to bear in his own body the chastisement of all our sins, declared of those who had "sown the wind," that they shall "REAP THE WHIRLWIND." Just as our paper is going to press, a sad rumour reaches us of an attempted insurrection of the Slaves at New Orleans. We may hope that, through the sparing mercy of the long suffering Father of all, this desperate movement may be suppressed. But have we any reason to hope that the white men will show mercy to those whom their oppression maketh mad? Alas! Alas! We blame the negroes who have failed to keep the everlasting patience, and to wait upon Him, who has said, "Vengeance is mine—I will repay." We blame them,—just as we would blame revolutionists in Poland or Hungary or elsewhere, for deeds of bloodshed. And we pity our Southern brethren and sisters, for the difficulties of their position, for their guilt in this matter of Slaveholding, and for the baits, the temptations, the bounty money constantly extended to them by us of the North. We "give the motive" which induces them to "sow the wind," notwithstanding the certainty that, (as Adam Clarke finely expresses himself) "the ventral seed shall be multiplied into a tempest; so they who sow the seed of unrighteousness, shall reap a harvest of judgment."

But some will be ready to charge this lamentable outbreak upon the Abolitionists.—People of the South, fool not yourselves with so delusive an idea. Rather bless the Abolitionists for their human sympathies and their prayers for you and for your bondmen, and know assuredly, that the poor Slave's desperate hand is often checked by the consoling thought that many thousands sympathize with him: and he cherishes the hope that this sympathy may become contagious, and at last infect his oppressors. Were he bereft of all hope, were the Abolitionists to take you at your word and become indifferent,—then utter desperation would light the torch, and nerve the arm, and guide the sword. We are not incendiaries:—yet we would call,—not upon the Slaves but upon you for a signal uprising.

"Up, now for FREEDOM! not in strife
Like that your sterner fathers saw:
The awful waste of human life,—

The glory and the guilt of war;
But break the chain,—the yoke remove,
And smite to earth Oppression's rod,
With those mild arms of Truth and Love,
Made mighty by the living God!"

And ye, the Friends of Freedom and of the Slave, clear your own selves. Wear not the livery of the beast Slavery! Tamper not with his meat offerings and drink offerings! Be separate! Be in very verity, NON-SLAVEHOLDERS.

MARY JANE EDMUNDSON.—We learn from the Oberlin Evangelist that this lovely and interesting person died on the 18th of 5th mo. at Oberlin College, where she was receiving her education at the cost of H. B. Stowe, whose history of the Edmundson family in her Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin, (part 3, chap. 6) we recommend to the attentive perusal of every one. Mary Jane died in christian faith and hope, having, it is reverently trusted, experienced the sufficiency of a Saviour's atoning blood, to wash away all spirit stains,—and in "Yielding unto God her spirit,
And her "dust to dust,"

there was no cause to apprehend that the African tinge in her earth-vesture would bar her admission among the ransomed multitude, gathered from "every kindred, tongue and people," before the "great white throne," and beside the pure river of water of life,

"Where, a white stone in her forehead,
And a new song on her lip,
Her cup in the sea of crystal
Evermore may dip."

A valued friend in the West says—

"We are much pleased with the paper. We think it well conducted; but I regretted one word in that very excellent article in relation to the attempt to kidnap Neal and carry him off in the cars. That article was very well written,—was well worth the price of the paper for one year;—but I think that "small blot" in the Governor's character should have been "large." And I think, at the conclusion of the article, while the feelings of the readers were highly wrought, thou shouldst have told them that this and other cases of kidnapping were done to raise cotton and sugar for them; and that thus the consumers are directly the cause of all these outrages."

These observations are just. If our friend will refer to page 22, he will see that we merely lay down a proposition. "A small blot, however dark, is not so much noticed upon a greater one of the same hue." This proposition was laid down in connection with the remark that the infamous pro-slavery message of Governor Bigler "has left a blot upon his name, which must be washed out before this one will be very conspicuous." Blots, as well as other things, are large or small by comparison. Gulliver was looked up to through a telescope in Lilliputia, but he became microscopic when he landed in Brobdinag. The official under consideration, blots and all, does not appear to us to be a very great character.

Whittier would probably assign "a half-peck measure" as affording ample room for "half a dozen such to dance in." We would commend to William Bigler some verses of Churchill—
"Thy greatest praise had been to live unknown—
Yet let not vanity like thine despair—
Fortune makes Folly her peculiar care."

THE HIGHWAY OF THE UPRIGHT.

Proverbs xvi. 17.

I pant, I pant for the heavenward path,
Which never the vulture's eye hath seen,
Where the forest king in his cruel wrath
Hath never been:
It leadeth a way from the snares of vice,
From the haunts of corroding Avarice;—
From vanity's shows which the soul entice,—
From Malice, and Falsehood, and Lust, and all
That subdueth the Spirit to Sin's dark thrall,
It leads to the city whose streets of gold
Even the militant Saints behold,
In the midst whereof, with healing rife
For the deadly wound of Zion's daughter,
Stands in its beauty the tree of life,
Mirrored within the balsamic water
Proceeding from under the throne of God,
The true and the only baptismal flood,
Whose streams, that in chrystalline clearness roll,
With healing are fraught for the sin sick soul.
Oh, I long in that city of light to dwell,
Where never a transient sunbeam fell,
Nor glimmering ray from moon or star;—
Unspenkably brighter, more glorious far
That holy city's undazzling ray!
For He is its glory who lighted the Sun!
And they who the heavenward race would run
Must enter by Him the Way.

There is a path upon Earth which no bird knoweth,
Where the holy zephyr of Eden bloweth,
And the tree of healing and water of life
Refresh the spirit redeemed from strife.
The Pilgrims who throng that unseen way
Are guided by no deceptive ray:
They have made the Uprising Guide their choice,
And they cannot follow the Stranger's voice.
To be joined to Christ, and in Him to live,
They would share his baptism, drink his cup,
Renouncing the pleasures which sin can give,
To walk in the way by Him cast up.
And joined unto Him, as they walk by faith,
They see, at the end of their pilgrim path,
The realm of inconceivable bliss,
Where the weary have rest from the toils of this.
And they hear at times, in prophetic tone,
The welcome greeting, "Well done—well done!"
And they catch some notes from the rapturous song
Which is learned by none but the ransomed throng.
And thus attuned, while they walk through Time,
To the harmony caught from that heavenly chime,
They make in their hearts, unto Him they love,
Melody, heard with approval above. W. J. A.

WORSER THAN LETHARGY.—By the Ledger of to-day we learn that in Carrollton, La., a few days ago, a negro, aged nearly 90 years, "universally venerated for soberness, honesty, great age, and revolutionary reminiscences," was, for a petty offence, "whipped, stamped and kicked to death," by his master, Chas. Hines. At the Coroner's inquest, "the sight was sickening. His back cut and bruised into a jelly," (says the Carrollton Star,) "and the lower part of his body nearly kicked to pieces." Hines is in jail.

AN APPEAL FOR THE BONDWOMAN,

TO HER OWN SEX.

BY ELIZABETH CLOYD, JR.

PART II.

DAUGHTER! happy cherished one,
Ever since thy life begun,
Hedged about by watchful care
From the peril and the snare
Hath our fallen race beguiled,— Hoary age and little child—
Tenderly and safely led
Where the stillest waters flow,
Ever bountifully fed
Where the greenest pastures grow,
When thy heart with love shall swell,
As the heart of woman will,
In its quiet gladness,
Unto him who came as well
Thy life's cup with joy to fill,
As with grief and sadness,—
Let it bring the captive near!
In her agonizing fear—
In her peril and distress—
In her helpless sinfulness.

For a father's tender care,
For a mother's every prayer,
For a brother's strength of arm
Ever between thee and harm,
For the precious gift to thee

Of a sister's sympathy,—
Daughter, for so blest a lot,
Be the Captive unforgot!

Succored in thy every need,
When thy full heart doth rejoice
In its many blessings, heed,
Oh, then heed Compassion's voice.
Wait not till thy youth be sped,
Till thy bloom of life be past,
Till thy summer hopes are dead,
Scattered by the autumn blast;
Wait not till thy loves depart,
Until thou hast nought to bring
But a disappointed heart,
Late and thankless offering!
But while all thy Heaven is bright,
Grateful to the Holiest, yield
Fruit which is the sower's right
From the vineyard and the field.
Even as the forest trees,
In their early putting forth,
Grateful to the sun and breeze
For each tender leaf-child's birth,
Ever its first fragrance give
To the air by which they live.

From the Bond of Brotherhood.

TWENTY REASONS

For Total Abstinence from Slave Labour Produce.—By ELIHU BURRITT.

1. Because all the products of the labour of the slave are the fruits of an aggravated robbery perpetrated upon him daily, and are therefore stained with all the crime and guilt that can attach to stolen goods.
2. The voluntary consumption of the produce of the slave's labour is a participation in the sin of the system that holds him in bondage.
3. It is one of the first and most important duties enjoined upon the Christian to make his practice square with his profession. Whilst, therefore, he sanctions and supports by his daily practice a system which he condemns as exceedingly sinful by his professions, his own conscience, as well as the world, testifies to his inconsistency, and his advocacy of the right is weakened if not wholly silenced by the discrepancy.
4. The slaveholders themselves declare that total abstinence from slave-labour produce would as surely abolish slavery as the day follows night; and they taunt the abolitionists with insincerity in not adopting a course which would put an end to the evil they so loudly condemn.

5. Abstinence from slave-labour produce, so far from being a substitute for any other anti-slavery efforts, would increase their number and variety, and give them all a point and a power which they now lack. It would create the occasion for more numerous anti-slavery meetings, and give a force and emphasis to resolutions, addresses, and remonstrances against slavery, which the slave-holder could not resist.

6. It is a mode of anti-slavery action in which every man, woman, and child may take a part every day, at every meal, in every article of dress they wear and enjoy. And this silent, daily testimony would tend to keep their anti-slavery sentiments active, out-spoken, and ever working in their spheres of influence.

7. It is a measure that does not trench upon any principle of free trade. It asks the interference of no legislation against the introduction or use of slave-labour produce. It requires no petitions to parliaments, diets, national assemblies, cortes, or congresses. It involves nothing but the free, voluntary legislation of the individual conscience upon articles of household or personal consumption. It is no more opposed to the fullest development of free trade than is the exercise of individual taste or fancy in supplying the table or wardrobe.

8. It is a measure which should commend itself especially to the abolitionists of the United Kingdom; because probably full three-fourths of all the human sinews bought and sold on the earth are worked under the lash to supply the British market; while there are free soil and free labour enough within the British dominions to produce all the cotton, sugar, coffee, and rice the whole world would consume. The whole value of the exports of the domestic produce of the U. States to foreign countries, during the year 1849, amounted to £26,500,000. Of this amount, the value of the exports to Great Britain and its dependencies was £17,700,000. The exports from the Slave States amounted to £16,000,000; of which cotton supplied £13,280,000; tobacco, £1,160,000; and rice, £514,000.—Great Britain and its dependencies took £9,560,000 worth, or nearly three-fourths of this cotton, and probably a larger proportion of the rice and tobacco.

9. A large number of slaves in Tennessee, Kentucky, Virginia, and Missouri, are employed in producing corn, pork, bacon, &c., for the slaves on the cotton, sugar, and rice plantations of the more southern slave States. It is probably, therefore, this side of the truth to say, that full three-fourths of all the slaves in the United States are employed, directly or indirectly, in supplying the British market alone. The money-value of every slave in America is determined by the price in England. The hammer of the Liverpool cotton-broker, and that which knocks off Uncle Tom at the slave-auction in New Orleans, descend by the same law of commercial gravitation. A penny a pound advance on cotton in Liverpool adds £40 to Uncle Tom's market value on the auction-block; and vice versa. At this moment, the cotton trade in Lancashire is very brisk and prosperous. A great many new mills are being erected, and, in consequence, the value of slaves in the United States has risen from £150 to £200.

10. The free States, and those slave States in which cotton, rice, and sugar cannot be grown, not only supply the American market with all the corn, potatoes, pork, bacon, and other provisions which it demands, but also export a vast quantity of these articles to foreign countries. Even if the climate and soil of the cotton-growing States were suited to the production of these articles, there would be no market for them at home or abroad. They must continue to grow cotton, rice, and sugar, whether by slave or free labour, or their plantations must remain untilled. This is the only alternative possible.

11. If the British market were closed against American cotton, rice, sugar, and tobacco for three years, three-fourths of the land occupied with their production would be reduced virtually to a wilderness; three-fourths of all the slaves in the United States would be without employment—a burden upon the planters which would bankrupt them, unless set at liberty.

12. If there were a movement set on foot in Great Britain which would, in the view of the slaveholders, close the British market against their productions at the end of ten years, if they persisted in adhering to their system up to that time, they would doubtless emancipate their slaves immediately, and adopt the system of free labour. For they would not risk the loss of the British market for any consideration which the existence of slavery could supply. The same would be true of the slaveholders of Brazil and Cuba.

13. A movement of this kind must have a strong moral as well as commercial principle for its motive-power. For if it were organised on mere commercial grounds, the slaveholders would be emboldened to run the hazard of a competition with the cotton, sugar, and coffee growers of the British dominions. But if the enlightened conscience of a Christian community could be associated with commerce in this enterprise—if the movement could be backed, ensouled, and propelled by deep moral convictions, the slaveholders would be obliged to give over the struggle as hopeless.

14. A great movement, based upon the commercial motive, is now being organized to supply the British market with cotton, &c., grown in India and other British possessions. The wealthy and influential manufacturers of Lancashire have set their hands to this enterprise with energetic determination. The Government appreciates its importance, and is willing to promote its success. Roads, railways, improvement of river navigation, are to be the order of the day in India, with the view of extending the cultivation and facilitating the transportation of cotton grown by free labour. It is not that the manufacturers of Lancashire are influenced by any moral objection to slave labour, as such, but that they fear it will not be able to supply, without interruption, their mills with the quantity they demand. Besides, they deem it hazardous to depend upon one country for this important article, which would be cut off in case of a war between the two nations. Total abstinence from slave-labour produce, because it is stained with the crime of theft and oppression, would give to this commercial movement a new element, aspect, and power, and make it irresistible to the overthrow of slavery throughout the world.

15. A movement thus embodying both the moral and commercial principle would not only stimulate the production of cotton, sugar, rice, &c., by free labour in the British dominions, but also in the United States, Brazil and Cuba. And it is of the utmost importance that the free-labour system of production should be brought immediately under the eyes of the slaveholder, upon the same soil as his own plantation, that the example may tell upon him with undiminished effect.

16. There never was a more favorable juncture for extending the cultivation of cotton by free labour in the American slave States, than at the present moment. For more than thirty years a considerable amount has been grown by small farmers, scattered among the large plantations. These men till from 50 to 100 acres of land with their own hands, chiefly because they are too poor to own a slave. They produce annually four or five bales, which they sell, of course, at the current price; thus competing with the wealthy planter with all his slaves, capital, and machinery. The Free-Labour-Product Association of Philadelphia has sent forth agents to find out these small farmers, and to purchase their cotton. It is impossible to conjecture how many of them are scattered through the States, but probably there are many thousands. A discussion has already commenced, in some of the southern reviews, in reference to the comparative economy of free and slave labour. The slaves, it is stated, "are running away by battalions," from the more northern slave States. Many planters have recently emancipated their slaves, and are cultivating their lands by free labour. Cassius M. Clay, one of the most influential of their number, has published his success to the world. He says that he finds no difficulty in hiring white labour according to his need, and at reasonable rates. He hires, also, a portion of his former slaves for wages, mutually satisfactory; and whereas his farm used to run him in debt, or at least yield him no profit, he is now making money by it. Every such experiment of free labour in the slave States is exerting a powerful influence in favour of the system. A planter recently went all the way from Georgia to New York to engage men to work on his plantation; "because," as he said, "white labor can be employed more economically than that of hired slaves."

17. A demand for free-labour productions, created and steadily increased by the pressure of Christian convictions as well as commercial motives, would draw them into the British market, in ever-widening streams, from all the countries in which they are grown. And in no country would it probably take a more immediate and decided effect upon slavery than in the United States.

18. During the great struggle against the slave-trade, Clarkson estimated that 300,000 persons in Great Britain abstained from sugar entirely, rather than support the inhuman traffic by its use. The friends of the slave are not now called upon to test their sincerity by such a privation. More than one half of the sugars in the British market are free-grown, and may be procured, with a little care, in every considerable town in the kingdom. An earnest demand for them will ensure a supply. A large wholesale depot has just been established in London, for supplying provincial grocers with free-labour sugars of all kinds, rice, coffee, &c. of as good quality and on as cheap terms as the slave-grown articles in the market. Not an article stained with the guilt of slavery will find an access to this establishment, and it will furnish a satisfactory guarantee to the purity of all it supplies to the grocers in the provinces.*

*This is equally true as applied to the Philadelphia Free Produce Store.—ED.

19. There is already a sufficient supply of free-labour cotton, to meet the demand of those who are thoroughly convinced that the voluntary consumption of the products of the slave, is a participation in the crime of the system that holds him in bondage. This supply will constantly increase with the demand. A house in Manchester, worthy of unwavering confidence, has undertaken to collect the free-labour cotton as it comes in from different countries, and to supply the public with all the various goods into which it can be manufactured. Small depots of these goods are being established in different towns, and in quality and price they compare favourably with articles of the same kind made of slave-grown cotton. A depot has just been opened in London, chiefly for promoting the establishment of similar ones in all the provincial towns, by enabling them to obtain easily an adequate supply. The movement has commenced under favourable auspices, with encouraging prospects in every direction. The commercial interests and the Christian conviction of the community are fast uniting to give this movement irresistible power. God and humanity "expect that every man will do his duty" to the slave, at this important moment, when that duty is so clearly revealed by the manifestations of the Divine mind and will.

20. The present moment is a most auspicious juncture for organising that deep, earnest, wide-spread sympathy which has been excited in behalf of the slave, by the powerful delineations of his condition of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." This book seems to bear the impress of a Divine mission. It has been translated into nearly all the languages of Europe, and it has been read by millions and millions throughout Christendom. The distinguished writer has commended abstinence from slave-labour produce in the first circles of English society, as a measure which would be most effective for the speedy overthrow of the inhuman system which she has depicted with such irresistible truthfulness and power. Persons in all ranks of life are beginning to consider this Anti-Slavery movement with serious attention, and there is every reason to believe that it will soon obtain their convictions and co-operation.

SLAVE PRODUCE.

BY E. M. CHANDLER.

Eat! they are eates for a lady's lip,
Rich as the sweets that the wild bees sip;
Mingled viands that nature hath pour'd,
From the plenteous stores of her flowing board,
Bearing no trace of man's cruelty—save
The red life drops of his human slave.

List thee, lady! and turn aside,
With a loathing heart, from the feasts of pride;
For, mix'd with the pleasant sweets it bears,
Is the hidden curse of scalding tears,
Wrung out from woman's bloodshot eye,
By the depth of her deadly agony.

Look! they are robes from a foreign loom,
Delicate, light, as the rose leaf's bloom;
Stainless and pure in their snowy tint,
As the drift unmarked by a footstep's print.
Surely such garment should fitting be,
For woman's softness and purity.

Yet fling them off from thy shrinking limb,
For sighs have render'd their brightness dim;
And many a mother's shriek and groan,
And many a daughter's burning moan,
And many a sob of wild despair,
From woman's heart, is lingering there.

Strictures on the Memorial of S. Rhoads, E. Lewis and others, with a reply.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

Our attention was recently called to a document in the Non-Slaveholder, which the Editor, in its caption, styles a "Magnanimous Memorial."—[p. 27.]

Permit us to say that on its examination we were much struck with its character, and can but believe that those who signed it, for whom we entertain a high regard as men of refined moral sentiments, and profound judgment, did not sufficiently weigh the matter before them.

We have no hesitation in acknowledging that the citizens of the free States have participated in the profits of Slave labor, if its products are, or have been thrown into market at a lower rate than the products of free labor; but if such has been the case, who is the sufferer? Is it the slave holder, or the bondman? Surely not the former, for he has no right to those products, unless he has a right to the person of the slave, which, of course, our friends will not admit.

The memorialists claim, that by participating in the profits of slave labor, the citizens of the free states have "become partners in the great business of slavery." Now, taking this to be true, what is our duty, and the duty of slaveholders; bearing in mind at the same time the axiom, that no man has a right to the labor of his fellow man? Surely not, that because we have been engaged in an unholy alliance with the oppressor in robbing our brother, the slave, we should pay over to him the estimated value of his slaves labor during life, but rather cut loose from such alliance—cease to be "partners in this great business." What! should the slaveholder, who has been living so long on that of which he robbed his fellow man, be rewarded for ceasing this robbery, and thus receive the practical commiseration of the non-slaveholders for so doing, while the poor slave, the victim of their joint oppression, who has been plundered his life long, till perhaps he is old, is not thought of! Are we to have no pity for him, whom we have injured most grievously by our criminal alliance with his master, but call on Congress to grant a bonus to his oppressor, who has long profitted by our commercial intercourse with him, as a reward for turning his victims loose in a cold and heartless community, destitute of any thing to subsist upon?

We apprehend, upon due reflection, it must be clear to all, entertaining the known views of the petitioners, that if there should be any money distributed amongst any class connected with the system of slavery, that class is the slaves. These, we have injured pecuniarily, by our connection with, and connivance at slave holding, and not the master.

We would suggest, that the memorial should have called on Congress for the passage of a law providing that when any State should liberate its slaves, Commissioners should be appointed by the functionaries referred to, whose duty it should be, to assess the value of each male slave's time, that he had served since he was 21 years old, and that of each female since she was 18; and for that amount to be drawn out of the national treasury, and distributed among the enfranchised as an out-lit in life, and as something of a compensation for the wrongs they have endured. This, we would style 'magnanimous,' or an act of simple justice, at least.

WALTER EDGERTON,
Geo. 28, 1853. WILLIAM BEARD.

[We have cheerfully given place to the above, altho' our extremely small limits will not afford much space for controversial essays without excluding matter which we are anxious to place before our readers. Considering the objections of our esteemed friends to be more benevolent than practical, we thought it proper to let the Memorialists have the opportunity to answer for themselves. We therefore handed the communication to one of them who promptly returned it with the following explanation of the position of himself and his colleagues.—Ed.]

It appears to me that the writer of the article to which my attention has been called, has taken unnecessary pains in his efforts to prove what will not be denied, that the slaves are the greatest sufferers by the system of slavery which has been established in this country, and which is still maintained in half the states of the Union. That the intentions of this writer were pure and philanthropic is not questioned; but when he raises an objection to the plan suggested for the extinction of slavery, he will probably permit me to say that he does not appear to have "sufficiently weighed the matter before him."

The expedient which he undertakes to criticise is based upon the admission of certain facts which will hardly be denied:

1. The states in which slavery is tolerated or maintained by law, possess the exclusive authority to abolish the system. Of course any effectual mode of relieving those states from the evils of slavery, or discharging the slaves from the custody of their oppressors, must depend upon the voluntary acts of the people or the legislatures of those states.

2. The holders of slaves have a pecuniary interest in the possession; and when we plead for the emancipation of their slaves, however just our plea, we are practically asking the masters to make what they at least consider to be a large pecuniary sacrifice; and what would be, under existing circumstances, to many of them an actual sacrifice of nearly all they possess.

3. The free states, by their commercial relations with the slaveholding states; by the traffic in, and consumption of, the products of slave labor, and by their political connection with the South, have identified themselves, to a great extent, with the system of slavery.

4. From what has yet been done in the U. States towards the extinction of slavery, we may reasonably suppose that if any state, which tolerates slavery, should embrace the plan suggested, and thus become entitled to the proposed compensation, it will be one or more of those bordering on the free states, from which a number of slaves are now annually sold to the states further south.

5. Whatever may justly be due to the slave for the services which they have rendered to their masters, it is obvious that they must be set free by some means before either the general government, or the people of the free states, can possibly contribute anything by way of compensation for those services.

To what, then, does the plan, which this writer thus criticises, amount? Simply to this: That the people of the non-slaveholding states should hold out to such of their slave-burthened brethren as may be disposed to engage in the work of emancipation, an inducement so to do, by an offer to share in the pecuniary sacrifice. It suggests an expedient by which a state may place its slaves in the full possession of their freedom without either making such pecuniary sacrifices as a sudden emancipation without remuneration would involve, and which we can hardly expect will be voluntarily made, or passing through the tedious process of gradualism, by which Pennsylvania, the leader in the work, was transformed from a slave into a free state.*

If Congress could be prevailed upon to adopt the proposal in question, and one or two states should embrace the opportunity of getting clear of slavery, there can be no reasonable doubt that the benefit arising from the change would be so obvious, that the example would be followed, as a measure of policy, and that the compensation, at a very reduced valuation, would be found amply sufficient.

If slavery could be abolished in one or more of the present slave states, the way would open then for adopting an expedient, if any practicable one can be found, for compensating those thus set free, for the service which they have heretofore performed. When Friends in Pennsylvania engaged in the work of emancipating their slaves, the first object was to restore them to freedom; and then followed the plan of remuneration for services performed beyond the legal age.

E. L.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

I have very little doubt that at the great audit, the influences, if excusatory, which underlie any act of wrong, will have their fullest weight in mitigating the judgment which shall be passed upon the actor, by Him who seeth the heart and trieth the reins, and who knoweth what is in man, and how frail a being he is. I have no doubt that many a pirate—many a slaveholder—many an offender, will escape—wonderfully to himself—at that merciful tribunal, whilst it may possibly be, that the “utmost farthing” shall be required of him who made them a pirate—a slaveholder—an offender. But I do not perceive that, in establishing a code of morality, we are allowed to apologize in advance for any crime on the presumed ignorance of its perpetrator, any more than we are allowed to undervalue any mathematical truth, because of its non-reception by the unintelligent. Rather should we shew the crime and the more fully illustrate it. I have the charity to think there are many human pirates encompassed by many difficulties, who would yet be conscientiously restrained from the commission of murder;—but would that make them the less thieves?—It is in this relation that pirates are put in comparison with slaveholders. Do either class take to their own use with a better right the property of the victims of their aggression?—The answer must decisively settle a subject left in some suspense

* The law, for the gradual abolition of slavery, the first enacted by any State, was dated March 1, 1780, and yet the census of 1850 was the first which represented Pennsylvania entirely clear of slaves.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, EIGHTH MONTH, 3, 1853.

RENDITION CASES.—We sometimes feel as though it were idle to write respecting slavery. We feel, we reflect, we read, we accumulate facts and illustrations; and then it seems to us that no one can possibly be ignorant of the existence of slavery—of its great sinfulness,—of the claim upon our human sympathies,—of the absolute duty to avoid participation in the guilt, and to use any means which appear to be within our reach to abate the evil—the sin—the curse. At this moment we are surrounded with piles of pamphlets and periodicals, with hundreds of paragraphs which would be appropriate to our little journal, and we are sickened when we reflect that the hearts of those whom we would induce to listen to the bondman's wail, are impenetrably cased and unapproachable.

“Every day's report

Of wrong and outrage, with which earth is filled,” seems only to familiarize with cruelty, and to harden the hearts which ought to sympathize.

“Vainly to the child of Fashion,
Giving to ideal woe
Graceful luxury of compassion,
Shall the stricken mourner go;

Hateful seems the earnest sorrow, beautiful the hollow show!”

The continual occurrence of rendition cases, instead of inducing abhorrence of the wicked and accursed fugitive slave law, is by tens of thousands regarded as calmly as is the regular course of equity and civil law. Strange to us it seems, but not less true, that well bred men of decent exterior, are to be found, men who are admitted into the selectest circles of refinement, men whom Beauty smiles upon, whom Respectability grasps by the hand, whom Theology entrusts with Church affairs, and who unblushingly thank God that they are not as other men are, yet who justify and approve this law which has re-baptized this nation in damning guilt, and which is augmenting the Judgment-cloud now glooming above us, and only held in suspense by long-suffering Mercy; but which must at length break in terrible retribution, unless we in time remember the mercy we ourselves shall need. The voluminous details of the case of George Smith alias Bill Fisher are before the public. As usual, in these cases, the authorities leaned away from mercy. The firm of ALBERTI & INGRAHAM have done another stroke of business. Ashmead has, we presume, received another fee—and Marshall Wynkoop could have had little heart to say “get thee behind me Satan,” unless he had been able to add,—“for thou art an offence unto me.” We could wish that all those who are ready and willing to execute this cruel and unconstitutional law, might be colonized in some island more secluded than any part of Australia, where they could not contaminate others of the human family. We clip a good paragraph respecting the Marshall from the Daily Register. To our readers we would earnestly say: Let all these outrages, which fairly illustrate the evil we long to abolish, deepen our resolve that we will withdraw our support from slavery, our custom from the Slave Market. Let us tell to our generation and teach to our children,

His brother's sin his own.”

“MARSHAL WYNKOOP.—The Bulletin is particularly severe in its comments on the conduct of this officer in the recent case. The Sun also. We can only add our opinion that he acted more like the partisan than officer. He seems to have espoused the cause of Howard, the claimant, with unbecoming zeal. Why should he have despatched a cab to prevent Fisher from being deposited in the county prison, and, consequently, to prevent the service of the writ of habeas corpus on Mr. Freed? Why, too, should he have displayed so much ingenuity and activity in baffling the law of the State?”

The claimant in this case revived a claim of six years date. And against whom? Against a humble and friendless man, a husband, and a father. Howard's mission among us was to widow an innocent wife, to orphan four helpless children, and bear away into hopeless slavery a man who had long enjoyed the blessings of freedom. And all this, to add only a few hundred dollars to his large fortune. It was an infamous mission. What matters it to a man of honor that it was legal? Your sympathy with it was ill becoming you, Marshal Wynkoop! Your slowness to spirit away the trembling wretch who was in your custody,—under a law which no American names in a foreign land, and which he cannot think of here without the hot flush of shame on his brow,—will be the regret of your old age. Hide, if you can, the handcuffs under your military tunic; and do not forget the four children and lonely wife who are now weeping over the desolate hearth-stone. In the sight of God, their grief is a testimony against you.”

It is evidently becoming a prominent object with many philanthropists to supply the English market with free grown cotton, independent of the United States. Should the effort be successful, and the monetary interests of America suffer in consequence, we shall have ourselves only to blame. England would still have been content to purchase of us her chief supply of cotton, had not considerations of humanity induced the investment of capital in efforts to procure it from other sources. We have never desired the alienation from our own country of any honest trade. Nor is it essential to the procuring of free cotton if American enterprise be rightly turned to this object. A highly valued correspondent suggests the importance of trying the experiment in South Carolina or Georgia. “Would it not,” says he, “be a capital thing if half a dozen active, energetic men, would go into one of these States, and raise Cotton by free labor, right under the eyes of the Slave-holders, setting them an example, and demonstrating the capacity of free labor to compete with the slave in this way? Could not a small plantation be bought and cut up into a dozen farms of 150 acres each, to be tilled by a dozen earnest men, applying to the cultivation of Cotton, all the genius, skill and science of free sinews?” A moderate supply of Sea Island Cotton, free grown, is a desideratum. This might be obtained in the manner suggested, and persons so engaged might, probably, buy in from small non-slaveholding producers around them, sufficient to enable us to introduce the finer fabrics which cannot be made from ordinary cotton.

MAINE LAW,—SINS OF OMISSION,—MATERIAL AID.—The present time calls for unremitting watchfulness, and well directed persevering action, on the part of all advocates of a prohibitory Liquor Law. In every State, in every locality, Maine Law men should organize, and should determine to act with efficiency. There is, in many vicinities, a sort of spasmodic zeal, “Moving like a sick man in his sleep,

Three paces, and then faltering,— which only serves to awaken the alertness of the Rum Power, and which spends itself in an occasional testimony. It is melancholy to observe the resoluteness of the individuals and the masses who advocate the wrong, and the apathy of a large proportion of those who enlist as laborers for the true and right. We want the Maine Law! We want it NOW! Our desires, our prayers, and our endeavors should be always with a humble reference to the sovereignty of God, whose own good time may not be our time. But if, in any Commonwealth, the enactment and enforcement of prohibitory law should be delayed one year by the tame remissness of its friends and advocates, what fearful consequences may they charge upon themselves. Through their sins of omission inebriates will have failed to reform, and a long train of dismal results will have befallen their afflicted families. Through their unfaithfulness, the appetite of moderate drinkers will have become confirmed, and the number of drunkards augmented. Young men will have fallen into the snares which Prohibitory law would have removed, and will have entered, with a rapid pace, upon the broad way leading to the chambers of death.

Friends of Prohibition,—if, through your fault, the reign of Rum be prolonged one year, you can never recalc past opportunities. The evils resulting from your non-action will be felt through eternity. Awake, then,—arise—organize, throughout the length and breadth of the land. And it will add greatly to your energy and efficiency, if liberal collections of money be made, commensurate with the importance of the object: so that there shall be no lagging in the work from recollection of an empty treasury, and from fear of being unable to defray the necessary expenses of the campaign. Let all men, and all women, calculate the value of Maine Law, and give liberally to the Temperance treasury, as the Lord hath prospered them.

THE RUMORED INSURRECTION in New Orleans, alluded to in our last, proved to be a false alarm. An intoxicated negro uttered, as men under such hallucination will do, swaggering words. And "on this hint" the community went into horrors, and stood on its defenses. The mail was too slow of speech to be entrusted with the news, nothing short of the speed of lightning would suffice, the Eclectic Telegraph was charged with messages in every direction, and by the time that Cuffee was "himself again," he had given to millions of people a topic for excited conversation.

But is there no lesson to be derived from this false alarm? Would to Heaven that the lesson might be read by all concerned, whilst as yet the well-grounded fears of those who dwell on the slumbering volcano are not realized. The people of the South would have no need to fear an uprising of the African race, if they would "break off their sins by righteousness,"—if they would "do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with their God." We wonder not that those who live in slave districts are readily alarmed. It is with no feeling of unkindness that we apply the adage, "the wicked flee when no man pursueth,"—and it is with sober sadness that we reflect, that the proslavery feeling and action at the North perpetuate Slavery, and must bear a full share of responsibility whenever that contest shall really come which Thomas Jefferson predicted, and in which, as he declared, "the Almighty has no attribute which can take side with us."

We have several anonymous metrical favors which arrived after the quantum of verse designed for this number was in type. In these essays the sentiments are valuable, and are in part clothed in harmonious numbers. Yet there are lines and stanzas which are sufficiently out of tune to give pain to the practised ear, and thus we cannot find use for them as articles of luxury. Dr. Johnson says; "as there is no necessity for our having poetry at all, it being merely a luxury, an instrument of pleasure, it can have no value unless when exquisite of its kind." Were we to place our standard so high as that of the erudite lexicographer, we should withhold our own pen forever from versification. Yet we certainly would not recommend the use of rhyme for unimaginative essays upon unpoetical themes, when the same talent, with less effort, if employed in prose writing, would act more strongly upon both the judgment and the heart of the reader. For instance:

"Rather than Slaves should toil for me
I'd go without my cigar,
And have my coffee and my tea
And pies made without sugar."

The sentiment is laudable, but, did we need conversion on this point, we should have been more impressed by the remark in humble prose, that the essayist would rather forego the dainties which pamper appetite, than have his fellow beings compelled to furnish them by unrequited toil amidst agony and oppression. To this correspondent we volunteer our advice to "taste not the pierrian spring." The same counsel might have been extended to a Bard (?) of a generation ago, who scintillated the following brilliancy:

"From house to house we took our departure,
And went into the garden to view sweet Nature."

Another effusion (which might perhaps have been marked for insertion in our next, is under consideration. But our declining to publish is no evidence that we do not appreciate. We have always more material than we can use, and hence our labor is greater than if our sheet were double its present dimensions. The favors, in prose, of sundry esteemed contributors, are of necessity postponed. Several Essays are on hand of about equal value, and somewhat similar in character, and in quantum more than sufficient to fill our sheet. One makes inquiries to which we would cheerfully respond by letter, were we favored with the writer's address.

We often long to clip from our valuable exchanges, and our fingers tingle with cucothos scribendi in reference to sundry new publications, which ought to be noticed.

ERRATUM.—We have a Printer who approaches to infidelity as nearly as his brethren, yet the following errors crept into our last number. Page 69, third line of article on "Slave Produce,"—for priceless read Pious. In the poem on page 64, lines 18 and 19 should read thus,

"Whose steele us in crystalline clearness roll,
With hissing freight for the sin-sick soul."

AN APPEAL FOR THE BONDWOMAN,

TO HER OWN SEX.

BY ELIZABETH LLOYD, JR.

PART III.

THOU OF THE GIFTED MIND!

Born to a sceptre and a realm unknown,
With thy keen vision bent upon mankind,
Where are thy glances thrown?

Where have thy lines been cast,
Fisher of treasures in Time's rolling sea,
What of the watch? what hath the hoary Past
In trust revealed to thee?

Where hast thou sown the seed,
Gathered beside the lamp with patient toil,
From Learning's fields, thine record, and old creed
Where hast thou laid thy spoil?

Who hath the wiser grown,
That thou art learned in herb, and rock, and tree,
That Nature's secrets hath herself made known,
Her voice instructed thee?

Why dost thou dwell apart?—
Ah, it may be, that thou hast borne away
Into thy solitude a wounded heart,
Too sore to "watch and pray."

It is the lot of all
Who feel, to suffer—and no cup is free,
However seeming sweet, from drops of gall;
Our doom we cannot flee!

Thou of the gifted mind!
For all thy wealth thou hast a debt to pay;
To aid the poor, to guide the weak and blind,
That travel on thy way.

And who a friend so needs,
As she that draws her very breath in fear?

Outraged and scourged—who questions as she bleeds,
'Can the Great God be near?

'Can the All-just behold?
Can the All-merciful look down and see
My tortured form—my soul to darkness sold,
Nor stoop to succor me?

'Am I of that blest race,
He shed His blood on Calvary to save?
No! from my wretchedness He hides His face—
No Father hath the slave!

Oh! let it break thy dream—
Shut it not out, that sad despairing cry—
It may upon thy heart let in a gleam
Of light to labor by.

With thine eye fix'd on Heaven,
And thy light footstep free upon the earth,
Put on thy strength—for generous action given,
And to her rescue, forth!

ALWAYS REJOICING.

[The following extract from a letter from the late A. W. H., shows instructively how an aged negro saint could rejoice continually in the Lord, when all ordinary sources of enjoyment were excluded.—Ed.]

A clergyman in England was visiting a mine, and, when far beneath the surface, beyond the reach of solar light, his attention was arrested by the sound of music, floating through those gloomy caverns in clear silvery cadences, and deep rich heart notes of melody.

He followed the sound through chill horrid channels, black with perpetual darkness, where the flickering torch only threw a passing glare upon unfathomed dangers. At length the music swelled upon his delighted ear, in clearer, fuller tones, and on turning an angle he found the sole performer, an aged negro, totally blind, and bending beneath a load of physical infirmities. The clergyman asked him to repeat those words of such wondrous melody, and he found them to be simply these: "In the morning I shall be in Heaven." This was all he knew of poetry, and doubtless was his own. The melody was that of the soul: an afflicted and tried soul, but one that had learned to lean upon the Savior as the alone Refuge and Comforter.

There was this poor creature in the midst of utter penury, continually stationed at one spot, employed for years in the monotonous labor of opening and shutting a door, deprived of social and domestic enjoyments, shut out from light and sound, and even fresh air; yet so filled with the love of God as to be ever rejoicing in his goodness, and looking forward, not with fretful yearning, but with cheerful resignation and delighted hope, to the dawning of that eternal day that should beam, in cloudless beauty, upon the sanctified and redeemed.

No eye shall then be sightless, nor shall the tears of sorrow dim the vision: but they shall behold the King in His beauty, and their voices shall join one rapturous hosanna to his praise.

Hereafter, when the clouds of sorrow shall so darken about me as to obscure the sweet light of hope, when the storms of contention shall have dimmed all my horizon, and the dust clouds of petty cares shall be almost overpowering, I will remember the poor miner, and tremblingly enquire: Have I a well grounded hope that when all these mutations are passed, I shall know an everlasting morning, which I shall spend in Heaven?

PRACTICE versus PROFESSION.

Profession.—The more I reflect upon Slavery and its manifold enormities, the more irreconcilable it appears to me with the commonest notions of honesty, as entertained by mankind the world over.

Practice.—Yes I agree with thy remark, having long ago been forced to adopt the sentiment. Hence, feeling strongly impressed with a sense of its injustice, it became my duty to assist by moral means in its overthrow.

Prof.—It is a system which should everywhere be spoken against.

Prac.—And not only spoken against, but our influence and example should be steadily opposed to it. In order to do this consistently, we must withdraw our support of it, and cease to countenance it in any shape.

Prof.—Certainly, we must not be slaveholders. Indeed we are in no danger of committing this wrong whilst we reside in those states where it is prohibited by law. I would have all who are not slave holders protest against it.

Prac.—But I would first have all thoroughly examine whether or not they are slaveholders!

Prof.—What dost thou mean by slaveholder? My understanding of the word, is, I believe, according to its common acceptation: one who owns or claims to own a human being as his property; holding him as bound to serve him, and him only, except as it is his will to transfer his claim to others. This pretension, I believe to be unjust, and I protest against it.

Prac.—I go further. I esteem every man a slaveholder, who assists in causing a person to be held as a slave. He who owns a plantation in Louisiana or Alabama, and consents to its cultivation by slaves, though he may reside in Philadelphia, and never see the slaves or the land, is, to all intents and purposes, a SLAVEHOLDER, although he may not receive a cent of the profits. So, if he does not own the land, but employs the slaveholder who does own it, to raise for him sugar or cotton by slave-labor, he is still in effect a slaveholder: the slaves are held in his service. Though he does not claim to own them, to drive them, to clothe or to feed them, they are held, driven, &c., by the aid of his means—he is the prompting cause of their being held and the immediate holder is his agent.

Prof.—That is tracing responsibility further than I had apprehended it to go.

Prac.—Allow me to proceed. Still further, I maintain that he who voluntarily buys or consumes the sugar or cotton, offered in the market, which he has sufficient reasons for believing to have been raised by the labor of slaves, is a participant after the fact, in the crime of holding the slaves, by whose labor the said product was prepared, and aids, by his countenance and support, in prompting to the continuance of slaveholding, and is therefore, because of his connection with the system, virtually a slaveholder. GREGORY.

THE SNARE OF GRADUALISM.

There is, in the proposition for a gradual abolition of Slavery, that it may prove a blessing to master and slave, something plausible and inviting, and it readily obtains assent, not because of its justice, but rather because it accords with inclination, and affords a quiet resting place from all action upon the subject. This view has quieted the consciences of many, who, otherwise, actuated by the plain principles of justice and Christianity, would have accomplished much, in giving their influence towards the liberation of the suffering bondman. It has so paralyzed religious sects, that they have not failed to proclaim the slave's wrongs, the master's iniquity and loss,—and to bear an uncompromising testimony against the abhorrent evil.

This delusive idea of gradual emancipation, has destroyed the agency for good of not a few, of all classes. At the important crisis moment, when the idea of giving perpetuity to human slavery would not have been tolerated, an assumed expediency, and the policy of worldly wisdom, dictated that Slavery in this country, should be left undisturbed for the present, and that it was so repugnant to a republican government, that it would, of necessity, become gradually extinguished, as the proper circumstances favored. This idea was evidently both entertained and acted upon by the slave's friends, who assisted in framing the U. S. Constitution, and consented to sign the anomalous instrument. Here we see wise men under the influence of the gradualism idea, giving security, and countenance, to the otherwise excellent Constitution, to a system of barbarity and injustice, and of aggression upon human liberty, that has doomed its millions to degradation and suffering. So abhorrent was Slavery then, in its infancy, that the framers of the Constitution, were ashamed to legislate for its protection, so they effected their object by construction, in a round of words—which in a good cause they would have reached, by a frank, manly expression, the word slave being studiously avoided. Blinded by the attractive plan of gradually ceasing from gross injustice, they were too insensible of the inevitably calamitous results of denying to the African race the inestimable blessing of liberty, which they proudly declared to be the birth-right of all men.

The gradualism idea is fraught with much injury to the slave's cause. Those who adopt it, acknowledge the present rightfulness of Slavery, in the logical inference that where it is wrong to emancipate, it must be right to enslave. They are thus unprepared to exert their influence for its extinction, resting in the delusive hope that at some future period circumstances will better favor the measure. But alas! giving perpetuity to the system only increases the obstructions to its removal. The injunction "cease to do evil," is immediate in its bearing, it is never too soon to fulfil the command to "deal justly and love mercy," nor can the mandate be violated with impunity.

Now if emancipation at the adoption of the Constitution was unwarranted—if the master's claim to his slave was just and right under circumstances then existing, there could have been no inquiry in legalizing it. If at later periods, and even at the present, the slave's right to himself has become invalid, and spurious from circumstances beyond his control, circumstances, that have out-balanced his claim to liberty, so that morality and Christianity forbid the removal of his bondage yoke—then is the Statesman right in throwing guarantees around the system of Slavery—the Christian professor in disregarding the cries of the oppressed—the Editor in giving his influence in behalf of the system, and the dealers in, and consumers of slave labor products, are entirely consistent in patronizing slavery by the purchase of such products of the master. But these assumptions we unhesitatingly deny, and ought therefore not to practice upon them.

Americans admit the right to liberty, to be inalienable. Then all the abuse, and deprivation heaped upon the African, has had no tendency to diminish the validity of his right. This renders the master's claim, at all times and forever spurious. These are self-evident truths, too plain for denial, and had they been adopted (instead of the gradualism idea), at the beginning of our Country's Independence, by the leading part of the community, then, instead of an increase of Slavery, the word slave, would long since have ceased to stain the statute books, to disturb the peace of civil and religious society, and to disgrace and curse the country. And the same happy results, would yet be produced in a short period, did people generally investigate the subject upon its own merits; they would abandon, as erroneous and unjust, all gradualism, which has long fostered the system of Slavery, and still continues to give it support to an alarming extent. Like so many tributary streams to the great Ocean of pro-slavery sentiment, almost all classes of men give their influence to sustain the accursed system. The statesman, the politician, the editor, the Christian professor, the artisan, the merchant, the agriculturist, and consumer, it is these contributors that keep the system alive with all its attendant evils. Shall it cease, or shall it continue? this query let each one answer for himself. Let man, woman and child answer, no, nor at my arm! This resolution made practical, would secure a speedy triumph over a barbarous system of cruelty and oppression, that would be far more honorable and glorious, than any heretofore achieved by this country. #### EGYPT NOT ALL DARKNESS.

The southern portion of the State of Illinois is settled generally by people from the South, and, whether from the ignorance of the settlers or from some other cause, it is known as Egypt. The name is patent to this portion of the State, and it is supposed by many that it was to conciliate the prejudices of the Egyptians that the Black laws of the last Illinois Legislature was passed. During the recent session of the Universalist State Convention, at St. Charles, Ill., two resolutions were introduced by the business Committee—one strongly favoring the adoption of the Maine Law, and calling upon all Christians to support it; the other equally pointed in opposition to the "Black Law." The Maine Law resolution passed without objection; but when they came to that against the "Black Law," a report of the proceedings says:

"A worthy divine—a Mr. Mc somebody, of McHenry county—seeing that a large number of the Convention were from the Southern part of the State, rose in his seat, and said he was sorry the resolution was presented; he was opposed to mixing up politics with religion; there were members from the Southern part of the State, who could not support it; it was extremely wrong to throw in a firebrand to disturb the peace and harmony of the Convention. He thought that the Law was a judicious one, right in itself, and hoped that the resolution might not be pressed upon the Convention."

This was too much for the Convention to stand, and,

"Upon taking his seat, a long, straight, six-foot-three Kentuckian, rose deliberately, and after letting his eye wander over the assembly, finally fixed it upon the gentleman from McHenry, and said, 'I am extremely glad that I have attended this Convention. Owing to the distance from my home to this place, it was some time before I determined to come. But once here, and after the remarks of the brother who has preceded me, I feel amply repaid for travelling three hundred miles. I have travelled, almost continually during the last six months, mostly in the southern part of this State, have mixed freely with all classes of people, and I have come to this Convention to hear a man from one of the most northern counties of the State stand up and defend a law so infamous that it cannot find a single apologist in all Egypt! I would not have failed to attend this Convention for five hundred dollars, since I should have missed the spectacle of a man—a minister of the religion of Christ, who brought peace and good-will among men—defending such a monstrous piece of iniquity as the Black Law of the Illinois Legislature of 1853. The old Kentuckian then turned to the Convention, and spoke upon the resolution for the space of half an hour, in a very impressive and eloquent manner; and when the question was put upon the passage of the resolution, not a dissenting voice was heard. The gentlemen from McHenry was 'as a sheep before his shearers, dumb—so he opened not his mouth.'

So may all doughfaces be rebuked, when they palter to prejudice, and display their own servility.—Nat. Era.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, NINTH MONTH, 7, 1853.

EGYPT NOT ALL DARKNESS.—We have sometimes thought that the personage who is declared to be "not so black as he's painted," can have no very high respect for his volunteer tools and over obsequious minions, particularly when they "steal the livery of Heaven" to serve him in. The "worthy divine" who figures in the article with the above caption, is a fair sample of a large class of northern men, who continually forfeit their own self-respect, by advocating the wrong to please the south. They don the collar and the harness, silyly inflect upon themselves "the soul's emasculation," and "Thus trampled, thus condemned in Pharaoh's robes, They tell thro' all, still trembling to be wrong; For fear some noble don't like heavenly robes, Should rise up in high treason to their brain, They sing, as the Athenian spoke, with pebbles in mouth, lest Truth should stagger through their strain."

And what thanks have they? what is their reward? Certainly not that peace which passeth understanding, which is independent of outward prosperity, and which will sweeten the most adverse circumstance. Not the consciousness of their Heavenly Father's approval. Not the approbation of any honorable intellect. Not the respect of even any rogue.

"Traitors cannot discern, till, with Arnold, they learn That their payment is score from the party who buys them. They are bought with a price, they accept it in vice, And they find it a price that their buyers despise them."

Men of the North—you are happily exempt from peculiar trials to which our Southern brethren are subjected. As you stand then upon the soil of freedom, plant your feet firmly there in God's strength, and extend to your brother the unblenching glance of honest love, the voice of truth, the helping hand of firm consistency. Compromise is no kindness;—if his own faith fail, he needs the strength of your assurance in the right, and if you will be honest, honorable, consistent, uncompromising, and maintain the Christian spirit, American slavery will cease. We know of nothing more ignoble, more adverse to the dignity and true well-being of man than Northern proslavery. Nor do we know of a more inoffensive or more emphatic rebuke thereto, than a steady non-use of the fruit of oppression.

NON-PARTICIPANT'S PLEDGE.—In the "Bond of Brotherhood" is submitted the following PLEDGE.

"Believing that the voluntary consumption of the products of the Slave, is a participation in the crime of the system which holds him in bondage, I do hereby pledge myself to abstain, as far as possible, from the use of any article which has been produced by his unrequited toil."

E. Burritt argues, that in moral obligation this would present as strong a claim as the Temperance Pledge, and, in moral responsibility, involve less hazard. In this case he says,

"We do not declare war against a habit which has set all the appetites of our system on fire, as the drunkard does, when he signs the tea-total pledge." "It is utterly impossible ever to acquire a thirst or appetite for Carolina rice or cotton, to be compared with the thirst for Gin and Brandy."

A PROFESSING RUMSELLER.—A few days ago, on board one of our river Steamers, a fellow passenger introduced to us his companion, as "a Presbyterian Rumseller." "A strange compound!" was our response—"the two professions don't agree—Rumselling is essentially inconsistent with Presbyterianism, or any other phase of Christianity." Being pressed for time and compelled to make our words few, we wished to render them stecory also. The following conversation ensued, an audience quickly gathering round.

Non-Slaveholder.—I hold thy business in abhorrence as a great sin against God and man. However it may have been winked at in times of ignorance, yet those times have passed, and it is, as I conceive, out of the question for a Christian to sell intoxicating liquors indiscriminately as a beverage.

Rumseller.—We have the sanction of Law. We are licensed.

N. Slaveholder.—By joining the Presbyterian Church thou hast consented to a higher law; and no human enactment can render this business innocent. I abhor it with all my heart. I have no unkindness towards Rum-sellers—I desire the conversion and the salvation of them all;—but their business I hate with perfect hatred. I would rather license a volcano in the midst of our most populous streets, than a Rum Shop; and should think it the lesser evil.

Rumseller.—You use very strong language. N. Slaveholder.—It is not the hasty language of excitement, but the result of calm reflection. I would rather license, in the midst of a crowded city, any number of volcanoes, than so many Rum Shops.

Rumseller.—The people want public houses and they must have them.

N. Slaveholder.—The Public ought to change their habits about the use of Public Houses. A temperance man should pay for the accommodation he receives at a Hotel. The owner should be paid for the use of his fire, of his carpet, and for all the accommodations he provides. It is a shame for the Temperance men to enjoy all these at the expense of the poor drunkard, who spends his earnings at the bar, while his family are suffering from want.

Rumseller.—That's very true, sir. I agree with you there. I always thought it mean for the temperance men to come to our houses and then abuse us.

N. Slaveholder.—But the Rum-seller has no business to complain. The temperance man ought to pay his own way for the testimony's sake, but it takes the community some time to get out of established usages. But, as I said, the Rum-seller has no right to complain. He has purchased permission to curse the community to an indefinite extent, in purse, in body, and in soul; to be the very worst of all bad citizens; to ensnare and to ruin all whom he can, for time and for eternity. For this privilege he pays a two-fold price:—a paltry license fee,—and an agreement to give certain accommodations to the public. He is not aggrieved: (on the contrary he merits the penitentiary)—and the temperance man has a legal right in common with others to the accommodation so dearly purchased;—but he ought not to give his sanction to the contract.

Rumseller.—Well—you can't show any thing in the Bible against Rumselling!

N. Slaveholder.—Why the whole tenor of the Book is against it. Didst thou ever read the tenth Psalm?

A Bible lay on the cabin table, we opened it and read the Psalm with emphasis. The whole of it made an evident impression, especially verses 8 and 9,—

"He sitteth in the lurking places of the villages: In the secret places doth he murder the innocent: His eyes are privily set against the poor, He lieth in wait secretly as a lion in his den; He lieth in wait to catch the poor: He DOTTH catch the poor when he draweth him into his net."

Rumseller.—Do you think that refers to Rum-sellers?

N. Slaveholder.—I know that it applies to Rum-sellers,—and if I were one I would take it to myself.

A Passenger.—If you were a Rum-seller you would not read it.

Another Passenger.—The worst Rum-seller, I know, has not been to a place of worship these thirty years.

N. Slaveholder.—I would have thee to notice that in the sacred writings, especially in the New Testament, great truths and principles are laid down, and it is our duty to conform our lives to them, without expecting to see every particular deviation from them separately specified and condemned. We are to apply the principles of Christianity, according to the best light we have.

Here the dialogue closed. The liquor-seller seemed confused and conscious, and his friend informed us that he made no unkind remarks upon what had passed, but seemed "much galled by the Psalm."

A TESTAMENT FOR SLAVE-LAND CIRCULATION.—Punch, who, together with his abundant nonsense, not unfrequently gives utterance to a well-timed satire, thus bestows a sly poke upon the Slaveocracy.

THE SLAVE-OWNERS' TESTAMENT.—It would be a grand speculation for an enterprising publisher to get up, for circulation among serious slave-owners, a Family New Testament, with the objectionable passages expurgated; the passages to be expunged as objectionable being those whereby the practices of buying, selling, flogging, and otherwise treating black men and women like beasts, or worse than beasts, is forbidden in the injunction to act towards others as we would have them act towards ourselves.—Punch.

The hint is far from meaningless. The "Southern Chivalry" understand, far better than some abolitionists appear to do, that the Sacred Volume is an Anti-Slavery Book. Hence their aversion to its being read to or by their colored population. Hence the practice which prevails, on some plantations, of reading to the assembled Slaves certain favorite passages in which pro-slavery sagacity has given the finishing touch to the words of inspiration: as—"Slaves, be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, for the disobedient Slave shall be beaten till his sides are sore" (Ephes. vi, 5).—Hence professed ministers and ambassadors of Him, who left the throne of his glory and took on him the form of a servant, for the sake of the humblest African as surely as for his proudest oppressor, and who declared it a part of his mission "to break every yoke,"—messengers of His glad tidings are to be found, who will

Torture the pages of the hallowed Bible,
To sanction crime and robbery and blood,
And in Oppression's hateful service, label
Both man and God!"

Some of them will feel this much in a sore place, for, notwithstanding their professed indifference to transatlantic sentiment, their "Feelings are as soft and sensible

As are the tender horns of cooed snails."

LITERARY NOTICES.

NARRATIVE OF A RECENT VISIT TO BRAZIL, by John Candler and Wilson Burgess: to present an address on the Slave Trade and Slavery, issued by the religious Society of Friends. —91 pages.

We have been obliged to delay our notice of this valuable pamphlet, which is, as might be expected, characterized by candor, by simple perspicuity, and by earnest sincerity. The object of their mission, as set forth in the title of the book, is pretty well understood by our readers; and we need hardly, at this date, explain, that the Address to the Sovereigns and Rulers of Christian Nations, adopted by London Yearly Meeting, had already been favorably presented throughout Europe. The movements of the valued Friends composing the several deputations, have illustrated the truth that "Wisdom is profitable to direct." The arrival of a deputation to our own General and State Governments, is now expected on our shores, and having full confidence in the genuineness of the origin of this religious concern, and in the christian discretion of the beloved Friends who have been deputed, we do not doubt that they will be courteously received, we do not doubt that they will steadily seek for divine assistance to pursue this service, for Christ's sake, in a meek and Christian Spirit, and we trust that they will have the sympathy and the prayers, of those who, whilst dwelling in their ceiled houses, would willingly consider themselves as the constituents of these Christian Ambassadors. One of these dear friends writes, in a private letter, "our deputations have been well received in all the countries thus far visited; will the United States do otherwise than receive us kindly?"—We believe not: but to the pamphlet before us.

Our friends landed on the 2d of 10th Mo., 1852, at Pernambuco, "a large town of about 100,000 inhabitants, chiefly slaves." "The Slaves go without shoes to distinguish them from the colored free people."

During the voyage, several copies of Uncle Tom's Cabin having been brought out by the passengers,

"And observing one of them intent on reading it day after day, we ventured to ask him what he thought of the work. It is all true, he replied; I know it to be true. I am, unhappily, a slave-holder myself. Slavery is as much a curse to the master as to the slave. Much, and with great reason, as we may object to works prepared in this manner, to suit the public taste, it is quite certain that the reading of this extraordinary book has done much good: it has led many persons to see, what they never saw or thought of before, that slavery is a great moral evil, whether in America or any other land,—a hideous institution, which no professing Christian can, with consistency tolerate for a single hour. England has abolished slavery; France has abolished it; so have Sweden and Denmark. The United States of America must shortly follow the example thus placed before them, or cease to hold a high rank among Christian nations. Never before were the two continents of the Old and New World agitated on this question as they now are; there is, doubtless, an overruling Providence in it: the words of a modern poet, himself an American, are beginning to be realized:—

"Tis the waking up of nations
From slavery's fatal sleep;
The sunrise of a universe:
Deep calling unto deep."

May the movement, so long and so much needed, hasten on from murmurs to lawfulness, until freedom is everywhere secured to the slave!"

In two days they reached Bahia.

"The slaves and free blacks of Bahia have been chiefly brought from the coast of Benin, near the province of Africa, and are a remarkably fine race of people. The slaves are decently dressed on their lower limbs: the men go naked to the waist, and the women wear only a loose wrapper of cotton cloth; they thus display their fine limbs and noble proportions, and exhibit forms that a statuary would be emulous to copy. They perform an immense amount of labour, such as ought to be performed by horses, mules or oxen, and are evidently treated as if belonging to a lower grade in the animal creation. In bearing great loads up the steep ascents of the city, their nostrils expand with hard breathing, and they sing somewhat dolefully to relieve the chest. Sometimes, when the work is not hard, they sing cheerfully. About fifty of these fine men came on board to assist in coaling the ship, and as they lifted up the huge and heavy sacks of coal by a long rope, they matched in time on the deck, and sang an African song, which some of us thought had as much of melody in it, as the performances of our Italian opera-singer, who was going on a professional visit to Rio de Janeiro."

On the 9th, their arrival at Rio de Janeiro completed their voyage of 5240 miles. A chief officer of the customs "cleared their luggage with kindness and dispatch," and on reading their letter of introduction, said,

"I am glad of your mission: I have been striving with others these 20 years to put down the Slave trade; we cannot go as far as you do in regard to Slavery; our circumstances forbid it; but I will do what I can to help you."

The pages before us are rich in intelligent descriptions which we must omit.

"As we were walking in the 'Rua direita,' a Brazilian gentleman accosted us in imperfect English, informing us that he had been in England and knew that we were Quakers. 'They ask me,' he continued, 'who you are; I tell them Quakers, Friends—very good people. I knew a Quaker in London (William Allen) a very good man indeed.' Finding him disposed to be familiar, we told him that we were seeking the way to the National Library. 'I will go with you,' he said. Taking us by the arm he conducted us to a narrow paved court-way which we had just avoided. A Roman Catholic church, in which high mass was performing, opened by its principal entrance into the court, and a number of persons stood bare-headed before the doors. We requested him not to take us that way, as we could not take off our hats in honour of the service, and we desired not to give offence. 'Never mind,' was his rejoinder, 'leave that to me.' On coming to the people, he took off his own hat, and as we passed through them, he said 'These are my friends; you must give dispensation; and we were suffered to go on without molestation. Such dispensation is not permitted in Portugal. The truth is that in Brazil, though a strictly Roman Catholic country, in which no natives are protestants, there is a large amount of religious as well as of civil liberty. English and American protestants are allowed to build places of public worship so long as the exterior is simple, without a steeple and without bells, and to worship in their own manner; nor the Roman Catholics forbidden, if they please, to attend a protestant service. Free permission is given by law to the circulation of the Holy Scriptures: an agent of the American Bible Society sells them at a moderate price at a store in the city, and a Roman Catholic bookseller advertises for sale the Bibles of the British and Foreign Bible Society. We found, on inquiry, that the demand was small, and that the Bibles were objected to, as wanting the Apocrypha. So little aid is afforded by the State to a persecuting spirit on the part of the Roman bishops and clergy, that a travelling agent for the selling of Bibles might pass through the country unmolested. The fault of the Brazilians in regard to religion is not intolerance, but indifference: the common people, as in all Popish countries, are deeply superstitious; the upper or educated class, who rule the nation, are spoken of by those who observe them, as influenced greatly by the literature of France, and strongly disposed to infidelity. In such a nation, under the combined influences of Popery, infidelity, and slavery, it would be vain to expect a commendable state of morals."

An interview with the Emperor was arranged for the presentation of their Address, which, we are well informed, includes an uncompromising condemnation of Slavery, which it denounces as unchristian.

"A servant in attendance directed us to an ante-room. After waiting half an hour, a gentleman of the household desired us to follow him to the hall of audience, where he said we should find the Emperor. This was our only introduction. A fine tall man, dressed in plain clothes, but with a diamond star on his breast, seeing us enter, kindly walked a few paces to meet us. We knew him to be the Emperor. The gentleman who attend him on occasions of audience, stood at a distant part of the room. Holding the parchment in our hands, we addressed him in the following manner. 'May it please the Emperor to permit us briefly to explain the cause of our coming to Brazil? We are Members of the Society of Friends, in England. That Society has long felt a deep deep sympathy for the wrongs of Africa in the existence of the slave-trade; in different countries, and deploring also the continuance of slavery. Influenced by this feeling, it has believed it to be a religious duty to prepare an Address to the Sovereigns and Rulers of Christian nations on the subject. This address has been presented to many of the Courts of Europe, and we are deputed to present it to the Emperor of Brazil. Will the Emperor condescend to receive it at our hands?' The Emperor, taking the parchment, said, 'I will receive it with pleasure, and read it.' 'May we be allowed to congratulate the Emperor, and to express our thankfulness that the slave-trade is extinguished, or nearly so, in Brazil?' 'The Emperor,—I wish to see it abolished all over the world.' 'May we also express our desire that He, who rules in the heavens, by whom Kings rule and decree justice, may be pleased to bless the Emperor and Empress, and their children, and give prosperity and peace to Brazil?' The Emperor—"I thank you very much." Here the interview ended, and we retired.

"On returning from the palace, we called on Euzabio, the late Minister of Justice to the Empire, an earnest opposer of the African slave-trade, who expressed his gratification at receiving such a visit; and intimated his determination, though no longer in office, to continue his efforts to suppress a practice so disgraceful to the Brazilian name."

The Editors of the daily papers in Rio Janeiro promised to insert their address.

"It was found, however, too stringent and uncompromising to suit the public taste; one part of it, relating to the slave-trade, and that part only, made its appearance in the 'Correio Mercantil'; no part of it was printed in the other Government paper, the 'Journal do Commercio,' during our stay in Brazil. We resolved therefore, without delay, to send copies of it by post to persons of influence throughout the empire, and took advantage of an undisturbed residence of a few days in the mountain-district of Tejuca to carry out the design."

The Slave trade in Brazil is to a great extent honestly suppressed. Many of the large land-owners are benefited by the change.

"Some of them who prefer the comfort of being out of debt to the pride of power, begin to feel, with the community at large, that the slave-trade is bad for themselves and the country. There is little or no outcry against its suppression from the planters, nor, generally speaking, from the native Brazilians. The chief opponents of this new measure of the Government are the Portuguese traders, who have grown rich by these iniquitous transactions, and who have become, from this cause, a powerful class, but whose race, it is to be hoped, is now nearly run. Between the native Brazilians and the resident Portuguese, there has long been a rivalry of feeling, and the profits of the slave-trade, monopolized by the latter, had served to exasperate it. The same rivalry, combined with other causes, may tend to prevent its revival."

Although, viewing Christianity as a Religion of Peace, we cannot but deplore all resort to arms to further any cause, however righteous, we must state our conviction that the late conduct of Great Britain in chasing the African slavers into the harbors of Brazil, and making seizures of them under its very forts, has contributed mainly to stimulate the Government of Brazil to put down the African slave-trade to that country. It deeply wounded the pride of the nation to see its past inhumanity and bad faith thus exposed to the whole world; the Emperor therefore resolved to take the matter at once into his own hands, and, by bold measures, to crush the traffic."

Our friends journeyed through the land, leaving copies of their manifesto against Slavery with the owners of estates, one of which they describe as 12 miles square, containing 240,000 coffee trees: 100 acres are appropriated to sugar culture.

"While riding out one morning during our stay in Tejuca, we witnessed a sight that caused us to shudder; it was a black man being tied up by another black, probably for the purpose of flogging, and his owner or overseer standing by with apparent unconcern. We were admiring the lovely scenery by which we were surrounded, but on seeing this, it immediately cast such a gloom over the whole that admiration gave way to a feeling of sadness."

They visited the JOHN DEL REY GOLD MINES, the power of which to yield gold, is described as only limited by the want of labor.

ers. They are chiefly worked by Slaves, "and the mortality of the mines is very great."

"The present superintendent of the mines has a high character for humanity and kindness. Still, we have the startling fact before us, that Englishmen are slaveholders, and work their slaves in unhealthy mines for the paltry love of gold (they obtain 10 per cent. per annum and often much more, for the capital they employ, but the slaves of their servants are, in the mean time, shrinking, their bodily powers decaying, and a fearful rate of mortality goes on! Had the slaves whom the Company now hold been purchased by it since the passing of Lord Brougham's Act, in 1843, instead of before that period, every individual share-holder, we presume, might be looked upon by law as a felon, and be liable to a prosecution in our criminal courts. But every share-holder is a slave-holder now; and if slave-holding be a crime, where is the difference, in fine conscientia, between having slaves purchased before a given date, or after it? The subject is a national reproach; and all who possess a share in the capital of the Company, may adopt the language of Scripture,—"We are verily guilty concerning our brother."

Our friends in various instances evinced their fidelity and efficiency. Having heard in England of some English boys reduced in Brazil to a state of semi-slavery, they investigated the matter. "The minister for Foreign Affairs, at Rio, as soon as the complaint was made, issued a commission of inquiry, and on the proofs adduced of harsh treatment to these poor boys, ordered instant reparation."

The favorable reception of our friends by those whose interests were arrayed against the mission, and by the various functionaries is a good token of their fitness for this labor of love. On leaving Rio for Bahia they had the satisfaction that their passports of leaving, which were liable to a fee of $80, were sent to them free of charge.

At Bahia, an opportunity presented of witnessing the superstition of the negroes.

"In walking the street on one of the Saints' days, we saw rockets in the air and heard the sound of loud crackers. We asked what the rejoicing meant: "The feast is held up in the church, and the people outside send up the rockets to let the Saint know, and to beg his prayers." A short time since, after a long period of dry weather, the people began to be uneasy, and asked the priests what they could do to obtain rain. After serious consultation, it was agreed that there should be an exchange of Saints: the images of two of the churches should be removed and take each other's places; and there should be music, and rockets, and a long procession. The day came: men and women of every class, in holiday attire, attended by priests in their paraphernalia, with long black gowns, and broad black hats, moved slowly along from one church to the other, to assist in the ceremonies. The work was accomplished: rain fell, and priests and people proclaimed a miracle of Grace! (And do you really think," said our friend Baines, to an intelligent priest, "that the changing of these images has brought these showers?" "Indeed I do," was his reply; as soon as the work was done, it began to rain: what else could it be?" With a religion of this sort, and with occasional holidays of mirth, the poor slaves are taught to believe that they may become happy here and hereafter. The fetters, however, that bind the limbs of some of them are felt to be galling, even in the cities. The newspapers abound in advertisements of runaway servants, with offers of large rewards for their apprehension. They are sold by public auction, with other chattels, and are separated from their families, and sent under slave-drivers to be sold to the plantations. The lot of the slaves in Bahia is alleviated by their concentration and immense number, and the bold front they exhibit of strong forms and physical power, which silently says to their masters, "It is better to treat us well;" but still, slavery is, and must be, a bitter draught, even in that city; and though many are made to drink of it, it is not the less bitter on that account."

We propose to finish our notice of this narrative in our next number.

Passages from our Correspondence.

It has been some time since we have afforded space for this department.

A beloved correspondent, in a letter not intended for publication, after speaking of a recent journey, writes as follows:

9 month 19th, 1853.

It took something from the buoyancy of our pleasurable feelings on reaching home, to learn that dear friends, and you of the number, had been to visit us during our absence. "Iron sharpeneth iron, so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend." Engaged in a common moral conflict, with much (even from very friends) to deter us in our up-hill reformatory work, we need this brightening to make the path of duty joyous. As we journeyed onward we sat down to splendidly furnished tables, where, with the sacrifices made to luxury, were doubtless mingled, in the eye of true philosophy, the blood of our fellow men. Enough remained to us, not so commixed, for health and enjoyment. When, my friend, shall the time be, that, rightly regulating "our daily bread," we shall see a blow struck at Slavery greater than all declaration, however eloquent, can wield? It would be painful to believe that, in the increase of the government of the Prince of Peace, that time shall not arrive, when the products of all violence done to God's image shall by pure Christendom be held to be forbidden fruits: and it would be difficult to suppose that, in that happier era, their use, when such violence has the infliction of death as its frequent concomitant, will be regarded as much short of the crime of the Fijee Islander.

We had one morning among our stage companions, a politician of the "Silver Gray Stripe," who without being called to it by any remark of others, volunteered a defence of the Fugitive Slave Law, and the social and personal duty of enforcing it. This led to an hour's debate, in which our politician averred that he would himself drive back to his master "the panting fugitive" at the point of the bayonet, should occasion require. I remarked that I would pay him the compliment to disbelieve his assertion. Rather did I suppose he would imitate "Senator Burr," or, failing to secure the escape of the fugitive, would say, "come, neighbors, let us raise a purse, and save this over brother from the wretched doom which awaits him." But he had to be informed who "Senator Burr" was, and had yet to read the admirable story of Uncle Tom's Cabin! Driven by the argument into a close corner, where a cute down-Easter helped to put him, he made his escape from the obligations which the higher law of Heaven imposed, by affirming that all religion was priestcraft. A sick Clergyman, till then a silent listener, raised himself from his reclining position, and feebly yet earnestly remarked: "Did you ever see, Sir, a vindicator of Slavery, whose views at bottom were not tinged by infidelity?"

Not to inflict our diary on thee,—in returning homeward we fell in with a gentleman whose fine personal appearance at once prepossessed us in his favor ere a word had been exchanged with him. * * *

He announced himself as — the rescuer from a twelve year's Slavery of Solomon Northup, a free and intelligent colored man, seduced at Saratoga Springs into the temporary employ of two men going to Washington City, and where, being drugged, he was put whilst insensible, into a Slave pen, in that representative city of our nation's glory, and thence transferred as a slave to the Bayou Boeuf, Louisiana.

Referring me to the published account of Solomon's capture, bondage and escape—the accuracy of which he held to be unquestionable, and the interest in reading which he thought would to my view be next absorbing to "Mrs. Stowe's work," he gave me an affecting statement of a visit to a slave pen in Washington City, and other incidents of Slavery which had come under his own observation since commencing the work of effecting Solomon's liberation, confirmatory of all that is spoken of as evil in the vile system, and involving in their terrible influences women as fair and beautiful, and having minds probably as feeling, as any lady in the saloon of the steam boat then carrying us. The favorable impression which the narrator had made on my mind, lost none of its force in his telling me of a recent visit to the man of Peterboro, and enthusiastically describing him as one of God's noblemen. On my arrival at Philadelphia, I had to make, ere proceeding further homeward, a detour from my direct course, to get the book spoken of. Having promptly read it, and with no abatement of the expected interest, I must say to every friend of the Slave, to every one who for any cause feels an interest in knowing what Slavery is;—Go, and buy, and read, without delay, the "Narrative of Solomon Northup, a citizen of New York, kidnapped in Washington City in 1841, and rescued in 1853 from a cotton plantation near the Red river in Louisiana."

Another correspondent says:

I have read with exquisite delight the poem now publishing in successive parts in thy journal: ("An appeal for the bondswoman") and I feel impelled to invite to it the especial attention of all lovers of fine poetry. There are some of the finest chords in the soul's lyre which are not to be moved by argument, but will vibrate to such touches as those of E. L. Jr. And notwithstanding the sentiment of Dr. Johnson, which thou hast half endorsed, (page 72) that "there is no necessity for our having poetry at all, it being merely a luxury, an instrument of pleasure," and his deduction that "it can have no value unless when exquisite of its kind." I conceive that to some minds it is an absolute necessity; a sentiment which has a strong sanction, since so large a portion of the Divinely inspired Scriptures were written in poetry.

It is, perhaps, chiefly in ante-meridian life that such minds are peculiarly accessible through poetic influences, which cannot be spared from the economy of philanthropy. Whittier has made many thousands of abolitionists, whose sympathies for the Slave had also remained as dormant and as inaccessible as "the figure in the stone" which a classic writer declares that "the Sculptor only finds."

I have perused,—or rather I have inhaled, with growing interest and zest, the appeals of the authoress to the successive classes of her own sex, till I begin to wish that thou wouldst insert the whole of it at once, and not tantalize us with small portions. Permit me to express my anxiety on one point. It was mentioned in the editorial accompanying Part first, that "it is addressed, in so many sections, to seven distinct classes." Now upon the plan which thou hast so far pursued, of giving one part only in each number, it will overrun the present volume, which I should regret. I am one, I hope, of a large number who intend to bind the N. Slaveholder at the close of the year, as a book for my library, and were there less inducement otherwise, it would be sufficient that the volume contained a complete copy of E. Lloyd's 'APPEAL FOR THE BONDWOMAN TO HER OWN SEX.'

OBERLIN, Sept. 7th, 1853.

I send you nine subscribers for the N. Slaveholder. Prof. G. N. Allen, E. H. Fairchild, Hiram A. Pease, W. Jones, Prof. T. B. Hudson, Hamilton Hill, Uriah Thompson, A. Beacher, Prof. John Morgan. I have not time now to state to you the interest that is felt here on this important movement, but hope to be able ere long. Suffice it to say that the people of Oberlin will not be behind in any reform or movement calculated to remove oppression and to promote the good of our fellow men: and when they see their duty on this subject, I believe they will be willing to do something towards furthering the cause. I hope soon to be able to communicate to you some cheering intelligence in respect to it, together with some more subscriptions.

Yours truly,

R. CRITTENDEN.

So be it. We love Oberlin.

LYNN, MASS. (with eight new subscriptions) "The ball begins to roll."

That's right. There are no flaws in the ball. It is a true sphere and will roll well.

CLEVELAND, OHIO. (with thirteen subscriptions.) The friends in our little meeting very cordially give encouragement to the work you are engaged in, and some of them have subscribed for the Non-Slaveholder.

WESTMIDDLAND, N. Y. (with subscriptions.) "I have lent the papers—No. 5, was particularly interesting. A person to whom it was lent read the piece entitled 'Stolen Goods,' to a man who professed to be an abolitionist and who thought that he did nothing to uphold Slavery: but on hearing this he said that it was a perfectly new idea. This man thinks that if people were only informed upon this subject, we should soon be able to support a factory."

VASSALBORO, MAINE. "I enclose $2 00 (postage stamps) for eight copies of N. S."

[Acknowledgements are due for several communications from this place.]

JEFFERSON CO., OHIO.

A valued correspondent writes:

I fully intended sending an occasional article for your valuable paper, but prior engagements have absorbed every moment of my time. I have not however been an uninterested spectator of your labors, but have during the past year maintained a very extensive correspondence, either on behalf of our Board of Managers on my own account, with the friends of the cause, in reference to the establishment and support of the N. Slaveholder. I have no doubt that its publication is doing good, and I desire your encouragement, hoping the time is not far distant when it may be increased in size, &c., &c.

A friend in Ohio writes.

"There is an increased interest felt in many places, not only among Friends but others respecting the inconsistency of the friends of humanity making use of the products of the slave's unrequited toil. Many elder persons still oppose the Free Labor movement, but among the younger class with us you rarely meet with any one who is not ready to admit the propriety of it, and the obligation to refrain, however inconsistent his practice. * * * We desire to act with great prudence, and due deference to the preference of those who are determined not to see, but, at the same time, to clear our own consciences, by keeping the subject, on all proper occasions, distinctly before their view. Have we all done our whole duty in this respect? Have we remembered those in bonds as bound with them? Could we change situations with the poor slave, we could answer all these queries in the negative."

AN APPEAL FOR THE BONDWOMAN,

TO HER OWN SEX.

BY ELIZABETH LLOYD, JR.

PART IV.

WONDERERS AT FASHION'S SHRINE!

To that idol-god of thine,
Giving time, and soul, and sense,
What hath been thy recompense?

Lady—in the minstrel guise
I have looked with searching eyes
On thy seeming paradise
Thou art dropping secret tears,
Sorrowing o'er wasted years,
Harassed by unnoted cares
Stealing from thee unawares
All thy best of life away,
Till weary is thy day—
And thy silent hours confess
All is loss and emptiness!
Thou art haunted in the crowd,
Thou art followed in the dance,

At the revel late and loud,
By a sad accusing glance.
In the brilliant festal hall,
Where thou glidest to and fro,
With a winning word for all,
But a pining heart below,
Music's elevating power—
All that can enlure the sense,
Fills the place and rules the hour
Vainly—thou art beckoned hence.

Read the mandate to depart
In thy sick unquiet heart,
Chafing now at empty word,
Hollow smile and mean desire,
Like some poor, imprisoned bird

Shut within its gilded wire,
Fashion's cold benumbing creed
Cannot answer to its need;
Alike's Palm would sooner grow
On the soil that feeds the pine,
O'er a wall of Alpine snow
Sooner creep the Southern vine,
Than in Fashion's drifting sand,
Could thy loving heart take root,
In her chilling clime expand,
Or put forth an upward shoot.

Lady! for thy conscience' sake,
Through a weary thralldom break—
For the Slave's sake be thou strong!
She hath watched and waited long,
In the failing hope to see
From its thrall thy spirit free.
Well she knows, that helpless one,
That her freedom is begun
Only when thy shackles fall—
Well she knows it were in vain
On a pinioned arm to call
For the loosing of her chain.
Under God, her trust must be
In the mind whose strength is free;
In the lip will fearless speak
For the trodden down and weak;
To the heart awake to feel,
Must be made her sad appeal;
And her cause must still abide
With the pen that Truth shall guide.

V.

MOUJNER! on a lonely pathway,
Where the lights have ceased to shine,
From a true and warm heart parted,
Linked in love with thine,—
Living only for the future,
As thou seekest day by day
Commune with the white-robed spirit
God hath called away,—
Hath not Consolation met thee,
Even at Affliction's door,
Softened eyes, and words of healing,
Never known before?

Messengers of Peace surround thee—
Friendship's grasp is long and kind—
And His hand thy heart hath broken
Is outstretched to bind.

Ah, there are—whose tears and partings,
Touch no cord in Pitt's breast;
Day but brings them toil and anguish,
Night a fearful rest.

Thy dark seasons come and vanish,
Christian Faith and Hope between,—
For the Slave, no bow of promise
In life's cloud is seen.

Beautiful thy dead lay sleeping,
Yet with an immortal's trust,

Thou could'st yield to God the spirit
And the "dust, to dust!"
Ah, thy wretched sister bendeth
O'er her dead, a ghastly form,
With that dread thought of the hopeless,
Darkness and the worm!

On her dull ear, no glad tidings
Of a world beyond the grave,
Where the gates of pearl are open
Even to the Slave.

No hope on her vigil breaketh,
That the form so weary here
May in white and shining raiment
With the Just appear.

Where, a white stone in her forehead,
And a new song on her lip,
Her cup in the sea of crystal
Evermore may dip.

Sorrow's mission is to draw thee
Tow'rd Earth's suffering children near,
And thy spiritual vision
To enlarge and clear.
In thy heart her hand is sowing
Seed unknown to outward sight,
Destined to bear fruit in actions,
Children of the light.

For the Non-Slaveholder

Friend William J. Allinson—Permit me to make a few remarks by way of rejoinder to the reply of E. L., contained in the 8th number of thy excellent little sheet.

The writer of the strictures on the memorial in question, may not have "sufficiently weighed the matter before him;" as intimated; but after all the explanation which has been given, the plan suggested by the memorial, is not, in my view, relieved of any of its objections. The question is not, whether the abolition of slavery might not be facilitated by the passage of such a law; but is it morally right to do so. If the offer of the common price would not induce slaveholders to liberate their slaves, doubtless some two or three times that amount would: at any rate, the offer might be such as to insure this result. But would our friend admit, that because slavery might be abolished, say by paying ten thousand dollars each for the slaves, that therefore, such payment would be justifiable—would be right? Surely not. Why? Is it because that is too much money to pay for freedom? That is beyond all price. Is it because slaveholders have no right to so much? Have they any better right to ten dollars for each slave, than ten thousand? The question then, is not whether this plan would extinguish slavery, but is it a righteous one.

We can have no doubt, that with a correspendent training of the public mind, slavery might be abolished by a resort to violence—to war; but our friend would not advocate this plan, because it is practical.

Again, the writer of the reply will surely not claim, that there is any more propriety in paying slaveholders to cease their robbery, than there is in paying the highwayman, the counterfeiter, and the common swindler, to cease their depredations on community, and give up their ill gotten gains; (unless it could be shown that the free states, by their political and commercial intercourse with slaveholders, have injured them pecuniarily; which our friend will not assume, because it is well known that the contrary is the true state of the case, in different instances, to the amount of millions.)

Now, in asking them to do so, "however just our plea, we are practically asking them to make what they at least consider to be a large pecuniary sacrifice; and what would be, under existing circumstances, to many of them an actual sacrifice of nearly all they possess." Should we then, to save them from being reduced to poverty by their crimes, be so "magnanimous" as to ask a law to remunerate them for all they would lose by becoming honest men? This is just what our friend asks for those who have long practiced the very worst kind of robbery!

Another point. Our friend must know that were he in possession of slaves, it would be his duty to liberate them without remuneration—that he could not do right in any other way. Why then does he advocate that, which in itself he is aware is wrong? Evidently, because he "can hardly expect" slaveholders to emancipate without compensation—can hardly expect them to do right. Here is one of the strongest points of objection to the course of our friend. He is well aware that justice and right do not demand compensation to slaveholders: but because they will not do as they should, he advocates that which is in itself unjust, and that because such a plan suits them better than an honest one; and because he thinks this is the best that can be done under the circumstances! Wrong in the abstract, but right in the concrete!

Let those whose moral acumen enables them to see no better than to recognize property in man, do it in this way, and abolish slavery if they can; but surely it is the duty of all who have correct principles, to advocate them, and not another set, and that because such principles may be more popular or more palatable. Gradual emancipation has been the plan, by which slavery has as yet been abolished in the United States, and it is probable, is the only one that will succeed; but it is our duty nevertheless, to advocate an immediate abandonment of the sin. Whatever others may do, we should maintain the right, in word and deed, inflexibly and without compromise or wavering, regardless of any principle of expediency, or policy, except that of immutable justice; and let half-way men, adopt half-way means if they will.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

PRACTICE versus PROFESSION.

Prof. Dost thou mean to say, that the people of the northern states, are slaveholders, notwithstanding they may be opposed to the system and in the constant habit of denouncing it?

Prac. I do; unless they carry their opposition to it further than talking and writing against it. If, with the knowledge that the cotton they wear, and the sugar and rice they eat, are produced by the labor of slaves, and are the main support of slavery, they continue to use those articles so produced, I have no hesitation in classing them as slaveholders, morally considered. Their living outside of the jurisdiction of slavery, does not exonerate them from the responsibility of slavery, if they are maintaining it directly or indirectly. In fact, there is less excuse for the support of it by persons living in free states, when they are not dependent upon slave labor for most of the necessities of life, than for those in the midst of it, who are willing to do what they can to discourage it.

Prof. Thy doctrine is rather severe. I have some objections to make to thy positions. In the first place, thy refusal to buy the products of slavery, looks to me very much like compulsion. I do not think we are required to compel other people to do right.

Prac. As to severity, the truth is always severe against falsehood, and righteousness against unrighteousness. Rum-sellers and distillers might make the same complaint against tea-totallers.—Compulsion, indeed! What vice is there by which the wicked make merchandise, that the same cry of compulsion might not be raised against those who do not choose to support it?

Prof. But if the products of slave labor could not be sold, not only the masters, but the slaves must starve.

Prac. Not much danger of that, while so many continue to buy the fruit of the slave's toil. The progress of abstinence seems likely to be sufficiently gradual to warn all against the catastrophe, in time for them to change their system of labor. If however, it were possible at once to stop the sale of slave labor produce, a remedy could immediately be found against starvation. The masters could proclaim liberty to the captive. This would at once open the door for the sale of the otherwise tainted commodities; when both master and slave, in their new relation of employer and employed, could be fed and clothed, and abundantly provided for.

Prof. I look upon the scheme of abstinence from the products of slave labor, as impracticable. How can we do without cotton and sugar? They are both so completely interwoven with our every day wants, and needs, that they may be considered indispensable to our comfort.

Prac. It is always practicable to do right. And I can readily show thee that there is no danger of our being obliged to deny ourselves the use of either cotton or sugar. It is a law of trade, that demand will bring supply. In this case, we are not left in the dark.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, TENTH MONTH, 5, 1853.

OHIO FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION.—This spirited Society held its annual meeting on the 5th ult. The Report of the Board of Managers, a valuable document, came to hand after this number was made up. It will appear in our next.

OUR BELOVED FRIENDS WILLIAM AND JOSIAH FOSTER, JOHN CANDLEER AND WILLIAM HOLMES, arrived by the Steamer Niagara, at Boston, on the 15th ult., where they were met with a cordial welcome by a number of Friends, committees having been appointed by the Meetings for sufferings of New York and New England Yearly Meetings to render them any desired assistance. On reaching Philadelphia, the correspondents of that Yearly Meeting had an interview with them, entering with sympathy into their pious objects.

In prosecuting the christian embassy to which reference was made in our last No. (under the head of literary notices) it will be done purely as a religious concern, without any connection with politics, or any attempt to agitate or to step aside from their direct mission to those in authority. Their errand is one of dignity and great moral beauty, perfectly unimpeachable both in its object and its mode, and we cannot doubt that the officials with whom they communicate, will sustain their national and individual character by receiving them as christian gentlemen.

THE WORLD'S TEMPERANCE CONVENTION.

The various detailed reports of this Convention, have been, so far as we have seen them, singularly inaccurate. One conclusion, however, to which they all point, is a correct one,—that some of the leading men evinced their unfitness for the moral platform. How far it was in taste for Antoinette Brown to claim her rights as a delegate, after a secession Convention had been held because of the understanding that women were to be excluded from this; or how far the case was altered by the assurances of welcome given to her and to her friends, and by the reception of her credentials, without objection, by the chairman of the committee; are questions respecting which wise men may differ, and are thrown into the shade, as considerations unimportant in the contrast, by the shameful conduct of men of education, genius, and high celebrity,—and who, to drive her and her friends from the platform and from the convention, disgraced themselves by rowdiness, vulgarity, and violations of the rights of others, and of the decencies of debate, which might have subjected them to the care of the police in attendance.

We have no room for even a condensed synopsis of the proceedings, but we wish that the Convention had not been held. We left it, with grief of heart that old and valued champions of temperance had almost forfeited their right to rebuke the disorder of the bar-room. We had, however, one high comfort, in knowing that the large majority of the Convention were true, not only to temperance, but to fairness, manliness, honor, and virtuous propriety. We rejoiced to see the decisions of the noble President, our well beloved NEAL DOW, (who, in most trying and painful emergencies, acted sublimely) sustained by a large majority of the Delegates. It will be difficult for those who were not present, to conceive how well he acted;—which is cause for thankfulness, since he is so identified with the holy cause of Temperance in its most darling phase, that we could not afford to see him stoop from his sublime position, to the level of Pro-Slavery Rowdiness.

Yes, reader, it was pro-slavery intolerance that invaded the Temperance Convention, and a large portion (if not the whole) of those who there took leave of decency, who joined by fifties and by hundreds, in outcries and hisses, to prevent fairness of discussion, who insulted their presiding officer, (to whom the world owes so large a debt of gratitude) and carried their points by dishonorable tricks,—were pro-slavery men. We speak advisedly, for we were in the midst of the commotion. We heard the whisperings and the pass-words, which revealed the motives of action, and as we marked these raging waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame, we were deepened in our conviction that the spirit of Slavery is the very antipodes of Republicanism, of honor, and of all that is lovely and of good report.

But let us not be discouraged from using all diligence in working for the passage of the Prohibitory Liquor Law in our several states. The evils of intemperance are far beyond the power of language to describe—the License System is an outrage upon humanity, and upon common sense. It is time for THE PEOPLE to make known their determination that the sale of rum as beverage shall not be restricted, but PROHIBITED.

It is impracticable for us, consistent with the design of our publication, to present our readers with a summary of anti-slavery news, or even to give a statement of all the startling occurrences. Several atrocious rendition cases have occurred since our last issue, for which we are unable to make room. Owing to a mistake of our compositor, a considerable amount of editorial matter is crowded out, and with some disappointment we find the present number quite different from what we intended.

A DISCLAIMER.—In our last No. page 76, in an article copied from the Nat. Era, occurs the following passage.

"The gentleman from McHenry was as a sheep before his shearer—dumb—so he opened not his mouth."

Had we particularly noticed this sentence, we should have omitted it, and we now allude to it for the purpose of saying that we would not willingly sanction a flippant jesting use of Scripture quotations, particularly when they properly refer to HIM, who for our sakes became "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief."

LITERARY NOTICES.

NARRATIVE OF A RECENT VISIT TO BRAZIL, by John Candler and Wilson Burgess: to present an address on the Slave Trade and Slavery, issued by the religious Society of Friends.

We are gratified with the interest which has been manifested in the notice and extracts from this work which we commenced in our last No., and which we now resume, without fearing that our readers will object to the occupancy of so large a proportion of our small sheet.

To appreciate the movements of our travelers, and their sphere of labor, it may be well to state that Brazil, (or The Brasile) comprises many large provinces, separate in jurisdiction, each having its local legislature and a Governor, styled President, appointed by the Crown. It is a constitutional monarchy, working to the general content of the free inhabitants, contrasting, in peace and tranquillity, with "all the republics of North and South America which have separated from Spain." It occupies nearly half of South America, the extreme length and greatest breadth being each about 2200 miles. Were its population of about six millions equally spread over the land, "it would be difficult," says the pamphlet before us, "to trace the inhabitants: the habitation of every single family would be distant about three miles every way from its nearest neighbor: the land would be a solitude."

We give their account of their reception by the Archbishop of Bahia—

We had visited the Archbishop in the hope of inducing him still more intently to dwell on the wrongs of this unchristian system, and still more boldly to denounce them: and, in pursuance of our mission, we ventured also to call on other persons of influence. Attended by our friend, the American Consul, from whom we received many kind attentions, we paid a visit to one of the Judges of the province, and his son, who resides with him, and who is a representative to the Provincial Chamber of Deputies. Whilst we were conversing with the father—a man of intelligence, and an ardent friend of public liberty—the son, who sat near the window, was attentively reading our Address, a copy of which we had put into his hands. When he had finished it, he came up to us and said, in a serious manner, and with apparent emotion, "These are the true principles;" and before we left he said to the Consul, "I will make this mission known in the Journals." The reading of this Address had made a deep impression on his mind, of which we soon had a full proof, as, in a day or two after, a paragraph from his own pen appeared in one of the daily newspapers of the city, which we have copy. We place it on record, not because it speaks flatteringly of ourselves, for we deserve no eulogium; but because it does homage to a principle, and shows to a slavery-loving community, that if they mean to be Christian, they must be just. The newspaper has for its motto, "Order, Liberty, Constitutional Rights, Material and Moral Progress."

There are now in this city two members of the Society of Friends of Great Britain, who are come from Rio de Janeiro, and who, during their brief stay in the capital, have been collecting information on all the questions which bear on Brazilian slavery. Messrs. John Candler and Wilson Burgess have paid their compliments to His Imperial Majesty, and have presented to him, in the name of the Society which they represent, a Memorial, in which are unfolded the bitter fruits of slavery, and principles of the purest religion and the most eternal truth. These gentlemen, who have left their country, their families and the comforts of their home, thus to peregrinate, have filled up a sublime and disinterested banner, and certainly deserve the thanks and benedictions of the whole community. Most earnestly do we pray that the seed they scatter in their travels on the ground we tread upon, may spring up in a day to come, and that, visited by the benign breezes of the Gospel, it may grow up into flourishing and fruit-bearing trees."

Not only was our visit thus kindly announced and spoken of, but we had the gratification to find that through the solicitation of our Consul at Bahia, the whole Address was published in the daily official journal, which has a wide circulation in the city and province. We were the more anxious to procure the insertion of this Christian Address in the newspapers of Bahia, inasmuch as that city was the chief seat and emporium of the African slave-trade, which had lately flourished here in all its vigour. Every possible influence had been used to extend it. Young boys and clerks in the warehouses were induced to circulate the tracts they could save or procure, in these infamous speculations, and were thus all interested, more or less, in the success of the slave-trade. They looked out with anxiety for the arrival of each successive steamer on the coast, and watched, with intense interest, the lighting up of the distant bonfires on the islands and along the coast, that signified to them the important fact that the slaves were landed and sold.

Keeping steadily in view their Christian mission, they appeared to have been "fervent in spirit,—not slothful in business." They obtained a free interview with the President of the province (Bahia) who was very courteous. Permission was granted them to visit the prisons and other public buildings, but their time only admitted of a visit to the State Prison of Bahia.

On our presenting to the chief jailor the order to admit us, he called out a file of musqueteers, with fixed bayonets, to attend us. At first, we wondered at this strange precaution; but our surprise ceased when the doors of the prison were unlocked—heavy massive doors, that required strong arms to open them—and we were introduced into one long vaulted chamber, with iron gratings for air and light, and found ourselves in the midst of a band of murderers! The inmates in this part of the prison were forty in number, most of whom had committed murder, and were incarcerated for life, or for a limited term of years. Here, confined in a long narrow dungeon, with nothing to do, they frequently quarrel, and sometimes fight. The laws of Brazil, or rather, perhaps, the feelings of the people, are opposed to capital punishment, even for the worst of crimes, so that executions seldom take place. What there is of good in this, and we cannot but commend the feeling that leads to it, should now be directed to some humane secondary punishment, which, whilst from its severity it may deter others from guilt, may conduce at the same time to the reformation of the guilty. It was a sad spectacle that we witnessed; the poor wretched men fell back and ranged themselves in a long row; we saw their ferocious-looking faces, and would gladly have addressed them, but their tongue was an unknown one to us, and we could only give them a sorrowing look, and our silent sympathy. The other parts of the prison were less revolting.

We had just left the great gate, when we were called back to converse with a prisoner at the lodge. He was a genteel good-looking man, and addressed us in excellent French. He supposed we were the gentlemen who had come to present an Address to the authorities in Brazil on the subject of slavery. We told him we were, and asked him if he had seen it. Yes, he said, and had read it and approved it; we had taken right ground; slavery was an unchristian institution; but if we thought, by good words, to put it down in Brazil, we should find ourselves greatly mistaken. Our principles were pure, but the moneyed interests of the nation offered too much resistance; the shock, on collision, would be too great; we could never make way in a contest so unequal. This individual was an Italian by birth, imprisoned for insolvency and fraud. We had higher faith in the ultimate prevalence of Christian principle in the world than he seemed to think any man ought to have.

They visited many towns upon the coast, and to an extent inland of near 100 miles they had some opportunity both of seeing the country and of leaving copies of their document with institutions, and with distinguished intelligent and influential persons. An inland tour among the sugar plantations is narrated with much interesting description. But the beauty of society and the frank hospitality extended to them, were shaded by continual evidences of the glaring wrong of slavery, and the gloom upon the faces of the pried slaves, even where most humanely treated. At one princely estate,

The good lady of the household told us that when she came out from Europe, as a young wife, to take charge of the family and female slaves, her heart sank within her at the sickening sights she saw and the tales she heard; but that custom, and the seeming impossibility of working out a change, had to a degree reconciled her to the evils of the sad system.

In the Sugar and Tobacco producing country they were assured that there was no natural increase, but an annual diminution of the number of slaves, and the reason given them was,—"because the slave mothers feel no interest in rearing their children to slavery: they neglect them in infancy, and the mortality is great."

Some extracts are given from the correspondence of Henry A. Cooper, Consul at Pernambuco, who mentions being "eye witness to an unfortunate slave cutting his throat at a dinner table at which I was present; and that invitations were issued in this province, by a proprietor, to witness the boiling alive of a slave in the cauldron of his estate!" He asserts that rural slaves "have only four hours of actual sleep." In an official despatch he writes:

"I defy anyone who has visited a Brazilian engenho, to deny the miserable, overworked, enfeebled, idiotic, I had almost said, inhuman, appearance of the slaves." "I have visited forty or fifty of these engenhos, and I never saw a slave laugh: but I have seen them sleep over their work; they are ill fed, and are generally treated without feeling or consideration." In addition to this lamentable description, he observed to us, that he had never seen a slave on a sugar plantation laugh!

The sugar statistics given are interesting and important, showing that a very small increase in the price of Brazilian sugar, gives a fearful stimulus to the horrible traffic in slaves: that the opening of the British ports to slave grown sugar immediately gave them a better market in England, and a small increase in price everywhere; and also opened a reasonable prospect of annually increasing trade. This induced Brazilian and Cuban planters to use all their energies in bringing fresh land into cultivation, and gave, of course, new vigor to the slave trade. As the British planters could not resort to the latter means, they were placed at disadvantage, and the cause of human liberty received a blow. In a 1846 a bill was passed in England, removing the distinction which had existed between free and slave grown sugars, and admitting them at all reduced rates of duty. The fatal consequences were foreseen, and faithfully pointed out, by English Friends, and by many other philanthropists. Had Great Britain, acting upon the fine idea which forms the motto of the Non-Slaveholder, continued to place upon slave-grown sugars an exclusive duty, Brazil had ere this, in all probability, abolished slavery. Our friends Chandler and Burgess, alluding to this bill, say:

Greatly was the traffic augmented. The number of Africans landed in Brazil, so far as can be ascertained, amounted in the four years from 1842 to 1845, both inclusive, to 78,830. In the four years from 1846 to 1849 it rose to the awful number of 220,496. Here was an increase in this very short period, of 141,666 captives landed alive on the Brazilian shore; and if we take into calculation, according to Sir T. F. Buxton's estimate, the number of persons slain in Africa to procure these victims, and of those who die on the middle passage, we multiply them threefold, and find the dreadful amount of more than 400,000 human beings, living and dead, sacrificed in four years to Mammon! Friends as we are to the principles of free trade, we think we have a right to ask, how that commerce can be called free which leads, as a consequence, to such enormities as these, and conduces to the continuance of them?

A prolonged and satisfactory interview with the President of the Province of Pernambuco, in which (whilst he strove to keep slavery out of view, and to confine attention to the trade in slaves) they were most politely treated, resulted in the following letter to the Consul:

"Most illustrious Senator, Henry Cowper.

"I request your Lordship to make known for me to Messrs. John Chandler and Wilson Burgess, members of the religious Society of Great Britain and Ireland, called Friends, how pleasing to me was the visit which I received from them in your Lordship's company on the 11th instant, and how much I appreciate it, thanking them for their attention, and at the same time for the two copies, in English and Portuguese, of the Address made in the name of the Society on the subject of the illicit traffic from the African coast, and its consequences, offered to the Governments of all Christian nations. And moreover, that I was highly gratified at being told by your Lordship, that they came on a mission from the Society, to congratulate his Majesty the Emperor upon the measures adopted by his Government for the extinction of the traffic, and especially for the desire and determined resolution which he himself feels upon so important a subject. May they return and arrive in peace, to their own country and Society! In the mean time, while they remain here, they may calculate upon all the aid which this Government can afford.

"I renew to your Lordship the assurance of my particular esteem and consideration.

"I am your Lordship's

"Most obedient Servant,

"FRANCISCO ANTONIO RIBEIRA."

They witnessed, early one morning, the entrance into Pernambuco of 6000 horses carrying bags of sugar and bales of cotton on their backs, and so thronging the streets that it was difficult for passengers to force their way. This gives some idea of the traffic with the interior. At Madeira, on their homeward voyage, they had to perform a quarantine, and the government officer sending a launch to convey the whole company to the health station, an officer in the American Navy gave occasion for a smile at the expense of republican character.

"He put on his uniform, girded on his sword, came on deck, and declared that nothing should induce him to go ashore in the same boat with dirty coal-heavers; unless he could have a boat to himself, he would go on to Lisbon, or even to England; his bluster prevailed, and a private boat was despatched to convey him: he vindicated, he thought, the honor of a great nation, and descended and took his seat with much self-complacency. Americans can justify equality at home, but love distinctions abroad."

Our beloved friends appear to have performed their important mission most faithfully; and in a feeling of thankfulness for their preservation, amid many dangers encountered for the purpose of sowing good seed, we feel that we may safely leave the result to Him who giveth increase, well assured that labors, thus undertaken and honestly pursued in the Divine fear and counsel, "are not in vain in the Lord."

We finish this notice with their own concluding paragraph.

If in preparing the Narrative we have not spoken so strongly, as some may think we should have done, on the evils of slavery, it must be remembered that our object has been to record what we saw and observed, rather than what we had heard, or read. A stranger passing hastily through a foreign country is seldom able, from his own personal observation, to lay bare the state of society and exhibit it with correctness to others. This applies with peculiar emphasis to slavery, as an institution, whose hideous and revolting workings are often in secret, and carefully concealed from the eye of those who are known to be engaged in searching them out with a view to public exposure. Were we disposed to lengthen this Narrative, we could fill many pages with the horrors of Brazilian slavery, as exhibited in the reports, from year to year, of our Ambassadors and Consuls residing in that country, and from other accredited and recent sources, but we forbear. It is enough to know and to say that slavery is bad in Brazil, and in every country where it is tolerated, and that it is our duty, as professing Christians to join hand and heart in every Christian endeavor to sweep it from the world.

CHRISTIAN BENEVOLENCE.

By THOMAS C. UPHAM.

Luke x. 35, 37.

Who is my BROTHER? 'tis not merely he,
Who hung upon the same loved mother's breast;
But every one, whoever he may be,
On whom the image of a man's impress.
True Christian sympathy was never designed
To be shut up within a narrow bound;
But sweeps abroad, and in its search to find
Objects of mercy, goes the whole world around.
Tis like the sun, rejoicing east and west,
Or beautiful rainbow, bright from south to north;
It has an angel's pinion, mounting forth
O'er rocks, and hills, and seas, to make men blest.
No matter what their color, name, or place,
It blesses all alike,—the universal race.

OHIO FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION.

At the annual meeting of the Free Produce Association of Friends of Ohio Yearly Meeting, held at Short Creek meeting-house, on 2d day afternoon, the 5th of 9th mo. 1853.

The minutes of the last annual meeting, together with those of the Board of Managers, and the Annual Report, were read and approved; and the Board of Managers were directed to forward the report, and a notice of such parts of the proceedings of the meeting as they deemed proper, to the Non-Slaveholder and Friends' Review, for publication.

The committees of correspondence appointed last year, within the limits of the different Quarterly meetings, were continued, and they were encouraged to open free subscriptions in their respective neighborhoods, for the purpose of carrying on the free-labor movement, and were specially requested to endeavor to extend the circulation of the Non-Slaveholder, as a means of awakening a greater interest in the concern.

ANNUAL REPORT.

The Board of Managers of the Free Produce Association of Friends of Ohio Yearly Meeting, in presenting their Fourth Annual Report, acknowledge that the success of our efforts, and the advancement of the cause in which we are engaged, depend upon the goodness of God, to whom we should earnestly look for wisdom and guidance in all our efforts. From the reading of our minutes, it will be seen that we have met monthly. We have endeavored to keep the importance of the Free Labor subject prominently in view, in the way that seemed best calculated to promote the advancement of our testimony against slavery, which is incomplete without an abstinence from the use of its products.

It will also be seen, that we have in accordance with your recommendation of last year, labored much, in connection with others, for the establishment and support of a Periodical, devoted specially to the advocacy of the Free Labor question; and we are pleased to inform the Association of the resuscitation of the Non-Slaveholder, under the charge of our friends William J. Allinson, as Editor, and George W. Taylor, as publisher.

This paper has already obtained a very respectable circulation, and we fully believe is contributing much towards the advancement of a faithful and consistent testimony against slavery; yet we would here particularly recommend to the members of the Association individually, and to the friends of the cause generally, the necessity of using their influence and exertions to give it a still wider circulation.

As the only periodical in our country, established expressly for the purpose of diffusing light upon the Free Produce question, and advocating the consistency and necessity of an abstinence from the use of the products of slavery, the friends of the cause should see that it does not languish for want of support and encouragement.

Upon the other side of the Atlantic, the little periodical sheet entitled, "The Slave, his wrongs and their remedy," is still, we believe, effecting a very salutary influence in favor of the cause it so earnestly advocates.

We are much encouraged by the appearance during the past year, in the "Friends' Review," of several excellent articles on the subject, and also by the appearance, occasionally, of articles on the free-labor movement, in several papers within our own state, among which we would mention the "Herald of Freedom," published at Wilmington, Clinton county; "The Columbian," of Columbus; and the "Oberlin Evangelist," at Oberlin Institute, Lorain county. As an exponent of the views of the Professors and other officers of the extensive institution of learning at that place, we are gratified with the position lately assumed by the last mentioned periodical, on the Free Labor movement. From communications recently received from thence, we are happy to believe that the obligation to abstain from the encouragement of slave-labor, has taken a deep and abiding hold of the minds of many of the students and citizens, and is recognized by nearly all as of binding force. The increasing interest in the subject, is expected to result in the establishment among them, of one or more Free Labor stores, the business of which will be confined exclusively to the sale of goods uncontaminated by slavery.

We would add "The Christian Press," Cincinnati.—Ed.

We believe that persons in this country generally, except where too directly connected with the system of slavery by commerce, are more and more appreciating the consistency and justice of non-participation in slavery by the disuse of its products.

This we are happy to see manifesting itself in the action of almost every religious or ecclesiastical assemblage of whatever denomination, in which any pretensions to feeling on the subject finds admittance. But a short time since, and even those who were admitted as the devoted friends of the oppressed, appeared unable to see the necessity of refraining from the use of the products of slavery, or the bearing it would have upon the great question of the abolition of slavery; but such, we are most happy to state, is no longer the case. Instead of a total silence with regard to the use of slave-goods, resolutions are constantly being adopted, in conventions and associations, of the character above referred to, declaratory, not only of the incompleteness of the testimony against slavery without this necessary accompaniment, but the moral obligation to refrain from slave-grown products, and its direct tendency to destroy the system.

Even slave-holders themselves are found, both publicly and privately acknowledging the consistency, and direct bearing of this testimony, on the overthrow of slavery, and are charging home upon us the utter inconsistency and contradiction of professing or preaching opposition to the system, whilst we indulge in the unrestrained use of the products.

Indeed, it appears almost impossible that any one who can see any connection between making and vending, and using spirituous liquors, and drunkenness, should not also be able to see the connection between using the proceeds of slavery, and slavery itself. It is too plain to be longer called in question, that slaves are held in servitude, and compelled to severe and whip-extorted toil, for the sake of the money to be obtained by the sale of the products of their unrequited labor, and hence, that the atrocities of the system, are justly chargeable, in part at least, on the vendors and users of those products, as well as upon the slave owners.

In our own society, and particularly in the western country, we believe there is a decided progress in this testimony; and Friends are feeling more confidence in the probable good results of the labors in this particular branch of the anti-slavery enterprise. Many are glad to avail themselves of the opportunity afforded by the establishment of Free-labor stores, to supply their wants, without support to a system we all abhor. The fact that all necessary wants can be supplied, by the successful efforts in different places, to establish and sustain these stores, is cause of satisfaction and rejoicing to those who have a wish to separate themselves from all traffic in the toil of slaves. Let those who are not accommodated with a varied and general supply of Free Labor goods, be encouraged to submit to some privations, in order that they may maintain a decided opposition, in practice as well as word, to the robbery and wrong which the oppressor perpetrates.

We should let the memory of the sufferings endured by the victims of oppression, be so interwoven with the lines of our lives that we shall be disposed to embrace every suitable opportunity to speak and act for their good. Let us not allow that we are doing enough in giving up the use of the luxuries, and are supplying ourselves with what we deem necessities from the products of the slaves toil; or too readily pardon ourselves for the committal of a wrong against our brothers and sisters, which is no less a wrong to them because inducements to perpetrate it appear to be on excusable ground.

Shall all the sad array of weary wasting human forms, and wronged and stricken hearts, still fail to find relief? Must years of toil yet mark the lives of Africa's sons, and all the evils that are "nourished up into rank, vigorous growth in the soil of slavery," remain undisturbed, whilst the powers, the entrusted powers of freemen are either unemployed, or exercised upon subjects unworthy of regard, when compared with the cause of human rights and human liberty? When a feeling averse to self-denial is indulged, with a knowledge that this same indulgence to ourselves places others in conditions of suffering and degradation, it is presented in a form of selfishness and inconsiderateness altogether unbecomely in the remembrance of our own unworthiness of the least of the favors we enjoy, and under the influence of wide benevolence of feeling, there must be not only a willingness, but a decided inclination to submit to whatever restraints or efforts may have a tendency to the benefit of any class of sufferers.

Since, in a world like this, it is a first principle of christianity to forget ourselves and our own happiness, in order that we may do good to others, let us lay aside considerations of individual comforts and pleasures, when they interfere with our duty to our less favored brethren and sisters, of whatever color or name.

AN APPEAL FOR THE BONDWOMAN,

TO HER OWN SEX.

BY ELIZABETH LLOYD, JR.

PART VI.

CUNNING PLAYED ON THE LYRE!

Priestess to the sacred fire
Through all time alive and holy,—
Be thou of the great, or lowly,
By the freedom thy soul loveth
When through Fancy's realms it roveeth,
Flinging off the curb and rein
Put upon its speed in vain,—
By thy power of turning in,
When the world is waste and cold,
Weary of its dust and din,
Unto treasures more than gold,—
By the blessed joy of knowing
Thou hast strength within thee hidden,
Spiritual fountains flowing,
None may check or chill unbidden,—
Grateful for a precious trust,
Use it for the trembling Slave—
Woman, trampled in the dust,
Wake thy noblest strain to save!
By thy lofty hope of dwelling
Where the faithful only go,
On thy ear the pean swelling
Mortal never heard below;—
By thy Poet's trust of bearing
Branch of palm and harp of gold,
Sing for her—for day is wearing,
And thy hours will soon be told.

That helpless one hath earnest need
Of many lips her cause to plead.
Oh! not upon his head alone,
Who claims our Father's as his own,
Belongs the misery and sin
Her living soul is buried in:
By all the chains that mar and bind
The freedom of our common mind,
We make for her a starless sky—
We dim with tears her falling eye—
We lengthen out her day of toil,
And leave her for a prey and spoil.
Our bonds must one by one be broken—
And a language each will know,

Must to many hearts be spoken,
Ere we let the Captive go.

There are soldiers for the field,
Girded with Truth's sword and shield,
Aiming still at Justice' foe
Bloodless thrust and stunning blow:
But to thee, thou child of song,
Other tasks than these belong;
Not of them should'st thou be found—
For the work thou hast to do,
Seek not on the battle-ground,
But, to thine own calling true,
Plead with such as coldly stay
From the conflict far away.

As the Harper sought of old
Isolated castle-hold,
Poor man's hearth, and chieftan's hall,
Welcome by his gifts to all;
In the palace, in the cot,
Beating time to every lot,
So would'st thou an entrance find
Into castellated mind;
Lowly heart would let thee in,
And the proud unconquer'd soul
No rude touch could melt or win,
Might bow down to thy control.

If he moved the stern and cold
By some old "heroic strain,"
Daring youth and manhood bold—
Will thy harp be touched in vain?
Tell the Bondwoman's sad story—
And the spirits he could wake
To a love of strife and glory,
As they listen, down shall take
From the touched heart's castle wall,
Garnished by the God of all
Weapons for the Captive's sake!
(Concluded in next No.)

PRACTICE vs. PROFESSION.

Prof. How can we know the articles that are free from the taint of Slave-labor, if we must so brand them? Sugar for instance. What is there about the appearance of free labor sugar by which we may recognize it?

Prac. Though we may not be able to distinguish the free-labor sugar by any peculiar characteristic of the article, we need not be so ignorant in this day of the general diffusion of intelligence, as not to know that, through the blessing of Providence on the efforts of philanthropists, there are some tropical regions where the demon of slavery cannot set his foot any longer. Abundant supplies of sugar, molasses, rice, and various other tropical products can be obtained, and are obtained from those islands and countries.

Prof. But we cannot all be importing merchants; and how may we be assured that the articles we purchase are really from those places?

Prac. "Look ye out among you men of honest report, &c., whom we may appoint over this business." Let the business of procuring be entrusted to those who have a conscience in these matters. Establish, and maintain, a central warehouse where no slave-labor goods shall be sold. Let the management of this concern be confided to one or more persons of acknowledged ability, and having a general comprehension of what is to be done; that every needful guard may be set, and no imposition practiced. This done, let those in every neighborhood who desire to use the products of required toil, either unite their orders for obtaining supplies from the central depot, when they are too remote to obtain them individually, or make their custom at their neighboring stores conditional on their supplies being obtained from this source, so far as is necessary to furnish the free-labor consumption.

Prof. This may prove satisfactory so far as groceries are concerned. But where is a sufficient supply of free-labor cotton to come from?

Prac. It has been found by inquiry in the southwestern states, that there are many planters of small means, who neither own slaves nor employ them. They nevertheless, manage to raise by their own hands and the aid of their families, a few bales of cotton, which it is to their interest to put up in nice order. In various parts of Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, Texas, and Arkansas, there are numbers of planters thus circumstanced, who live in associated neighborhoods, rendering it practicable and customary to have their cotton ginned without the aid of slave-labor. This cotton can be purchased at the market prices for cash, and the parties raising it are willing to give certificates that they neither own slaves nor hire them, and that the cotton they furnish has been raised and handled entirely by white people. —(To be Continued.) #### For the Non-Slaveholder. COMPENSATION TO THE SLAVEHOLDER.

If what is criminal in Slavery rested solely upon the personal holders of the Slave, and none on those who give the essential stimulus to the system, and who gather to themselves wealth and comfort out of it, there would be much force in the objection of W. E. to any national relief to the Slaveholder in compensation to him for the emancipation of his Slaves; but it so happens that the whole nation is "particeps criminis" in this matter. The question then arises—shall the enriched nation disgorge none of its ill-gotten gains to relieve the impoverished emancipator on the plea that doing so would recognize "property in man;"—or would it not rather deny that claim of "property," by applying a part of its "unrighteous mammon" to the relief of those who, in the winding up of the cruel evil are the only sufferers among the more numerous offenders, yet have with them an equal right, whatever worth, to that mammon?

"Honor among thieves," is an adage which seems to have some appropriateness in this case; and I suggest to W. E. a re-consideration of his views in the light of it. P. L. A.

REDEMPTION OF SLAVES BY PURCHASE.

I find in the 10th number of the Non-Slaveholder, some observations on a note which I addressed to the Editor, and which he inserted in the 8th number, relative to the redemption by purchase, of the slaves whom the people or legislature of any slave-holding state may agree to emancipate, on condition of being paid what may be deemed a moderate valuation. There can certainly no arguments be required to convince me, or those of similar sentiments, of the intrinsic injustice of slavery; or of the total nullity of the claims advanced by slaveholders, to the persons and services of their slaves. To the arguments of W. E. to prove the moral obligation which rests on the possessors of slaves to grant their immediate and unqualified emancipation, I can cordially assent. The only question between us seems to be whether we are bound to depend exclusively on the justice of our plea, or whether we may not properly, and with due regard to the principles of universal righteousness, share in the sacrifice necessary to secure a boon which we all agree is unquestionably due to the colored race.

Perhaps a fact may illustrate my view on the subject. Nearly fifty years ago, I was informed early one morning, that a black man residing in the neighborhood, had been seized as a fugitive slave. Now it had happened that this man told me, some time before, that he had escaped from slavery, and requested that I would negotiate a purchase of his freedom. I quickly set out with one of my neighbors in search of the party; and upon finding them, my knowledge of the slavery of the prisoner, did not restrain me from insisting upon the most rigorous proof on the part of the claimant, who then had him in his possession. But the proof appeared overpowering, and no defect in the legal proceeding afforded us any opportunity to release the prisoner by civil process. We were therefore reduced to the alternative of abandoning the poor victim of an unrighteous law, to the mercy of a master, who did not seem to be overcharged with humanity, or of trying what could be done by way of purchase. Did we by adopting the latter expedient give our sanction to the master's claim? I tried the effect of moral reasoning on the subject, and was answered by a derisive laugh. In trying a negotiation, we felt no scruple in screwing the master down to the lowest price we could attain; but after a good deal of chaffering, a practice to which I was not much accustomed, having arrived, as we supposed, at a minimum price, we paid for the man, on the spot, and set him instantly free.

Perhaps our sympathies operated upon our judgment, but during the time which has elapsed since the transaction, I have never repented of the part which I took in the case.

If now the people of the free states would voluntarily assent to the extension, to one or two states, a single one if they please, of the same principle of action which a few of my neighbors and myself, applied to an individual case, an object would be attained which we all desire to see effected. If the free states or the United States, should agree to purchase, upon what would be deemed moderate terms, (the lower the better, so that the purchase was effected) of all the slaves in Delaware, and restore them to the rights of men, it appears to me that no new principle of action would be adopted. The practice has long and extensively prevailed, of contributing to the purchase of slaves in cases of unusual hardship, not as an acknowledgment of any right in the possessor but as the only method which the laws and usages of our country have left within our power. If we can without encroachment on moral rectitude, promote by purchase, the emancipation of individual slaves when their circumstances are calculated to rouse our sympathy to its greatest intensity, what is the difference, except in our own sympathetic feeling, between cases of the kind alluded to, and those ordinary ones, which we know prevail in all slave-holding communities. #### THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, ELEVENTH MONTH, 3, 1853.

A MOUTHFUL OF TALK TO OUR SUBSCRIBERS.

We are near the end of our first volume, and, as the reasons which induced us to commence it continue to operate, it is our prospect (Providence permitting,) to continue our task. We have therefore a few words to say to all our subscribers, and to all our readers, (from among whom we hope for additional subscribers.)—"To all, to whom these presents may come, greeting."

It is desirable that the names of subscribers should be forwarded to the publication office, by the first of 12th month, or as soon as practicable thereafter, that we may know how large an edition will be needed.

As the interest in the Free Produce cause has considerably advanced within the past year, and as the Non-Slaveholder is believed to have contributed towards this result, it is not unreasonable that we should ask of our friends a continuation and an increase of zeal in extending its circulation. As it was not undertaken for pecuniary profit, it has so far been conducted at a pecuniary sacrifice. Several efficient and true hearted friends of the enterprise have, by extensive, and doubtless arduous correspondence, done much to enlarge the subscription list, and to them, for the cause sake, our acknowledgments are due: yet we feel no diffidence in asking a continuance of their zeal, since our own labor, for the same object, has been much greater, and at much greater cost. The mere effort of writing editorials and making selections, is small and light compared with the incidental claims and cares, the vexations and disappointments, which only an Editor can appreciate or imagine. We endeavor to "take things by their smooth handle," yet if we talk from this platform another year, we wish to be assured of an enlarged audience, and to feel that we are not toiling in vain.

Our terms will be the same. Fifty cents for one subscriber:—One dollar for three; Two dollars for eight. Always in advance.

There are many hundreds from whom we have not yet heard, to whom we are certain that the journal would be worth its cost. There are very many who would actually be better off in their spiritual circumstances for paying the almost nominal price of eight copies, and giving them away.

We are disposed to be about as modest as the occasion requires, at the same time sufficiently explicit. We would like to have as many subscribers as we can obtain; and we intend to please them, if their tastes, judgment and principles coincide with our own.

We are still able to supply complete sets of the present volume, (although we are likely to run short of No. 3—if any have duplicates of that No. we would be glad to receive them) and we advise new subscribers to order the back numbers and to file or bind them for preservation and future reference. We shall furnish with No. 12, (or as soon after as possible) a title page and table of Contents.

EDITORIAL JUSTICE.—We have noticed with some surprise the transfer of sundry essays which were written for the Non-Slaveholder to the columns of other periodicals without any credit. From our ninth number the following articles were thus appropriated. "Always rejoicing:—"A Testament for Slave-land circulation:"—and the dialogue "Practice versus Profession." We feel sure that at least the cases we have specified must be attributed to inadvertence. An attention to usual etiquette in this matter is due on the score of Justice. An Editor is at liberty to enrich his Journal from the pages of another, on condition that he make known to whom he is indebted, and thus bring the periodical from which he copies, to the knowledge of perhaps a new class of readers, some of whom may become subscribers. This act of Justice we have carefully observed towards the papers whose conductors have forgotten to reciprocate it.

THE WILKSBARRE SLAVE CASE.—SLAVE CHASERS ARRESTED.—JUDGE GRIER SOILS THE ERMINE.—This case is well known to the reading public, and we need not tell of the violence committed upon the poor fugitive, nor harrow afresh the feelings of our readers by depicting his desperate flight, whilst his base and blood thirsty hunters pursued him with fire-arms, seeking to take his life. We need not describe his desperate resort to the water, with a fixed determination to put away his life rather than lose his liberty.

The deputy slave catchers were subsequently arrested for riot and assault and battery with intent to kill. Judge Grier granted a writ of habeas corpus, and the High Constable and his prisoners were brought before him, and the case finally dismissed. The conduct of Judge Grier has been so at variance with Judicial decency, that plain citizens who do not pretend to accurate legal knowledge, feel no confidence that the law has been honestly illustrated and applied by him. They perceive, throughout his course, that he is the partizan of the Slave catchers.—They perceive that his "opinion," is full of special pleading,—that after refusing to hear the testimony, he mis-states and perverts the facts of the case. They think that they can see that he was, like Tom Moore's lawyer,

"Born with a taste for the unfair,"— and they inquire among themselves: "Is there no way for Judge Grier to be impeached?"

We heartily rejoice in the escape of the fugitive. It would have been peculiarly a hard case, had he been captured, after such amazing efforts to escape. We wish no harm to Judge Grier.—We think him a great sinner, and we desire his repentance, amendment and salvation. But we have been thinking that as Keith of Virginia had precisely equal right to the ownership of Bill Thomas, and of "his honor the Judge," (that is to say, no right at all in either case,) and as Thomas had served in bondage till he could bear it no longer and had managed to escape, while Grier had never served at all; how much more just (we mean, less unjust) it would have been, for Keith to have sent his miscreants in full howl after Judge Grier, with bludgeons and pistols, to beat him, to shoot at him while running and while swimming, calling upon Marshals and Deputies, and all bad citizens to aid in the evil conspiracy. We are glad that they did not treat Judge Grier in this manner. We are sorry that they treated William Thomas so. But if one or the other must be victimized; we see not but that it had been better (that is less bad) to abuse Grier than Thomas. The negro is very probably the better man of the two—at any rate he knows how to run away better than the Judge knows how to behave himself upon the bench—and as he has had his share of Slavery, if there must be more victims take fresh hands—and as the colored race neither devised nor approve the fugitive bill, take white folks—and as Judge Grier is so favorable to the Slave system, take him—or—nobody.

But this fugitive bill is no sound law! It has no true legal basis! It contravenes the precepts and commandments of the Supreme Lawgiver of the Universe. No law is lawful which has his disapprobation. "You may statute but you cannot legalize it." His will is supreme. Every christian prays daily that it may be done on Earth. And it will be—and this, and other wicked enactments will melt away before it.

COTTON FIGHTS AND CONQUERS.—In every moral discussion the unwitting and incidental testimony of an adversary is deemed significant. The Charleston (S. C.) Mercury, in the course of an argument to prove his position that "Slavery is a positive good in itself," presents us with the following strong reason for withholding the motive.

"If not by the expansion of area, certainly by the diffusion of her grand project, the South is growing more powerful abroad. There is not an additional bale of cotton which leaves our shores, but renders the world more tributary to her labor, and more dependent upon its successful permanency. Defying all competition, whitening the wharves of every port, and clothing alike the peasant and the prince, whithersoever it goes, cotton fights and conquers for Southern Slavery. It closes the question by its actual and wide spread blessings."

Recently, in a neighboring city, a very pro-slavery N. Orleans relief committee assumed the sufficiency of Corron to fight and conquer the Yellow Fever and its attendant calamities, and they announced that they did not wish contributions from Abolitionists. None of the Gothamite Cotton Princes, however, came up to the thousand dollar donation of "the man of Peterboro" whose pocket and whose conscience are alike unsullied by the gratification or the profit arising from slave-grown produce.

NEW SPECTACLES WANTED.—The Austin (Texas) State Gazette complains of reiterated cases of misconduct of negroes, one instance being the murder of an overseer by a Slave who was daily subjected to his loving kindness, or the reverse, as the case might be; and gives the sum of the matter—the moral—the philosophy as follows:

"The control of masters over slaves in Texas, is not sufficiently strict and severe:—there lies the evil."

We find by our Exchanges that in other Slave States overseers have been killed by Slaves, but mild treatment is not stated as the cause. We always lament such acts of violence, but the true deduction of effect from cause is given by the Freeman in the caption of one of these sad anecdotes. "REVENGE THE FRUIT OF TYRANNY." Our readers will not think the query impertinent—Who gives the motive?

FREE PRODUCE CONVENTION SUGGESTED.

—We see in F. Douglass' paper a letter to Gerrit Smith from our valued friend and contributor H. Miles of Monkton, Vermont, suggesting "the propriety of organizing an American Free Produce Association:—of holding a convention during the fall or winter,"—"Let us," says H. M. "have a demonstration that there is some 'resolution in our resolves' to have no union with slaveholders, politically ecclesiastically or commercially." G. Smith in an unpublished reply says,

"I and my family have refrained for 20 years from Slave produce. It is one of the ways by which, UNDER GOD, I AM ABLE TO MAINTAIN MY ANTI-SLAVERY PRINCIPLES. I should be much pleased to see such an Association as you speak of."

A kindred project has been entertained by some friends in this vicinity.

TURKEY.—DECLARATION OF WAR.—"Telegraphic despatches are such as to make the stock-jobbers dizzy." Such is the prominent thought of the London correspondent of an important Commercial Journal, in announcing a crisis which threatens the peace of Europe. The philanthropist's heart grows heavy in the apprehension of results, far more dreadful in his estimation than the dizziness of a few selfish stock-jobbers' heads. He thinks of "confused noises, and garments rolled in blood,"—of desolated homes,—of mangled bodies, and departing souls. He shudders to think "in that sleep of death what dreams may come," and remembers that "after death cometh the judgment." According to his ideas of political economy, no circumstances can arise to render a war expedient: no causes, no provocation can be sufficient to justify it. The enlightened republican thinks within himself,—

"War is a game, which, were their subjects wise, Kings could not play at."

The student of prophecy, feels a solemn thrill through every vein, as he marvels whether, in this stirring up of nations, the dominion is now to be taken away from the fourth beast having ten horns, (Dan. vii. 23, 26.) He feels that the present crisis moment will be a point of interest to future christian historians, either from the greatness of the events, or from the extension of God's restraining power to hold back the wrath of man until the fulfilling of his time. The call is emphatic upon every denizen of Earth, so to live that his soul may be secure, while thrones are cast down, Prophecy takes its course, and the consummation hastens; so to live that in the perfecting of the unarrainable WILL he may not be "afraid with any amazement," but may like Daniel, "stand in his lot at the end of the days."

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE THIRTEENTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE AMERICAN AND FOREIGN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY: PRESENTED AT NEW YORK, MAY 11, 1853. 216 PAGES.

We cannot well speak too highly of the interest and value of this elaborate document. It is worthy of preservation in a permanent form in every christian's library. Were we not otherwise "full of matter," we might profitably fill our sheet with extracts. The range of subject matter is large, "embracing" (says a notice in the Era) "not only a copious history of the past year, (political, ecclesiastical, and miscellaneous,) on the subject of slavery and abolition, but much important additional information concerning the present position of the slave question, some of which was never before published."

We have to acknowledge a kind notice of our humble periodical, and a fair statement of the objects of the Free Produce Associations of Friends.

The edition is large, and copies will be sent gratis to any one who will address (postage paid) L. Tappan, 48 Beekman st., N. York, enclosing four postage stamps to pay the postage on the pamphlet. The offer is liberal, and every person who wishes either to be posted up on the subject, or to contribute to an Anti-Slavery Library, should avail himself of it.

PLATFORM OF THE AMERICAN ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY AND ITS AUXILIARIES. 86 pages.—This pamphlet which contains the constitution of the Society and declaration of its sentiments adopted twenty years ago, and a recent exposition by W. L. Garrison, is prefaced by a paragraph addressed "to the the reader," which says that, "by these documents, and by its official acts," the Society asks to be judged."

We turn over the pages, to see how far this important Society has recognized and developed the non participation idea, which we deem so sound, and which certainly gains favor daily. We do not look in vain. The documents are full of noble sentiments, some of which cover the whole ground. This little book is a well-timed re-assertion of this fundamental principle, and we trust it may check many of its readers from giving to a brother the motive for sinning. W. L. G. in his Exposition says:

"No steps has the American Anti-Slavery Society ever taken backwards. Not that it is conceited, dogmatical, unwilling to yield when in error, but because there has been no occasion for retracing or going back."

In the declaration (adopted simultaneously with the Constitution) a powerful document, permeated with eternal truth, after declaring that slaves are "plundered daily of the fruits of their toil without redress,"—it is asserted "that no man has a right to keep back his hire by fraud;" and this unquestionable position being admitted, we would suggest to all anti-Slavery friends the inquiry, how can the right accrue to us, to accept the hire from those who have kept it back? In the next paragraph it is well asserted, that "Every man has a right to his own body—to the products of his own labor, &c." After this much, we cannot wonder, that, in immediate connection with solemn resolves, the determination should be written out: "WE SHALL ENCOURAGE THE LABOR OF FREEMEN RATHER THAN OF SLAVES, BY GIVING A PREFERENCE TO THEIR PRODUCTIONS." Truly, "there has been no occasion for retracing or going back" from this position, and if it be only to "give the preference," we wish our friends to keep their ground. Give the preference to free groceries, (they may be obtained)—sugars, rice, coffee, &c. Give the preference to flax, to wool, or to free grown cotton, even though it be at some expense of pride, and though it involve the cultivation of that christian grace, humility, wear for the slave's sake, if needs be, a homelier garment, and as thou lookest thereon, "remember those in bonds as bound with them."

AMERICAN SLAVE CODE.—W. GOODELL.

We have already noticed this work on page 24, and we again commend it to all who wish to have, in form for convenient reference, complete, reliable and irrefutable information respecting the "domestic institution" in behalf of which the South and the North, like Ananias and Sapphira, conspire together to "lie unto God," and which is hourly the occasion of such enormous cruelties

"as make the angels weep."—

From chap. 10, we extract the following notice of

"a merciful Safety valve."

"In our chapter V. on the 'Uses of Slave Property,'" it was shown how coolly and deliberately gangs of slaves are used up on the sugar plantations of Louisiana, once in seven or eight years. In Mr. Weld's book, before us, we have many testimonies that corroborate the general fact. We spare room for only one, which comes on the authority of Rev. John O. Choules, Baptist minister, once of New Bedford, Mass., afterwards of Buffalo, New York. "While attending the Baptist Triennial Convention at Richmond, Va., in 1835," says Mr. C., "I had a conversation with an officer of the Baptist church in that city, at whose house I was a guest. I asked him if he did not apprehend that the slaves would eventually rise and exterminate their masters? 'Why,' said the gentleman, 'I did use to apprehend such a catastrophe, but God has made a providential opening, a merciful safety valve, and now I do not feel alarmed, in the prospect of what is coming.' 'What do you mean,' said Mr. Choules, 'by Providence opening a merciful safety valve?' 'Why,' said the gentleman, 'I will tell you.' The slave-traders come from the cotton and sugar plantations of the South, and are willing to buy up more slaves than we can part with. We must keep a stock for the purpose of rearing slaves, but we part with the most valuable, and at the same time the most dangerous; and the demand is very constant, and is likely to be so, for when they go to those Southern States, the average existence is ONLY FIVE YEARS!"

WEEKLY MISSOURI REPUBLICAN.—Some one has sent us this paper for the 7th inst. It is a large sheet, with a business appearance. The feature which most attracted our attention, however, is certainly not very "Republican." The advertising columns are sprinkled with cuts of negroes, with advertisements of rewards for the recapture of self-emancipated bondsmen.—"Negroes wanted,"—&c. A certain John Mattingly advertises for 2500 negroes, brags of his new jail, and "wishes to purchase every good negro offered." We are pretty certain that he is not a good white man, but what shall we say or think of the newspaper conductor, who thus for hire leads himself to Satan's vilest work. We wish no harm to the Republican, nor to his advertising patrons, Flournoy, Smith, Lynch, Mattingly &c.—but we think when a gang must be made up "for the N. Orleans market," it would really be better to sell them off, than to catch and send back poor fellows who have had their term, and have proved their fitness for freedom by their efforts to obtain it. It was quite refreshing to see, among these advertisements, a reward offered for a runaway horse.

*Among other uses incurably sick damaged and disabled negroes are bought "cheap, like old iron," by medical institutions, "to be experimented and operated upon, for purposes of medical education and the interests of medical science."

The following communication, addressed to our subscribers by a valued friend in Ohio, who, in co-operation with others has rendered most efficient service in extending the circulation of our paper, was received just as we were ready for the press. It is most gratifying as an evidence of zeal on the part of distant friends, and cannot, we think, fail to enlist volunteer agents.

We call upon those to whom the present number is sent, to consider whether it may not be proper for them to obtain new subscribers in their respective neighborhoods, or to hand it to some one who would be likely to take an interest in the work.

Pecuniary considerations had nothing to do with the establishment of our paper; and apart from such considerations, it is desirable to bring the Non-Slaverholder before a new class of readers. The reasons for aiming to do so, are too obvious to dwell upon. The greater the number of conscientious persons whom we can induce to look the subject fully in the face, and think seriously upon it, the more probability will there be that our abstinence from Slave produce may tell upon the system of Slavery.

To the Subscribers of the Non-Slaverholder.

Feeling a deep interest in the advancement of the cause of human freedom, we have entertained strong desires for the continuance of the Non-Slaverholder, an efficient advocate of a branch of that cause, which has engaged too little of the attention of the christian philanthropist.

We have felt bound to make an appeal to the subscribers individually, that they not only continue their subscriptions, but consider themselves as agents for obtaining as many additional subscribers as possible; let every one feel that upon them individually rests the responsibility of its continuance. If each could obtain but one additional subscription, it would establish this periodical upon a permanent basis.

It is very desirable that the circulation of the Non-Slaverholder should be largely extended. The price is but a trifle, 25 cents per copy per annum to clubs of 5 or upwards. It is of creditable appearance, and will be valuable for preservation. Will not (then our young men, and young women throughout the land, those whose hearts are ever ready to feel and sympathize with the oppressed, enlist in this righteous cause, and make up clubs of subscribers for the Non-Slaverholder?

This has been done in a praiseworthy manner the present year by many of this interesting class, and we rejoice in believing that this method will be extended, particularly in localities, where we think the Non-Slaverholder would be a welcome visitor, but where we are sorry to learn but few copies are yet taken.

Then may we feel an assurance that this periodical will become firmly established, and its usefulness increased. That the principle it advocates will be more generally embraced by the sincere advocates of universal emancipation, and that a powerful restraint will be thereby exercised upon the dark crime of Slavery the world over.

AN APPEAL FOR THE BONDWOMAN, TO HER OWN SEX.

BY ELIZABETH LLOYD, JR.
PART VII.

SINCE and PERITENT! uplift thine eyes,
Bent on the past too sadly and too long,
From fast, and vigil, and vain sacrifice,
Rouse to the story of a sister's wrong.

BEAUTY hath beard it—and hath turned aside
From heartless homage, to make glad our way;
Converts from humble hearth and hall of pride,
Follow our standard in a firm array.

AWAKEN, with its eager straining eye,
Mark'd in their strife with wrong, our early brave,
Flung to the winds its schemings wild and high,
And pledged its strength for Freedom and the slave!

And GENTLE is with us, dropping dew
Upon our toil-worn hearts in holy Song,
Setting to music doctrines stern and true,
And making green our pathway hard and long.

SORROW hath brought her sympathetic tears,
And MIRTH our drooping spirits doth beguile,
Hope keeps a patient watch with all our fears,
And FAITH bends o'er us with an angel smile.

Some are beside us, bearing on their way
The lone slave's burden, meekly and serene.

Her stripes and groans, as, in a darker day,
One wore our bonds—THE HOLY NAZARINE!
Chastened and contrite one! but yet we need
Thy knowledge, and thy strength, of suffering born
Not for the slave alone to strive and plead,
But for her tyrant, sitting high in scorn.
For who like one who knows the Tempter's power,
Can find into a hardened heart, the way?
In sad remembrance of her own dark hour,
Learning to pay all that go astray.
By the deep quiet of a soul forgiven,—
The humbling lessons thou wert crushed, to learn—
By thy sweet foretaste of the joy in Heaven,
When lost ones, who have missed their way,
return—
Draw near us—the oppressor needs a friend,
Slow to reprove, forbearing in the right,
Till God in mercy over him shall bend
On his dark path to say, "Let there be Light!"

For the Non-Slaveholder.

QUOTATIONS.

The liberty which ardent minds often take with the writings of others—the dead especially—of italicising parts of a quoted sentence which the authors have not so emphasised, is a departure from the precise truth which a proper consideration of the subject will not justify. It is very clear that in so doing a magnitude may often be given to a point not so enlarged in the mind of the writer—thus doing an injustice to his views: at the same time a deception is to some extent practised on the unlearned reader, who confidently relies on the exactness of the quotation. In some cases, the effect may be equivalent to an interpolation. To avoid all error, it is better that the quotation should appear as found in the text, and the gloss be left to the reader, or separately stated by the commentator. VERITAS.

PRACTICE vs. PROFESSION.

Prof. Is there any way, by which such cotton may be certainly separated, collected and manufactured unmixed with slave labor cotton?

Ans. That has already been done repeatedly. First by the Free Produce Association, which sent a conscientious man into these states, who visited a large number of those planters at their own homes, and ascertained satisfactorily, that they neither owned nor hired slaves. This agent took down the address of those whom he considered reliable persons; and from them, free labour cotton has been obtained for the free labour store in Philadelphia. Some has been manufactured in this country, and some has been shipped to England and manufactured there, to supply the demand both in England and the United States.

Prof. Is there not a strong probability that after this free labour cotton has been thus honestly put into the hands of manufacturers, they will, to avoid trouble, allow it to be mixed with the cotton they buy in the open market, and thus defeat your object at last?

Ans. It is true there is some danger of this. To guard against imposition, manufacturers of integrity must be employed.

Prof. But is it not a very expensive as well as troublesome operation to clean out a mill in order to run this free labour cotton through by itself?

Ans. To avoid this expense, the plan is, to put into the mill a larger quantity of free labour cotton than is required for the fabrics wanted. On introducing it into the machinery, its progress is watched, and when the goods can be certainly considered all of the free labour material, they are set aside as such until the mixture again appears. But a less troublesome method, and requiring a smaller provision of free labour cotton, would be to establish mills to run exclusively on free labour cotton. (C. W. Taylor proposes, if the friends of the cause will raise sufficient capital to purchase the machinery, to try the experiment on the smallest scale of running a mill on a variety of staple articles.)

Prof. I must confess, the free labour movement has more reason on its behalf, and appears more practicable than I at first supposed.

Ans. It is not only reasonable, and practicable, but demands attention and adhesion upon Christian grounds. CHURCH.

A TENDER CONSCIENCE.*

Soon after I entered this province, [Maryland] a deep and painful exercise came upon me, which I often had some feeling of, since my mind was drawn toward these parts, and with which I had acquainted my brother before we agreed to join as companions. As the people in this and the Southern Provinces live much on the labor of slaves, many of whom are used hardly, my concern was that I might attend with singleness of heart to the voice of the true Shepherd, and be so supported as to remain unmoved at the faces of men.

As it is common for friends on such a visit to have entertainment free of cost, a difficulty arose in my mind with respect to saving my money by kindness received, from what appeared to me to be the gain of oppression. Receiving a gift, considered as a gift, brings the receiver under obligations to the benefactor, and has a natural tendency to draw the obliged into a party with the giver. To prevent difficulties of this kind, and to preserve the minds of judges from any bias, was that divine prohibition: "Thou shalt not receive any gift; for a gift blindeth the wise, and perverteth the words of the righteous." Exod. xxiii. 8. As the disciples were sent forth without any provision for their journey, and our Lord said the workman is worthy of his meat, their labour in the gospel was considered as a reward for their entertainment, and therefore not received as a gift; yet, in regard to my present journey, I could not see my way clear in that respect. The difference appeared thus: the entertainment the disciples met with, was from them whose hearts God had opened to receive them, from a love to them and the truth they published; but we, considered as members of the same religious society, look upon it as a piece of civility to receive each other in such visits; and such reception, at times, is partly in regard to reputation, and not from an inward unity of heart and spirit. Conduct is more convincing than language; and where people, by their actions, manifest that the slave-trade is not so disagreeable to their principles but that it may be encouraged, there is not a sound uniting with some friends who visit them.

The prospect of so weighty a work, and of being so distinguished from many whom I esteemed before myself, brought me very low; and such were the conflicts of my soul, that I had a near sympathy with the prophet, in the time of his weakness, when he said, "If thou deal thus with me, kill me, I pray thee, if I have found favour in thy sight." Num. xi. 15. But I soon saw that this proceeded from the want of a full resignation to the divine will. Many were the afflictions which attended me; and in great abasement, with many tears, my cries were to the Almighty for his gracious and fatherly assistance; and after a time of deep trial, I was favoured to understand the state mentioned by the psalmist, more clearly than ever I had done before; to wit: "My soul is even as a weaned child." Psalm cxxxi.

2. Being thus helped to sink down into resignation, I felt a deliverance from that tempest in which I had been sorely exercised, and in calmness of mind went forward, trusting that the Lord Jesus Christ, as I faithfully attended to him, would be a counsellor to me in all difficulties; and that by his strength I should be enabled, even to leave money with the members of society where I had entertainment, when I found that omitting it, would obstruct that work to which I believed he had called me. As I copy this after my return, I may here add, that oftentimes I did so, under a sense of duty. The way in which I did it was thus; when I expected soon to leave a friend's house where I had entertainment, if I believed that I should not keep clear from the gain of oppression without leaving money, I spoke to one of the heads of the family privately, and desired them to accept of those pieces of silver, and give them to such of their negroes as they believed would make the best use of them; and at other times, I gave them to the negroes myself, as the way looked clearest to me. Before I came out, I had provided a large number of small pieces for this purpose; and thus offering them to some who appeared to be wealthy people, was a trial both to me and them. But the fear of the Lord so covered me at times, that my way was made easier than I expected; and few, if any, manifested any resentment at the offer, and most of them, after some conversation, accepted of them.

JOHN WOOLMAN, in 1757.

THE SLAVEMARKET AT MEMPHIS.—A correspondent of the Chicago Daily Times gives the following description of some things he saw at Memphis:—"I landed at this place on Christmas morning. The first thing that met my eye, standing on a high bank facing the river, was the following inscription in large letters, upon a fine building, with piazza and pillars in front:—'Bolton, Dickens and Co., Slave Dealers.' In addition to this, I soon found two others on one of the principal streets in the city, situated nearly opposite to each other. The sign of one read thus:—'Byrd Hill, Slave Market;' the other: 'Ben Little, Slave Market and Livery Stable.' I visited them, and was invited to walk in and look at the stock. Oh! how my whole being recoiled at the thought. There were men and women, girls and boys, of almost every shade of complexion, ranging in age from ten to thirty or forty, all well dressed, as you see no other slaves, except some favoured body-servants. Some of the best-looking young women were attired in beautiful de lains, made in the fashion too. When a stranger goes in, they are quickly arranged upon seats on either side of the room, and they watch with interest any one they suppose intends to buy. Of course, you can examine teeth, limbs, &c., and call for any exercises from them you choose. They are taken out every day and walked around in a large circle, the men and boys under one leader, and the females under another. I was not permitted to look into their place of confinement for the night, but only saw the grated window. Near by are horses and mules for sale, and they are fat and sleek, because in the market. For the same reason were these men and women well dressed."—A. S. Reporter.

WELL DONE.

The slave Lewis, while before the Commissioners last week, at an interesting moment of the trial, when all eyes for some minutes were fixed upon the court, took out a writ of Habeas Corpus on his own account, and taking himself into his own custody, walked out unperceived, and has not been heard of since. Mr. Commissioner felt that his proceedings were effectually quashed, and the Anglo-Saxon found himself in the vocative.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, TWELFTH MONTH, 2, 1833.

With this number, which concludes the volume, a title page and Index will be sent out for the use of those who wish to file or bind our Journal.

Our esteemed friend, the Publisher, wishes us to state distinctly, that his old list is thrown aside, and that no one can be known as a subscriber till his name is entered, on renewal of his subscription, in the new forwarding book. This cash system appears to be the only one on which we can proceed.

A large number of Subscriptions have been sent to us in clubs, and many of these have been paid by interested friends, without consulting the persons so furnished. The names were entered on receipt of the money. We cannot know what subscriptions will be renewed, and were we to continue to furnish our paper until requested to stop, we must incur the risk of sending to many non-subscribers, and hence, without incurring the expense of printing a large number of extra copies, we might be unable to meet new orders.

We hope and expect the renewal of most of the old subscriptions, and a large addition to our list. We hope that those to whom this volume has been sent without charge, will, if they approve our labors, take care to send us some additional names as subscribers. We have evidence that our little periodical has been instrumental in an accession to the number of those who admit its leading idea. This consideration will, we confidently trust, stimulate the friends of the cause to extend its circulation.

Promptitude in this matter is extremely desirable and important to us. New subscribers, and those who wish to renew their subscriptions, will accommodate us by remitting to our Publisher in time to enlighten us as to the probable demand before the publication of our next number.

With those who have accompanied us through this volume, we trust that there are established some feelings in common, which would induce an unwillingness to part company.

Those who have kindly acted as AGENTS of the cause in procuring subscribers, are requested, for the Slave's sake and for the testimony of Truth's sake, to renew their labor of love. These will not think their efforts in vain, even though it be their lot to swell the number of those, who, having labored in faith for the right, and not having received their heart's desire, died in faith.

"Knowing this—that never yet
Share of Truth was vainly set
In the World's wide fallow;
After hands shall sow the seed,
After hands from hill and mead
Reap the harvests yellow."

SPROUTINGS OF GRIER SEED.

"Many tuppenny magistrate, or any unprincipled interloper can come in, and cause to be arrested, the officers of the United States, whenever they please, it is a sad state of affairs."

"If habeas corpus are to be taken out after this manner, I will have an indictment sent to the United States Grand Jury against the person who applies for the writ, or assents in getting it, the lawyer who defends it, and the sheriff who serves it."—Judge Grier.

In our last, we noticed the attempted capture of the fugitive, W. Thomas, the arrest of the brutal men who outraged the community by beating him till his blood flowed like water, and aimed at his life with fire-arms, whilst he was, without resistance, effecting his escape, and the discharge of these criminals by Judge

Grier, who accepted testimony for defendants, rejecting that on behalf of the commonwealth.

The witnesses thus set aside by the modern Jeffries, gave their testimony, before Alderman Mitchell and Com. Ingraham. Their affidavits were sent to the Editor of the Register, who published them, having, as he says, "given every thing on the other side, Judge Grier's tirade against State magistrates included."

On this, complaint being made by John Jenkins and George Wynkoop, WM. BIRNEY, the editor of the Register was arrested on a criminal charge of libel, and was required to give bail in $800. He says:

Judge Grier threatens to have indicted, every body who shall take part in bringing such cases before our State Courts. A beginning is now made on the Editorial corps. We have been selected as the first victim. This we regard as a proud distinction. Tho' not a native of Pennsylvania, we shall let no right of tier's be stricken down in our person. Our cause is that of the whole press. We shall defend ourselves, even if to reach the shoulders of the chief abettor in this business, our blows must fall on errands.

The Grand Jury of Lucerne county, have found true bills against "the ruffian deputies" (as the Freeman styles them) Wynkoop, Jenkins and Crossen, "for their murderous assault on Wm. Thomas."—"We understand," says the Freeman, "that the most desperate efforts were made by the United States authorities to have the bill quashed; but the manly yeomanry of that mountain region did not choose to submit to their dictation."

Immediately after the arrest of Birney, was published an announcement and outline of a forthcoming drama in three acts, called "Bill Thomas, or the Marshal and his men." According to the programme, Judge Grier is to hold a conspicuous place, and to appear sufficiently odious and ridiculous. We mention this as one of the results of this bold violation of Justice, and glaring insult upon the people of a free Commonwealth. We trust that those who perceive the dangerous tendency of theatrical exhibitions, will not be snared, by their curiosity or their sympathies, into a violation of their well-ascertained sense of right.

"The Theatre was from the very first
The favorite haunt of Vice:—altho' some men,
Some very honest, wise and worthy men,
Have deemed it might be turned to good account,
And so perhaps it might:—but never was."

"A BRIBE FOR A JUDAS."—Under this caption the Freeman publishes the advertisement of Marshal Wynkoop, offering $100 reward for the arrest, or for proof leading to the conviction of the humane individual who acted the good Samaritan to William Thomas. The Marshal had better keep his hundred dollars, or invest them in the under-ground railroad; for the fact he wishes to ascertain will be sufficiently published in good time, in view of all the world; it is already

Recorded in the book which opened lies
Before the throne, scanned by angelic eyes.

At first blush it would seem that the coin might have been appropriately offered as a "Reward" to the good Samaritan referred to. But on reflection it will be seen that the helpers of those who are ready to perish, serve a bountiful Master, who recognizes deeds like this as done unto Him, and who is quite competent to reward his own servants, though his payments are made, "not as the World gives."

COLORADO.—Many of our readers are acquainted with R. Purvis, a gentleman of talent, education, refinement, and as well entitled to be respected in all his rights as any magnate of the land. Those who enjoy his friendship, derive fully as much benefit as they confer, in the interchange of thought and courtesy. And those who are not worthy of the society of gentlemen, may be the objects of his benevolence, but they enter not the circle of his friendship.

As Robert Purvis had not the ordering of his pedigree, as he did not select his parentage, it is neither to his credit nor the reverse that there is a slight admixture of African blood in his veins. It is, however, much to his credit, that his wife is the accomplished daughter of the late James Forten, for none but a man of merit could have secured her hand.

The son of this gentleman, (a gentleman himself) with two young women of education and refinement, and of African descent, who were guests at the house of Robert Purvis, visited the late Exhibition of the Franklin Institute, and were expelled, it is alleged, on the strength of an order of the Managers.

Had they sneaked into the hall without paying their admission fee? Nay verily! They purchased their tickets, and were admitted without objection. They anticipated none, or they would not have presented themselves. Especially, had any hesitation been foreseen, Purvis would never have subjected these really delicate and refined young women to the liability to insult.

Purvis Senior, prosecuted the policeman who committed the outrage, before Alderman Mitchell, who dismissed the case, as we think, unlawfully and unjustly. We do not suppose that the matter will rest here. Our friend Purvis is not one to yield, in his person, (he rights of all whose ancestry can be traced to the African Continent. We trust that he will so far guard his spirit as that Revenge shall not be a motive. We trust that he will remember that wicked men are to be pitied, and that no conceivable danger is so lamentable as that of a perilled soul. If he can maintain christian love for his enemies, we would be far from wishing him to rest his case, so long as he can, by pressing it, check this wicked disposition to trample on the rights of a foully injured class of our heavenly Father's children.

Not for revenge, not for wanton punishment, but for humanity's sake,—for the sake of Truth and right, the persons (whoever they may be) implicated in this despicable outrage, unless they will make ample reparation in a public apology, ought to be forced to pay exemplary damages.

MEETING IN MANCHESTER.—Our English exchanges are fraught with interesting anti-slavery matter. From a notice in the A. S. Reporter of a meeting at the Friends' Meeting House, Manchester, 9th mo. 18th. we clip some passages from the remarks of L. A. Chamerovzow.

Mr. Chamerovzow said that it would have afforded him much pleasure to yield to the wishes of the Manchester friends to hold a mass meeting on the anti-slavery question, but there was sometimes wisdom in resisting the solicitations of friends. His principal motive for desiring to confer with them—privately as it were—before holding a public meeting, was with a view to their coming to some common understanding as to the object of such a meeting, and the basis on which their proposed movement should be established. To hold a meeting in Manchester, simply to raise an outcry against slavery, he considered next to useless. Probably, not ten persons could be found in Lancashire who were in favor of slavery; and taking this for granted, they had no converts to make through the medium of a public agitation, which if undertaken at all, must have a definite object. If, however, in Lancashire there could be found no advocates of slavery, tens of thousands would be found to be advocates of cheap cotton. It was scarcely a figure of speech to say that the three million three hundred thousand slaves of the Southern States of the American Union, are held in chains of cotton. England alone had been computed to consume upwards of four fifths of the whole quantity of this staple produce of the United States. Cotton, then, might be regarded as the main-prop of American slavery, and what the anti-slavery friends of Manchester had to consider was, whether they could not procure supplies of free-labour cotton from other quarters, and thus render themselves to a certain extent independent of the American slaveholders. Now, a public meeting held to call attention to the importance of opening new sources for the supply of this important commodity, would be of so practical a character that it could not fail to recommend itself to the attention of all parties; and some such course he begged to recommend. In relation to this subject, the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society had directed their attention to the question of India Reform, as a means of introducing such ameliorations in the government of India, as should lead to a rapid development of the natural resources of that empire, and an augmented supply of free-labour cotton from the same region. They thought this to be one of the most practical instrumentalities for putting an end to slavery; for if the value of the slave-grown commodity could be reduced by the honest competition with it of the free grown article from India or elsewhere, slavery must infallibly be starved to death in many years. To accomplish this object, it would be necessary to agitate the country from end to end, because there were powerful influences at work to prevent India Reform, and unless public opinion declared itself uncompromisingly in its favour, no progress would be made. As soon, therefore, as the friends in Manchester were prepared to take this movement in hand as an anti-slavery instrumentality, the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society would be also prepared to take action, and send a deputation to attend a public meeting.

L. A. C. proceeded to discuss the position of American Churches, and, after remarks from others, the subjoined resolution was adopted.

Mr. Chamerovzow having given an outline of operations contemplated by the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, and embracing the following points; namely, 1st. The securing of a reform in the Government of India as a means of promoting the cultivation of free-labor cotton in that country; and, 2ndly, The calling of public attention, but especially that of the various religious denominations in Great Britain, to the position of the American Churches on the question of Slavery, in order to evoke, on the part of the former, a moral testimony against the shortcomings of their co-religionists in the United States with regard to this enormous iniquity; this meeting desires to express its cordial approval of this specific course of action, and resolves to promote the success of the same by every means in its power.

SUIT FOR DAMAGES.—One Johnson has sued the owner of a western Steamer for the value of his negro boy, who, by order of the mate, was piling wood, when by a mis-step he fell overboard and was drowned. Damages laid at $1000.

FLAX IN AMERICA.—An important, interesting and elaborate series of Essays upon this subject, is in course of publication in FRIENDS REVIEW. We designed attempting a condensation, but have concluded to refer the readers to the Essays in full. The subject has an important bearing upon our agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests, but a still more important one upon the FREE LABOR question, since it opens a prospect of a supply of linen goods, more durable, and at less cost than those made from cotton.

PENNSYLVANIA A. S. SOC.—Henry Grew, at the late anniversary of this Society, introduced a resolution affirming the apathy which exists respecting the use of Slave Produce to be inconsistent with the avowed principles of abolitionists;

"and that their requisition of the slaveholder to make great sacrifices for the cause of freedom and humanity, demands that they should make the smaller sacrifice of labor and expense, in procuring the products of re-quitied toil, so far as is practicable."

In the ensuing discussion, some objected to the sentiment, others to the wording of the part which we have quoted. It was intimated that some make this the "all in all" of the anti-Slavery cause. (An error indeed, if there be any such.) The subject was deferred to another meeting. Our friend Grew follows up the subject in the Freeman, in an Essay in which he happily maintains his position.

DEFERRED.—A valued communication from H. Grew is in type, but crowded out of this number.

GILDERSLEEVE'S LETTER.—This person, on whose affidavit the slave catchers were arrested, has written to Robt. C. Grier a letter, the manly dignity of which he would do well to emulate. Appended is J. L. Butler's deposition taken before and certified by Justice Barrows, that Judge Grier requested said Butler "to tell Mr. Gildersleeve that if he, Gildersleeve, should ever be brought before him, he would hang him." The high character of Barrows "as a citizen, a magistrate, and a Christian," is certified by two Presbyterian ministers, the cashier of the Bank, a Justice of the Peace, a Democratic Congressman, and a Whig Ex-Congressman. Gildersleeve's letter ends thus.

"The outrage at Wilkesbarre, and the indecent and arrogant zeal of a man who fills the high and honorable station of a Judge of the Supreme Court of the U. States, will do something to increase the intense odium with which the Fugitive Slave Act is viewed by the better class of the community. May that odium continue to expand and gather force until it shall finally render it impossible to execute this execrable act. If this be treason, you are at liberty to make the most of it."

IT IS THE SYSTEM.—F. Bremer in her "Homes of the New World," noticing the apathy, the total indifference with which really amiable people in Slave States witness the brutal maltreatment of negroes of both sexes, exclaims, "It is the system! it is the system which produces all this!" From that system, Reader, withdraw thy support. Be separate from it, and bear the eloquent testimony of a blameless example not so much against Slaveholders as against Slaveholding.

OUR TENTH NUMBER.—We have run almost entirely out of number 10. Our Publisher fears that his Packer has inadvertently sent No. 10 in place of No. 11, to a portion of our subscribers. If any have duplicates of No. 10 please send them back, as we are much in want of them. If any have received it a second time, in place of No. 11, such will please send it back addressed to "Non-Slaveholder, Philadelphia," taking care that the name of the person returning should be on each copy, that we may send No. 11 instead.

OUR NEXT VOLUME is to appear with an enlarged page. By widening and lengthening the columns we propose to give more reading matter.

Passages from our Correspondence.

MARCH CO, N. J., 10 Mo., 14th.—Yesterday I was at the Crystal Palace. Whilst gazing upon the vast collection, bewildering in its variety, I met with our friend T. D. W., and shall remember the warmth of our greeting when much that I saw will be forgotten. We spoke of the Anti-Slavery mission to the South,* prompted and prosecuted under deep religious feeling. In this connection I referred to the touching notice, in John Woodman's Life, of his visit to some of the Southern Colonies. Under a solemn conviction that he ought not to receive the gains of oppression, he distributed to the Slaves, either directly or through their masters, sums of money which he thought equivalent to the value of his entertainment. Who could have harmed this meek disciple, prostrated himself into the dust at his humiliating service, yet not daring to shrink from the divine reproof?

T. D. W. said it reminded him of a circumstance which occurred in Virginia. At the meeting of a Presbytery, its members were the invited guests of a wealthy slaveholding minister. One morning, one of the members took an early walk, and, happening by the Slaves' quarters, went in and saw their apartments and the miserable meal of which they were partaking. Returning to the house deeply oppressed in spirit, he sat down to the plentiful breakfast of his host, but he could not eat. On his describing the various deficiencies which were successively proffered him, inquiry was made as to the cause; when, overcome by his feelings, he burst into tears, and simply related the observations of the morning. So deep was the effect produced upon his auditors, that the report was unspoken. They went into the Presbytery, where he resigned the pastorate of his congregation. He removed to a free State, and remained there till his death.

A private letter, in the midst of some valuable remarks, has the following passage.

In many of the reports issued by Free Produce Associations, complaints of apathy occupy a conspicuous place. It may be that this apathy exists—it is equally true that such apathy being felt as a burden, is an indication of life somewhere. The impression still resting upon my mind is, that the declared friends of the Free Labor movement, including the Yearly Meeting of N. Y., of which I am a member, have not endorsed a delusive theory, in committing themselves on the side of Free Labor.

BALTIMORE.—A valued Friend referring to the favorable result of the efforts, at the late election, of the Friends of Prohibitory Law, says:

There was no compromise in the matter.—It was a clear understanding that the candidates if elected, were to labor for far-tee-totalism. The Sheriff, who is a resolute and able man, is elected for two years. The balance of the wards swell our majority to near one thousand. With such an example from a large commercial city, surely our counties will now take up the matter.

I am much hurried but must tell thee of a case of the power of conscience. I met one of our wholesale merchants on the day of election who has heavy consignments of country produce, especially of whiskey. I asked if he had voted. He said,—Yes, and for the Maine Law. It may seem strange," he continued, "for me to do so, as my commissions on Whiskey are $1000 a year, but my conscience bid me do what I knew was right, even though beggary to me should be the result." Hundreds voted secretly for the law.

But beggary won't be the result! We have not seen such men, nor their seed, begging bread. That man would make "a whole team," if hitched on to the Anti-Slavery Car. And if he were once to appreciate the principle of Non-Slaveholding as we seek to expound it, we do not think he would long hesitate to sacrifice luxury, and the slight pecuniary interest involved, at the shrine of principle. For aught we know, he may be one, who, adopting the views prevailing around him, would regard our Anti-Slavery yearnings and pleadings as futile;—be that as it may—we honor him, for he yields to manifested Duty, and such men may rise up in the judgment against many who yield their assent but not their obedience to the Right.

A PLEA FOR THE SLAVE.

For him who is not kinsman to the Slave.—

To whom some other God existence gave,—

To whom the eternal snow-powdered Dove

Hath never stooped on embassy of love,—

Of whom the God of Heaven is not the Sire,—

To whom the Holy Spirit hath not spoken,—

For him we speak not, nor awake our lyre,

We seek not from that soul an answering token.

But, to each soul who claims a Sire in Heaven,

To each for whom a Saviour's life was given,

In fervent love we send our voice abroad,

Beseeching, "Be thou reconciled to God."

Stupendous work! to make thy peace with Heaven!

To appease a God what offerings shall be given?

How wilt thou minister to His delight,

Or find oblation grateful in His sight?

How wilt thou reach Him in His bowers above

Save through His own blest medium?—God is Love

And love is the fulfilling of the law,

The sovereign tribute which he deigns to draw;

And love to Him, evinced through love to man,

Comprise the Gospel Law and Prophet's plan.

Pay to His almoners the tribute due!

In each down-trodden bondsman thou may'st view

Thy God rejected, outraged, and oppressed,

Of thy allegiance and thy love a test.

If to his misery thou hast steeled thy heart,

If to his need thou would'st not aid impart,

Or from the fugitive hast turned away,

Nor lent him shelter on his weary way,

Thou hast denied thy Maker before men,

And holy angels marked thy treason then.

Open thine eyes, and in each brother see

The representative of Deity!

With yearning love behold the meanest child,

Whose soul was ransomed by the undefiled,

Weep if oppression thrall his soul or limb!

Weep if Sin's worse domain hath fettered him!

Two harrowing spectacles our view arrest!

The man oppressor, and the man oppressed!

The plundered bondsman, when his race is run,

May hear from Heaven's high throne the words, Well done!

And he who sits thereon, may wipe his eyes,

While ambient glory thrills with glad surprise!

And he may range that living stream beside,

Whose waters from the throne like crystal glide,

Mirrored within its breast that tree revealing,

Whose verdant leaves are for the nation's healing.

"There shall be no more curse,"* to sadden him,

* Rev. xix. 2.

Not o'er the uncreated Light grow dim,— Redeemed—the unquenching tyrant's thralldom o'er—Mercy and Love are his for evermore!

If, for eternity, such hopes remain
For the poor slave now writhing in his chain,
Denied the brute's poor lotury,—to complete,—
Whose griefs and wrongs are multiplied each hour,
Beyond conception or description's power,
How must the Father, Maker, Judge of all,
Look down in wrath on his unhalloved thrall!
What words of human utterance can portray

The outpouring gush of tenderness and love,
The indignant pity, and the full array
Of sympathies, which should our bosoms move!
And breathe there one, who from respect to laws
Set in array against "the Great First Cause," Whose Will alone is Law o'er all supreme,
Would fail to break the tether from his limb?
Would hesitate to speed his onward way,
Fleeing to freedom from unrighteous sway?
When Law conflicts not with the right and true,
Render to Cæsar, then, the tribute due,
If minor evils to its code belong,
In peaceful non-resistance "suffer wrong"—
Or else, alike for interest and for right,
Thou may'st, in calm remonstrance, use thy might—
But when against EXTANT LAW arrayed,
Judge ye, if God or man should be obeyed!
When to this issue we, perforce, are brought,
God's will is everything,—man's law is naught!
Oh! harden not thy heart, nor ease it o'er
With selfish pretext, or with sophist lore.
Leave to the Eternal Arbiter the sway
Of those relations He alone can weigh;
And, for thyself, the simple Right pursue!
Keep this pure standard ever in thy view!
Expediency will still attend the right,
But, taken as a rule, will Virtue blight,
Lead thee a meteor chase, and dim thy moral sight.

But, most of all, be agonized for those
Who, while they bind the chain and wield the rod,
With infidel security repose.
As the crushed captive's cry ascends to God,
Who see, nor feel, nor fear the warnings given,
When the land darkens with the frown of Heaven!
For these speak out in love untrammelled words—
Such searching doctrine as the Truth affords!—
For these, incessant, let tongue, press, and pen,
Speak demonstration to the sons of men.
Scatter good seed abroad, and never cease!
Sow them in faith, and God will give increase!
Where Schuylkill sparkles o'er her rocky bed,
Where Delaware's serene expanse is spread,
Where Tombeckie with Mobile southward creeps,
Where Susquehanna's wealth impetuous sweeps,
Mingling where broad Potomac's current pours;
Where Colorado dimples with strange oars,
Where Rio Bravo bounds the land of Slaves,
Where golden sands the Sacramento laves,
Where swift Columbia leaps and whirls and gushes,
Where Erie to Ontario madly rushes,

Or Mississippi in her channel loiters,
Sow with unsparing hand beside all waters.
In the cold truckling North, and boastful South,
Sow pungent seeds of never dying truth;
And pray for wisdom, guidance, utterance, strength,
And that the scattered seed may grow at length,
And bring forth fruit to multiply again,
To the high praise of the great Husbandman;
That the unflattering witness in each breast
May speak rebuke which cannot be repressed,
And that the Sun of Righteousness may shine
In hearts where selfishness has found a shrine,
Till Magnanimity o'er Avrice stealing,
And human love supplant each sordid feeling.

The spurned of man hath still a friend above,
And, stored in Heaven, exhaustless founts of love.
But, for the wielder of the chain and whip,
Who holds God's image in his Hell-nerved grip,
Who gives Cain's answer when the inspeaking Word
Asks of his brother, earnest to be heard;
By whom unnumbered wrongs and stripes are given
To the loved representatives of Heaven,
Whom God hath made recipients of the care
And love He needs not, but which man should spare;
Who wrongs his Maker's image in the slave,
What hope of mercy gleams beyond the grave?
To him thy pity, not thy wrath, be given!
Pray that the chains which bind his soul be riven!
For, more degraded than the wretch he spurns,
Self-blinded, from the gospel light he turns;
Shuts out the Truth's effulgence from his soul,
Where wilful Error holds supreme control;
His heaven lent powers in Mammon's service wasting,
Most holy Truth to Falselood's service wresting;
The light within him is to darkness changed,
His soul from God and happiness estranged.
For him the beacon light!—the trumpet sound!
For him let yon blue arch with Truth resound!

Friends of the slave, pursue your Christian course,
Always in love, but with redoubled force—
Heed not the fruitful slanders which defame,
And brand with transient infamy your name.
Your reputation shall be safe with Him,
Whom sinners spit upon, reviled, and slew,
Yet pitying love breathed forth in prayer for them,
"Father, forgive—they know not what they do!"
Hold up the light before the bandaged eye!
Shout in the deafened ear the warning cry!
Forth from the press, let winged agents fly
To publish Freedom's doctrines, where alone
Her name, and not her living soul, is known.
And, whilst on Truth and Freedom's service bent,
On Truth's blest guidance be thy soul intent!
With watchful spirit tread the narrow way
Where thy Exemplar left a guiding ray.
Far from thy chafed heart be all the train
Of ill which on the untempered zealot gain.
In meekness do thy part, and look to Heaven!
In God's own time, not thine, the fetters will be riven!

TO THOSE I LOVE.

BY ELIZABETH MARGARET CHANDLER.

Oh, turn ye not displeased away, though I should sometimes seem
Too much to press upon your ear, an oft-repeated theme;
The story of the negro's wrongs is heavy at my heart,
And can I choose but wish from you a sympathizing part?

I turn to you to share my joy,—to soothe me in my grief—
In wayward sadness from your smiles, I seek a sweet relief:
And shall I keep this burning wish to see the slave set free,
Lock'd darkly in my secret heart, unshared and silently?

I cannot know that all the chords, which give their magic tone
Like Memnon's harp, in music out, 'neath sunshine smiles alone,
Are torn by savage hands away from woman's bleeding breast,
And with their sweetness on my soul, my feelings keep repress'd!

If I had been a friendless thing—if I had never known,
How swell the fountains of the heart beneath affection's tone,
I might have, careless, seen the leaf torn rudely from its stem,
But clinging as I do to you, can I but feel for them?

I could not brook to list the sad sweet music of a bird,
Though it were sweeter melody than ever ear hath heard,
If cruel hands had quench'd its light, that in the plaintive song,
It might the breathing memory of other days prolong.

And can I give my lip to taste the life-bought-luxuries, wrung
From those on whom a darker night of anguish has been flung—
Or silently and selfishly enjoy my better lot.
While those whom God hath bade me love, are wretched and forgot?

Oh no!—so blame me not, sweet friends, though I should sometimes seem
Too much to press upon your ear an oft-repeated theme;
The story of the negro's wrongs hath won me from my rest,—
And I must strive to wake for him an interest in your breast!

FREE LABOR MANUFACTORY.

TO ALL THE FRIENDS OF THE FREE LABOR MOVEMENT.

The importance to the cause of abstinence from the products of Slave Labour of a manufactory exclusively employed on free labour cotton, must be obvious to all who have been conversant with the many difficulties which have attended the occasional employment of mills, ordinarily filled with slave-grown cotton. The undersigned proposes the FOLLOWING PLAN for the supply of this desideratum.

If the friends of the movement will supply the means for the purchase of machinery and one half of the stock of cotton, (which must be procured in the winter for the whole year,) the undersigned will rent the machinery and purchase the cotton, guaranteeing 6 per cent. per annum interest on the whole, (a sum deemed adequate for wear and tear of machinery,) and keep it insured against loss by fire during the term of his lease:—and will also engage to purchase the machinery within five years from the time of its going into operation if required by the contributors of the fund, for a sum equal to the cost less the reserved fund.—It is proposed that the contributors appoint one or two of their number to hold the trust, and to attend to its proper application. Several Friends of this city and vicinity have subscribed one thousand dollars each, and some have offered five hundred dollars each. It is now proposed to the friends of the cause all over the country to make up about six or seven thousand dollars more, which they can readily do by subscriptions of twenty dollars and upwards—or even smaller sums. It is very desirable to have the mill go into operation the approaching spring.

Address, GEO. W. TAYLOR,
 First mo., 1854. Box 777, Philada.

Passages from our Correspondence.

WESTCHESTER Co., N. Y. (with 16 Subscribers.)—Having been furnished with the first Vol.
 of the N. S. by some unknown friend, we have been so far interested with it as to desire its continuance, and its perusal for another year; and well knowing that patronage is necessary, we have taken a little pains to ask our neighbors and friends to subscribe, and thus, with my own name, I send 15 others. It is a little trouble, but more imaginary than real, and if every family who read the paper last year at some other person's expense, would do only as much as we have done, it would no doubt add very considerably to the circulation of the paper, and stimulate the benevolent to "cast their bread upon the waters." We shall continue to obtain subscribers, as opportunity offers, at the club price, as the cheapness of the paper induces some to try it.

JACKSON Co., MICHIGAN, (with a subscription.)—Being determined not to support Slavery in any way, shape or form, and being fully convinced that the use of the products of the Slave's unrequited toil supports the unrighteous system,
 I have come to the deliberate conclusion to be a partaker of that great wrong no longer; and therefore wish you to send me the following bill.

[Here follows an order on the Free Produce Store.]
 [This correspondent and subscriber is especially welcome, and his testimony is entitled to much respect. He was banished from North Carolina two years ago for preaching against Slavery.—Ed.]

QUEEN'S CO., L. ISLAND—(with 8 subscriptions). * * * I wish to encourage the paper, having always liked it from the first, because it was in unity with my concern, which I have endeavored to maintain for forty years, although I have not been as faithful at all times as would have yielded the greatest amount of happiness.
 Therefore, as my only regret in the retrospect is my unfaithfulness, may we be cheered on our way, to do what our hands find to do in the great work of reform, not only on the subject of Slavery, but of Temperance, &c. As brotherly kindness and the great law of love become predominant, and take the rule in men's minds, then indeed will the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ."

A BELOVED FRIEND FROM THE SAME COUNTRY writes, (with larger number of subscriptions). "Endeavoring to enlarge the list of subscribers, nearly all the families in our meeting unite therein."

CLINTON CO., OHIO.—(with 16 subscriptions.) There appears to be a lively interest felt in the free-produce cause, by some whose influence may do much towards promoting the good work. Yet it is to be feared that (even amongst those of foremost ranks, and in other respects worthy in double honor) too much apathy exists. I trust that the cause may never flag for want of true and faithful supporters, even should they be among the youth.

WILLOW GROVE, N. J.—Having perused Vol. 1.—of the new series of this rare publication, I have been so well pleased with its contents, and with the wholesome tendency, (as I conceive) of the sentiments which it offers to the reading community, that I wish to contribute towards ensuring its continuance and extension.—To test my power to do this, (though laden with the infirmities of fourscore years,) I tried the experiment of a short walk among such of my neighbors as had no knowledge of the existence of such a publication. The result was nine subscribers, and $2.25 as per enclosure. Such unanimity of belief prevails in the irrefutable principles of our "Declaration" of rights, and of their evident appliances to the outraged Ethiopian, that were a suitably qualified person with a stitched copy of the published volume, to walk over our County, subsisting for a few weeks with its hospitable inhabitants, and soliciting their patronage of the N. Slaveholder, I think he might enlist such an army as would effectively attest the approval of your objects.

CAYUGA Co., N. Y.—(with subscription,)—I should be glad to do something more towards circulating so valuable a paper.

ORLEANS Co.: N. Y.—Enclosed are $2.00 for 8 copies of that spirited and excellent little sheet the N. Slaveholder.

HENRY Co.: INDIANA.—I enclose the price of 8 copies, hoping thus to contribute something to the down-trodden and oppressed of God's poor.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

NECESSITY FOR ACTION.

While many are endeavoring to procure and use such articles only as are free from the sin of oppression, it is to be feared that others have not let obedience keep pace with knowledge, and have used but little effort on this behalf.—The difficulty of obtaining all the articles we need, is so great, that it has a very discouraging effect on our zeal, and did not the monthly visits of the Non-Slaveholder remind us of our duty, I fear there is danger that some of us would lose our interest altogether. I hope, however, that all of the readers of this paper are sufficiently convinced of the sin of Slavery, and also of the necessity of bearing a testimony against it, to be willing to take some further action on the subject, than we have heretofore done.

We are told that Slavery "sits upon a cotton bale,"—that the Slaves in the United States are held by "chains of cotton"—and that "cotton is the main prop of American Slavery." When we reflect on the vast amount, and various uses of cotton, we cannot but assent to the correctness of the above comparisons. Here, then, is the strong hold of Slavery, against which, but a very small amount of anti-slavery effort has been yet wielded. It is comparatively an easy matter to select the free, from slave grown groceries, but to obtain free cotton goods, is a very different thing. In a recent letter from the esteemed proprietor of the Free Labor Store in Philadelphia, he says, "It is with great difficulty I get the cotton goods made, tho' I can readily get the cotton. I hope the difficulty will become less." Here in a few words, we have the whole matter laid open to our view. While we have been persuading one another to use free goods, many of us perhaps, have not been aware of the difficulties those have to encounter, who have undertaken to supply those goods. Their devotion to the cause certainly demands our sympathy, as well as aid.

Thus it appears the first step has not yet been taken to enable us to be consistent in our testimony; and it is very plain that something further must be done,—that some further action is necessary, to enable us to obtain a supply of free cotton goods. Then let us seriously apply to ourselves the query of the early converts to Christianity, "Men and brethren what shall we do?"—In the twelfth number of the Non-Slaveholder, Practice tells Profession, that "G. W. Taylor proposes, if the friends of the cause will raise sufficient capital to purchase the machinery, to try the experiment, on the smallest scale, of running a mill on a variety of staple articles." "Friends of the cause," we have here something pointed out for us to do. We find that the cotton can be obtained, but that the goods cannot be manufactured without our aid; and unless we give it, it will shew that our zeal is not sufficient for the cause we have espoused. The early Christians did not falter in the performance of their duties, for when they found that money was needed, they "sold their possessions, and goods, and parted them to all men, as every man had need."—Let us be faithful in the performance of our duties, which do not require that we should sell all our possessions, but only a small part of our goods, in proportion to the quantity we possess, and bestow them, as the cause has need. Let our friends in Philadelphia inform us what amount will be needed, and on what conditions, and I hope a sufficient sum can soon be raised, to set a manufactory in operation, which would be the beginning of a system, that, if faithfully carried on, would lead to results, that might cause millions to rise up and call us blessed. W.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

Friend Editor,—Having been absent for several months, I have not, until recently, had the privilege of reading your useful periodical.

It has long appeared to me an anomaly of no ordinary character, that so many of our anti-slavery friends, who can reason so ably on the general subject of slavery, and who are condemning constantly, the practical inconsistency of northern politicians and professed Christians, for their fellowship with slavery, are themselves maintaining a fellowship with it, which implicitly sanctions, and which actually sustains the entire system of iniquity.

With their standard unfurled to the world, "NO UNION WITH SLAVEHOLDERS;" they voluntarily maintain a commercial union, which constitutes the chief incentive for the continuance of what they themselves denominate "the sum of all villainy." Can arguments be offered in vindication of such voluntary support of the system, which will not vindicate the system itself? Is there not, in fact, a striking similarity between the excuses offered in both cases? To every abolitionist we say; close the market to the oppressor and you present the most effective motive to the Slaveholders, in general, to cease the oppression which you so earnestly and so severely condemn. Close it in parts and you diminish slavery's woes in part. You may say you wish the slaveholder to act from a purer motive. Very well; but is it right for you to present the inferior motive, which is, with him, the actual inducement to perpetrate the wrong? What would you say, in reply to the man who is constantly encouraging theft, by receiving and paying for stolen goods, if he should tell you he desires that the thieves should leave off stealing from better motives than merely to obtain his money? Would you not think that his love of virtue was rather anomalous?

Extend your mental vision across the ocean, to the land of Africa. See the warring tribes in hostile conflict. For what purpose? To supply, with wretched victims of cupidity, the white man's slave-ship, to endure the horrors of "the middle passage." Who presents the motive to perpetrate these incalculable outrages on humanity, which the nation has denominated villainous piracy? Every man who stands ready any where to purchase a fellow being to coerce his unrequited toil. So long as there is a market, it will be, in some measure, supplied, in defiance of the laws of God and man. But who presents the motive to the men who deal in human souls, and drive them to unrequited, cruel, and often death devouring toil? The purchasers and consumers of the fruits of that toil. And here we come to the foundation of the whole superstructure of oppression, cruelty, blood and death, which we have vowed in the presence of God, angels and men, to overthrow by all righteous and appropriate means in our power.

The caveat of "impracticability" is inadmissible, until we have done what is practicable. To avoid all contact with slavery, we must needs go out of the world. Will this justify us in passing by a store where we can obtain the products of honesty, to go into one to purchase the fruits of our brother's oppression? We may not avoid all contact with unrighteousness, by purchasing at stores of honest repute. Will this justify us in dealing with the man whom we know to be in the constant practice of receiving stolen goods?

Let us solemnly consider the subject, and act so that the avenger of the poor may not require our brother's blood at our hands.

HENRY GREW.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

FRIEND WM. J. ALLINSON.—In noticing the remarks of E. L., in the 11th number of the Non-Slaveholder, it has appeared to me that his position demands some further examination.

The instance referred to, of releasing a recaptured fugitive, by purchase, it seems to me is not in point—is not a case parallel with that of petitioning Congress to pass a law to remunerate such Slaveholders, as may choose to set their Slaves free. We may be entirely excusable in throwing down our purse to the highwayman, who threatens our lives if we do not deliver it up; but in my opinion it would be far different to ask for a law granting him the money or property he would otherwise take by force on his own responsibility. Those who petitioned for the enactment of a law, most assuredly sanction that law, should it be enacted; hence it is evident there is just as much difference between the two cases our friend makes parallel, as there is between suffering wrong and legalizing wrong.

Now, as it is admitted, that the possessors of Slaves are under moral obligation "to grant immediate and unqualified emancipation" to them, can we suppose a law would be just and right, which holds out an inducement to do it for compensation only? which virtually contradicts the idea of their being under any moral obligation whatever so to do? What, I would ask, must be its effect? I take it for granted, however, that it will be conceded, that the law in itself, would be unjust; but that it will be said it is necessary, under the circumstances; and that the object to be attained warrants it. This, I apprehend, is the point between us. Can we innocently support, nay more, advocate the passage of such a law? Has it become necessary in this age of the world to "do evil that good may come?" I have believed, and still do, that the great moral Governor of the Universe has not, in His infinite wisdom and divine economy, so ordered, that the advocacy of any wrong or unjust measure, should be necessary for the promotion of His righteous cause, or the good of his creature Man. And entertaining this view, I certainly believe, if Congress would pass a law recognizing the justice of the claim of all who should be set free, to fair and equitable wages for the time they had served, it would have a far better effect than the law proposed for the remuneration of Slaveholders.

The object of all law and government, divinely recognized, according to the apostolic definition, is the punishment of evil doers and the praise of them that do well. The law proposed, would certainly be very near the exact reverse of this, in its operation. At any rate, I am sure it would mete out no punishment to those evil doers, whose darling system embraces the "sum of all villainies," in taking care that they should not suffer pecuniarily, when they should leave off their crimes, in consequence of having committed them. If we may, "with due regard to principles of universal righteousness" enact a law to pay the Slaveholder for the relinquishment of his grasp upon his fellow man, why not apply the same rule in every other case of crime?—Why not pass a law to pay the counterfeiter for all he would lose by becoming an honest man, as an inducement to him to forego his knavery?—Can any one tell? Can our friend? It would certainly, in my opinion, be as likely to succeed in the latter, as in the former case; because, if men have no conscientious scruples against Slaveholding, and believe it to be a money-making business, why should they take a "moderate" valuation for their Slaves, when they think money is to be made at the business, even when they bear a high price? But if they have these scruples, the remuneration is uncalled for, because then they will not hold them anyhow. In this light I think we may see that it is our duty to pass such laws, and advocate such principles and measures only, as are calculated to strengthen every conscientious scruple in the minds of the people, against any connivance whatever at this wicked scheme, and that this is the best way; the speediest way to effect the object, and the only consistent way for us to act. Our friend, perhaps, in his first article, gave as one reason for his policy, that if one of the Slave States could be freed from Slavery by the purchase of its Slaves, it would afford an opportunity to show to the others, the advantages of freedom, and thus, much good might result therefrom. I ask, have not these advantages been as clearly exhibited in the contrast existing between the already contiguous free and Slave States, as possibly could be? If there is anything that can be made of it, we have all opportunity, by making the masses acquainted with the facts.

A few words in reply to the remarks of P. L. A. That we, the people of the United States, "are verily guilty concerning our brother" of African descent, I readily admit, but that any have been enriched by Slavery is a matter altogether questionable. Had we a complete table of statistics showing the result of the trade between the North and South, and the losses the former has sustained by its intercourse with the latter, it would be almost astounding. In a very short time, a few years back, the town of Lynn, Mass., alone lost about 3,000,000 of dollars in this way. A vast sum is annually taken out of the pockets of the non-slaveholders of the North to pay for the transportation of letters and papers to these "only sufferers among the more numerous offenders," in the matter! The whole system of diplomacy, conducted as it has been for a long time by the Slaveholders, has been such as to regulate the duties in a way to protect their own interests at the expense of the North, and to draw from it, the expenses in a great degree, of the general government, and relieve themselves of the burden. If there has been any money made by Slavery, the Slaveholders have been the alone receivers; if not, why pay them to rid themselves of a nuisance? I repeat, the Slaveholders have lost nothing by our intercourse with them, far from it; even "honor among thieves," would not give them anything. They have always taken the lion's share, they have compelled their fellow men to work for nothing, obtaining as they no doubt think, many times the amount of the money they paid for them, while we pay our laborers for all they do. But I admit that the Slave has suffered by our alliance with his oppressor—he has been the great and principal sufferer. And, if we have heretofore been partners in a firm of "thieves," and now propose to become honest, I think we should act honestly, and if we are not willing to come up to Zachens' standard of "restoring four fold" to those we have defrauded, we should be willing to restore what we have taken at least. Let them be the objects of our sympathy and commiseration, instead of taking pity on those who have revelled in idleness on the unrequited toil of their fellow men, when they may conclude to cease.

For the Non-Slaverholder.

"TIS ALMOST NIGHT."

A beautiful little girl between two and three years of age, the only child of a missionary in the East Indies, was attacked by the jungle fever, and in a few days her case was declared by the physicians to be hopeless. Having been taught, from very early infancy, to repeat a short prayer every morning and evening, as her strength ebbed rapidly away and her sight grew dim, she naturally supposed the hour of rest drew nigh. Claspings her tiny hands, in a faint but earnest voice she began—

"Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep—"

and gently breathed forth her soul into the keeping of Him who has declared, "of such is the kingdom of Heaven."

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, FIRST MONTH, 18, 1854.

It is to be supposed that our subscribers and readers are acquainted with the design of this little periodical, and although the opening of a new volume affords an appropriate opportunity for defining our position, we incline rather to let this be apparent in the course pursued. And yet a few words with this object may be serviceable.

Our true purpose is uncompromising antagonism to Slavery. In this we are not restricted to any single idea or mode of testimony against the great national sin, and if we omit to insert many items or to notice many important facts, it must be remembered that our space is small, and that we do not aim at obviating with any of our friends the necessity of other Anti-Slavery Journals.

The phase of Anti-Slavery action which we chiefly aim to illustrate, is indicated by our title and our motto; and we intend, (as heretofore) to keep it prominently in view. This mode of action has been regarded by the Non-Slaverholder, from its commencement, as "elementary."—We have thrown the gauntlet, charging those who supply the motive to the purchaser, and through him to the capturer of Slaves, with being the true Slaveholders. Though the charge rebound upon ourselves, we cannot on that account elude the force of the maxim; Qui facit per alium facit per se. Remembering our own need of clarity, we hope not to be uncharitable toward others, whilst we seek to promote a perfectly consistent and pure testimony against the greatest wrong upon which the sun shines.

We are also deeply interested in other moral reforms:—and, when we find occasion and space to do so, we mean to advocate them. We regard it as being within our province to testify against OPPRESSION in its various disguises, even when, with sanctimonious garb, it stands where most emphatically it ought not. The cause of TEMPERANCE is unspeakably dear to us, and claims much of our time and effort. To it we mean to devote a portion of the Non-Slaverholder. Believing, with adoring reverence, that whenever we pray to our Father in Heaven,—"THY KINGDOM COME,"—we ask for the extension of the dominion of "THE PRINCE OF PEACE,"—and that all wars and fightings obstruct this kingdom, and spring from lusts that war against the soul,—we consider the cause of PEACE, a subject for advocacy;—and holding that "all revenge is crime" and that human life ought by man to be held inviolable, we intend, as occasion calls for it, to oppose what Whittier has fitly styled "the crime of law";—the unchristian policy of

"saying Murder's hand
By Murder at the Law's command."

We shall also aim at presenting as much variety as may comport with the giving of due prominence to our main subject, by the insertion of

By a dying infant's bed,
Sadly worn her parents weeping;
While above her sinking head,
Guardian angels watch were keeping.

In a distant tropic land
With the dark-browed Hindoo dwelling,
Had her father joined the band
Jesus' love to pagans telling.

Far away from native soil,
Far from scenes of early childhood,
For his Master did he toil
In the lonely jungle wildwood.

But when evening brought repose,
Heart felt praises up to Heaven,
From that humble cot arose,
For the daily blessings given.

For the friends they once had left,
Far away beyond the water;
For the boon of health, and gift
Of a darling, only daughter.

In her parents' arms entwined,
She was all their earthly treasure,
And her early dawning mind
Filled their souls with purest pleasure.

Gentle—tender as a bird,
Her blue eye with love was gleaming,
And, by lively fancy stirred,
All her face with thought was beaming.

By her mother's pious care,
Oft as came her time for slumbers,
Breathed she forth her little prayer,
Lapsed in faltering infant numbers.

But the loveliest scene will fade:—
In the distant skies are swelling
Clouds that darken, by their shade,
Sunshine in each earthly dwelling.

When the heated noonday air,
From the poisoned forests springing,
O'er the landscape wide and fair,
Fell disease and death was flinging.

Ere three summer suns had rolled,
Swiftly in their course returning,
Brilliant cheek and bright eye told,
Fever in her veins was burning.

As before the autumn gale,
Shrinks the tender summer blossom,
She, when strength began to fail,
Drooped upon her mother's bosom.

Still her breath grew short and sparse,
And the mists began to gather,
While upon her cherub face,
Shone the image of her Father.

"Mother, dear, 'tis almost night;—
Said the dying babe caressing;
Now I cannot see the light—
Mother sweet, thy evening blessing.

"Now I lay me down to sleep,
(And she raised her hands to Heaven)
"I pray the Lord"—'Tis silence deep!
With those words her soul was given!

With that prayer went up her Spirit,
As the morning dew exhaled,—
Free Salvation to inherit
From a source which never faileth.

Lay her hands upon her bosom?
Leave them clasped, as still in prayer!
Give to Earth Earth's fairest blossom!
God has claimed what is not there!

Weeping Parents dry your eyes;—
Trust her soul with Him who gave it!
Let the ransomed Spirit rise,
Rise to Him who died to save it!

some literary matter. Of the extent to which this may be done to advantage, whilst our readers will differ in opinion, as the responsibility rests with us, we claim the casting vote.

In making up a number of a periodical an editor has to consider many things, the bearing of which will be overlooked by his readers. Let those, for instance, who think the whole space too little for the non-participant idea, reflect that there are some who take and read our paper for the sake of other matter, and that whilst we wish to stir up by way of remembrance those who are already convinced, it is an important object to bring before fresh minds and consciences the consideration of the duty of withholding from Slavery the motive.

Although our subscription list is a pretty large one, yet as nearly all are at the extremely low club price, (which can only be remunerative with much extension,) a pecuniary loss has attended the publication of Vol. I.—Still we have now enlarged the size of our page, adding to each number half a page more of reading matter, and of course increasing the cost of printing.

We trust that volunteer agents will continue and increase their efforts. The work is most neglected in large cities, where persons are accustomed to wait to be called upon for their subscriptions. The low price of our Journal will not admit of the employment of paid Agents. If a few persons, for the sake of the cause, would circulate subscription papers in such cities, there is no doubt that hundreds of additional names might be obtained with little labor.

On page 27 of last volume we inserted the Memorial of Samuel Rhoads, Enoch Lewis, Geo. W. Taylor, Abm. L. Pennock, Jasper Cope, Isaac Collins, and Edward Garrett, setting forth the participation of citizens of Free States, (through their commercial relations with the South) in the profits of Slave Labor, and their consequent partnership in the great business of Slavery, and asking of Congress

"The enactment of a law which shall provide that whenever any State, by its Legislature, shall pass an act emancipating the Slaves within its limits, an assessment shall be made by Commissioners appointed under the authority of the Governor of the State, and the President of the U. S. of the loss sustained by Slaveholders individually, and the aggregate amount to be paid into the Treasury of such State for equitable distribution."

This gave rise to a discussion which was conducted, in the Non-Slaverholder temperately, in a good spirit, and with ability, and we would willingly have closed it with the volume, as, in reopening the debate, it must be before a very different audience, and many of our new subscribers may fail to appreciate a controversy, which has already been pretty well exhausted. We wish, however, to treat with entire fairness, correspondents who have at heart the same important objects, and who, whilst appearing to differ a little in mode, can appreciate the integrity of each other. We wish that our friend W. E. could have condensed his remarks into a smaller space, as we have to reject various articles from the present number, solely on account of their length.

And here we would make a general remark to correspondents:—that, however tedious and prolonged our own lucubrations may be, yet, in the writings of others, we are enamoured with the beauty of brevity. We love to receive communications of the right stamp, and of the desired shortness. We have some essays lying on our table which we have repeatedly taken up, to count the lines, and to calculate what space they would occupy, in Long Primer, Bourgeois, or Minion, but were finally obliged to reject them, because there was too much of a good thing.

Our "Green Mountain" friend is quite facetious about "the Cotton that Tom picked." We wish that there was no ground for his satire upon

"the Friend so plain and grave
That would not directly own a Slave."

We have, however, the comfort of knowing that the principles of Quakerism lead to straightforwardness in acting out the testimonies of Truth, and that there are not a few yet preserved who find no willingness to dodge a self-application of the doctrines they profess. As we pursued our meditations on this subject, our fingers began to tingle with the "cacoethes scribendi;"—a pen was in our hand, and we found that it had written as follows—

THIS IS THE FRIEND CONSISTENT AND RIGHT.

I knew a Quaker, modest and meek,
Who weighed every word that he deigned to speak,
And he seemed to be always in Godly fear
Lest he might not preserve his conscience clear.

And yet he was brave—and at Duty's call
He was ready to hazard the loss of all.
He could suffer or do as the case might be
To keep from offence his Conscience free.

The views of the World he would oft neglect,
But he treated his Conscience with great respect.
Its smallest scruple he'd pause to weigh,
And its least motion or hint obey.

For he kept his Conscience turned to the Light,—
And so he was sure that his Conscience was right.
There's a Spirit in man—and the Quaker knew
That all its revealings were pure and true.

But any thing mean the Quaker scorned—
And any thing base he hated and spurned—
And what he deemed wrong for himself to do
He'd not do by proxy through me or you.

He would pay his debts like an honest man
To Pompey or Patrick or Tom or Dan:—
And none of his servants white or black
Could charge him with keeping their wages back.

And never a hunted Slave that came
For shelter or alms could put him to shame;

Nor say of his vestment's simple braid
"I raised that Cotton and never was paid!"

No Slave had lien on his sugar or rice,
He never kept back a part of the price;
Nor chain nor manacle clanked for him,
Nor Slave-whip gashed the o'erwearied limb.

There was moral health in the Quaker's tone—
And moral health on his visage shone.
He walked with an honest and manly tread
There was nothing on Earth for the Quaker to dread.

He was unembarrassed in princely hall.
He owed nothing but love, and gave that to all.
To his Maker the Quaker his soul would abase—
But any man living he'd look in the face.

GENUINENESS OF FREE LABOR GOODS.—It appears to be necessary, in answer to the queries of some new subscribers, briefly to re-state what has been pretty fully explained in our former volume. An extensive supply of Dry Goods and Groceries is kept, (wholesale and retail), at the Free Produce Store in this city, N. W. Corner Cherry and Fifth Sts. These are quite free from the stain of Slavery: the guarantee for which is not merely in the care, conscientiousness and discrimination of the Proprietor of the Establishment, but in the sufficiency of the means employed. In reference to the Groceries, no explanation is called for at present. A list is possessed by said Proprietor, of the names of growers of free Cotton, in Texas, Alabama, Western Tennessee, and Mississippi, who have been visited on their plantations by a confidential Agent. They neither own nor hire Slaves, and hence, (owing to the laws of those States,) the cotton is raised by whites. It is also ginned exclusively by free labor. From these planters it is purchased by reliable stationary agents, who, after ascertaining that they neither hold nor hire Slaves, require, on delivery of the cotton, a certificate or affirmation of the fact, that this particular parcel of cotton has been raised and ginned entirely by free hands, and by persons who employ no slaves.—Moreover, no temptation to deceive is extended in the way of premium or higher price. What little extra expense is charged upon free goods, results from the cost of separate manufacture, and hopes are entertained that even this trifling bar (trifling to those who are conscientious on the subject) to the use of free goods, will be removed. To keep the free cotton unmixed in the process of manufacture, an excess thereof is sent to the factory, and the portion at the beginning and end, being mixed with Slave Cotton in the joining (to avoid stopping the machinery) is rejected. But whilst the arrangement is perfect as regards the integrity of the free fabric, it is highly desirable to establish mills to run on free cotton exclusively; and our friend of the Free Produce Store, has made the proposition alluded to by our correspondent W., (and to which we should be glad to see a liberal response) to establish a Jobbing Mill, and to run it upon a variety of staple articles: the only mode at present seen, to obviate the hazardous necessity of laying in large stocks of articles for which the demand is small. From the store referred to, many Merchants and others, in various States, are furnished with Goods.

FREE LABOR FACTORY.—We invite attention to the article which commences the present number. The object proposed is important. A capital of about $15,000 thus invested, would, it is believed, enable the Proprietor of the Free Labor Establishment to carry on the business much more to the furtherance of the original design, and to the satisfaction of consumers of Free Produce. We think there are persons enough, who, by loans of various amounts, could, without any inconvenience to themselves, place the Establishment beyond the position of a mere experiment.

DO STATESMEN HAVE HEARTS?—Gerrit Smith, in his speech upon the Ingraham resolutions, happily hits off the idea entertained respecting statesmanship by the sort of politicians whom Salmagundi satirizes: "A candidate for political eminence is like a dead herring which never becomes luminous until it is corrupt." We quote a few passages.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, I should not have presumed to rise, had I been duly influenced by what the gentleman from Alabama has just now told us of the characteristics of a statesman. For in that gentleman's esteem, the heart does not enter into the composition of a statesman. With him, the statesman is a creature all head, and no heart. With me on the contrary, the heart is of more account than the head—and that, too, in all the possible circumstances of life, including even the province of statesmanship. A higher authority than the gentleman from Alabama makes more of the heart than of the head. His command, as well upon the statesman as upon every other person, is, "My son, give me thine heart." The heart first, and the head afterwards. The faculties of man drive on but to mischief and ruin, unless the heart be first given to the right and the true.

I find that gentlemen of Alabama agree in their definition of a statesman. Another gentleman from that State [Mr. Phillips,] when reviewing my speech, a fortnight ago, kindly informed me that I am but a sentimentalist, and not a statesman. To use almost precisely his words: "Though I had attained some notoriety in the country as a sentimentalist, I had never risen to the dignity of a statesman." I beg that gentleman to be patient with me. I may yet become the dignified, heartless, frigid, conventional sort of being, that makes up the accepted and current idea of a statesman. They say that Congress is a capital place for making a statesman of one, who is willing to come under the process. They say so, for the reason that Congress is a capital place for getting rid of all sentiment and sympathy, and conscience.

Now, I cannot say that I am very ambitious to have realized, in my own person, the popular idea of a statesman. Nevertheless I beg the gentleman to be patient with me. When I shall have been in Congress a few weeks longer, I may so far have lost my heart, and killed my soul, as to be a candidate for the honors of a statesman. And then the honorable gentleman will, no doubt, be willing to take me by his own right hand, and install me into that dignity which he and other statesmen so self-complacently enjoy.

After advocating the resolutions because they rest the justification of Capt. Ingraham on the naked ground of humanity, and after saying many good things which were liable to a salutary home application, Gerrit Smith thus concludes:

Pass these resolutions, Mr. Speaker—pass them promptly and unanimously. By doing so we shall honor humanity and honor ourselves; by doing so we shall rebuke our Government for having taken, three years ago, the diabolical position that they who rescued their kidnapped, and oppressed, and outraged, and crushed brethren, merit at the hands of this government, fines and imprisonment.

Pass these resolutions, and you will put the seal of your emphatic condemnation on that diabolical position; and you will cheer the hearts of those who have rescued such poor brethren, and of others who are determined to rescue them whenever they can get the opportunity to do so. Pass these resolutions; and these past and these future rescuers of the most wronged of all men will rejoice in knowing, that upon the principle of these resolutions and upon the principle by which some on this floor have advocated them, they are entitled, not to suffer fines and imprisonment, but to receive gold medals.

WHAT IS YOUR RUM TAX?—Any intelligent man, who would devote himself to answering this question for the community in which he resides, could present astounding facts. The Prohibitionist, (a Journal of excellent promise, just started in Albany) gives under the above caption the following extract from The Miners Journal, "published in the heart of the coal region."

"Coal is coal just now, and those are esteemed fortunate who can secure any now even as a favor. Considerers are entirely cut off. Rum has reduced the supply from this region, at least one hundred thousand tons this year, which will be the means of enhancing the price of coal at least one dollar per ton in the distant markets. So that the rum traffic in this region the present year will probably cost the people abroad nearly one million of dollars in the single item of fuel, and that too without benefitting this region a single iota. This is worth thinking about, even by those who consider Temperance advocates fanatics and lunatics."

The above passage does not fully explain itself. The workmen were formerly paid in orders upon the stores, (a system often allied to oppression) but recently the wages have been paid in cash. Unfortunately a large portion of the laborers are addicted to Intemperance, and it takes them half their time to spend their wages. The detriment to themselves and their families is not reducible to an exact calculation.

DAILY NATIONAL ERA.—The weekly of Dr. Bailey, published in our National Capital, established with such moral courage, and conducted with such ability and wisdom, has been crowned with signal success. Dr. Bailey has resolved upon a daily issue in addition, and to those who have occasion for a daily Washington paper we strongly recommend it. The terms are thus stated.

The Daily Era will be issued on a sheet as large as that of the Daily Nat. Intelligencer, on the 2d of Jan. 1854, and daily thereafter until the 1st of Sept. 1854, (or longer should Congress continue in session), at $5.00 per annum in advance; and should the result then warrant, the publication will be resumed on the 1st of December following by the year.

In reference to this enterprise the Tribune says: "On all moral questions we are sure to find The Era on the side of virtue and of human rights; and the independent thinker who may differ from it on any subject, can be sure that he will presently find himself fighting along with it in some other part of the battle. Besides, there is reason to welcome the establishment of a daily paper at Washington, which public patronage is not likely to corrupt, or any party to buy up. Success to the undertaking."

This is the Cotton that Tom pickt.—A Parody.

1. THIS is the Cotton that Tom pickt—
2. THIS is the Friend that stole the cotton that Tom pickt.
3. THIS is the merchant that paid the fiend, That stole the Cotton that Tom pickt.
4. THIS is the mill where spun the thread Out of the cotton that looked so red, In stealing of which the blood was shed The merchant had bought when he paid the fiend, That stole the Cotton that Tom pickt.
5. THIS is the loom that wove the cloth (The feeling child to wear is loth) Within the mill where spun the thread, Out of the Cotton that looked so red, In stealing of which the blood was shed, The merchant had bought when he paid the fiend That stole the Cotton that Tom pickt.
6. THIS is the Store where a stock is kept Of goods of Cotton o'er which Slaves have wept In its way to the mill where spun the thread Out of the Cotton that looked so red, In stealing of which the blood was shed, The merchant had bought when he paid the fiend That stole the Cotton that Tom pickt.
7. THIS is the dress so bright and gay, That I mean to wear on my wedding day That I bought in the Store where a stock is kept Of goods of Cotton o'er which Slaves have wept In its way to the mill where spun the thread Out of the Cotton that looked so red, In stealing of which the blood was shed The merchant had bought when he paid the fiend That stole the Cotton that Tom pickt.

AMELIA OPIE.

DIED, on the second of twelfth month, [December,] 1853, at her residence, Chattle Meadows, Norwich, England, AMELIA OPIE, in the 86th year of her age.*

She was the only daughter of Dr. JAMES ALLPERSON, for many years a resident and eminent Physician in that ancient city, which was not only the birth place of Amelia Opie, but, with the exception of a brief period of married life, her only home. At a very early age she was deprived by death of the care of her Maternal Parent, and, as her Father, at that time, and for many years afterwards, entertained skeptical sentiments on the subject of religion, and of course associated with persons holding similar opinions, her position was a very exposed, and undesirable one; and the absence of female influence in her early training gave a somewhat masculine tone or unfeminine independence to her manner, which was, however, much subdued and softened in maturer life, by the regulating power of the Cross of Christ; and she was always remarkable for the amiability of her temper, the kindness of her disposition, the steadfastness of her friendships, and the tenderness and sincerity of her heart.

At the age of 29 she became the wife of JOHN OPIE, R. A., of Truro, Cornwall, who had recently commenced his career as an Artist (in which he afterwards attained to considerable eminence,) and drew forth commendations from Dr. Wolcott, who warmly patronized him, and predicted "that his young friend would turn out one of the greatest Painters the world had ever seen." At this time, Amelia Opie was much admired in fashionable circles in London, to which her husband's professional talents introduced her; and she soon acquired considerable reputation as a novelist. But when she became a widow and returned to her native city, things began to be presented to her in a different light. She was brought into near neighborhood and intimate association with the Gurney family, which no doubt had a very beneficial influence, in turning her attention from the vain and unsatisfying trifles of time, and quickening her pursuit after the enduring riches of Eternity.

* A widow about 46 years.—Ed.

"As years rolled on," says the Norfolk News, "they brought with them a change in Mrs. Opie, which astonished the literary and religious world. Many of her former works were, as we have been informed, called in from the publishers, and Mrs. Opie, it was whispered, had forsaken the fashionable world and allied herself with the Society of Friends. Some have attributed this change to any other cause than a conviction of the rightfulness of her new course, and have jeered at the supposed want of ease and comfort with which Mrs. Opie seemed to be oppressed, when first wedded to her new attire, and to habits so at variance with those which had characterized the former part of her life. That the change however, resulted otherwise than from a sincere conviction of duty is a most gratuitous assumption, as is amply proved by the consistency of all her subsequent conduct, due allowance being of course made for the difficulties with which so vast a change could not be otherwise than accompanied."

No one who was acquainted with the integrity and uprightness of her character, could for a moment doubt that the change which took place in the habits and affections of Amelia Opie, was wrought by the transforming power of the Grace of God, and that the corresponding change in her dress and address, was the result of a sincere conviction of duty. Let us hear the sentiments of one who knew her well, and who had, perhaps, a better opportunity than most, of forming a correct appreciation of her real character.

"Few persons," (said he in a little sketch written in 1837,) had drunk deeper of the cups of fashionable life than Amelia Opie. Admired for her amiability, her talents, and her accomplishments, she was received in London at the houses of many of the nobility, and was, I doubt not, wherever she went, a welcome guest. Such was the condition over which Grace had to triumph: a condition the more unpromising from her having been trained, among the Socinians, to low views of religion. But she gradually discovered that all her vanities, her place in the great world, and her novel-writing, in which her reputation was high, must be laid down at the foot of the Cross of Christ. Convinced of the errors of Unitarianism, and not satisfied with the forms of the Church of England, or of any class of the dissenters, she took refuge in the quietness of our silent meetings, which she attended with much assiduity. In the meantime it was evident that Christ Himself was becoming her home, her peaceful, permanent home; and, by degrees, she became thoroughly convinced of the truth of the principles of Friends. Her friendship with our family appeared to be one principal means allotted, in the order of Providence, for the working of this change. At length came the critical period, when she found herself constrained to make an open profession of Quakerism. Great was her conflict:—I remember her telling me of the agony of her mind, in the view of changing her dress, which had been decidedly worldly and fashionable, and of addressing her numerous friends and acquaintances by their plain names, and with what appeared to her to be the scarcely tolerable simplicity of Thee and Thou. But her great Master was with her in this time of need; and with remarkable decision and firmness, she made the change at once, and openly declared herself a Quaker. Seldom has a more striking improvement been wrought in any one who has passed under my notice. Truly may it be said, that her endearing qualities have been sanctified, and her play of character has not been lost, but has been rendered more interesting, than before, by her change. Every one who knows her, is aware of her truthfulness, and appreciates her kindness and good temper; and Quaker as she is, and a determined one, she is still sought after by some of her old friends in high station, by whom she is much beloved."

In confirmation of this, A. Opie writes herself from Lowther Castle, 9th mo. 29th, 1826.

"I am glad I came, if it were only to be assured of having re-awakened in dear Lady—and in myself, the affectionate feelings of former days—but I am also glad that I go away to-morrow. The kindness I have met with here is truly cordial, and I shall leave Lowther with pleasant and grateful feelings. But what awaits me? A welcome from dear friends in humbler life—in my own sphere—and welcome from and to my own people—worth all the grandeur in the world to me.—For, my dear —, I cannot separate the principle from the people. I love to be with Friends, because I have unity with their principles. What a refreshment was last first day's meeting to me! G. B. sent me John Gratton's Journal, and well-timed it was; for I read it coming to Lowther, and felt it strengthen me, while contemplating the temptations before me. I think I may say that when I retired to rest last night, I did not feel condemned for any thing I had said or done; and yet I had to meet that sneering R..., whom, in former days, I used to shrink from meeting:—but now I feel quite at ease with him, and even friendly towards him. Wordsworth is charming, so is Sir G. Beaumont. In short it is a circle of harmony, and I may add of talent. Still, I do long to see the dear friends of Sunderland, and to find myself once again under their quiet roof. I have given thy "Letter on Christianity," to the mother of Elizabeth Smith. She had read the "Peculiarities," and said, 'I could be a Friend myself, if you would allow me the Sacraments.'

In a letter of an earlier date to the same friend, A. Opie says,—

"Your last was most welcome and truly salutary. With the text to which you refer me, I am quite familiar, and unite in your interpretation of it—"Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this—to visit the Fatherless and Widows in their affliction, and KEEP OURSELVES UNSPOTTED FROM THE WORLD. From the 'real evil' there is in the fashionable world, I trust I am in no danger—as many circumstances defend me from any temptation to positive crime, and the manner in which I begin my day, enables me to carry with me into the world, feelings and convictions, which must, I firmly believe, make me shrink back with horror from anything in the shape of real evil. No dissipation has yet had power to make me neglect to read the Scriptures every day, or fail to take advantage of every opportunity that has offered itself, of religious conversation with a view of instruction. * * * I heartily assent to your opinion, that 'there is in the world much which is not evil in itself, yet has a decided tendency to produce forgetfulness of God, and thus to generate evil indirectly.' It is against this danger that I feel myself called upon to exert all my powers of resistance, for it is one, by which I feel myself every day liable to be assailed and subdued. Against this assailant I know of no shield so powerful as a devotional spirit, habitually cultivated and exercised, but at the same time, I know of no one so difficult to be preserved in an intercourse with the world, as that intercourse generates one, entirely opposed to it, viz, a worldly spirit. However, all I can do, I endeavour to do. I try to keep the 'devotional spirit,' by reading the Bible, and such books as are most likely to improve my heart, and regulate my conduct. Yet believe me, I feel, with deep humiliation and self-abhorrence, how inadequate my best efforts are, to prevent my living without God in the world. The voice of that unerring guide within us, is too apt to be drowned in the noise and clamor of less holy voices, as I know full well from experience. But perhaps there is some security from evil in the consciousness of being in danger."

Eleventh of 2d mo., 1823, she writes:—

"I am truly sorry that my visits to the sick, should have deprived me of the pleasure of thy company at our own house. I therefore write, as I wish to tell thee that we are going on more comfortably, and that my dear Father attributes his present tranquillity to thy printed "Letter" [on Christianity.] which he reads, I find, every third day morning, while I am at meeting, and one passage he has nearly gotten by heart."

The origin of the letter here alluded to, is thus interestingly described in J. J. Gurney's autobiography.

"It was about this period (1821) that I became greatly interested in the case of Dr. James Alderson, an eminent physician in Norwich, then an old man of 77 or 78, but still in much vigor as to his intellectual faculties. He was one of those in whom the evil heart of unbelief had long predominated, and whom I had sometimes seen occupying the seat of the scorner. I believed it would be right for me to go and pay him a religious visit, in the character of a gospel minister; but so weak was my faith that it seemed impossible, and I actually did not yield to the impression for a full month. Finding no peace however, on any other terms, I at length called upon him, and, with his daughter's help, induced him to sit down with me in silence. It was an awkward occasion. He was very restless, and my ministration as weak as possible. However, in broken terms, I expressed my sense of the unutterable importance of simple faith in Christ. Some considerable time afterward he was exposed to great personal danger, on his way home from London, in consequence of the horses in the coach running away. He was alarmed. The Lord applied that alarm to the highest purposes, and he suddenly awoke to a painful solicitude respecting the state of his immortal soul. In this condition, he desired his daughter to apply to me for a selection of passages from Scripture on the subject of the atonement. O the importance of that only refuge for the awakened sinner! Glad, indeed, was she to embrace the occasion, and I to avail myself of it: and without delay I sat down and wrote the original of my "Letter to a friend, on the authority, importance and effect of Christianity." It contained a brief summary of the evidences and doctrines of our holy religion, and especially of the doctrine of Redemption by Christ, and pressed the subject home, practically. I anxiously waited the result, and soon found, to my great joy, that it was well received. The doctor placed the letter under the cushion of his arm chair, and read it frequently. His ever watchful daughter was always at hand to second every good impression. The Bible was read to him from time to time, and in the course of a few weeks, his mind was changed: his opinions, his temper, his heart, had all undergone a revolution; the lion was become the lamb. 'It was the Lord's doing, and marvellous in our eyes.'

"On calling upon him one day, when about to leave Norwich for a short period, I expressed a desire for his preservation in the truth. 'I do assure you,' he replied, 'I have not one sceptical feeling left.' He was much afflicted with a painful disease, which he bore with patience, and continued steadfast in the christian's faith, until his death, which took place about two years afterward. Though unhesitating in his belief, he was often in conflict respecting himself, but evidently kept his hold on Jesus. Standing by his bed-side, two or three days before his end, I said 'Ah, doctor, what a comfort it is, that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin.' 'Oh, yes!' he replied, with intense feeling, 'if it were not for that, I know not what would become of me!' After his death, the dignified expression of his countenance reminded us, not of an unbelieving philosopher, but of some veteran Apostle!"

The letter on Christianity was afterwards revised, enlarged, and published, and numerous editions have been printed since. There is, however, an ease and familiarity in the original letters, which give them a peculiar interest.*

Not only was J. J. Gurney instrumental in the divine hand, in turning this aged unbeliever from darkness to light, but it is very evident from letters of Amelia Opie, now in the possession of the writer, that although he was greatly her junior, his plain and faithful dealing, both in his correspondence, and in his personal communications with her, were much blessed to her soul. She often calls him her "Mentor," and desires he will continue his candor and faithfulness, and "make no apology." Her intimacy with his sisters was also a great advantage to her, and for thirty or forty years it might almost be said, she looked upon Earlham Hall as one of her homes: at least she was a frequent and always welcome addition to the cheerful family party assembled there.

The Daily News, says, "she improved greatly

*[These letters—the originals, in the hand writing of Joseph John Gurney, it has been our privilege to peruse. We regarded them as most precious autographs, and there is in the personal and familiar portions a richness and freshness which gave a delightful insight into the loveliness of the christian character of the writer. The printed letter condensed from these has been read by many thousands, and has been signally blessed in winning souls unto Christ. The writer of them, a dignified and beloved minister of the Gospel, was induced to an unusual degree with the mind of Christ, and remarkably conspicuous in him were those fruits of the Spirit of which the Apostle says, when he enumerates them:—"against such there is no law."—Eh.]

in balance of mind and evenness of spirits, during her long and close intimacy with the Gurneys, and there never was any doubt about her beneficent disposition, shown by her family devotedness, no less than by her bounty to the poor. Her dignified form moved through the narrow streets of the ancient city of Norwich, and her bright face was often seen lighting up the most wretched abodes. That face never lost its brightness, nor the heart its youthfulness and warmth. She was cordially respected, and will be vividly remembered for life, by many who have long forgotten her early fame, or perhaps had never heard of it. She was a striking picture in the childhood of some, who are now elderly, when her stately form was seen half a century ago, among the old elms in her father's garden, and she will ever be a picture in the minds of such young people as saw her seated as erect and upright as ever, but with her crutches behind her, at her sofa table, in her cheerful room on the Castle Meadow, any time within the last few years."

Alluding to her literary labors after she became a Friend, the Norfolk News says—

"These were now directed into a different channel. In the place of novels, she devotes herself to the direct injunction of christian duties, and warns her fellow-creatures against the vices into which all are in danger of falling." Hence we have her powerfully written 'Illustrations of Lying,' published in the year 1825, a work which has been thought to be well calculated to make a deep impression on the minds of youthful readers. In 1828 Mrs. Opie published a volume under the title of 'Detraction Displayed,' the object of which was, as she said, to expose that most common of all vices, in every rank or class of society, from the peer to the peasant, from the master to the valet, from the mistress to the maid, from the most learned to the most ignorant, from the man of genius to the meanest capacity. In earlier life, she was fond of painting, and has left some excellent portraits of her friends, by her own pencil."

* Dr. CHAMBERS, in the year 1833, made a visit to Earham, which he calls "a little paradise," and the varied attractions of which, (attractions which could not fail of being congenial to the truly great and truly good,) drew from him, in a letter to his daughter, the exclamation—"The breath of heaven is here: without, a scene of beauty that to the eye of sense is altogether delicious—and within, a sanctuary of love and holiness."

He speaks of one of the guests, as "a lady—now aged, and in Quaker attire, which she had recently put on, and who in early life was one of the most distinguished of our literary women, whose works, thirty years ago, I read with great delight—no less a person than the celebrated Mrs. Opie, authoress of the most exquisite miniature tales, and for which I used to place her by the side of Mrs. Edgeworth. It was curious to myself that, though told by Mr. Gurney in the morning of her being to dine, I had forgotten the circumstance, and the idea of the accomplished novelist and poet was never once suggested by the image of this plain looking Quakeress, till I rushed upon me after dinner, when it suddenly and immeasurably augmented the interest I felt in her. We had much conversation, and drew greatly together, walk-

On the whole, it may be said of Amelia Opie, that she had great versatility of talent, but she was certainly more remarkable for quickness than solidity, for brilliancy than depth; and perhaps her most striking characteristics were, as above suggested, the sprightliness of her disposition, and the kindness of her heart. Her sympathies were readily enlisted in the cause of the oppressed, and being intimately acquainted with Wilberforce, Buxton, &c., she watched their efforts on behalf of these, with deep and heartfelt interest."

Until within a recent period she had enjoyed an unusual share of health and vigor, but her physical powers gradually failed her, and for some time past she had been confined by lameness to an upstairs room, in her cheerful dwelling, where various classes loved to congregate, for all were sure to meet a smiling welcome. The illness which terminated her life was an extremely painful one, but she submitted to the dispensation with remarkable composure and even cheerfulness. "Not a murmur escaped her." An intimate friend, who visited her a short time before the close, made some allusion to her sufferings, when, looking at her, with a beaming countenance, she sweetly said, "But with Christ in the vessel I smile at the storm!" and then, as if correcting herself, she added, "storm did I say? no, there is no storm—it is all a perfect calm." At another time she asked, "Where is that text, 'He maketh all my bed in my sickness,' and expressed her grateful sense of the many mercies bestowed upon her. Thus gently and quietly, on the second day of twelfth month, 1853, she fell asleep in Jesus, "whom not having seen, she loved," in whom believing, she now rejoices, as we humbly trust, with joy unspeakable and full of glory.

AMERICAN SLAVERY, ITS CAUSE AND THE REMEDY.

The skilful physician, upon examining a patient and ascertaining the disease, seeks to know the cause, and having found the exciting cause or causes, which induces unhealthy action in the system, he directs his efforts to their removal, and nature, when left to her proper influence, will in due time effect a cure.

American Slavery is a national disease. Let ing and talking with each other on the beautiful lawn after dinner. She has had access into all kinds of society, and her conversation is all the more rich and interesting."

We quote the above as the spontaneous testimony of a person of highest literary excellence as to the literary standing of Amelia Opie.—(Ed. N.S.)

[† Let no one think that the service thus rendered to the oppressed was a slight one. Such women as H. More, A. Opie, and others who might be named, did much to cheer and to assure Clarkson, Wilberforce, Buxton, Gurney and other valiant champions of Truth and Freedom, in their stupendous work of faith and labor of love. For these sympathizing sisters, as well as for those heroic men, was heard the music of breaking fetters and falling chains, and the anthems of praise for deliverance, to the God of Liberty and Love.—(Ed. N.S.)

us direct our attention to the causes which have produced and riveted it upon our nation. Slaves, I believe, were first introduced into America by a Dutch ship, and were purchased by the farmers, in the early settlement of the country, to assist in opening their new lands. Thus it will be seen that it was the value of the labor of slaves that first induced our forefathers to introduce slavery into the country. That was the first exciting cause that brought the disease upon the nation.

But slavery did not greatly spread and darken the face of our fair nation for some time. Two or three historical events contributed greatly to strengthen it, and to fasten it upon the nation. I allude to the invention of the cotton gin by Whitney, and the spindles by Arkwright, and to the admission of Louisiana into the Union. Those inventions, by reducing the amount of labor necessary to prepare cotton for market, and by thus lessening its cost, and thereby opening an extensive market for it, made the labor of slaves valuable for producing it; while the increase of territory suitable for making sugar, made the slave-labor valuable for the purpose of supplying the markets of the world with sugar.

The value of the labor of slaves for these purposes, created an unprecedented demand for slaves, which greatly stimulated both the domestic and foreign slave-trade. It was this which first led to the lucrative but inhuman practice of breeding slaves for market, and which caused southern and southwestern states to be such strong holds of slavery. The value of the labor of slaves for supplying the demand for rice and tobacco, have also had their effect in fastening slavery upon the nation.

It will thus be seen, that the value of the labor of slaves was the first exciting cause of slavery, and that the value of labor strengthened the hold of slavery, and is still its sustaining food. The question then is, what creates this value of labor, and who is responsible therefor? It is not the demand for these articles? And are not the purchasers and consumers responsible?

I believe it is conceded that the great mass of cotton, sugar, rice, and tobacco, grown by American slaves, is consumed by Great Britain and America. Hence it appears, that anti-slavery Great Britain, and anti-slavery persons in America, are in a great measure accountable for slavery. In order to remove the disease, let us remove the exciting cause. Let us withdraw this demand. Let Great Britain declare that she will no longer be the cause of slavery, by purchasing the proceeds of the slaves' labor—and let all anti-slavery persons in America declare that they will no longer lend their influence to the support of slavery, by gratifying themselves with the comforts and luxuries of life, at the expense of the downtrodden and defenceless slaves. Then will the cause, the food which supports slavery, be in a great measure removed, and nature or the laws of trade effect a cure.

If the consumers of these articles enable the slaveholder to sell the labor of slaves, it necessarily follows, that each consumer or purchaser is accountable for his or her acts in this respect, for the amount he or she consumes, and for the effect his or her example may have upon others. For, if a number of persons unitedly commit an evil act, each one is at least accountable for his portion of the offence. If a number of persons unitedly and wilfully commit murder, I believe, that according to common law and in the eye of Supreme Justice, each one is held to be a murderer! Would it not then be well for us to consider, whether we by furnishing the demand for the labor of slaves, and thus affording the life sustaining food of slavery, will not, in the eye of Supreme Justice, each of us be held to be a slaveholder, and this too, whilst we are denouncing slavery as the "vilest system of iniquity the sun ever shone upon."

Now, fellow christians of all denominations, come with me to the land of slavery. Behold the slave mother, our christian sister. See her husband torn from her embraces, and sold forever into a distant land. See her children, one by one, torn from her arms, and transported she knows not whither. Now behold that inhuman monster in human form, scourging her for not suppressing the natural feelings of a woman's, a wife's, a christian mother's heart. Then let us ask, for what are these dearest family ties broken? An internal voice answers: To raise cotton for our wardrobes—sugar and rice to supply our tables!! Do not our hearts sadden at the thought that we are the cause of so much suffering? And when we remember that our Lord has said, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto Me," will we not exclaim, can it be that we are thus oppressing our Saviour? He died for us all. He suffered for us all. Let us then resolve henceforth to wash our hands of the sin of slavery. Let us cease to use its productions. Let us vote against it. Let us talk, write, preach against it, and let the prayers of our hearts continually ascend to heaven for its overthrow. Let us do this, not merely for fear of punishment that may justly be meted out to us, but from that pure love to God and humanity which should fill the hearts of all christians.

Passages from our Correspondence.

MORROW COT. ONTO.—One correspondent sends sixty subscriptions. Another (with 8 subscriptions) writes—I think the cause of Free Produce is gaining ground slowly in these parts, and I sincerely hope that it may so gain, that not an individual bearing the name of Quaker may be found participating in the products of Slavery.

A friend travelling in GEORGIA writes:—"I was grieved to find in our train a negro trader, carrying with us (in forward cars) a lot of living chattels in human shape, mostly women and children—the latter of all sizes from very young infancy. I was informed that they were bought in N. Carolina, and to be taken to Alabama.—Those from 5 to 10 years old appeared to enjoy the novelty of the journey, while the mothers were occupied in caring for the wee ones. 'Tis wonderful how they are adapted to their cruel fate, which very many do not realize. I thought of my friend Non-Slaveholder, that he would hardly know how to let such a man pass, in his honest zeal for justice and humanity. I thought with Cowper that 'I had rather be myself the slave' than be that wretched dealer."

RANDOLPH CO. INDIANA.—"A Friend placed in my hands a copy of the N. S., with a request that I would make up eight subscribers. I forthwith send that number of names, and $2.00,—supposing that the second vol. will bear the first."

VERMILION CO. IOWA.—(with 8 subscriptions.) "I gladly embrace the opportunity of circulating the Non-Slaveholder amongst our members. There is an increasing interest here on that subject. Many would gladly purchase free labor goods."

The principal of an important Boarding School in INDIANA, mentions the use of free groceries in the Institution, and forwards the subscriptions of sundry pupils and of a colored domestic.

WAYNE CO. IA.—(with 13 subscriptions.) "I have read every number of the past volume, and have been much pleased with it,—and should not be willing to do without it for twice the price of the paper. It is just such a periodical as the friends of the free produce movement want, and I earnestly hope it will be well sustained."

HENRY CO. IOWA.—(with 24 subscriptions.) "There are many of our citizens here in the far West, who would gladly abstain from slave-grown productions, if a sufficient supply of Free grown could be obtained. Many of us have sacrificed largely rather than purchase the unrequited toil of the Slave. Many are becoming awakened to subject, some of whom abstain as much as they can consistently. We yet are in hope for a brighter day."

CHESTER CO. PA.—(with 8 subscriptions.) "I shall be glad to see the N. S. widely circulated and the principles it inculcates more generally understood, and carried out in consistent practice; for I believe the leading idea inculcated to be TRUTH."

JEFFERSON CO. OHIO.—(with 17 subscriptions.) A correspondent whose heart is warm with right zeal, in a valued letter, whilst expressing his approval of our paper, still thinks that "it falls short in size of what would best promote the object in view." We would cheerfully double our sheet, if it could be done without too great pecuniary sacrifice. Another highly valued friend in a remote State, after some very kind remarks says: "I have a great desire that so needful a periodical may be sustained, and now permit me to suggest the doubling of the amount of reading—then it seems to me that it would be easier getting full subscription lists. It is quite a Yankee notion to buy cheap, and few stop to estimate the great difference in the quality of reading matter. And when your paper shews the reader his own faults instead of other people's it is little marvel if the list be small."

To all which we must reply that whilst a large amount of reading matter can be furnished for a small price, where type already set for another publication is used, and an edition of tens of thousands struck off, a journal the size of ours cannot be published at 25 cents per annum without actual loss, unless a large list is obtained of paying subscribers. We have done better than we expected—but not well enough to enlarge our borders,—the size of the present number notwithstanding. A talented authoress writes, earnestly advising us not to enlarge, thinking a small sheet more likely to be read.

OTSEGO CO., N. Y.—(8 subscriptions.) The minds of many are turned to the subject, and to enquiring for the way to supply themselves with Dry Goods and Groceries free from the taint of Slavery. The Oberlin paper circulates to some extent through this country, and is, I believe, a great help to the cause.

MERCER CO. N. J.—What unthought of perfidy will be evinced by the passage of Douglas' Nebraska bill! The attempted overthrow of the Missouri Compromise however, and the eager avidity with which the measure is supported by the South, after their almost unbroken assent to it for thirty three years, most forcibly illustrates the futility of a bare majority in one Congress settling a disputed moral question 'forever.' Each succeeding Congress is invested with full law making power, untrammelled by the principles and resolves of its predecessors. If the exclusion of Slaves from all territory north of 36° 30' was wrong,—if it was even inexpedient,—let the old compromise be repealed! Why bind that vast realm, the home of future millions of our race, by the narrow obsolete notions of the men of 1820, "whose ideas of morality and religion were bounded by the line of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude?"—Let the patriarchal state be there again renewed. McDuffie, I think, called Slavery 'the corner stone of our republican institutions.'—With national solemnities let the great blessing be secured for Nebraska! Repeal the Missouri Compromise, and let it be distinctly understood that this nation outgrows and cannot wear the baby clothes of its childhood. It is now in its youth: but, in its fast coming maturity, other measures, having become hateful to the moral sense of our people, will also be overthrown. The Compromise Bills of 1850, the 'finality' measures which pledged the Government before-hand to admit New Mexico and Utah as Slave States should they desire it, and three or four new Slave States out of Texas,—and which enacted the UNCONSTITUTIONAL* 'Fugitive Slave Bill,' may yet by the enlightened conscience of the Congress of 1860 be expurgated or repealed.

"FOREVER!"—I used to think this a great while. Should this bill pass,—future lexicographers may give the American meaning of the word:—The third of a century—and may cite as authority,—the Congress of 1854."

The same correspondent, not writing for publication, says,—under date of 2d mo. 7th.

"Sad, and indeed is the intelligence contained in thy letter which I received this evening at our post office. Rarely, in the course of my experience, have I felt such a shock; and in my solitary homeward ride it seemed as though I could not bear the removal of our beloved friend, in the midst of his missionary labors. I thought of his stricken brother,—of their companions in the work,—of various friends in our land who are keenly feeling the stroke, especially—and—and—and then, in advance of the swift steamer, I visited in fancy his island home, saw his bereaved partner and family, his large circle of warm friends, and even London Yearly Meeting in tears; till the gathering sense of sorrow overpowered me, and I wept. And yet why should we weep that a soldier of the Cross has fallen in his armor in a foreign land? What though the endearments of a fond circle of loving friends were wanting, and even some of the attentions and comforts deemed requisite were absent,—what are these trivial roughnesses of a passed pathway, to that freed ransomed spirit?"

"When we think of what he was and of our loss, we find the well of consolation deep and difficult of access. When we think of what he is, we find it an exhaustless spring."

"Oh what an increased depth of holy interest will the diminished band feel in the work to which they have dedicated themselves, now that he to whom they so much looked, has gone to his everlasting home! In this chastening humbling dispensation, they will, I trust, find a fresh anointing for the service,—and the sympathy which will be awakened in their behalf, will aid in unlocking many hearts."

FREE LABOR FACTORY.

I was gratified on seeing the proposition of G. W. Taylor, in the preceding number, and that such liberal sums had already been offered toward the establishment of a Free Labor Factory. Although some may reason, that the establishment of one small manufactory will do but little toward liberating three millions of slaves, it will be the beginning of a system, that may lead to that result. My memory reaches beyond the time, when a cotton factory existed in the United States; and I have often been in the little wool carding-mill, said to have been the first in America. The cotton manufactory had a small and slow beginning, but now, see its extent, and its effects on slavery. Every important measure has had a beginning, and vast results have arisen from beginnings as small as this proposed establishment.

The beginning of Slavery in this country was gradual, and its abolition thus far has been gradual. Although many have long been contending for immediate and unconditional emancipation, we see how little progress they have made. It is very little that man can do in his own will and strength, but the Creator of man, who alone has power in heaven and earth, and who sees the end from the beginning, can, and doubtless will, in his own time, give liberty to the captive, and let the oppressed go free. And although He can do this without the aid of man, yet He has heretofore been pleased to make use of instruments to accomplish his purposes, and doubtless will continue to do so; and in order to become His instruments, I believe that it is necessary for us to endeavor to make our hands clean from the sin we undertake to contend against. And while every individual is thus engaged in purifying himself, his influence and example, will doubtless have an effect on others; hence the testimony will increase and extend; and in order to provide ourselves with the necessities and comforts of life, that are free from Slavery, we shall be under the necessity of resorting to such means as are in our power, to accomplish it; and in doing this, with a single purpose of heart, we become instrumental for good to the poor slave. Thus, if all who profess to be opposed to Slavery should cease from using its products, one factory would do but little in supplying them with cotton goods, and after adopting these views, and undertaking in earnest to put them into practice, it would not be long before they would as soon think of introducing Slavery, as slave-grown produce, and from necessity the Slaveholders would have to change their system for one of free labor; and thus the object would be accomplished—not by our fighting against Slavery, or denouncing Slaveholders, but simply by ceasing to partake of its iniquity.

If the above views are correct, how important it is, that there should be a beginning to a system of free cotton manufacture; and all that is asked to make this beginning, is, for those who see and feel the importance of the movement, and who are blessed with the means, to lend, for a time, a small portion thereof. There is no difficulty in raising large sums of money for objects calculated to promote public, and pecuniary inter-rests, and for popular benevolent purposes; but I have observed that for objects of this nature, a great reluctance to contribute has often been manifested. While calling upon Slaveholders to give freedom to their Slaves, we cling to the dollars obtained from the fruits of Slavery. I have often thought if non-slaveholders were as liberal as such Slaveholders as are disposed to do right by liberating their Slaves, the era of freedom would be much hastened.

As examples of some of these, I will refer to the recent sailing of the brig Gen. Pierce from Savannah, for Liberia, "with 168 emigrants, of whom 126 were sent by masters now living, 16 were liberated by Will, and 21 were born free."—"Of these emigrants 50 were liberated by Richard Hoff, Esq., of Oglethorpe County, Georgia, who paid $60 each, for their transportation and support six months in Liberia, in addition to giving them, when they embarked, about $2,000." Supposing these Slaves to be worth $500 each, we find that Richard Hoff has in this instance contributed $30,000, to the cause of freedom.

"It will be remembered," says the Secretary of the American Colonization Society, from whose letter I copy, "that the honorable W. E. Kennedy, of Columbia, Tennessee, sent in the Zebra, from New Orleans, last spring, 26 of his slaves. He sent another company of 29 in the Gen. Pierce, leaving only two with him, who are unwilling to leave him while he lives, but intend to go to Liberia after his death." Thus W. E. Kennedy has on these two occasions contributed $27,500.

"The most interesting and extraordinary part of this expedition was a family of thirty-eight, consisting of a man and his wife, and their children and grand children from near Nashville, Tennessee, liberated by Col. Montgomery Bell, a gentleman 85 years old. He gave them every thing requisite as an outfit, and paid us $2,000 for their transportation and support six months in Liberia. He has a large number more, of whom he wants to send about 80 as soon as we can take them, and is willing to pay one half the expenses of transportation and support, besides giving them a comfortable outfit and paying their expenses to the port of embarkation. These people are the iron men of Tennessee. Mr. Bell has long been known as one of the largest manufacturers of iron, and his Slaves have been his only workmen. They thoroughly understand the business, and have among them miners, colliers, moulders, and are fully competent to build a furnace for making iron and carrying it on themselves. Thomas Scott, the patriarch of the family, is yet a man of great activity and energy of character. He and his whole family entertain the very highest respect and veneration for their late master, and valued friend. His last words to me, as he stood on the deck of the vessel, were, 'Do write a most loving letter to my old master, and tell him how much we love him, and will never stop thanking the Lord for his goodness to us.'"

Here is a case that must certainly command our admiration and respect. Montgomery Bell, having already made free a family of 38, and doubtless will add 80 more to the number, will thus contribute over $60,000. Thus three individuals contribute some $120,000 to the cause of freedom. Who can calculate the benefits that would result to the same cause, by the employment of a like sum in the purchase of free cotton and its manufacture? W.

Correspondence of the Non-Slaverholder.
Christianity, Sept. 12th mo., 25, 1853.

We arrived at Kingston, Jamaica, yesterday morning. * * * I strolled to the outskirts of the city, and among the now half cultivated grounds and dilapidated buildings of the grandees of Slavery in former days. Many of these buildings, enclosed with massive brick walls, studded with broken glass bottles, and the iron bound entrance gates, reminded one of the insecurity felt by the former inhabitants, and I pictured to myself the alarm of the inmates, whenever the tocsin was sounded during the still hours of night, by the vigilant patrol of the citizens, necessary, peculiarly so, where Slavery exists in its mildest form. The advocates of Slavery think they see in this, coupled with the degradation in this city of 40,000 inhabitants, an argument in favor of its continuance; whereas I arrive at a conclusion diametrically opposite. The trade growing out of the vast production of the staple articles of this Island,—Sugar, Rum and Coffee,—the exportation of the surplus, and the importation of food and clothing stuff, gave employment formerly to much shipping, and afforded to the merchants, storekeepers and others, exchanges of the necessities of existence for the products of the Island; the whole gains of which were drawn, with the aid of hard task masters, from the unrequited labors of the slaves, who under the stimulus of the lash were drawn to perform an amount of labor and production to which the population after tasting of Liberty and inaction are altogether strangers. Subsequent to the final part of the emancipation act being repealed and unconditional liberty substituted, attempts were made to compel the former Slaves, (now freemen,) to labor for a sum altogether inadequate for the subsistence of themselves and their families under the new order of things. The same degree of injustice was attempted to be exercised towards them, by compelling them, if possible, to labor at a rate of wages about equal to what it had cost their former masters to maintain them. Remember too, that, on very many plantations, eviction from their little shanties or gardens, was the resort of the hard-hearted men who still owned and controlled the soil and habitations of their just enfranchized and suffering fellow beings, notwithstanding the liberal appropriation of the home government of £20,000,000, ($100,000,000) which was paid, pro-rata to the slave owners of the British West Indies, and which saved them from almost universal bankruptcy and ruin. Thanks, from the friends of humanity the world over, to the memory of such men as Clarkson, Wilberforce, Fox, Buxton and others. The heaven of their labor has worked, until this stupendous stride in morals, humanity and goodness has been made in our day; and where, in the morning of our time, was blackness of darkness, light has sprang up. Eight hundred thousand human beings have been released from Cimmerian darkness, and ushered into the glorious light of the gospel. * * * Several large estates, the proprietors of which adopted a liberal system and agreed to pay the wages of freemen to their former Slaves, are still flourishing and productive, paying handsomely:—thus showing how mistaken was the opposite policy of those, who, by refusing to pay a reasonable price for labor, depopulated their lands, and deprived themselves of the power to obtain other laborers. The lands of these are now growing up into a wilderness, and evince ruin to the proprietors, and desolation to the tenants. But who, in the sequel, suffers most? Many of the evicted laborers have been encouraged, by far seeing individuals, who are buying up these abandoned estates for sums comparatively trifling, to take small tracts, (five or ten acres,) with a long time for payment. They build their own dwellings,—fence or wall their plots, and make other permanent improvements;—raise their own provisions, and some little matters to sell or to exchange for foreign articles of consumption. They build school houses, and houses for worship,—promote education and encourage marriages, which were inadmissible under the slave system. A nucleus is thus forming, in various districts, distant from each other, for a population worthy of protection and encouragement from Great Britain or any other Government;—a population, who, in time to come, will, by the force of example, do much to redeem the vicious and vitiated individuals who have concentrated from the sugar estates to the towns and cities. It must be confessed that real estate in the city of Kingston has depreciated in value: but what does this prove? Nothing—save that fewer people can now be supported in affluence and comparative idleness from the labors of the black population. They now are either prevented from working at all by the perverseness of some of the former owners or those who do labor receive the benefit themselves. Hence the many supernumeraries, who in former times produced nothing by their own efforts, are now cut off from an income, and cannot support themselves in their former luxuriance and extravagance. This will in some degree account for the dilapidation and abandonment of the princely establishments adjoining the town, as well as for the vicious and abandoned black population therein. * * * L.

UNMERCIFULNESS OF MAN.

It is strange that unmercifulness should be a characteristic sin of man. Among devils, who received no mercy when they fell, it were less out of place. But man is the child and protégé of mercy. He lives and enjoys his probation amid arrested thunderbolts, and storms of wrath rolled back, and caverns of despair closed, and the hushed curses of the law. The rain, and dew, and sunshine of Heaven are descending upon his fields. The birds are piping their sweet notes as they might have done in Eden, and all nature, not veiled in sackcloth, but clad in multifarious glory, waits upon him like a sister. Above all, man lives in the light of glorious and glad revelations, of evangelical and joyful tidings, of living streams of salvation, and of ministering angels, and of voices from the sky, owning him as a younger brother that wandered, but in the far-off land of prodigality found mercy, through the cross, and through that blood that flowed freely as rain drops from the bosom of Jesus—in the midst of these he stands a monument of mercy, himself unmerciful!! Yes, and too often with one hand on the New Testament and the other on his brother's throat, no argument nor art avails to persuade him that in that brother's bosom may beat a heart of higher aspirations, of better purposes, of purer affections than his own. —Christian Parlor Magazine.

A NEGRO BURNED TO DEATH!—The burning of a negro alive near the city of Natchez, an account of which appears in the Natchez Free Trader, is frightful. The slave struck a white man, and the Democracy of that region, not waiting for justice to take its course, indicted Lynch law. The victim was chained to a tree, faggots were placed around him, while he showed the greatest indifference. When the chivalry had arranged the pile, in reply to a question if he had anything to say, he is reported to have warned all slaves to take example by him, and asked the prayers of those around. He then asked for a drink of water, and after quaffing it said—"Now set fire, I am ready to go in peace." When the flames began to burn him, in his agony he showed gigantic strength, and actually forced the staple from the tree, and bounded from the burning mass! But he instantly fell pierced with rifle balls, and then his body was thrown into the flames and consumed, that nothing might remain to show that such being had ever existed. Nearly four thousand slaves from the neighboring plantations were present as at a moral lesson. Numerous speeches were made by the magistrates and ministers of religion to the slaves, warning them that the same fate awaited them if they proved rebellious to their owners.—N. Y. Tribune.

JUAN PLACIDO.

The intelligent reader of Whittier's captivating little volume, "THE STRANGER IN LOWELL," will be glad to know more of the hero of the seventh section, entitled "The Black Man."

Juan Placido was born in slavery, about the year (as we suppose) 1798. His father was a parto negro—(mulatto)—his mother "the offspring of an African and a mulatto union." He was a poet of no mean pretensions, and we have before us (a present from our valued friend, Joseph Sturge) a volume of his poems, with his Autobiography prefixed.

"It is not too much to say of these poems," says Whittier, "that they will bear a comparison with most of the productions of modern Spanish literature. Certain it is, that their author is the only Cuban poet. His style is bold, free, energetic."

At the time of the publication of the poems, Placido was residing at Havana; and from prudential motives, his name was suppressed by the compiler, R. R. Madden. Such reasons no longer exist. From "The Stranger in Lowell," we learn the tragical termination of his career.

The autobiography we now lay before our readers, for its intrinsic value, as a creditable specimen of negro literature, and as evidence that this injured people are capable of higher performances than the raising, by unrequited toil, of luxuries to pamper our appetites. Ed.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF THE NEGRO POET.

The Senora Donna Beatrice, the wife of Don Juan M— took a pleasure every time she went to her beautiful estate, the Molino, to make choice of the finest Creole children about the age of ten or eleven years, and carry them to town, where she gave them instruction conformable to their new condition. Her house was always filled with these young slaves instructed in everything necessary to her service. One of the favorite young slaves was Maria M—, my mother, who was greatly esteemed for her intelligence, and her occupation was to wait on the Senora Marquesa de J., in her advanced age. This lady was accustomed when she was pleased with her attendants, to give them their liberty when they were about to marry, if it were with some mechanic likewise free; providing them with all things necessary, as if they had been her own children, without depriving them after their marriage of the favor and protection of her house, which extended even to their children and husbands; of which conduct there are many notable examples, among those who were not even born in her house. Various changes, however, taking place in the service, Maria became the chief waiting-woman of the Marquesa. In this situation she married Toribio de Castro, and in due time, I was ushered into the world.

My master took a fancy to me, and it is said I was more in his arms than in those of my mother. She had all the privileges of a slave who had acted as a dry-nurse, and also partly as a wet-nurse, media criandera; and having married one of the head slaves of the house, and given a little Creole to her mistress, I was called by this lady, "the child of her old age." I was brought up by the side of my mistress without separating from her, except at bed-time, and she never went out without taking me in her volante. With the difference of hours in respect to some, and days in regard to others, I was the contemporary of Don Miguel de C., and also of Don Manuel O'R., now Count of B.; which two families lived in a splendid house, close to the Machina, separated only by doors which divided the apartments; for, in fact, it was two houses made into one.

It would be tedious to detail the particulars of my childhood, treated by my mistress with greater kindness than I deserved, and whom I was accustomed to call "my mother." At six years of age, on account, perhaps, of too much vivacity, more than anything else, I was sent to school to my godmother every day at noon; and every evening I was brought to the house, that my mistress might see me, who seldom went out without seeing me, for if she did, I roared and cried, and so disturbed the house, that sometimes it was necessary to send for the whip, which nobody dared to lay on me, for not even my parents were authorised to flog me, and I knowing this, often took advantage of it. On one occasion, being very bold, my father beat me, but my mistress hearing of it, did not allow him for many days to come into her presence, until he procured the intercession of her Confessor, the father Maya, a Franciscan, and then he was forgiven; after the latter had explained to him that my Senora, as mistress, and my father, as a parent, had each their respective direction of me.

At ten years of age, I learned by heart some of the longest sermons of Father Louis, of Grenada, and the visitors who came to the house on Sundays, used to hear me repeat them when I came from the chapel, whither I was sent with my godmother, to learn how to behave in church; because, although the service was performed every Sunday in the house, I was not permitted to be present, on account of the tricks I might have played with the other children.

I also knew my catechism well, and as much of religion as a woman could teach me.* I knew how to sew tolerably, and to place the furniture in order. On one occasion, I was taken to the Opera, and received some presents for reciting what I heard, but many more for the sermons, and my parents got what I received in the drawing-room.

* Placido may be excused for his inadequate estimate of woman. Happy for those who, blest with pious mothers, evince by their lives the value of a true woman's teachings.—Ed.

But passing over much of my early history, in which there was nothing but happiness, I must not omit the circumstances which happened at my baptism; on that occasion, I was dressed in the same robe in which the Senora Donna Beatrice was baptized, which was celebrated with great rejoicings, my father being skilled in music, and playing on the flute and clarinet; and my mistress desiring to solemnize that day with one of her noble traits of generosity, in part liberated my parents by "coartacion," giving them the power at any time of purchasing their liberty at the sum of three hundred dollars each; what greater happiness could be looked for at her hands.

At the age of ten, I was placed under the care of my godfather; having learned something of my father's trade, which was that of a tailor; previously, to being sent to the estate. My mother gave birth to two other children. One of them, for what reason I know not, was made free—and this one died. My father lamenting his death, saying, "if things had been otherwise, I might have been content, my two living children are slaves, and the one that was free is dead;" whereupon my generous mistress had a document prepared, in which it was declared that the next child they should have should be free; and it happened that twins were subsequently born, who are still living, and both were freed. My parents now were removed to the estate of the Molino, where they were placed in charge of the house, and about this period the Marquesa died there. I was sent for in her last illness. I remember little of what happened on my arrival, except being at the bed-side of my mistress with my mother, Donna Joaquina, and the priest, and that her hand rested on my shoulder, while my mother and Donna Joaquina wept a great deal, and spoke about something which I did not understand, and then that I was taken away. Soon after I went to play, and the following morning I saw her stretched on a large bed, and cried, and was carried, down stairs where the other servants were mourning for their mistress; and all night long all the negroes of the estate made great lamentation, repeated the rosary, and I wept with them.

I was taken to the Havana, to my godfather, with whom I soon learned my mistress had left me; for some years I saw nothing of my father. My godfather had taken up his residence in the courtyard of the Count, in the street Inquisidor, where I was accustomed to go about the house, and to leave it when I thought proper, without knowing whether I had a master or not.

But one day, being permitted to go to the house of the Marquesa, to see my old acquaintances there, I knew not what passed there, but when I was about returning to my godfather, and my dear godmother, I was not allowed to go: here I was clothed in a rich livery, with a great deal of gold lace, and what with my fine clothes, going to the theatres, to tertulias, balls, and places of amusement, I soon forgot my old quiet mode of life, and the kindness even of my godmother herself. After some time I was taken to the house of Donna Joaquina, who treated me like a white child, saw that I was properly clothed, and even combed my hair herself; and as in the time of the Marquesa de J., she allowed me not to pray with the other negro children at church—and at meal time my plate was given to me to eat at the feet of the Senora Marquesa de P., and all this time I was far away from my father and mother.

I had already at the age of twelve years composed some verses in memory, because my godfather did not wish me to learn to write, but I dictated my verses by stealth to a young mulatto girl, of the name of Serafina, which verses were of an amatory character. From this age, I passed on without many changes in my lot to my fourteenth year; but the important part of my history began when I was about eighteen, when fortune's bitterest enmity was turned on me, as we shall see hereafter.

For the slightest crime of boyhood, it was the custom to shut me up in a place for charcoal, for four-and-twenty hours at a time. I was timid in the extreme, and my prison, which still may be seen, was so obscure, that at mid-day no object could be distinguished in it without a candle.—Here after being flogged I was placed, with orders to the slaves, under threats of the greatest punishment, to abstain from giving me a drop of water. What I suffered from hunger and thirst, tormented with fear, in a place so dismal and distant from the house, and almost suffocated with the vapours arising from the common sink, that was close to my dungeon, and constantly terrified by the rats that passed over me and about me, may be easily imagined. My head was filled with frightful fancies, with all the monstrous tales I had ever heard of ghosts and apparitions, and sorcery; and often when a troop of rats would arouse me with their noise, I would imagine I was surrounded by evil spirits, and I would roar aloud and pray for mercy; and then I would be taken out and almost flayed alive, again shut up, and the key taken away, and kept in the room of my mistress, the Senora herself. On two occasions the Senor Don Nicholas and his brother showed me compassion, introducing through an aperture in the door, a morsel of bread and some water, with the aid of a coffee-pot with a longspout. This kind of punishment was so frequent that there was not a week that I did not suffer it twice or thrice, and in the country, on the estate, I suffered a like martyrdom. I attribute the smallness of my stature and the debility of my constitution to the life of suffering I led, from my thirteenth or fourteenth year.

My ordinary crimes were—not to hear the first time I was called; or if at the time of getting a buffet, I uttered a word of complaint; and I led a life of so much misery, daily receiving blows on the face, that often made the blood spout from my nostrils; no sooner would I hear myself called than I would begin to shiver, so that I could hardly keep on my legs, but supposing this to be only shunning on my part, frequently would I receive from a stout negro lashes in abundance.

About the age of fifteen or sixteen, I was taken to Matanzas once more, and embraced my parents and brothers.

The character, grave, and honorable of my father, and being always in his sight, caused my time to pass a little lighter than before. I did not suffer the horrible and continual scourgings, nor the blows of the hand, that an unfortunate boy is wont to suffer far away from his miserable parents; notwithstanding, my unfortunate cheeks were slapped often enough. We passed five years in Matanzas, where my employment was to sweep clean the house as well as I could at sunrise, before any one in the house was up; this done I had to seat myself at the door of my mistress, that she might find me there when she awoke, then I had to follow her about wherever she went, like an automaton with my arms crossed. When breakfast, or the other meals were over, I had to gather up what was left, and having to put my hand to clear away the dishes, and when they rose from table I had to walk behind them. Then came the hour of sewing, I had to seat myself in sight of my mistress to sew women's dresses, to make gowns, shifts, robes, pillow-cases, to mark and to hem fine things in cambric, and mend all kinds of clothing.

At the hour of drawing, which a master taught, I was also present, stationed behind a chair, and what I saw done and heard, corrected and explained, put me in the condition of counting myself as one of the pupils of the drawing-class. One of the children, I forget which, gave me an old tablet, and a crayon; and with my face turned to the wall, the next day I sat down in a corner, and began making mouths, eyes, ears, and going on in this way, I came to perfect myself, so that I was able to copy a head so faithfully, that having finished one, my mistress observing me, showed it to the master, who said that I would turn out a great artist, and that it would be for her one day a great satisfaction that I should take the portraits of all my masters.

At night I had to go to sleep at twelve or one o'clock, some ten or twelve squares of buildings distant, where my mother lived (in the negro barracks).* Being extremely timid, it was a serious matter to me to pass to this place in the wettest nights. With these troubles, and other treatment something worse, my character became every day more grave and melancholy, and my only comfort was to fly to the arms of my mother, for my father was of a sterner nature. He used to be sleeping when my poor mother and my brother Florence waited up for me, till the hour of my arrival.—To be Continued.

A NEARLY EXCELLENCE.—M. M. and P. T. White of Cincinnati, having inherited eleven Slaves, magnanimously refused the proffered sum of $10,000 in cash, for them, gave them their liberty, and made arrangements to settle them, as agriculturists, in Indiana.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, SECOND MONTH, 18, 1854.

We have doubled the size of present number, to afford room for the valued article respecting AMELIA OPIE, written, and kindly contributed, by one who was for many years her intimate friend and correspondent. We are certain that we thus make an acceptable present to our subscribers, who will have too much taste to object to it as being aside from the main design of our Journal, especially as we give, in addition, more than our usual amount of anti-slavery matter.

DECEASE OF WM. FORSTER.—The solemn event which has been permitted by Him in whose sight the death of his saints is precious, has saddened many hearts, and words are too poor to convey our sense of the bereavement to survivors and to the church, and of the perfect peace and unspeakable gain of the loved friend who, though to us his farriance seemed so needful, has now realized that "to depart and to be with Christ is far better."

WILLIAM FORSTER, long honored and beloved,—whose life from his youth has been a Christian Mission, who in obedience to the Divine voice, traversed seas and continents, pleading with Kings and Rulers, and giving his tender sympathies to their humblest subjects, has now responded to the call,—“come up hither,”—has received the welcome of “Well done good and faithful servant,” and has (we reverently believe) entered into the joy of his Lord.

It is of little matter to the bondman in which particular field of a great plantation, he may feel the fetters stricken from his limbs, and hear the thrilling words “be free.” Nor signifies it now to the enfranchised spirit, that home and its endearments were afar, and that, of the thousands who revered and loved him, none, save three proved and faithful brethren stood by when he left his earthly tabernacle for “a house not made with hands, eternal in the Heavens.”

The place of his decease was an obscure spot in Tennessee, surrounded by that evil which had so oppressed and grieved his soul—a wrong against humanity—a sin against Him who took on Himself a servant's form. And dying thus, in the midst of his testimony, that testimony, for which he has laid down his life, is thus rendered the more emphatic.

“Fallen while his loins were girded still,
His feet with Zion's dews still wet,
And in his hands retaining yet
The pilgrim's staff and scallop shell.”

It is a comfort that although in the domain of slavery, he was also among his own people, and his interment was in a pleasant burying ground of Friends', immediately in front of Newbury Meeting House, at Friendsville.

No subject could be more adapted to the objects of our Journal than a fitting notice of this apostolic man. We hope to furnish a more extended one in a future number.

INCOMPATIBILITY OF WAR WITH THE REDEMPTION OF JESUS CHRIST. SIGNAL EXTENSION OF DIVINE MERCY TO SOLDIERS.—We were wishing to insert in the present number something illustrative of the unchristian character of War, when an aged and venerated Friend related to us the following anecdote.

During the French and English war some generations ago, a strange scene was observable in the English camp in Normandy. The officers and common soldiers were seized with an uncountable feeling of solemnity,—and they stood in groups of hundreds together, with gaping mouths and awe-stricken faces. They were brave men, not accustomed to fear—they were flushed with recent victory and had no unusual reason to anticipate coming evil—yet paleness overspread their countenances, and indicated an inward emotion of no ordinary character. During this panic, if such it might be called, one John Haywood, a soldier quite popular in the army, was seized with sudden illness and carried to the hospital. During his sickness the fatal battle of Fontenoy occurred, which was, in fact, a massacre in the two contending armies.* A young man was brought wounded into the hospital and placed on a bed near to Haywood. He was in great mental agony, loudly and continually bewailing his departure from his principles, by which departure he had been brought to this deplorable condition.

Haywood at last called to him—“Young man—you talk of your principles—what are your principles?” He said that he was brought up in the Society of Friends—and again exclaimed bitterly “Oh that I had never departed from my principles!”—“But young man”—repeated Haywood, “what are your principles?” He then explained that the principles of Friends were against wars and fighting, and not to kill but to love their enemies. Conviction of the excellence of these Christian principles was sealed upon Haywood's mind. He recovered and returned to the camp; and, on a day of great parade to the great astonishment of the soldiery, he stepped forward out of his rank, and laid down his gun upon the ground. The amazement was heightened when two others with whom there had been no collusion also stepped forward and laid down their guns.

They were, of course, at once placed under arrest. They understood the consequence involved, and that their lives must be forfeited. Sentence of death was passed upon them by Court Martial. Haywood being generally beloved, was visited and urged to retract, with promises of pardon. He told them that he knew that he must die and he was ready to lay down his life—he was convinced that war was inconsistent with Christianity, and he could not retract.

The case was represented to King George, who gave orders that they should be tested to the very last—but, said he, “God forbid that any man should be put to death for conscience sake under my reign.”—The time of execution came—they were led to the ground, their eyes were bandaged, and they were made to kneel.—At the moment when the command to “fire” was due,—their pardon was proclaimed. Haywood afterward narrated, that he was already in heavenly places, and his soul filled with peace and ready to depart. But when the pardon was declared, a great revulsion took place in his feelings, and great conflicts and darkness were his portion.

They returned to England, and here we lose sight of the other two. Haywood sought the People called Quakers, and became an eminent minister among them; and dedicating his life to his gracious Lord who had redeemed him from destruction, he travelled much in the service of Truth, and died in a good old age. A memorial has been preserved of him, but we are not aware that the above anecdote, which was related to us by a valued friend who had it from those who personally knew him, has ever, till now, been committed to writing.

This circumstance not only includes the clear testimony of the Divine Spirit against War,—but illustrates also the kindness and mercy of our gracious Lord to those soldiers, who, torn from their parents, forced into the army without any agency of their own, were made mere tools in the destruction of their fellow men. To these poor men, on the eve of a bloody engagement, a remarkable visitation was extended preparing some of them, perhaps, for the solemn event. In the midst of a camp where levity, dissipation and revelling prevailed, the spectacle was suddenly presented of large groups of such men, standing with the solemnity of worshippers, awed by the unseen presence of the Father of the Spirits of all flesh. The young apostate too, upon his death-bed, mercifully recalled to the principles he had forsaken, was made the means (by Him who works by means) of arresting Haywood in his illuress. The soldier also, in mercy called away from the paths of death and made a minister of life and peace,—the other two soldiers, by the direct workings of the Holy Spirit upon their minds, brought to such a knowledge of the Truth that they were willing to yield their natural lives for the testimony's sake,—the Divine protecting care of Providence in delivering his servants, by tendering the heart of a King;—all these lead us to magnify the Divine benevolence, and to exclaim, "Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness!"—"for his mercy endureth forever!"

JOHN MITCHELL.—His fame might perhaps have survived the violation of his parole;—the breach of honor might have been skillfully concealed and forgotten;—but when he deliberately says, in print,—"We, for our part wish we had a good plantation, well stocked with healthy negroes, in Alabama,"—he extinguishes the sympathies which thousands had cherished for him as an exiled patriot. On this Alexandre Holinski, a Polish refugee, reminds him, that, had the British Government been "sufficiently enterprising" to reduce the Irish population to the state of servitude he now commends, "there would be no more anxious agitation, no more hope of obtaining redress for your religious and political grievances, no more emigration even. Those who desired to seek liberty in America would be advertised, hunted down, thrown into jail, and given up to their owners, upon the arbitrary decision of any inferior judge. They would, then, according to you, be better lodged and better fed than they are now. I will admit this pretended advantage, and I ask your ragged and hungry Irish brethren if they would buy clothes and bread at at the price of their own persons. A thousand times no! would answer all these men, who are worthy of a better fate, if it were only because they aspire, not to the well-fed state of domestic animals, but to well being, with liberty for its first condition."

John Mitchell sits complacently in his editorial chair and writes,—

"We are not abolitionists—no more abolitionists than Moses or Socrates, or Jesus Christ. We deny that it is a crime, or a wrong, or even a peccadillo, to hold slaves, to buy slaves, to keep slaves to their work by flogging or other needful coercion." Holinski, (in his admirable letter) after giving him for his inconsistency, such a dressing as might make him wince, rebukes him for his presumptuous comparison of himself.

"Never did Moses, nor Socrates, nor Jesus Christ, sanction, as you have done, the ownership of one man by another."

"The wise Hebrew was pre-eminently an abolitionist, for his time. He found slavery in Egypt, and only permitted it for a term of years. And slavery for a term of years must have been stripped of its most odious features. It was more in the nature of an apprenticeship. You may consult with advantage upon this point, the excellent book of Mr. Barnes."

"Socrates, whose life was a constant struggle to keep down every evil inclination, did never, that I am aware, desire to become a rich slaveholder."

Poverty was a virtue in his eyes, and this feeling could not have made him envy those who lived in luxury on the sweat and blood of another. You would oblige me by showing me some passage in Xenophon or in Plato, where the wisest of Greeks excuses or praises cupidity—the first and most miserable source of tyranny in every shape. If such a passage exists, it has escaped me.

"As to the founder of Christianity, he has generally been proclaimed, and with justice, the greatest of abolitionists. To prove this, it is not necessary to quote many texts: 'Do unto others as you would that others should do unto you'—'Love thy neighbor as thyself.' Is there an oppression upon the earth, call it despotism or slavery, which can exist without a flagrant violation of these two admirable precepts, the epitome of Christianity and of Christian philosophy? Has the Crucified One ever appeared to tell you that the black or the mulatto was not your brother? Or has he ever authorized you to buy, to sell, and to lash the flesh of slaves, when it would seem to you abominable to be bought and sold and subjected to the infamous chastisement yourself? What! Christ, the friend of all the poor, of all the unfortunate, not an abolitionist? Excuse the expression, sir, but this is a blasphemy against truth!"

"If you are a Christian, you cannot draw so false a conclusion from the Gospel. If you are only a Catholic, you are guilty of heresy—you are in opposition to the Popes."

We can make room for but one more extract.

"If you care nothing about the Universal Republic; if Ireland alone interests you, you serve her cause badly, believe me, in separating it from that of the other victims of tyranny. You maintain her rights with a bad grace, when you deny the rights of a vast portion of humanity."

"The joy of Ireland at your deliverance will be saddened to find you in open contradiction with her most illustrious patriot. I can hear from the tomb the angry voice of O'Connell, repeating his fine expressions of 1837: 'We are all children of the same Creator, heirs of the same promise, redeemed by the blood of the same Saviour, no matter to what caste, or color, or faith we may belong.'"

THE NEBRASKA BILL.—We scarcely suppose that any reader of the Non-Slaveholder will need to be awakened to a sense of the nefarious design, the perfidy and falsehood couched in this bill, and in the unprincipled advocacy of it by Douglas and others. Its design is the diabolical one of extending the area of slavery, and the pretence is that the Missouri Compromise (wicked as a whole, and good only in the part which it is now designed to annul,) is abrogated by the compromises of 1850. In this pretence there can be no sincerity, and the men who urge it ought not to be regarded as veritable, or as fit for the society of humane, honest, truth-loving people.

Were we called upon to designate this bill by some one attribute, we should hesitate to say whether barbarity, mendacity, or audacity predominates. A certain leading commercial paper, is only restrained by the "perfectly knavish character" of the reasoning of the Washington Union and the advocates of the measure, from calling it "fool's logic." It is indeed a kind of folly which would hardly depart from its possessor, or though you should "bray him in a mortar." Yet when we have heard it openly avowed, and this policy vindicated as "justice to the South," and in itself right, we have wished that such persons might try the experiment of slavery just long enough (and no longer) to clear their vision—to give them a true perception of what is due to human beings. "But," said such a person yesterday, in reply to this wish—"I hope you don't compare niggers to white men!" We do place all human beings on the common platform of humanity, and we do claim for them all the rights which belong to our common nature.

The N. Y. Evening Post has some good passages on the subject:

"Among the commercial men who are giving their signatures to the call for a meeting in relation to the threatened repeal of the Missouri compromise, the observation is frequently made, as they set their names to the paper, that a bargain is a bargain, and that if one of the parties to a bargain, having received from the other the consideration stipulated, refuses to do what he promised, he is a rogue. The Nebraska question in the aspect which Mr. Douglas's bill has given to it, is a simple question of moral honesty. A merchant of New York, who should refuse to deliver to a purchaser merchandise for which he had been paid, would never be trusted again. This is mercantile honesty, but if we are to follow the maxims of those who talk of repealing the Missouri compromise, after Missouri has been admitted under it, political honesty is a very different thing."

"The very reasoning employed by these people refutes itself. If the compromises of 1820—the Missouri compromise—is repealed by the compromise of 1850; in that case it is not necessary to repeat it again—in that case the permission to introduce slavery, prompted by Mr. Douglas, is unnecessary. If the compromise of 1850 has annulled the prohibition of slavery in the region once called Louisiana, there is no need of annulling it in the bill for organizing the Nebraska territory. But if it be needful to enact a special law in order to permit slavery to enter Nebraska, then is the Missouri compromise not repealed by the compromise of 1850; and the plain truth of the matter is, that Mr. Douglas and his associates want to make another compromise."

Let us try this question by the ordinary rules of mercantile morality. There are two partners, Mr. Smith and Mr. Jackson, in a mercantile house. For one year they divide equally the profits of their business. The next year Smith is persuaded to relinquish the entire profits to Jackson. After Jackson has pocketed the proceeds of that year, he turns upon Smith and uses the logic of Mr. Douglas and the Washington Union, requiring him to refund his share of the profits of the previous year. "By our last compromise," says Jackson, "I was to have all the profits—that was the effective and vital principle of our agreement—I must, therefore, have all the profits of the year before, of which, under a previous agreement, you have taken half. I have here an instrument ready prepared, acknowledging my right to the whole of the profits of the first year as well as the second. Sign it, my friend; it is the only way to 'give permanency and perpetuation' to our last compromise. If you do not sign it, I shall consider you as desirous of fomenting an agitation. What I want, is peace and harmony, and all the profits."

"Strange as such language would seem in a mercantile transaction between man and man, it is precisely the language of the friends of the Nebraska bill. Of course, nobody but one who deserved to be under guardianship for idiocy would listen for a moment to such arguments in an affair of business. Those who use them in support of the Nebraska bill, greatly understate the intelligence of the people, as, we think, they will yet find to their cost."

THE BURNING OF A NEGRO.—There is a class of citizens who stoutly deny that, except in isolated cases, cruelty is practised upon the slaves. Yet we need not look elsewhere than in Southern pro-slavery papers for abundant instances of horrible barbarity which sicken the soul. The negro, bond or free, male or female, has in fact no real security in some states of the south. No matter what the injury, the outrage or assault, the negro who shall dare to raise his or her hand against a white, is subject to fearful retribution. And the greatest outrage and wrong may be perpetrated upon a negro, in the presence of many credible negroes, and they dare not interfere, nor will their testimony be listened to. In another column we give a shocking narration, much the worst part of which, in our apprehension, is the part performed in this tragedy by the ministers of Religion (so called.) Far be it from us to join in denunciations against the ministers of the Gospel, a class of persons (if genuine and faithful) who are occupied in the noblest work which can engage the powers of man,—but such as these,—who "steal the livery of Heaven" for the service of the foul Fiend, merit the scathing rebukes of Whittier in his "Clerical Oppressors."

"Pilate and Herod, friends!
Chief priests and rulers, as of old, combine!

Just-God and holy! is that church which lends Strength to the spoiler, Thine?

Paid hypocrites, who turn
Judgment aside, and rob the Holy Book
Of those high words of truth which search & burn
In warning and rebuke!

Feed fat, ye locusts, feed!
And, in your tassell'd pulpits, thank the Lord
That, from the toiling bondman's utter need,
Ye pile your own full board.

How long, oh Lord! how long
Shall such a Priesthood barter truth away,
And, in Thy name, for robbery and wrong,
At Thy own altars pray?

Woe, then, to all who grind
Their brethren of a Common Father down!
To all who plunder from the immortal mind
Its bright and glorious crown!

Woe to the Priesthood! woe
To those whose hire is with the price of blood—
Perverting, darkening, changing as they go
The searching truths of God!

Their glory and their might Shall perish; and their very names shall be Vile before all the people, in the light
Of A WORLD'S LIBERTY!

HONESTY IS THE BEST POLICY, says a popular adage, and as an abstraction we suppose most people would assent to it. But who is there that really believes it? Not the runseller, for he thinks it his policy to pursue a business which he knows to be in violation of honest principle. Not the slaveholder, for he knows that nobody can acquire an ownership in him, and that he has no right to hold and to use his fellow beings as property. We deal gently with those who give him the motive so to hold and use our brethren and sisters, for we wish them to know their own true position, and to be sure to occupy a right one. We deal gently with them,—for who has been clear enough in this matter to accuse those who stand to day where he stood yesterday?—and our aim is to convince and not to criminate. But does the politician believe it? Do statesmen, legislators, and magistrates believe it? If they did, we might look out for a millennial stride in legislation, for these folk are very desirous to pursue the best policy. Suppose that one more than half of the members of each House of Congress for ten successive years, should really believe that honesty is the best policy;—and suppose, in addition, that a like majority in each State Legislature should be thoroughly impressed with the same belief;—we are inclined to think that a much larger portion of our private citizens would soon be compelled to give their practical assent to the proposition. We are pretty sure that if this were the case, negro slavery would never be introduced into new territory, and that no slave would ever be publicly burnt to death in Nebraska, for raising his hand against a white man.

But suppose,—to make a tremendous supposition—suppose that every professed minister of the Gospel were actually and practically to give in his adhesion to the position that honesty is the best policy;—would we know the world we live in after so great a change? Slaveholding ministers, and slaveholding church members, would soon be as few and far between, as fig trees bearing olive berries, or vines yielding figs; and we should not again have to record the hideous spectacle of clergymen assembled to witness a slave burned to death, and to admonish thousands of assembled negroes that, unless they observed due subordination, a similar fate should be theirs.

But ministers there are, and statesmen, magistrates and citizens, who truly hold, and illustrate by their lives, the proverb that, HONESTY IS THE BEST POLICY.

FREE LABOR MANUFACTORY.—By a typographical error in G. W. Taylor's card on the first page of last number, his meaning was obscured. It should have read thus:

"The undersigned will rent the machinery and purchase the cotton, guaranteeing six per cent per annum interest on the whole, and a sum deemed sufficient for wear and tear of machinery,—and will keep it insured against loss by fire, during the term of his lease," &c., &c.

JUAN PLACIDO.

Some attacks of ague, which nearly ended my days, prevented me from accompanying my mistress to Havana. When I recovered, no one could enjoy himself in two years as I did in four months; I bathed four times a day, and even in the night, I fished, rode on horseback, made excursions into the mountains, ascended the highest hills, eat all kinds of fruit; in short, I enjoyed all the innocent pleasures of youth. In this little epoch I grew stout and lively, but when I returned to my old mode of life, my health broke down again, and I became as I was before.

When I recovered sufficiently, my first destiny was to be a page, as well in Havana as in Matanzas; already I was used to sit up from my earliest years the greatest part of the night, in the city, either at the theatre, or at parties, or in the house of the Marquis M——— and the Senoras C., from which we went out at ten o'clock, and after supper play began, and continued till eleven or twelve; and at Matanzas, on the days appointed, and sometimes not, when they dined at the house of Count J., or in that of Don Juan M., and generally to pass the evening in the house of the Senoras G., in which the most distinguished persons of the town met and played at treillo, malilla, or burro. While my lady played, I could not quit the side of her chair till midnight, when we usually returned to the Molino. If during the tertulia I fell asleep, or went behind the volante, if the lantern went out by accident, even as soon as we arrived, the mayoral, or administrador was called up, and I was put for the night in the stocks, and at daybreak I was called to an account, not as a boy; and so much power has sleep over a man, four or five nights seldom passed that I did not fall into the same faults. My poor mother and brothers more than twice sat up waiting for me while I was in confinement, waiting a sorrowful morning. She, all anxiety when I did not come, used sometimes to leave her hut, and approaching the door of the infirmary, which was in front of the place allotted to the men where the stocks were, on the left hand side, at times would find me there; and would call to me, "Juan," and I, sighing, would answer her, and then she would say outside, "Ah, my child!" and then it was she would call on her husband in his grave—for at this time my father was dead. Three times I remember the repetition of this scene, at other times I used to meet my mother seeking me—once above all, a memorable time to me—when the event which follows happened:—

We were returning from the town late one night, when the volante was going very fast, and I was seated as usual, with one hand holding the bar, and having the lantern in the other, I fell asleep, and it fell out of my hand; on awaking, I missed the lantern, and jumped down to get it, but such was my terror, I was unable to come up with the volante. I followed, well knowing what was to come, but when I came close to the house, I was seized by Don Sylvester, the young mayoral. Leading me to the stocks, we met my mother, who, giving way to the impulses of her heart, came up to complete my misfortunes. On seeing me, she attempted to inquire what I had done, but the mayoral ordered her to be silent, and treated her as one raising a disturbance. Without regard to her entreaties, and being irritated at being called up at that hour, he raised his hand, and struck my mother with the whip. I felt the blow in my own heart! To utter a loud cry, and from a downcast boy, with the timidity of one as meek as a lamb, to become all at once like a raging lion, was a thing of a moment—with all my strength I fell on him with teeth and hands, and it may be imagined how many cuffs, kicks, and blows were given in the struggle that ensued.

My mother and myself were carried off and shut up in the same place; the two twin children were brought to her, while Florence and Fernando were left weeping alone in the hut. Scarcely it dawned, when the mayoral, with two negroes acting under him, took hold of me and my mother, and led us as victims to the place of sacrifice. I suffered more punishment than was ordered, in consequence of my attack on the mayoral. But who can describe the powers of the laws of nature in mothers? the fault of my mother was, that seeing they were going to kill me, as she thought, she inquired what I had done, and this was sufficient to receive a blow and to be farther chastised. At beholding my mother in this situation, for the first time in her life, (she being exempt from work) stripped by the negroes and thrown down to be scourged, overwhelmed with grief and trembling, I asked them to have pity on her for God's sake; but at the sound of the first lash, infuriated like a tiger, I flew at the mayoral, and was near losing my life in his hands; but let us throw a veil over the rest of this doleful scene.—[To be Continued.]

Passages from our Correspondence.

JEFFERSON Co: OHIO.—“Has it not been a bitter-cup to us all, to give up our honored friend Wm. Forster, to lay down to his last rest thus far from his beloved life-partner, his home friends. He has fallen as with a double armor on—a mission of philanthropy, and the mission of the gospel of Christ. He preached Christ most sweetly whilst he was here. Some of our children who were present were much interested in his sermon at ———. His theme was the shortness and uncertainty of time. Again in the evening he spoke most sweetly to a select circle, and to a large company next day, one of whom afterward remarked emphatically, that he seemed too ripe for Heaven to stay long here.

To him the change is doubtless glorious: but the Church is mourning and stripped.”

A correspondent from the far south,—(in such cases we think it best not to give localities) says: “There are men in this vicinity, doing business, who can neither read nor write. This is not a fair specimen of the south. In some places there is a good share of intelligence: planters are more wealthy—children better educated—society more aristocratic, and more dissipated. I was recently at a wedding. The bride was quite pretty, but, when she came to sign the certificate, not being able to write, she touched the top of the pen while the magistrate wrote the name for her. Most of the beautiful girls in this neighborhood smoke a pipe!—and nineteen twentieths of the married women do so. The old women here pay great respect to the moon in planting garden seeds, &c. &c. At table, in serving fried meat or boiled, they will enquire,—‘Will you have some of the fat?’—‘Will you take a piece of the bile?’”

Rich and poor are alike generally deficient in education, or if they have a competent literary education, be sure they have no domestic one. From personal observation, I am convinced that in a company of Yankee girls, a Coolebs might take the first he came to, and find her in intelligence and moral worth, in literary and domestic education, in gentleness, and in all the characteristics of the true lady, superior to nine out of ten of the southern ladies.

The southerners have a high opinion of ‘the Yankees,’ as they style all from ‘the north:’ and well they may. When they come in contact with them their pockets generally feel it. It is those who take most of the contracts on their railways—who furnish their carriages, steam engines, pianos, &c., (at high prices)—who manufacture their negro shoes and clothing, teach their high schools,—who are their music masters, lawyers, physicians, ministers, master carpenters, &c., and whoever has anything to be done will employ a ‘Yankee’ in preference to a southerner, (supposing them in other respects equal.) Experience has taught them that southern habits and southern education do not develop a business capacity that can compete with that of ‘Yankee land.’”

A CORRESPONDENT WRITING FROM LOUISIANA, says: “This is a cotton growing country, but one of few comforts. Fig trees grow readily from slips, merely staking them in the ground and keeping the cattle from them; yet few have plenty of figs, and nine tenths have none at all. Peaches will do very well here, yet they are by no means plentiful, and the quality is generally inferior. For apples the climate is rather warm, yet by a suitable selection, and by keeping the trees well trimmed, enough for home consumption might easily be raised. But farmers have no apple orchards. Some have four or five trees of natural fruit, which are never trimmed, and the fruit of which the slaves eat when half ripe. They seem to have but two ideas: the one cotton and the other ‘Niggers.’ They clear land, exhaust it, and then clear more. Thus a planter must own four slaves as much as he wishes to cultivate at once, and when it is all exhausted, he must abandon his place, buildings and all, and settle a new one. I have endeavored to show them that by plowing in the southern pea, (the clover of the south) all the level land at least, might not only be kept in tillable condition, but actually improved at less cost than the clearing of new land. I have enforced my views by the authority of the Patent Office Report, address of Edmund Ruffin, &c., but many are too ignorant to understand an argument which contemplates the future as well as the present, and the most intelligent are mere routineists in farming. They will cut down great pines, and deciden others, and work hard rolling logs, &c., and then raise an uncertain crop of four or five bales for one man, worth $40 clear per bale, when instead of felling the trees, they might, by properly notching them in three or four places, and collecting the turpentine, make at least twice as much. But ignorance and indolence, twin sisters, sit brooding upon the hearth stones of the ‘sunny south.’ They cloud the brain and palsy the arm; and, while the soil and climate admit of many and varied productions, the golden fruit hangs from the bough, but they reach not their hands to gather it.”

The same friend says:

“I think I can demonstrate that slave-labor is generally unprofitable. A good field-hand is now worth $1500. The interest at 8 per cent is $120 per annum. Doctor’s bills and lost time, including one week at Christmas, say $15 more. Clothes, say $15 per annum: expense of overseeing, say $10 per head: tax about $5 per head; making $165 a year,—to which add the gradual and yet final extinction of capital, and the fact that seven northern freemen will, at most work, perform as much as ten slaves, and it must be evident that as a mere matter of dollars and cents, it does not pay well.”

For the Non-Slaveholder.

BE STRONG IN THE RIGHT.

“He that is not with me is against me: He that gathereth not with me scattereth abroad.” This declaration is unchangeably true, when applied to religion—inasmuch as human research has never been able to find a middle ground between approval and disapproval in the Divine sight; and with little exception, the declaration is equally applicable to Slavery. Honest self-examination would prove to us, that we are either countenancing or discountenancing it; either aiding its continuance or its discontinuance.

This system, with its inseparable evils, is so repugnant to the moral feelings of those who have not dwelt immediately under its benumbing influences, that ninety-nine out of a hundred will declare themselves opposed to it; and yet how few are willing practically to make good this declaration by refusing it aid, politically, morally, religiously, commercially.

The Slave system demands non-interference—it demands even silence, under the specious plea that the peace and prosperity of the Church, the Government and the Country require it; and under the cloak of apparent good, the demand has been astonishingly submitted to. The agents of civil government, the church, the commercial interest, have all largely responded to the demand:—not because they really approved and loved the system of American Slavery, but because they have not sufficiently hated it—because (having never been its victims,) they underrate its enormity, and thus make it a subordinate concern of small account.

And why does the system require silence and concealment from public notice, but because its atrocity will not bear investigation? Why does the powerful instrumentality of pro-slavery newspapers, (made such by political and commercial influences) fill the minds of the people, with apologies for Slavery and with pro-slavery arguments based upon supposed expediency, but to close the way against partial examination into the wrongs of the Slave, upon principles of morality, christianity, and humanity? These labors have for a great length of time proved alarmingly successful, so that very many who would not willingly be in the wrong, have received from such sources much of their information of the present character and position of Slavery. Yet there is reason to believe that a better and a brighter day, for the unhappy bondman and his oppressor, is in advance. There is a remnant who are, in good earnest, heart and hand, opposed to the barbarous system. The feelings of the people are against it. Yes, we know it to be wrong, and it is clearly true, that the wrong is not without a remedy; and the day cannot be far distant when that kind of logic (suited only to uncivilized ages) which undertakes to prove that slaveholding is not a crime to be repented of and forsaken, will be rejected with disgust. May this day be hastened with a rapidity commensurate to the vast amount of injustice and iniquity embraced in the system.

Fellow Christians, let us make the subject an interesting one. It is superlatively so to the Slave, his all is at stake. And why should it not be so with us? We too have much at stake in the matter. Our profession requires that we do not aid tyranny and oppression, by political, commercial, moral or religious means, but that we should wash our hands in innocency, and “remember those in bonds as bound with them.” This will give to the subject an importance, that in its advocacy will enable one to chase a thousand, and two to put ten thousand to flight.

DO WE CONSIDER?

The query has arisen, do we often enough review mentally the evils of slavery, the sighs and tears that are drawn from its helpless victims, by the rending asunder of the closest ties of relationship,—their hard toils and cruel whippings, which they do not escape, notwithstanding their faithful endeavors to comply with the demands of their cruel taskmasters? It seems to me, were we seriously and frequently to consider these things, we would also consider whether we are endeavoring in any way to advance their liberation, and whether an abstinence from the productions of their unrequited toil would not in some measure, tend to open the eyes of their oppressors. Should we not view those productions as the price of blood, since the slaves are driven under the lash, and their blood daily flows, to produce luxuries for the consumers? Let us then examine whether the amount consumed by each family, or, may I not say by each individual, has not caused the laceration, sighs, and groans of some poor toil worn slave.

The greater the demand for sugar, cotton, &c., the greater the toil and sufferings of the poor victims of slavery. Although each individual may sometimes reason thus,—“what good can it do for me to refrain from their productions? What I use can have no effect either to increase their toils, or to break their bonds,”—let such remember that many small items swell to a considerable amount, and it is something to feel guiltless of our brother's blood. And while we should endeavor to act so as to be guiltless; we should look upon the slaveholder as our brother, who is deluded by the influences of a wrong education and example, and, remembering that we are by nature frail and erring, remembering too, the power and influence of habit and education, we should not spurn him from us, as unworthy of our regard, but endeavor, in kindness, to convince him of the evils of his practices.

“The oppressor needs a friend,—
Slow to reproach,—forgetting in the right,—
Till God in mercy over him shall bend,
On his dark path to say—let there be light!”

For the Non-Slaverholder.
USE THE RIGHT SPECTACLES.!

It is difficult to prove a self-evident proposition. That the system of slavery is upheld entirely by the purchase and consumption of its products, seems so plain a statement as to admit of no demonstration. Never have I met with a candid, unprejudiced individual who would not admit, that, if all professed abolitionists would abstain from the use of slave-labor products, slavery would inevitably fall. And seldom have I seen a person having little or no interest in such products, who could not perceive the impropriety of their use. But it is difficult to see clearly through the medium of interest. All the arguments adduced in justification of their promiscuous use, resolve themselves into those of expediency.

The heart often feels its way where the intellect stumbles. I have just risen from the perusal of the thrilling narrative of Solomon Northrup. Here is no labored fiction; but we see faithfully depicted, the stern realities, the terrible facts, the overwhelming enormities of the system of slavery. Again, I resolved, never, knowingly, to partake with the slaveholder, in the gain of oppression. I have been moved often to grief and tears, by the sad records of the dreadful wrongs inflicted upon our colored brother; but never before was my heart so deeply, so painfully oppressed by the monstrous injustice and iniquity of the system.

It seemed to me, that Providence had permitted him to be thus ruthlessly snatched from his home and family, to pass unpitied and alone, his long, painful, and almost hopeless pilgrimage; and finally, in a remarkable manner, rescued him from the grasp of oppression, that he might give us another report from the dark prison-house, and raise one more warning voice against that dreadful traffic in “slaves and souls of men.” And I remembered the voice of inspiration: “Whoso stoppeth his ears from hearing the cries of the poor, himself shall also cry and shall not be heard.”

Let every abolitionist read that volume, and then ask himself, if, in the eye of impartial justice, he is innocent, while he continues in any way to countenance, or lend the notice to that most iniquitous system.

A vast amount of time, talent, and money have been expended by the many friends of the slaves, in disseminating information, purchasing their freedom, or colonizing them in Africa. Let the same amount of genius, funds and time, be devoted to increasing the growth, and of course consumption of Free labor productions, and the days of oppression would soon be numbered.

Who is fully on the side of mercy and justice? Let them be united, and faithful to their individual convictions of duty. L. T.

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, SECOND MONTH, 18, 1854.

WILLIAM FORSTER.

In our last number, we gave brief expression to our emotions respecting the removal of one who was justly loved and revered by many persons widely separated from each other. With his apostolic form mentally in our view, his solemn truthful, loving tones still lingering in our ear, his last ensemble present to our memory with affecting freshness,—we were unready to pen any thing further than a reference to the event by which the Father of Life conferred upon him in eternal fulness, “the end of his faith,” whilst to survivors was extended a deep sorrow, a profound lesson, a solemn call mingled with blessed consolation.

It is expected of us, and it is due to our subscribers, that we should fulfil the promise which we gave of a further notice of this eminent Christian Philanthropist; and, although space cannot be afforded in this month's number for all that we shall feel bound to say, we do not intend that our readers shall dissent from our opinion that the subject of this article was worthy of responsive love from all men, and of a full tribute from a Journal which is devoted to a testimony against all oppression.

Seldom, perhaps, if ever, has a person been known, who was so sensitive to the wrongs and sufferings of his fellow men, or who was so weighed down by the consideration of them. Literally remembering those in bonds as bound with them, his life has furnished an illustration of the practicability of obedience to this command, which includes so much renunciation of self, and so full an adoption of another blessed precept—

“Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.” This fundamental law of love being so incorporated in his system of motives, and his gift of sympathy being thus large, his appeals for the oppressed were beautiful beyond description, and it is difficult to convey or to conceive an adequate idea of the love with which, on the behalf of these, he pleaded with those in authority.

WILLIAM FORSTER, son of William and Elizabeth Forster, was born at Tottenham (near London,) 3d Mo. 23d 1784. Of his parents, who were valued and worthy Friends, we know little, but we may infer much. To have so trained a large family of sons and daughters that they should attain to Christian eminence, and serve their generation according to the will of God, they must themselves have walked in the Divine fear, and realized that better is he that ruleth his spirit, than he that taketh a city. What habits of self-government on the part of parents, what watchfulness, what secret fervent prayers, what circumspect example, and what Godly teachings must have been the seed sown, which afterward bore fruit in the matured characters of such men and women!

We have already said that his life, from his youth, has been a Christian mission. Early responding to his heavenly Father's gracious invitation, “My son give me thy heart,” he yielded at the age of nineteen, to the call of the Spirit to the public advocacy of Divine truth,—and at the age of twenty-one he was a duly recognized minister of the gospel, in the religious society of Friends. At this time he was aiding his father in the surveying business: but he left all for his Master's work,—was engaged in it, with little intermission, for nearly half a century,—traveled in it extensively,—and has died in it, the union from the Holy One abiding with him to the end.

In the year 1811, he was extensively engaged in a religious visit to Scotland and the Hebrides, and in that and the following year, he joined our beloved Stephen Grellet in his gospel labors in London, Dublin, and some other places. Of their remarkable labors in Newgate prison, (in which they spent more than a week) it is to be hoped that some Biographer may be able to furnish a particular account. We cannot refrain from noting, that these Friends, after their affecting discoveries in this prison, went to Elizabeth Fry, and enlisted her in the benevolent work, for which she became “world renowned,” and in the prosecution of which, the fruits of the Spirit were so conspicuous in her, and her life so shone before men that she was as a city set upon a hill that could not be hid. A meeting in London, for the Jews, appointed by Stephen Grellet, in which W. Forster was his companion, was, we believe, the first Christian meeting held for the Hebrews. At several large public meetings which our friends held in Dublin, W. Forster performed the work of an Evangelist—as also in visits to some public institutions.

Elizabeth Fry, who knew his humble dedicated walk from youth to age, in her memoranda speaks of Wm. Forster as having been an instrument of much good to her. In the year 1814, they were associated in visiting the families of Kingston Monthly Meeting. So abundant were his labors as a minister of Christ, that we cannot hope to trace out and enumerate a moiety of the services upon which he entered. In common with our readers, we must wait for the appearance of a memoir worthy of a career like his, and which, we hope, will not be withheld by his family and friends.

In the 5th Mo. 1819, he spread with great humility, before the Yearly Meeting of London a concern to make a religious visit to this land. A solemn silence reigned in that dignified and truly Christian assembly, in which those spiritually minded fathers and mothers in the church, sought to know “the mind of the spirit,” which, as the Apostle declares, “searcheth all things, even the deep things of God.” And strikingly was the whole body brought, in the true unity of the Spirit, to recognize the genuineness of the call which had been extended to this beloved disciple. The dear companion of his life, (as one who was present* testified) spoke beautifully and with power, declaring the goodness and mercy of the Lord which had hitherto followed them, and expressed her strong desire that her beloved husband might be upheld, comforted, and encouraged. The whole meeting seemed affected. Their striking example of submission and resignation, has been edifying and encouraging.”

His wife's brother, the noble philanthropist, Thomas Fowell Buxton, wrote to his sister, in reference to this contemplated mission, a letter fraught with a true appreciation of it.

Earlham, January, 1819.

“My dear Sister,
“Your letter has been much upon my mind, and has raised a variety of feelings. The first impression was one of much sorrow, that your plans and prospects of home and happiness should be interrupted, and for so long a time; but I must confess, I have been speedily almost reconciled to it; that is, I have brought it home to my own mind, and have considered, whether it would not really be the greatest of blessings, if by any means my duty would call me to such a sacrifice, and the call were not to be disobeyed. After all, it is a noble thing—it is the noblest of all things—to be permitted to be a servant of the Infinite Ruler of the world; and how low and earthly is that wisdom which could prefer any delights, before the delights of self-dedication. We know but few things for certain; but this is one of them;—a promise is given to him, who leaves father or mother, or wife, or children, for Christ's sake. How can I mourn then, that William should accept the terms of such a promise? I rejoice that he is counted worthy to suffer for Christ's sake. I have always felt particularly interested with the vision of the man of Macedonia, calling Paul to come over and help them, comparing it with the Epistle to the Philippians. The discouragements at first were so great, and yet the Epistle describes such an abundant and happy produce. Who can tell how many may have eternal reason to rejoice at the obedience of the Apostle; and who can presume to limit the effect, which Providence may please to produce by William's visit? We may differ on some points, but not on this—that his call is from above. I am persuaded it has been sought in the right spirit. I believe it is sent in mercy to others—in eminent mercy to him and to you; and I am willing that you should undergo the pains of separation. But, my dear Anna, you must not imagine I am indifferent about this. * * * With love to you both, and not without thankfulness that there is something of a missionary spirit among you,

* Priscilla Gurney.

"I am,

"Your affectionate brother,
T. F. BUXTON."

In a letter dated 3d Mo. 12th, 1820, from Bradpole, the residence of Wm. Forster, T. F. Buxton writes:

"I came here yesterday, and have had a full opportunity of learning a lesson of humility. It is very well to do good, and to serve one's country, while at the same moment we are feeding our ambition and gratifying our pride: but what are the sacrifices I make? I may call them sacrifices, but their true name is the pleasures I enjoy. Here, however, the pleasures and the sacrifices are totally at variance. How truly and exactly do the words, 'They left all and followed him,' convey my view of William's two years' absence from home, a wife, a boy, the very darlings of his heart, all his wishes and desires centering in this spot! Well, I cannot pity him, I am more inclined to envy one who is wise enough to make a bargain so incontestably good. I went to Meeting with him twice to day: his morning sermon, on 'Trust in the Lord with all thine heart, and lean not unto thine own understanding: in all thy ways acknowledge him, and he shall direct thy paths,' was one of the very best I ever heard. But the text is one particularly interesting to me."—[To be Continued.]

BLESSED ARE THE PEACE-MAKERS.—MISSION OF JOSEPH STURGE, &c.—It is among the interesting events of the day, and a pleasing evidence of the continuance among Friends of the missionary spirit, that a deputation from London Meeting for sufferings has proceeded to Petersburg to plead with the Autocrat in behalf of Peace, which cannot be violated without disobedience to Christ's precepts. The deputation consists of our valued friend JOSEPH STURGE, (personally beloved by many of our readers, and known to most of them as a large hearted Philanthropist)—HENRY PEASE, (brother to John Pease who is justly dear to American Friends) and ROBERT CHANTLON, another unwearied Philanthropist and Christian. These friends have engaged in this mission from an impression of religious duty, and, having spread their feelings before the Society, have received its sanction and encouragement. They are the bearers of an Address, which we have not seen, but from such a source, we cannot doubt that it is replete with christian sentiment. A political Journal, announcing their departure, says:

"Our Quaker friends have, ere this, successfully pleaded the cause of humanity before crowned heads, when diplomacy has been unsuccessful. Perhaps the simple tribulation of Joseph Sturge may produce more impression than the well reasoned dispatches of Lord Clarendon, or the entreaties of Hamilton Seymour."

On reaching St. Petersburg they had an interview with Count Nesselrode, the Prime Minister, and an assurance of an audience with the Emperor. From Count Nesselrode, with whom, at his request, they left their "Address," they met with extraordinary kindness and sympathy. They subsequently had a full interview with the Emperor Nicholas, who heard them patiently and sympathizingly, expressed entire approbation with the sentiments of the Address, and, on their representation of the inevitable consequences of the war, and of the horrors which had already resulted, was evidently affected. We understand that he pleaded the pressure upon him from without, that his honor was at stake, and that it was not in his power to arrest the war. Be this as it may, we quite believe that he who is styled the AUTOCRAT OF ALL THE RUSSIAS has in reality far less of power than is ascribed to him, and that he is compelled to move in the current of events which he is thought to lead.

Whatever may be the issue, we adore the benevolent Providence which moved our dear friends to this "work of faith and labor of love." We are thankful that the testimony of Truth has been uttered, and we have no fear that it will be in vain, whether we or they ever see the fruit or not. He who appointed the service will take care of the results.

It appears that the murderous hostilities so unhappily commenced, are most unpopular with a large class in Russia. How strange the infatuation by which thousands of people submit to be led to slaughter by the will of mere men like themselves, in a quarrel which concerns them not!

"War is a game, which, were their subjects wise,
Kings could not play at."

We are no revolutionists, and would not encourage in any people, an insubordination towards their government: but we should rejoice to see the day when all men, would resolve rather to suffer the penalty of human law than to enlist as warriors, in violation of the higher law of Christ.

In the southern part of this Empire, where every man is supposed to be a soldier, there are numerous religious people who have a testimony against War. Stephen Grellet and William Allen visited these people, and from the biography of the latter and the statements of the former we have accounts of the Malakans, of one of the sects of the Dulobortsi, and of the Mennonists, who hold that a true Christian cannot harbor revenge: and those last named conscientiously refuse to bear arms. The Malakans hold strongly the christian sentiment, that it is better to suffer wrong than to avenge it, and carry it very far in their practice, bearing violence and robbery rather than resort to suits at law. But, gleaming from the sacred volume that they must be subject for conscience sake to Kings and Governors, and that there are no powers but such as are ordained of God, they are puzzled, and whilst they know it to be wrong to fight, they are not so fully enlightened as to perceive that they may yield a passive obedience to the powers which are set over them, by bearing, for Christ's sake, the consequences of refusing to break his law, when the alternative is whether it be right to obey man rather than God.

And here we have to record what appears to us to be most instructive, and calculated to show the Divine condescension to those who, in sincerity, strive to avoid the evil and to adopt the right. "Who is there that shall harm you, if ye be followers of that which is good?"—These persons, being above the common soldiers in mental advancement and integrity, had, at the time when our informant knew them, never been actually engaged in human slaughter. They enlisted as soldiers, but, ere they reached the battle field were taken up and appointed to other services, often to trust and responsibility. Yet, in each successive enlistment, the Malakan left home with heart sorrow—imbued with peace principles, yet thinking his active obedience due to his rulers, and not knowing whether his might not be the first exception to the remarkable exemption from a murderous task.

Such is the care of the Almighty over those to whom he has entrusted sacred truth, and who are obedient to the heavenly vision.

HAVE FAITH IN YOUR PRINCIPLES.—It is a fine thing to be theoretically right,—but it is a noble thing to be practically faithful. Be right in such a manner, that, in the trial hour, men shall not have reason to say that you might just as well have been wrong! We have known many persons with whose real convictions we had perfect sympathy, who, when the crisis called for an out spoken testimony, either were silent,—or else whispered the truth as if they only half believed it,—or else conceded and compromised it away so that honest adversaries could not respect them, and the real champions of the right had to mourn for the faint-heartedness of their friends. Commend us to the man who does not think that discretion requires him, "under the peculiar circumstances of the case," to seem to side with the wrong in hope that he may thus reserve an influence which will subserve the Truth when Error shall have hanged herself with the rope which he has lent her. In many a case of wide-spread delusion, involving great violations of individual and collective rights, these faint-hearted lovers of the Truth, by their sins of omission, do more to advance the very thing which they abhor, than all the combined efforts of the opposition could have effected, if these had maintained their posts and prevented the very agitation they dreaded by being faithful in season. Where's the use in being right, if you act just as though you were wrong? Have faith in your principles!

FREE LABOR MANUFACTORY.—The proposition of our friend George W. Taylor, on the first page of the current volume, addressed "to all the friends of the Free Labor movement," is an important one. It invites subscriptions to a stock of about $15,000, according to a plan therein set forth, for the establishment and supply of a Jobbing Mill to be run on a variety of staple articles. Wake up friends! Talk to one another about it, and let your conversation be seasoned with what Demosthenes found to be the secret of eloquence: "Action! Action!" Don't be too diffident about these money matters. When Henry Clay failed to obtain the high position for which (it is to be feared) he bartered away so much of virtue and honor,—it was a light thing for politicians to undertake to raise for him a sum equal to the Presidential compensation. The cost in this case for pecuniary sacrifice (even if such were involved) is as much higher than the politician's motives, as Duty is above Dollars, as HUMAN RIGHTS are paramount to human ambition, as the Heaven of PRINCIPLE is higher than the earth of selfishness.

The stock is partly filled up—but there is room for you. Shall the enterprise stick fast? Shall one man, already overlaid, be expected to bear all the burden? Where's the Bellman? Wake up!

For the Non-Slaveholder.

WILLIAM FORSTER.

Ah! know ye not, in Israel
A Prince is fallen to day,
A just man, from the ills to come,
In mercy called away?

The Church is clothed in mourning:
Who shall supply her loss?
A standard-bearer's quit the field,
A soldier of the Cross.

On mission high and holy,
He braved the watery main,
And many a faithful heart rejoiced
To welcome him again.

Thrice had the veteran warrior
Nobly forsaken all,

And trod our western wilderness,
Obedient to his call
Whose voice he knew from childhood,
And followed where it led,
For "perfect love" reigned over him,
And banished fear and dread.
Meekly, he journeyed onward,
Unmoved by praise or blame,
The mark was always kept in view,
And steady was his aim.
Unflinching trust in Jesus
Had ever nerved his arm,
He knew his shield of love was near,
Protecting him from harm.
Like Paul, he "went from house to house,"
And boldly preached the word:—
And many souls accepting it,
Were gathered to the Lord.
While, from his heart and from his lips,
Wherever he might pass,
Fell gentle benedictions,
As showers upon the grass.
Nor from the galling chains of sin
Alone he sought to free:
However named, the "bondman" claimed
His whole souled sympathy.
Bending beneath a weight of care,
A pilgrimage of years,
Before the rulers of the land,
Behold him plead with tears.
For poor down-trodden Africa
He lifts his latest breath,
And with her name upon his lips,
Sinks in the arms of death.
Thoughts of the distant and the loved
Came thronging to his heart,
He felt, 'twere sweet to be with them,
Yet sweeter to depart.
"Better to die and be with Christ!"
Were the blest words he said,
Then, in the midst of bonds and chains,
The enfranchized spirit fled.
And in a far off stranger land,
Near Holston's billowy wave,
A voice is calling silently,
From that lone Martyr's grave.
Oppressor, list its meaning,
It is to thee it calls,
Ah heed the solemn warning voice,
Before the judgment falls.
It tells thee that a martyr's prayers
Are heard in highest heaven,
That soon the shackles of the Slave
In mercy shall be riven.
God will avenge his own elect,
Who're groaning to be free:

His promises are sure—He will Avenge them speedily.
But where will be the Oppressor,
In that soul searching day,
When perfect Truth and Equity
Have undivided sway!
Quailing before the majesty
Of the Omnipotent One,
Dealers in "slaves and souls of men,"
Will feel their work is done;
And bowed beneath that "word of God,"
Which pierces as a sword,
Call on the rocks to hide them, from
The presence of the Lord.
Hush! mercy's voice is whispering,
"Immanuel died to save"—
And his designs rich fruit shall spring,
From that lone martyr's grave.

JUAN PLACIDO.

I said before, that I was like my mistress's lap-dog, since it was my duty to follow her wherever she went, except to her own private rooms, for then I remained outside to prevent any body from going in, receiving any messages, and keeping silence when she was there. One afternoon, I followed her into the garden, where I was set to gather up flowers and transplant some little roots, when the gardener was employed in his occupation there. At the time of leaving the garden, I took unconsciously, a small leaf, one alone of geranium, thinking only of making verses; I was following, with this leaf in my hand, two or three yards behind my mistress, so absent in my mind that I was squeezing the leaf with my fingers to give it greater fragrancy. At the entrance at the anti-chamber she turned back, I made room for her, but the smell attracted her attention; full of anger, on a sudden and in a quick tone she asked me "What have you got in your hands?" Motionless and trembling, I dropped the remains of the leaf, and, as if it was a whole plant, for this crime I was struck on the face, and delivered to the care of the overseer, Don Lucas Rodriguez. It was about six o'clock in the afternoon, and in the middle of winter. The volante was ready to go to town, and I was to ride behind; but alas! I was little aware what was to come in the next hour! Instead of riding in the volante, I was taken to the stocks, which were in a building, formerly an infirmary, and now used for a prison, and for depositing the bodies of the dead till the hour of interment. My feet were put in the stocks, where shivering with cold, without any covering, they shut me in. What a frightful night I passed there! My fancy saw the dead rising and walking about the room, and scrambling up a window above the river and near a catact, I listened to its roar, when seemed to me like the howling of a legion of ghosts.

Scarcely day-light appeared, when I heard the unbolting of the door; a negro came in followed by the overseer wrapt in his cloak; they took me out and put me on a board fixed on a kind of fork, where I saw a bundle of rods. The overseer, from under a handkerchief over his mouth, roared out, "tie him fast;" when my hands were tied behind like a criminal, and my feet secured in an aperture of the board. Oh, my God!
Let me not speak of this frightful scene! When I recovered I found myself in the arms of my mother, bathed in tears, and disconsolate, who,
at the request of Don Jaime Florido, left me and retired. When my mistress rose next morning, her first care was to inquire whether I was treated as I deserved; and the servant who was waiting on her called me; and she asked, if I would dare to take any more leaves of her geranium? As I could not answer, I was near undergoing the same punishment, but thought to say, no. About eleven o'clock, I became quite dangerously ill: three days was I in this state. My mother used to come to see me in the night-time, when she thought my mistress out. At the sixth day I was out of danger, and could walk about.
I met my mother one day, who said to me, "Juan I have got the money to purchase your liberty; as your father is dead, you must act as a father to your brothers; they shall not chastise you any more." My only answer was a flood of tears; she went away and I to my business; but the result of my mother's visit was disappointment: the money was not paid, and I daily expected the time of my liberty, but that time was not destined for many a long year to come.

Some time after, it happened that a carrier brought to the house some chickens, some capons, and a letter, and as I was always on guard like a sentinel, it was my fortune to receive them;
laying the fowls outside, I took in the letter to my mistress, who after reading it, ordered me to take them to Don Juan Mato their steward, to whom I delivered what I received. Two weeks after this, I was called to an account for one capon missing. I said without hesitating, that I received three capons, and two chickens which I delivered. Nothing more was said of the matter, but the following day I saw the mayoral coming along towards the house, who after talking with my mistress for some time went away again. I served the breakfast, and when I was going to take the first morsel, taking advantage of the moment to eat something, my mistress ordered me to go to the mayoral's house, and tell him—I do not remember what. With sad forebodings, and an oppressed heart, being accustomed to deliver myself up on such occasions, away I went trembling. When I arrived at the door, I saw the mayoral of the Molino, and the mayoral of the Ingenio, together. I delivered my message to the first, who said, "Come in now," I obeyed, and was going to repeat it again, when Senor Dominguez, the mayoral of the Ingenio, took hold of my arm, saying, "it is to me, to whom you are sent;" took out of his pocket a thin rope, tied my hands behind me as a criminal, mounted his horse, and commanded me to run quick before him, to avoid either my mother or my brothers seeing me. Scarcely had I run a mile before the horse, stumbling at every step, when two dogs that were following us, fell upon me; one taking hold of the left side of my face pierced it through, and the other lacerated my left thigh and leg in a shocking manner, which wounds are open yet, notwithstanding it happened twenty-four years ago. The mayoral alighted on the moment, and separated me from their grasp, but my blood flowed profusely, particularly from my leg—he then pulled me by the rope, making use at the same time, of the most disgusting language; this pain partly dislocated my right arm, which at times pains me yet.—Getting up, I walked as well as I could, till we arrived at the Ingenio. They put a rope round my neck, bound up my wounds, and put me in the stocks. At night, all the people of the estate were assembled together and arranged in a line, I was put in the middle of them, the mayoral and six negroes surrounded me, and at the word "upon him," they threw me down: two of them held my hands, two my legs, and the other sat upon my back. They then asked me about the missing capon, and I did not know what to say. Twenty-five lashes were laid on me, they then asked me again to tell the truth, I was perplexed; at last, thinking to escape further punishment, I said, "I stole it." "What have you done with the money?" was the next question, and this was another trying point. "I bought a hat." "Where is it?" "I bought a pair of shoes." "No such thing," and I said so many things to escape punishment, but all to no purpose. Nine successive nights the same scene was repeated, and every night I told a thousand lies. After the whipping, I was sent to look after the cattle and work in the fields. Every morning my mistress was informed of what I said the previous night.

At the end of ten days, the cause of my punishment being known, Dionisio Copandonga, who was the carrier who brought the fowls, went to the mayoral, and said that the missed capon was eaten by the steward Don Manuel Pipa, and which capon was left behind in a mistake; the cook Simona was examined and confirmed the account. I do not know whether my mistress was made acquainted with this transaction; but certain it is, that since that moment, my punishment ceased, my fetters were taken off, and my work ceased, and a coarse linen dress was put on me. But the same day an accident happened, which contributed much towards my mistress forgiving me.—To be Continued.

Starkborough, Vermont, 3d Mo. 23, 1854.

Much esteemed friend, William J. Atkinson—
I wish through the columns of the Non-Slaveholder, to call the attention of its readers to the importance of an individual protest against the passage by Congress of the Nebraska or any other bill, the nature of which would be to extend or perpetuate slavery in our professedly republican government, or in the least degree to infringe upon our treaty with the Indians. I would by all means impress upon the women as well as men, the fearful responsibility that rests upon all, and the probable weight of influence attached to lucid appeals from the former.

One important feature of this momentous subject is, that in a republican government it is not expected that individuals rate, but the mass of the people, and that they send men as agents to Washington, to legislate and embody the will or judgment of their constituents, always however in conformity with the professed object of the framers of our excellent Constitution, which was for the benefit of all the people of these United States. Shall we then be silent, when we are assured that our agents enter upon a scheme which if consummated would greatly infringe upon the rights of three large portions of the people, viz: the Non-slaveholders, the colored people, and the Indians; or shall we rise in all our civil and moral power, and speak in language clear and urgent, saying to them, stop your oppressive measures, and do the work for which you were sent. Can we without protest, see our agents perpetrate abuse upon any class and be guiltless? In the little town of Starkborough, a meeting was called irrespective of party, and seven strong resolutions on the Nebraska bill, &c., were unanimously passed. They circulated petitions against the passage of said bill, and obtained and forwarded to James Miesham, our representative in Congress, the signatures of 260 males and 200 females. If all other towns in the free States should do as much in proportion to their population, Congress would be suitably warned.

Very affectionately thy friend,

JOEL BATTERY.

WELL-WISHERS.

There is a class of persons professedly favorable to the cause of emancipation, who nevertheless content themselves with vague hopes and wishes for the discontinuance of slavery at some indefinite period, without once attempting to hasten the hour of its approach, by any thing like active exertion. They are perfectly willing that the good work of emancipation should be accomplished—that millions of their fellow creatures should be raised from the miserable condition of beasts of burden, to the rank of men, and useful citizens—provided, only, that such consent involves nothing like personal exertion, no possible inconvenience to themselves, during the process of this transformation. They acknowledge the deep iniquity of the system of slavery, but they act as if the admission of its criminality, instead of being merely prefatory to amendment, was amply sufficient of itself to satisfy all the demands of justice, to silence all the reproaches of conscience. They appear to have one species of justice for their theory, and another, vastly lower in its standard, for actual practice;—or rather, the high and true rules of moral equity by which they mete out justice between themselves, averse instantly from their even measure, when the rights of their sable brethren are brought into competition with their own convenience, or their prejudices. Certainly, say they, every man has a just and natural right to his own person, and to the control of his own conduct, so long as it interferes not with the well-being of others. Yet should the ancestors of any individual, unfortunately guilty of having been gifted by his Maker with a sable brow, have been violently wrenched in some terrible scene of ruin and conflagration from their native home, and having been dragged to some distant land, there sold into perpetual bondage—then, under such circumstances, the right of the individual to his own flesh and sinews, or of the Creator to the being whom he has made, is superseded and invalidated by the claims of one who hath bought him for money, or received him as a lawful inheritance; and, although we regard with horror the idea of trafficking in human flesh, or holding our fellow-men in a state of slavery, yet we would not be so unjust as to wish rashly to deprive the slaveholders of their property. We know that the employment of free laborers would be much more advantageous to the planter, but we can convince him of this only by practical experiment; and it is not worth while for us to undergo the expense and inconvenience of obtaining free articles, unless every one else would do the same. So stands the argument; and so, were it committed to our hands, would the destinies of the slave stand unaltered for ages, unless some terrible convulsion, like the sudden springing of a mine, should at once tear asunder the bonds of the slave, and overwhelm his master beneath the falling ruins of his wall of opposition.—E. M. Chandler.

A TIMELY MOVEMENT.

A call has been issued for a meeting at Worcester, Massachusetts, on the 18th of next month, of persons disposed to emigrate to Southern Nebraska. It is proposed to form a colony of at least one hundred families of farmers and mechanics, "who are in favor of sustaining the principles of the Gospel, and opposed to the extension of Slavery." The call is from a responsible source—from men who are themselves prepared to enter into the movement, and to make personal and pecuniary sacrifices to give it effect.

The end is not yet. As in a beleaguered city, when the outer wall is in danger of being overthrown, an inner one is erected, so the breaking down of the Missouri prohibition may only disclose a wall of free hearts drawn around the threatened territory, against which the dark hosts of Slavery shall be broken like waves on a rock.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, FOURTH MONTH, 13, 1854.

WILLIAM FORSTER.

In resuming our notice of this dedicated friend, we are aware that our readers will look for details of his labors on behalf of the slave. They will, however, accord with us, in preferring to trace the various steps of his christian course, and to note how truly "the path of the just is as a shining light which shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

"He was not," (says a valued Friend who loved him much, and whom for many years he regarded as a sister in the Truth,) "one of the multitude, and there were comparatively few who were capable of taking the measurement of his large and powerful mind; still fewer, probably, who could appreciate the unellowed ripeness of his Christian experience, or the depth of those secret conflicts and exercises of spirit, which often brought him low before the Lord. His native reserve of disposition was a barrier to his forming many intimate friendships, but, to the few whom his heart had singled out in early life, as possessing a kindredship of spirit, he was a steady, faithful, and truly sympathizing friend. Indeed, his gift of sympathy, though not always called into exercise on ordinary occasions, was a very remarkable one. He would give his whole large heart, and tender all his services to a friend in need; and his true brotherly kindness, those who have largely experienced it, can never forget.

"One of the distinguishing features of his character was, a remarkable native timidity, which contrasted strikingly with his gigantic intellect, and manly, powerful frame. In allusion to his disposition to shrink from general observation, he says, in one of his letters; "My indulging in this sort of timidity is, I dare say, sometimes liable to be misunderstood, even by my best friends; and thus it is, I can well believe, that I have often deprived myself of intercourse which might have been to my help and comfort."

"This uncontrollable timidity extended even to the passage through the valley of the shadow of death. He had a constitutional dread of dying, from which he said, at different periods of his life, he had suffered much; but He who is Head over all things to His own Church, our compassionate and holy High Priest, touched with a feeling of the infirmities of His dedicated servant, in mercy smoothed the gradual descent, and shielded him from all the imagined terrors of the closing scene. A veil of unconsciousness was gently drawn over his perceptive faculties, and after a quiet slumber of twenty-four hours' continuance, 'he was not, for God took him.'"

The Norfolk News says, in a brief but graphic memoir of WILLIAM FORSTER; "An intimate attachment subsisted between him and Joseph John Gurney, and in many respects they were kindred spirits. We know not on whom the mantle of either may have fallen, but we scarcely expect to see the men who will wear it with equal worthiness. Faithfully did each of them serve his generation, and calmly did the sun of life set on their departing moments." Between these good and noble men, a close and intimate bond of union was formed in the year 1815—a bond of such a nature as not to be interrupted in life, and only to be hallowed and strengthened by the seeming separation of death. We have been allowed the perusal of a few of Wm. Forster's letters to his christian friend and brother, with some extracts from which we propose to enrich our Journal. They will serve as indications of his epistolary style, and will furnish a better insight into the beautiful character of his mind than we could otherwise hope to convey.

In a letter to J. J. Gurney, written at Staines, 8th Mo. 18th, 1815, he says:

"For some days previous to the receipt of thy letter thou hadst been much in my thoughts. * * * The remembrance of thee was attended with that indescribably sweet and precious feeling which I take to be a lively sense of the fellowship of the gospel of Christ, and I often recurred with peculiar satisfaction to the few days we passed together in Suffolk and Essex, to our meetings, our conversations, and our readings; but more especially to what I felt, and to what I believe thou felt with me. The last half hour of our last stage is to this day a subject of very grateful reflection. It was one of those bright spots in my pilgrimage to which I trust I shall always look back with comfort and satisfaction. * * *

"Now I want to tell thee a little about myself, and where I have been for the last few weeks: but I have such a thorough dislike to any thing in myself bordering on egotism (though I fear hardly enough so on a right ground) that I have scarcely courage to begin. But as I value thy sympathy I will try to tell thee a little of the way in which I have been led—of my troubles and rejoicings. When I had got through Barking Monthly Meeting, I was joined by my dear sister R., in a visit to our own members. It took up three or four weeks, and was an engagement as humiliating and mortifying as thou canst readily conceive. I was often plunged into the depths of my infirmities, and laid very low; but I have had to rejoice in these dispensations of Divine Wisdom; for by them the creature was subjected, former experience was forgotten, and having nothing to trust to but the renewing of the Holy Spirit, I was sometimes made glad in Him who is the Resurrection and the Life. When thus permitted to look unto Jesus, the faintest glimpse of His power and glory never failed to afford me comfort and support. From our own Monthly Meeting I came into Longford, where I found Ann Crowley, a humble disciple and truly valuable minister, prepared to unite with me. I left home last First day two weeks, and had a meeting in a barn at Harrow in the evening, on my way to Uxbridge. It was very large. The love and power of Christ were richly and eminently displayed in my view, and I think I never felt more of the consolations of the Gospel dispensed for my own support and encouragement, than while I was traveling alone in my chair that evening: a striking contrast to the fears and doubts that assailed me on my setting out. Such seasons are truly like a brook by the way. If the foretaste be so unutterably glorious, so completely satisfying, what must the fruition be. But we often rise to fall, and sometimes with little hope of being lifted up again. So it was with me. I had to wade under much sensible weakness in our visit to Friends, as we went from house to house, yet I trust the Lord was with us. Blessed be His name, He made His power manifest." He proceeds to mention numerous meetings, some of which were held to his relief in villages where the people were little acquainted with Friends, and, in looking towards the close of his present mission, he says: "How I then may be disposed of I know not, but at present I see no prospect of resting at home. Sometimes I wish for a little respite, but my principal desire is for that state of resignation in which I can feel it to be my daily meat and drink to do the will of my Father which is in Heaven." By subsequent letters of the same year, we find that he was occupied almost without intermission, by gospel services, holding meetings from day to day, &c., and whilst humbly ministering to others in the ability afforded, experiencing a fuller establishment in the gospel of Christ. Of a large public meeting at Huntingdon he modestly says: "under the prevalence of the love of the Redeemer (or at least what I believe to be such) I was enabled to labor to my own relief, and have left that neighborhood in a good degree of peace. I have just come from a meeting here, in which, after a dark and gloomy day, I met with a little comfort—but I am now ready to sink again. Alas!—what are we, unless upheld by the Divine Power from one hour to another. * * * Thou dost not tell me about Amelia Opie. I was thinking of her the other day, and something of a prayer was formed in my heart for her support and encouragement, that she may be enabled to persevere."

To this endeared brother in Christ (whose greatness of character he had the large mindedness to appreciate,) he wrote with perfect openness, and it is much to be desired that the world may in due time, be benefitted by their entire correspondence. From a letter, dated at Bradpole, 12th Mo. 13th, 1816, we extract some passages.

"My Dearest Joseph,

"It is most pleasant to us to think of thee, and to talk of thee, as we do almost every day, and often to feel thee near to us in such affectionate love as is our happy enjoyment, and I do not know whether these very feelings, so favorable to Christian friendship, and so likely to prompt to a frequent intercourse with those so near to us, have, not in some degree been the means of making me more satisfied with what I have not unfrequently felt to be a reprehensible silence. It has been so satisfying to me to feel that I loved thee, to believe that I enjoyed thy friendship, and that thou continued to retain an interest in me and my cares and comforts, that I have been too much disposed to rest in this sweet enjoyment, not enough considering that unless I took my part in the intercourse, there could not be much communication between us." After referring to afflictions in the family of his correspondent, he writes: "It is thus, as it has sometimes appeared to me, that our heavenly Father is pleased to grant to His believing and obedient children a token of his love. He afflicts them and lays them low. He makes them feel their dependence upon Himself. They call upon His name, and then in unutterable mercy He inclines His ear to their cry. He causes the light of His countenance to shine upon them, and they are made abundantly glad in His salvation. Thus I have to believe that, whether he visit us in judgment or in mercy, all His dealings with us are with the same ultimate object in view,—the increase of our acquaintance with Himself, the increase of our love to Him, and our more entire establishment in that faith which would enable us to hold out to the end.

In my earlier days I had many trials. My path in life has, to my own apprehension, been marked with much exercise of faith and filial dependence. Often did I seem to myself a pilgrim on the earth, without any certain dwelling place; and sometimes like one moving round a large circumference without an outward centre. In those days, I reaped the benefit of many sufferings, in being taught to look towards that rest which is in Christ Jesus our Lord, as my ultimate home. The principal object of my life was to fulfil what I believed to be the whole will of God, and I scarcely had a wish to be detained a day longer in this world, than to be brought to that day in which I could believe it to be accomplished. But now, in abundant goodness, the case is greatly altered. Blessings, temporal and social, are poured forth in such plenty upon me, the cup of earthly comfort is so full and overflowing, that I am at times seriously alarmed under the conviction of my utter inadequacy to worship the Lord with thanksgiving and praise, or even distinctly to enumerate my blessings. Canst thou realize or comprehend such a state as mine—laden and weighed down with benefits, and scarcely able to lift up thy soul with gratitude to the Father of all thy mercies? Yet even in this I would rejoice, because I am brought to feel my weakness and my poverty; to feel that all my help is in God; that all my springs are in the riches of His bounty and love, and that without His assistance I can neither serve nor worship Him.

"All our friends seem to fancy us very happy in our dear little cottage, and rich in the enjoyment of each others' company, and truly they are not mistaken. Our comforts are almost without alloy—the retirement, (nearly amounting to seclusion) of our allotment, insufferable as it would be to many, gives us an opportunity for rest, such as I little expected ever to enjoy, and in which I feel there is great need of watchfulness and prayer, lest it should have a tendency to settle me down in spiritual indolence and indifference. On my first coming here, I was a little uneasy at being without an object of outward pursuit and attention, though I must say, and thou canst believe me, that to attend to a dear and most affectionate wife, and in every possible way to endeavor to promote her comfort and enjoyment, was a duty and pleasure of all others most satisfying and delightful to me. But I already feel that there was not much need of this anxiety. There is enough for us to do. Our poor neighbors are in the extreme of indigence, and here seems scarcely any one to care for their wants. We have an association formed for the purpose of a stated supply of food during the winter, but there are many little wants which call for our attention, and which it will be our privilege and great enjoyment, in some degree to alleviate."

Nor was his attention to these poor neighbors restricted to their physical need, their educational and religious wants claiming his warm solicitude.

We find him, after his removal into Norfolk, earnestly associated with his friend J. J. Gurney, in the formation and support of the Norwich Soup and Coal Societies, which still continue their important benefits, and "he took," says the Norfolk News, "a deep and uniform interest in the Blind Hospital, the District Visiting Society, and the Norwich and Norfolk Hospital, with the latter of which he was, at different times, officially connected as a member of the Board of Managers."—"There was in fact, scarcely a local charity with which he was not more or less connected."

He made frequent domiciliary visits to the poor, imparting counsel more valuable than direct pecuniary aid, and to encourage economical habits he was active in the establishment of the provident Bedding Association, which was supported by the charity of a few persons, and "supplied many families with comforts otherwise unattainable." This institution was wholly under his own charge.

We have already alluded to his visits to Newgate. The subject of Prison Reform, especially in reference to juvenile offenders, was very near his heart, and in the jail of his own city (Norwich) he labored much for their benefit.

Indeed he was often led into deep sympathy with classes of human beings for whose souls none seemed to care. "He paid considerable attention," says the Norfolk News, "to the overlooked, or too often forgotten foreign itinerant musicians who visit this city, (Norwich) more particularly Germans and Italians. He made himself acquainted with them by personal visits, to ascertain if they possessed copies of the scriptures in their native language, and he labored to promote the well being, physical as well as moral, of a class which appears to lie beyond the pale of ordinary benevolent effort."

This humble, unobtrusive Christian, with a wonderful expansion of heart and mind, gave out his warm affection in large measure for all the children of his Divine Father,—for all the objects of his Redeemer's love. Seas formed no barrier to the flow of his sympathy: no nation, caste or color was excluded. In every human being he recognized a brother or a sister,—and human suffering always found him ready to mourn with those who mourned. A faithful and largely commissioned laborer in the Lord's harvest, with him as with the early apostles, the field was the world. (To be Continued.)

The beloved survivors of the deputation who were charged with the presentation in this land of the Anti-Slavery Address of London Yearly Meeting to the Sovereigns and Rulers of Christian Nations, have engaged their homeward passage in the Steamer Atlantic. Before this sheet shall be presented to our readers, they will probably have taken their leave of a country, towards which their hearts must ever turn with touching memories of an honored colleague, who there laid down his life for the Testimony's sake, and passed from the field of labor into unalloyed rest.

These dear friends have received from the members of their own Church in this land, and from many others, of various classes, abundant tokens of sympathy and appreciation, and many a friend can address to each of them the words of Montgomery:

"Thus, then, in peace depart,
And angels guard thy footsteps—No!"
There is a feeling of the heart
That will not let thee go.
Yet go—thy spirit goes with thee.
Yet go—thy spirit stays with me."

Of their Christian mission, which we believe to have been performed in the wisdom of their Master, we propose to speak more particularly in the course of our memoir of their deceased associate.

DEPUTATION OF FRIENDS TO THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.—Since our last publication full accounts of this interesting embassy have been received. The address of which Joseph Sturge, Robert Charlton, and Henry Pense were the bearers, is an admirable document, worthy of the Christian body from which it emanated. Pleading as their ground of action "a deep conviction of religious duty," and "the constraining love of Christ, our Saviour," and referring briefly to the Christian kindness to Friends evinced by the illustrious brother and the mother of the present Emperor, it proceeds ably to set forth our testimony against war, and its incompatibility with Christianity. The subject of their concern is skillfully presented, without obtruding any officious opinion upon political questions. For the Address itself, we refer our readers to Friends' Review, in which it has appeared, together with a synopsis of the Emperor's observations, and a translation (by the venerable Editor of that Journal) of the Emperor's written address to the Society of Friends, in reply to their document. This paper was considered by Friends in England of sufficient importance to claim the attention of the Government. Nicholas declared his anxiety to avoid war by all possible means, his determination not to attack, but to act only in self-defence,—and his readiness to forgive all that was personal to himself, and to hold out his hand to his enemies in the true Christian spirit. In his written reply, he "repudiates all ambitious designs of conquest, or of unjust interference with the affairs of Turkey."

At the request of the Empress, our Friends had an agreeable interview with her. To each of them a present was offered by the Emperor, which was refused by them, neither vanity nor fame having anything to do with this religious proceeding of three plain men. The Emperor kindly sent a courier before them over nearly 500 miles of drifted snow.

We believe, without a doubt, that this mission was instigated by the Divine Spirit, and we have no fear that it will have been in vain, although we may not be permitted to know when or where the good seed may germinate and mature fruit to the praise of the great Husbandman, who sent the sowers.

THE OCCASION AND ITS DUTIES.—Under this caption, Whittier gives us in the Era a capital essay, too large for us to copy in full. He thus introduces his subject.

"If appearances are at all trustworthy, the geographical question mooted by a late eminent New England statesman may be considered as good as settled. There is a North. It begins to be understood that it is hardly safe for political filibusters and piratical adventurers to ignore its existence, and treat it as a fabulous Cape Fly-away or Isle of St. Brendan's. The Nebraska mischief, like most other evils, has its incidental and unlooked-for compensations—it has revealed the North.

"The action of the Legislatures of New York, Maine, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts; the public meetings of men of all parties in nearly all the principal cities and towns of the Free States; the municipal elections of Detroit and Milwaukee; the falling off of the Democratic vote in New Hampshire, although the friends of the Administration spared no pains to impress the People with the belief that the Nebraska question had nothing to do with the State election; the united remonstrance of the clergy of New England, of all denominations and all political parties—these are among the indications of a development of Northern feeling, which can scarcely be mistaken.

"There is a North! The returns of the New Hampshire election must, we think, satisfy such skeptics even as General Pierce and Secretary Cushing of this fact."

He proceeds to show that the Nebraska bill, although an Administration measure, and advocated by these Government retainers, who are "sold to the Demon of Patronage, and renounce all pretensions to self-control and private judgment," entirely fails to enlist any popular enthusiasm in its favor, and he graphically pictures in numerous localities, the People, of all parties, on one side,—Collector, Postmaster, and a tide waiter or two on the other.—These "penned editorial leaders for subsidized presses,"—and for electioneering purposes relinquish part of their official pay. "They have piped, but the People would not dance. The plain common sense of disinterested men of all parties, has rejected their arguments in favor of the Nebraska perdition."

Our gifted friend pursues the subject with its present and prospective bearings,—and in conclusion presents an intelligent plan.

"The present is the time for action. Let the movement begin at Washington at this very session. Let those who are willing to stand on the question of Slavery where the fathers of the Republic stood, unite, irrespective of party names, to form a LEAGUE OF FREEDOM—the nucleus of a mighty organization, throughout the country, the country, having for its watchwords—

"No Slave Territory.

"No more Slave States.

"The General Government relieved from all responsibility for Slavery.

"No interference by the General Government with Slavery in the Slave States.

"No interference with the right of Jury trial, the writ of habeas corpus, and other guarantees of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, in the free States.

"Slavery left to itself in the States which cherish it, without any extraneous aid or comfort, to reconcile itself as it best may to the progress of civilization and Christianity, and to the liberal spirit of the age.

"Such a movement as is here contemplated will naturally demand a leader—an embodiment of its idea. He will not be wanting. The Divine Providence does not mock us in presenting these great opportunities for the advancement of humanity. It gives the Man for the Hour—the strong, bold hand, to grasp the forelock of the passing Occasion. When such a man shall unmistakably reveal himself, whatever may have been his party name or connection, whether his home is in New England or the Empire State, by the Mississippi or the Colorado, all who love liberty, and desire the peace, honor, and prosperity of the several States, and the permanence of their Union, will naturally rally about him. But, in the mean time, let the movement be commenced, and vigorously prosecuted, whatever may be the fate of the Nebraska Bill, and without regard to the selfish appeals of the present leaders of parties. It needs but to be begun at Washington; the great mass of the People of the free States, now anxiously waiting for it, will take hold of it at once, and carry it forward to its consummation."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—We omit many essays which we by no means "deem unworthy of a place."—We are much more embarrassed by the redundancy than the lack of matter, and are frequently compelled to throw articles aside after we have placed them in the Printer's hand.

We have sundry metrical communications of merit, (one upon a subject to which we have already devoted much space;) but our compositor's "chase" is of unyielding metal, and we know no means of making it elastic, like the Hall which was reported to have been "crowded with abundance more than it could hold." Four writers ask us to procure the insertion of their essays in other periodicals, from which, upon reflection, they will see that we ought to be excused.

For the Non-Slaveholder.
THE TIMES.

Written on hearing of the passage of the Nebraska Bill, in the Senate of the United States.

The dark storm gathering thick and fast
O'ercasts the distant Orient;
The shriek of death and trumpet-blast,
Betoken woes of dire portent:
War, rapine, ravage, ruin vast
O'er all the land their blight have cast.

Kong's fertile vales and Shanghai's plains,
Are scathed with fire and dyed with blood;
O'er Tartaria's antique domains,
By Pekin's wall, by Ganges' flood,
Imperial hosts—insurgents' arms,
Are dealing death and dread alarms.

But not alone on Asia's plain
War drives his gory reeking car,
Europa feels the scourge—the stain
Of blood and carnage rests on her.
By Citade's towers, by Danube's wave,
There fall the strong—there die the brave.

The navies sink, the hamlets blaze,
Cannon and bombs flamboyant,
Destruction deal, and havoc ways
The Baltic and the Dosphorus:
And gathering fleets from seas afar,
Are hastening to the scene of war.

Yet not alone on Europe's strand
Or Asia's plains, the dark cloud lowers:
A storm awaits our favored land,
A fearful fate may yet be ours,
Fraught with more sad and direful woes
Than Europe or than Asia knows.

Ye children of the wilderness!
Ye unsubdued, ye wild and free!
Flee! flee! For you there's no redress!
Your western Amazonia flee!
The haughty tyrant's on your track
With servile minions at his back.

Flee! broad Nebraska is not yours!
No home for freemen or for you!
The slave-power greedily secures
Your scanty portion as its due.
Flee to Nevada's summit—yet
The invader there his foot will set.

Ye remnant race! Ye robbed and peeled!
Thought ye, when from your father's graves,
From homes, and streams, and fertile field
Ye fled, driven out by artful knives,
To find a home by Kansas' waves?
Yam thought! For tyrants, 'tis, and slaves.

While ye repose beneath the shade,
Or crouch o'er hills the timid game,
Or rear the bark-hut in the glade,
Or angle in the limpid stream,
Wot ye that all this native joy
Base men are plotting to destroy?

That in dark counsel with his clan
The white Chief plots your overthrow!
Has found his tool, has marked his plan
To seal the doom—to fix the woe
On you and on the negro race,
And shroud the nation in disgrace!

Douglas—(oblivion hide his name):
Cass, Butler, Badger, Atchison
And Pettit fill the ranks of shame,
And to themselves have basely won
The meed of an inglorious fame—
From Sateau may their guerdon claim.

While Chase, a noble, damnable form,
Stands in the front of thickest fight
And bares his bosom to the storm,
Empanopied in Truth and Right,
Feared, yet respected by his foes,
Clear, cogent, strong his logic flows.

And caustic Wade, a colleague fit
For Chase, unflinching keeps his post,
Replete with reason, sense and wit,
Of truckling traitors worth a host,
For freedom and the rights of man,
Combats the mad opposing clan.

And Seward, Statesman-like and bland, Determined, bold, yet courteous still,
Beside his compeers takes his stand,
And meets, with firm unyielding will,
The conflict waged to overthrow
The dearest rights of man below.

And Sumner, eloquent, sublime,
Terse, flowery, classical and wise,
Turns back the pages of all time,
Strips from the tyrant his disguise,
And holds the Senate in control
With the deep pathos of his soul.

And Fessenden, undaunted, free,
Comes to the rescue with the few—
The gambler throws to Slavery,
And gives to Freedom's foes their due.
As stars in splendor these shall shine
And coming ages shall their names enshrine.

O, lost to virtue! lost to shame!
Lost to all good and manly sense!
Ye boasters loud in Freedom's name!
Ye sold to Slavery's defence!
When will ye cease your vain pretence,
Or to defy Omnipotence?

Tremble ye rulers of the land!
For while ye revel on the wall
In fearful lines, the mystic hand,
Prophetic of your destined fall,
Amid your sacrilegious deeds
Writes MENE, TEREL, o'er your heads.

Ah, yes! the fetters, which ye forge
For other limbs, shall bind your own!
The measure, ye so madly urge,
Be meted out ten fold for one!
Belshazzar's doom may be your fate,
For God his name will vindicate.

JUAN PLACIDO.—THE CUBAN POET.

After helping to load sugar, I was sent to pile blocks of wood in one of the buildings. While so employed, all of a sudden the roof with a loud crash gave way, burying under its ruins the negro Andres Criollo; I escaped unhurt through a back door. The alarm given, all the people came to the rescue of poor Andres, who with great difficulty and labour was taken from under the ruins, with his skull broken, and he died in the Molino a few hours after. Early next morning, as I was piling the refuse of sugar canes, there arrived the then Master Pancho, and now Don F., followed by my second brother, who was in his service, and who intimated to me that his master was coming to take me back to the house.
This was owing to my brother, who hearing of the accident and my narrow escape, begged earnestly of his young master to intercede with his mother on my behalf, which he easily obtained.
I was presented to my mistress, who for the first time received me with kindness. But my heart was so oppressed, that neither her kindness nor eating, nor drinking could comfort me; I had no comfort except in weeping: my mistress observing it, and to prevent my crying so much, and the same time being so very drowsy, ordered me to move about, and clean all the furniture, tables, chairs, drawers, &c. All my liveliness disappeared, and as my brother was greatly attached to me, he became melancholy himself;

he tried, however, to cheer me up, but always finished our conversations in tears: for this reason, also, my mistress would not let me wait upon her, nor ride in the volante to town; and at last appointed me to the service of young Master Pancho; they bought me a hat and a pair of shoes, a new thing for me, and my master allowed me to bathe, to take a walk in the afternoon, and to go fishing, and hunting with Senor.

Besides the events just related, there happened two other circumstances resembling each other; one while at Havana, and the other at Matanzas, and which I think worth relating, before I begin to speak of my passing to the service of Don Nicholas de C. on my return to Havana. The first of these events happened when the new coin of our C. M. King Ferdinand the Seventh, began to circulate. Don Nicolas gave me a peseta of the old coin one night; next morning there came at the door a beggar, my mistress gave me a peseta of the new coin for him, which calling my attention, and having the other in my pocket, one is as much worth as the other, muttered I to myself, and changing the pesetas, I gave the beggar the old one; after I went to my usual place in the antechamber, I sat down in the corner, and taking the new coin out of my pocket, began like a monkey turning it over and over again, when escaping through my fingers it fell on the floor, making a rattling noise; at its sound my mistress came out of her chamber, made me pick it up; she looked at it, and her face reddened, she bid me go into her chamber, sit in a corner, and wait there; of course, my peseta remained in her possession, she recognized it as the same she gave me for the beggar two minutes before; with such proofs my fate was decided. My mistress was busy going in and out, till at last she sat down to write; soon after the carrier of the Ingenio, who happened to be there at the time with his drove of mules, came into the chamber with a bundle containing a coarse hemp dress, and while he was unfolding it, he dropt a new rope, drawing near me at the same time; trembling, and suspecting his intentions, I sprang up on a sudden, and escaping through another door, ran for protection to Don Nicolas; in the way, I met the young lady Concha, who kindly said to me, "go to my papa." The Marquis was always very kind to me, I used to sleep in his room, and whenever he was afflicted with headache, I gave him warm water, held his head and attended on him till he recovered. When I arrived at his room, which was in instant, and he saw me at his feet, "What have you done now?" said he; in my confusion I related my case so confusedly, that he understanding that I stole the peseta, said in an angry tone, "You knave, why did you steal the peseta?" "No, sir," I replied, "your son Nicolasito gave it to me." "When?" "Last night," said I: we then went to the Seporito's room, who looking at the peseta, said that he did not give it to me. In truth, I was so frightened and confused, that I could not state the particulars sufficiently clear, on account of the presence of the carrier; and the name of the Ingenio, with its new mayoral, Don Simon Diaz, so inspired me with horror, that all conspired to confuse a boy of sixteen years only as I was.—The Marquis interceded for me, and for all that, I was shut up in a dungeon four whole days, without any food, except what my brother could introduce through a little opening at the bottom of the door, and that was little. At the fifth day I was taken out, dressed with a coarse linen dress and tied with a rope. They were going to send me with the baggage of the family, and the other servants, my brother among them, to Matanzas; when the hour arrived, and they were leading me away, I met at the door Donna Benitez, at present a nun in the Convent of the Ursulinas who interceded for me, that the rope might be taken off, which was done; we embarked in a schooner for Matanzas, where we arrived at the end of two days.

While on board, and before coming on shore, I changed the coarse dress for the one my brother unseen had provided for me; as soon as we landed, my brother and I instead of going with the rest of the rest of the servants to present ourselves to Don Juan Gomez, who had instructions about us from the family, but being ignorant of it, and desirous to see our mother, we left the rest of the servants, and went to the Molino, where after presenting ourselves to the mayoral, and telling him that the rest of the servants were coming, we ran at full speed towards my mother's house; but we scarcely arrived and had time to embrace her, when the Creole, Santiago, greatly agitated and full of anger, called me out, saying, "come with me," not suspecting the secret instructions he had, I refused to go with him, and my mother asking me what have I done, but without giving me time to explain myself, very abruptly took hold of my arm, tied me with a rope, and led towards the Ingenio Saint Miguel, where we arrived about eleven o'clock, fasting all this time. The mayoral read the letter sent to him from Havana, and then put me in fetters; twenty-five lashes in the morning and as many more in the evening for the term of nine days, was the order of the latter. The mayoral questioned me about the peseta, I told him plainly and truly the fact, and for the first time, this savage man showed pity; he did not put in execution his orders, but sent me to work with the rest of the negroes; here I remained two weeks, when my mistress again sent for me.—To be Continued.

WAYNE CO., INDIANA.—(With a list of new subscribers, prepaid.) "I am well pleased with the Non-Slaveholder. The principles it advocates are really those of Friends, and I believe it to be the duty of members of our religious society to see that it is well sustained. Were it doubled in size, I believe that it could be filled with profitable reading matter, and I am of the opinion that we have not given to the subject of free labor that serious investigation which its magnitude demands. This important testimony ought to be faithfully borne, especially, as I think, by all the members of the Society of Friends.

When we take into consideration the evils inseparable from the system of Slavery, and reflect that the products of the Slave's unpaid labor constitute the Master's great inducement to hold on to his victims; what further evidence do we need, that we, the consumers of these products, are implicated in the transgression of which we are not backward to complain. Hence the necessity for the Non-Slaveholder. The copies for which I previously sent have come to hand, and, so far as I know, give entire satisfaction. I hope to order more before long."

WASHINGTON CO., OHIO.—"Please send me the Non-Slaveholder. I admire the title. All we can do, is to be, in our Church Communion, our domestic expenditures, &c., Non-Slaveholders. Heaven save me, for the future, from paying the bond that stole the cotton that Tom picked. Though we can, perhaps, do nothing towards putting down Slavery, we are certainly in danger of doing, inadvertently, much towards building it up."

"I will do all I can against Slavery as I do against Satan, though I have no expectation of annihilating the old Adversary. I'll fight Slavery while I live—the Lord being my helper!"

DYRONES CO., N. YORK.—"Enclosed is $1.00 for three copies of your excellent and faithful advocate for the poor and oppressed of our land. We have received a few copies, and are much pleased with the benevolent and christian spirit which breathes throughout its valuable pages."

From among many approving references to our memoir of William Forster we select the following.

"Thou canst not easily realize the service thou art rendering to many of us by the deeply interesting biographical notices of dear William Forster. I knew before that he was a great and very good man,—but I had not formed an adequate estimate of the depth of his character, which opens more and more upon me with each succeeding number of the Non-Slaveholder. For an authorized memoir from his family, we may have long to wait, and thou hast well done in presenting us with an outline of his history."

Another says:

"The Editorial memoir of William Forster is worth to me much more than a year's subscription. It renders the Non-Slaveholder, since the commencement of this article, the most welcome periodical that enters my house."

RIGHT ACTION.

The habit which men are in of mutually deferring to each other's "superior piety and intelligence," in the exploring and carrying out of their moral obligations, is a rock on which many a beautiful bark has been shattered to pieces. It was divinely intended that man should act on his own honest convictions of right—not on the asserted convictions of others. What defects of the heart or head may underlie the latter, we know not. We even measure with difficulty our own, where the temptations of some selfish interest may intervene to obscure the lustre of the light within us. We know not but that the wrong in others may be the reflex of some wrong in ourselves, and that to be ourselves outright in the practice, and outspoken in the utterance of the truth as we find it in our heart, would be to correct a mass of evil both in and beyond us. To be thus outspoken, if speaking in love, is the evidence of a sound charity, not of its contrary. Under the truthful cover of this sentiment, I venture the assertion, that the conviction of the moral unlawfulness of using the products of slavery is an indwelling, though borne-down feeling in the minds of all who justly appreciate the evil of slavery itself. Every body knows that it is wrong voluntarily to support an evil, and often a greater wrong, in contemplation of the relative intelligence of the parties, in the necessary than in the principal. The man who buys the stolen apple is guiltier than the boy who stole it. He who gives the motive to the assassin is the chief assassin, for without him there would be no victim. In the great day of account who will be found the greater criminal—the tempter or the tempted? Let us then cease to justify our wrong by telling what this man says, or that man does, and listen only to Truth's voice. "Follow thou Me!" Thus doing, we would aim a blow at Slavery, which the most splendid declamation unvivified by a faithful life must ever fail to inflict.

Jonathan Dymond, in his chapter on Immoral Agency, well says:—"A great portion of the moral evil in the world is the result, not so much of the intensity of individual wickedness, as of a general incompleteness in the practical virtue of all classes of men. If it were possible to take away misconduct from one half of the community, and to add its amount to the remainder, it is probable that the moral character of our species would be soon benefitted by the change. Now, the ill dispositions of the bad are powerfully encouraged by the want of upright examples in those who are better. A man may deviate considerably from rectitude, and still be as good as his neighbors. From such a man, the motive to excellence which the constant presence of virtuous example supplies, is taken away. So that there is reason to believe that if the bad were to become worse, and the reputable proportionably better, the average virtue of the world would speedily be increased."

"One of the modes by which the efficacy of example in reputable persons is miserably diminished, is by what we have called immoral agency—by their being willing to encourage, at second hand, evils which they would not commit as principals. Linked together as men are in society, it is difficult to perform an unwarrantable action without some sort of co-operation from creditable men. This co-operation is not often, except in flagrant cases refused; and thus not only is the commission of such actions facilitated, but a general relaxation is induced in the practical estimates which men form of the standard of rectitude.

"Since, then, so much evil attends this agency in unwarrantable conduct, it manifestly becomes a good man to look around upon the nature of his intercourse with others, and to consider whether he is not virtually promoting evils which his judgment deprecates, or reducing the standard of moral rectitude in the world. The reader would have no difficulty in perceiving that, if a strenuous opponent of the slave-trade should establish a manufactory of manacles and thumb-screws, and iron collars for the slave-merchants, he would be grossly inconsistent with himself. The reader would perceive too, that his labors in the cause of the abolition would be almost nullified by the viciousness of his example, and that he would generally discredit pretensions to philanthropy. Now, that which we desire the reader to do is, to apply the principle which this illustration exhibits to other and less flagrant cases. Other cases of co-operation with evil may be less flagrant than this; but they are not on that account innocent."

Following out this reasoning, the intelligent reader will be led to inquire how much more or less necessary to the existence of the slave-trade and slavery is the manufacture of the thumb screws, manacles and collars, than is the use of the products of Slavery, and ascertaining this, he will be likely to arrive at a correct view of their relative guiltiness. VERITAS.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

"THE OPPRESSOR NEEDS A FRIEND."

HE NEEDS A FRIEND who will scorn to afford him an inducement to continue in the sin of enslaving his fellow man. He needs a friend who will encourage him by example as well as precept, to withdraw from tyranny's unhallowed deeds, from the unchristian practice of oppression, and to move in that line of life which is characterized by love and good will towards all. He needs a friend to show him that considerations of personal comfort, and the enjoyment of the luxuries of temporal things, sink very low in his estimation, when they interfere with the rights and well-being of any human being however lowly and despised. He needs a friend to set before him the self-denying example involved in a conscientious refusal to enjoy worldly good, when the blood of oppression's victims marks the process by which it is obtained, and in closing his eyes upon prospects of advantage to be derived from the "gains of oppression."

Such a friend, and many such, does the guilty slavemaster truly need. Who then will pursue that course of action, that principle, which at once befriends him and his suffering victim, affording the former no plea for the practice of cruel robbery, and the latter a release from the miseries of a galling servitude? And not only so, for we befriend ourselves by the force of the measure we would employ for the good of others; for therein we stand guiltless of our brother's blood. Who then will continue so to oppose the true interest of all, as to afford support to slavery? How can any endure the thought of the most distant connexion with the cause of African enslavement?

The Lord formerly complained by His prophet, of those who strengthened the hands of the wicked, and what greater wickedness can we be instrumental in strengthening, than that of slavery, the existence of which comprises every form of iniquity and wrong? P.

For the Non Slaveholder.

"IS IT I."

Let us not ask, in contemplating the circumstances of wrong and cruelty belonging to slavery, if the immediate actors in these scenes of horror, are to be regarded as the occasion of it,—but am I.

"While from the toiling bondsmen's utter need,
We pile our own full board," and fold about our forms the robes afforded by his wasted life, how can we condemn the Slaveholder who only does directly what we do by him?

Let us pause in the career of pleasure and profit, not so much to calculate the great destruction of life in the whole process of African enslavement, (we know that is fearful,) not so much to estimate the wrong done to the enslaved by the whole number of anti-slavery people, while they continue to demand the proceeds of their toil, as to consider and query if we individually, are clear of blood-guiltiness, while we are connected in ever so small a measure, or at any point whatever, with the process which causes the premature and cruel death of many an unfortunate creature, whose right to the unmolested enjoyment of all the gifts and privileges bestowed by the Universal Father, is the same as our own. How long will we neglect the cry of suffering, which comes up to us from the "field of cane, from the low rice swamp, from the traders cell, from the loathsome and suffocating hold of the slave-ship, and the coffee's weary chain? Know we not that our choicest luxuries are tainted with the blood of slaves,—that briny tears are mingled with the sweets prepared for our "pampered palates," wrung out from aching eyes, by the agonies to which the oppressor dooms his victim. Know we not that the over-tasked and fainting forms of age and youth, toiling in the cotton field, victims of the lawless cruelty of a merciless overseer, are affording, by their unrequited labors, the raiment we fold about us? And, knowing this, shall we deem it a light thing to add to our many comforts, and to the gains which arise from happy and requited toil, any proceed of slavery? I would, if others would; seems too much the feeling of some, when this subject is presented to them. They would withdraw their aid from the support of a system which we all profess to abhor, and clear their hands of the unhallowed gains of oppression, if others would do the same. Without looking to others, each should remember that individual effort, individual faithfulness, in this line of duty, is as important and effectual, as is an advance to the same extent in any good cause. Individual influence is adding to the inhuman force by which African bondage is prolonged, or it is tending to the advancement of principles that will weaken the task-master's hold upon his trembling victim. To which of these points, to the good or to the evil, shall our daily actions and our influence tend? With the thought of all the horrors of slavery, we should ever connect the consideration, that this cruel system owes its continuance to the consumption of those commodities, in the production of which, servile labor is applied. This consideration will not allow us to place ourselves at a distance from the charge of causing the enslavement of our sable brother, while we are pursuing a course which involves an inducement to the existence and continuance of his bondage. Were we disposed nicely to examine every form of injustice, we could discern immense wrong done to our fellow men in chains, in the very act which furnishes a free man with the full value of the slave commodity which we have purchased of him. His profit and our comfort and convenience, are the result of robbery and wrong, perpetrated upon the possessions of the slave, and held in continued force by transactions which have the appearance of justice and honesty, and which are just and honest, so far as the dealings of one free man with another are considered. But while we would scorn to defraud those with whom we are immediately connected, let us extend our principles of justice to the robbed and desolated condition of the slave. OMO.

With consciences satisfied with discharge of duty, no consequences can harm you. There is no evil that we cannot either face or fly from, but the consciousness of duty disregarded.

A sense of duty pursues us ever. It is omnipresent, like the Deity. If we take to ourselves the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost part of the sea, duty performed or duty violated, is still with us, for our happiness or misery. If we say, the darkness shall cover us, in the darkness as in the light, our obligations are yet with us. We cannot escape from their power or fly from their presence. They are with us in this life, will be with us at its close; and in that inconceivable solemnity which lies yet farther onward, we shall still find ourselves surrounded by the consciousness of duty, to pain us wherever it has been violated, and to console us so far as God may have given us grace to perform it.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, FIFTH MONTH, 15, 1854.

WILLIAM FORSTER.*

The time having nearly arrived for his embarkation upon a Gospel mission to this continent, his faith was subjected to an unexpected test.—As he was quietly walking in his lane, (at his retired country residence about two miles from Bradpole,) a cow, without any provocation, hooked him in the knee, inflicting a painful wound. In this condition he went to Bristol, (from whence he was to sail,) and in that city he was enabled to minister largely to his fellow probationers, "in the demonstration of the Spirit and with power."

On the 15th of third month, 1820, he sailed for America. A number of his friends accompanied him to the ship—among whom was the beloved Stephen Grellet, who had been bound to him in Christian brotherhood for nearly nine years, a fraternity which strengthened and brightened till their final parting in 1853, when it was our privilege to witness between these aged pilgrims an interview of peculiar interest and solemnity which truly seemed "quite in the verge of Heaven."

In allusion to his embarkation Joseph John Gurney makes in his diary, the following note:

"It was a memorable occasion; both he and his dear wife were marvelously upheld. Just before the vessel left the basin, we were all collected in the cabin, in retirement before the Lord—about twenty friends; dear Anna returned thanks for the prospect which was given her of William's safe voyage. I felt strengthened to commend them and their child individually to Him who can alone preserve; immediately after which the vessel sailed, and went off, contrary to usual custom, in almost perfect silence. The last look of William's, which I caught, was a look of peace and joy; and some of us, after we had parted, traced the course of the vessel down the river. It was a bright sun-shiny morning. The vessel was very handsome, and I shall not soon forget the beautiful scene which she presented to us as she glided between the banks of the Avon."

Our dear friend being increasingly conformed to the likeness of Christ, "his meat was to do the will of him that sent him." Hence, although his lameness was painful, and to his friends a source of anxiety, it was a relief to him to be able to enter upon the service to which he was called,—looking for his rest at the end, not by the way; and having committed himself, in filial trust to Him who rules the waves, he was enabled, during a tedious voyage, to possess his soul in patience, as will be seen in the following extract from a letter to J. J. Gurney.

Bristol Channel, 5 miles Eastward of Sandy Island, 14th Mo. 19th, 1820—9 o'clock, P. M.

"My dearest Joseph,

"Thy friendship, love and sympathy so eminently manifest during thy visit at Bristol are very frequently present in my recollections, much to my comfort and encouragement. My heart is so much dwelling with thee in near affectionate love, and most intimate unity, that I scarcely seem to have parted from thee, and I hardly know how to admit the thought that it may be years before we meet again. But that we shall meet again, in the enjoyment of the peace and love and fellowship of the gospel of Christ, is the hope with which I feel my mind sustained at this moment, and in which I am allowed to take some real consolation. My heart is very much prone to sink at the prospect opening before me, and I feel much of the awfulness of the service to which I have been strengthened to devote myself. But being enabled in some moments of Divine favor to believe that it is a path into which I am led by the Spirit of Christ, and endowed with some small measure of capacity to put my trust in the Lord for the days to come. Dear Joseph, I have heretofore taken comfort in believing that I was remembered of thee in thy secret approaches to the throne of Grace: that thou hadst it given thee at times to pray for me. May the Lord still incline thee, in his love and power, thus to think of and to plead for thy poor brother, both in his long pilgrimage thro' these deep waters, and in all the tribulations, temptations, and perils which may be permitted him, in filling up his appointed measure of suffering for the sake of Christ, upon those distant shores.

This is the fifth day since we left Bristol, and we are only now about to leave the Channel.—Our detention has been an exercise of patience, but through Divine help, I have mostly been kept in quiet contentment, not at all doubting that it is all best for me, and that if it be the Lord's good pleasure to give me a safe landing on the other side, it will be in the day of his own appointed time.

Do have the charity to cheer my poor wife's solitary widowhood by a few lines from thy pen. Thy letters, and those of our Keswick friends, seldom fail to have that effect. * * * Feel me as ever thy loving friend and brother,

W. F."

The friend to whom this letter was addressed, was associated five years previously, when about

22 years of age, with William Forster, as his companion in a religious tour in Lincolnshire, Cambridgeshire, &c.; in reference to which engagement J. J. G. long afterwards wrote: "This was the foundation of that warm and intimate brotherhood which has ever since subsisted between us, and which never bound us in a stronger tie than it does at present. His ministry and example powerfully impressed me; and I soon found, that beneath the veil of almost insuperable modesty, there lay a rich treasure of intellectual power." "Great fluency, depth and clearness, distinguished his ministry. It was almost apostolic."

He landed at New York on a First-day afternoon, at a time when he was not expected by his Friends, who understood that his visit was postponed on account of his accident. He enquired his way, and went, a stranger and alone, to one of the meetings of that city, where he took his seat beside Richard Mott, and they silently worshipped together "as unknown and yet well known," until William Forster, in reverent prayer to the God of the Spirits of all flesh, gave full evidence of the "anointing which he had received." Between these two dedicated servants a warm friendship subsisted, from that time till the close of William Forster's life.

On the ensuing seventh day, the Yearly Meeting of New York commenced,—during the sittings of which William Forster was conspicuously engaged in the work of the Lord, to the edification and comfort of the Church.

He then attended a few neighboring meetings, and the wound in his knee, being, by this time, greatly aggravated, his physician pronounced that nothing but perfect rest could save his limb, if even his life. He was accordingly confined, chiefly in a recumbent posture, at the house of Thomas Eddy, for about two months; after which he went with Richard and Abigail Mott to their home at Mamaraneeck, and soon after set out upon his christian mission, accompanied by Robert F. Mott. Whilst they were holding meetings on the eastern shore of Maryland, William Forster had a serious attack of illness.

He had been perhaps a year in America, when he was joined by John Paul of Philadelphia, (well known to many of our readers as a valuable Elder,) who was for about four years the faithful companion of his travels in this land, where, being long detained "an Ambassador in bonds," he visited (with the single exception of a very small congregation), every established meeting of Friends in America, laboring abundantly in the love of Christ. His diligence was exemplary, as an illustration of which we may mention, that being at a village in Western New York, and having peremptory appointments ahead, he found that he could not peacefully leave the place without discharging a debt of Christian love; and therefore, he held a public meeting, (which proved large and satisfactory), at 5 o'clock in the morning.

It will be remembered that William Forster bore a useful part in the proceedings of the General Anti-Slavery Convention, held in London in 1840. During the ninth day's sitting of that body, in a speech upon his resolution respecting the internal slave trade which is cherished by our nation (although we have declared the African Slave Trade to be piracy,) and referring to his American mission, he said:—"I have not forgotten, and it is impossible that I ever should forget, the impression made on my mind at that time, of the enormity and iniquity of the trade, which I there saw prosecuted between the older and the more newly settled States of the Union."—"With characteristic modesty, he said in the same speech:—"When the subject was before the Convention on a former occasion, I could have added my personal testimony to the truth of the statements then advanced, having travelled through the Southern States in the winter of 1824. I know not, however, that I can adduce facts more striking than those which were then brought forward. I, therefore, preferred hearing the recital of others, rather than addressing the Convention myself."

We are not certain that he journeyed, at this time, farther South than Charleston, South Carolina, where the impression left upon the minds of the people was such, that when, some years after, Stephen Grellet was in that city, they bore unequivocal testimony respecting his christian services.

During this tour he made notes respecting prisons in the U. States and in Canada, partly, we believe, for the use of his brother-in-law T. F. Buxton, then in Parliament, in whose philanthropic efforts he took a deep interest. "I feel much relief and real satisfaction," he writes, "in hearing that the subject of the Slave-trade and Slavery has such a deep hold on Fowell's mind."

In a letter, bearing date 10th mo., 1st, 1822, W. F. says:—"I sometimes take pleasure in anticipating the day, when relieved from my present many arduous exercises, I shall be restored again to that near and intimate religious communion with many of my dearest friends; rendered dearer to me than ever by my long separation from them, and the sympathy I have been brought to feel with them, under the trials they have passed through in my absence."

10th mo. 18th, 1822, he writes from New Hampshire:—"My path has been one of many trials, and often of discouragement, and I think thou wilt not be surprised to hear that it continues to be so, but through all, I am not left without confidence in the care and guidance of our gracious Lord; and sometimes I am animated to persevere, by the rising of a gentle hope, that, notwithstanding my very many infirmities, He condescends to accept my dedication, imperfect as it is, and to acknowledge me among His servants. If this be vouchsafed to the end, it is all I dare to ask, and I am sure it will be more than I deserve. I trust thou wilt feel for me, when I say, that I have not been able to discover a door open for my release as soon as my beloved wife, and my many dear friends may probably expect my return. I wish to stand constantly on the watch, ready to accept the very first intimation that may be granted me; and very earnestly do I crave an interest in the prayers of all who can feel with me, that I may be endued with patient resignation to the Divine will, and entire devotedness to the service of the Lord, until, in the same love and power in which He made me willing to forsake all for His name's sake, He may be pleased to lead me back again to the enjoyment of my many social and domestic comforts."

Few persons, as we apprehend, have more fully appreciated the glorious doctrine of redemption by Christ,—of the sufficiency of the price which He paid to cover all our debts,—of the vastness of that merit upon which we have to rely when all works of our own must fail us,—of the blessedness of the mediation of the Son of God,—of the importance of true faith in Him who has declared himself to be the Way, the Truth, and the Life, and that no man cometh unto the Father but by Him.—Being thus filled with a grateful sense of redeeming mercy, it was always painful to Him when those who stood as ministers of righteousness were engaged to preach themselves, and not Christ Jesus the Lord. On such occasions he would say: "It grieves my spirit."

We may close our notice of his first visit to America, with the following paragraphs, kindly furnished us by a valued friend, whose intimate friendship with the subject of our memoir, extended through the period embraced by that mission, and through his remaining years.

"The first visit of our late beloved friend, William Forster, to this land, occupied him almost five years, during which he visited nearly, if not quite all the meetings of Friends on this continent, and many of them several times. The gentleness and tenderness of his spirit, his warm and faithful affection to those who enjoyed the privilege of his friendship, greatly endeared him to them, and we believe it may safely be said that few ministers have ever been more truly beloved. There was a richness, a fulness and persuasive energy, a clear and comprehensive recognition and development of those great truths of redemption by Jesus Christ, which rendered his preaching peculiarly touching and impressive, and it was attended with a degree of divine unction and authority which carried conviction to the minds of his hearers, and won an acknowledgement of its truth, and of his sincerity, even from those who did not, in all respects, coincide with his views on some points. In illustrating and defending some of the leading points of Christian doctrine, he was often logical and powerfully argumentative, evincing an intimate and accurate acquaintance with the Holy Scriptures, and a clear appreciation of their force and meaning; which showed that he had been largely instructed in the school of Christ, and drawn the rich stores of his spiritual knowledge from the treasury of Him who only has the key of David, and opens and no man can shut. Some memorable occasions of this character are fresh in the recollection of the writer, and probably of many others, when he stood forth as an ambassador of Christ, and under the constraining power of His love, nobly and convincingly advocated that blessed cause which was dearer to him than life itself, with an earnestness, fervency, and tenderness of spirit which seemed to baptize the assembly, and, for the time, subdued every feeling of opposition.

"Possessing a mind unusually sensitive to every species of human suffering, with a peculiar faculty of making the privations and sufferings of others his own, and the most delicate and soothing manner of imparting sympathy and consolation, he was, beyond most, qualified for ministering to the suffering and afflicted. In his travels through the southern states, the deep interest he had long felt in our enslaved brethren of the African race, was powerfully called forth, and at times seemed almost overwhelming to his feeling mind. He was earnest in his efforts to spread correct views on this momentous subject, and circulated extensively, pamphlets and books which he thought likely to have a beneficial influence,—also embracing every opening which presented for pleading with the master, in christian love."—(To be Continued.)

AFRICAN COTTON.—The Royal Geographical Society publishes, in its proceedings, a letter from Dr. Irving, a missionary to Africa, who having been, in 1853, ordered on service to Abbeokuta, found the Yorubas "a population of nearly three millions, clothed entirely in cloths manufactured by themselves." Being greatly struck with the variety of objects which might lead to extensive and lucrative commerce, he took to England many samples of African productions, and the specimens of indigenous cotton "proved to be of the very quality required for manufacture." He has since been employed, on behalf of London Merchants, and with the sanction of Sir James Graham and Lord Clarendon, to examine the country.

The following Report was approved at the Annual Meeting of the Association, held the day following the date of the document. The Meeting, though not large, was interesting and satisfactory.

REPORT OF THE PHILADELPHIA FREE PRODUCE ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS.

In presenting their Annual Report to the Association, the managers would deem it unnecessary to insist upon the considerations heretofore frequently urged in support of the necessity and the importance of faithfully maintaining our testimony against the iniquitous system of slavery, by abstaining from its products, as far as our necessary connection with the commerce of the country will admit, were it not a fact, too glaring to be overlooked, and of too much importance to be disregarded, that many, both in and out of our religious society, who are fully conscious of the evils of slavery, and sincerely desirous of seeing a practicable and efficient remedy applied, still appear indisposed to afford their influence and example in support of the free labor movement.

To us it appears too clear to admit of a doubt, or to require illustration, that the whole system of slavery, the foreign and international traffic included, with all their enormities and destruction of life, owes its vitality to the market for the products of servile toil. Hence, the inference appears undeniable, that in just such proportion as we voluntarily increase the demand for those products, we contribute our support of the system, and participate in the guilt; and so far as we contribute to replenish the market with the results of free and compensated labor, to the exclusion of those extracted from the compulsive drudgery of slaves, so far we weaken the system of slavery, and diminish the temptation to sustain it.

Certainly the events of the last few months, the undisguised, as well as more insidious attempts to extend the area and strengthen the influence of the slaveholding interest—the Legislation of the Federal government now trembling in the balance—and the avowed policy of the Executive in relation to the abolition of slavery in Cuba, furnish a very pathetic admonition to the advocates of justice and friends of our race to withdraw their support, as far as practicable, from a system so oppressive in its operations, so grasping and insatiable in its demands, and so deleterious in its results. We have, however, the satisfaction to believe that the number of those who are willing to manifest their abhorrence of slavery, by abstaining from its products, is rather increasing than diminishing, especially among some other denominations of Christians; but considerable discouragement has arisen from the difficulty of supplying the Free Labor store, kept by George W. Taylor, with the requisite variety of cotton fabrics to meet the demand. Hence has been suggested the expediency of establishing a manufactory of cotton goods, to be employed exclusively upon the products of free labor, and to be connected with the store. Our friend, George W. Taylor, is willing to undertake such an establishment, in case an amount of capital adequate to the indispensable expenditure can be placed at his disposal. The outlines of a plan for the manufacture of free cotton fabrics, with an estimate of the funds required for its establishment, will be herewith submitted. It appears highly probable, if not absolutely certain, that unless some method can be devised to keep up a more ample supply of the various articles, of which cotton is the principal ingredient, than has been found practicable under existing arrangements, the attempt to keep up the store of free goods must be abandoned. Such a result must be greatly deplored, and could scarcely fail to prove extremely discouraging to the friends of the cause. The present, indeed, appears to be the time not to abandon, but to renew our exertions to increase the consumption of free-grown cotton.

The information recently thrown before the public, respecting the cultivation of cotton by the German settlers in Western Texas, may be hailed as one of the means for obtaining a supply of the raw material; a means provided to our hands, without trouble or foresight on our part. The production of a thousand bales, untouched by servile hands, within a small district of that fertile region, certainly gives encouragement to the belief, that with proper exertions a supply might be obtained more than equal to existing demands.

There is no reason why free cotton fabrics may not be supplied to the consumer, on as easy terms as those extracted from the labor of slaves; except what arises from the difficulty and consequent expense of preserving the raw material free from mixture with slave-grown cotton, during its transit from the producer to the consumer; and this difficulty must diminish as the quantity produced in any locality is increased. And a factory, working altogether on free cotton, could unquestionably execute its work as well and as cheaply, as one supplied with the slave-grown material.

The plan proposed for the manufactory is, that the friends of the cause should raise, by subscription, a fund for the purchase of machinery, and one-half of a year's supply of cotton, requiring altogether about fifteen thousand dollars; G. W. Taylor to rent the machinery for a sum that will keep it insured against loss by fire, set aside yearly an adequate sum for needful repairs and depreciation by wear and tear, and pay annually to contributors 6 per cent.

The cotton is also to be kept insured, and to be furnished to him at cost, and all expenses, including 6 per cent. per annum interest for the contributors.

The fund to be applied and guarded by one or two Trustees, to be chosen by the contributors.

As it is very important to have the machinery ordered soon, and make other necessary arrangements for putting the mill in working order, it is hoped that there will be found friends of the cause enough to subscribe the required amount, within a month from this time. The money will not be needed till the machinery is ready for delivery, which will not probably be sooner than two months after an order shall be given for it. Address Geo. W. Taylor, Box 777 Post Office, Philadelphia.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "LAYS OF QUARBERDOM."

Laid in thy rest amid the mighty mountains
That, naked and sterile, symbolize thy soul;
Sleeping in peace, whence warriors from trying battles
Types of thy spirit, in their cleanness roll.

Leaving Life's labor for its full fruition,
Sull bearing meekly in thy forthright hand
The high credentials of thy human mission,
Whose glorious ending is the better land.

Thine earnest pleading for the bound and broken,
Fulleth like music on that other sphere;
Half on the Earth and half in Heaven 'twas spoken,
Bringing the bondsmen and the Angels near.

Slowly receding in thine act of pleading,
From the poor sufferers whom thou sought to save;
Their blessing resting on thy interceding,
Hangs like a halo o'er thy lonely grave.

And streaming inward through the narrow portal,
Breaks like the morning in the shadowy tomb,
Lifting the first steps of thy march immortal
To Joy and Triumph from the chill and gloom.

While from the verge of Earth, loved voices ringing
Far through the valley, luminous as day,
Herald thy coming to the Angels singing,
Whose streams of welcome meet thee half the way.

There they shall greet thee, whom thy labors lifted
From the low planes of their human life!
Who but for thee, o'er the wild seas had drifted
Outward afar, or perished in the strife.

The lone Pariah round the true Shetina,
With the poor toilsman of thy native land,
The slave aesi, the slave of Carolina,
Waiting to meet thee in a shining band.

Passing in love and power, thy soul's transition
Is but ascension to a higher height,

Where all around thee in thy new condition
Life's mysteries open in celestial light.

Viewing forever in calm contemplation
The widening circles of each duty done;
And through all cycles of thy elevation,
Ascending nearer to the Heavenly One.

CHELMSFORD—(Eng.) 5 Mo. 15th. "I look for extensive misery to many nations, and the subversion of thrones. We have one consolation in the midst of these murderous conflicts; the Almighty Ruler of the Universe can over-rule the wrath of man, to the advancement of His own blessed work of purification in the Earth, and the remainder of wrath He will restrain. To Him we must look, and to Him we must commit ourselves, abiding under the shadow of His wing till these calamities are overpast. England has a trying path to tread; for although, in mercy, we may be spared the horrors of war within our own shores, our men will die in battles abroad, our finances and commerce will become disturbed, and much home misery will ensue.—A rumor is afloat, which I believe to be true, that Spain has directed the Captain General of Cuba to emancipate the slaves of that Island at any time on his own authority, should he think it needful to resist any piratical expedition or hostilities of war from the United States. We hope soon to hear of the abolition of Slavery in the Dutch colonies."

RANDOLPH CO., N. CAROLINA. "I was pleased to see in the first No. of the present Vol. the proposition of purchasing a factory for the manufacture of free labor cotton goods. It revived a desire I have long cherished, that some of the advocates of freedom and the free labor system in the northern states, who have capital, may move hither. We have much water power, and many factories, and can raise the cotton. Were our population of the right kind increased, the cotton may be raised by free hands and a factory purchased and kept in operation in a part where the cotton grows well, and I have no doubt these goods could be sold as low as any other, and thus be placed completely within the reach of all. We have room, here in the middle and western part of this state for more than double our present population. Not half our land has yet been cleared. It stands, in its natural forest, in tracts of 100, 200, and 300 acres, and may be purchased at from $1 to $10 or $12 per acre. We have few slaves here compared with the eastern part of this State, or Virginia. The land is rolling, mostly clayey, with places mixed with sand. In the north and western part the timber is mostly oak and chestnut—the eastern or southern part are more sandy, with pine timber."

We wish that the views of our beloved friend may have due place. It has often moved us deeply to hear of Friends and other conscientious persons emigrating from slave States where a testimony to the truth is needed, and where, perhaps, the Good Husbandman had planted them that they should bear it. Often on hearing of such removals, the words have thrilled in our mind, "then shall the righteous flee from the devoted city." But, how cheering would it be to those who remain faithful at their post, bearing their burden alone, and weeping for the for the oppression around them, if freemen who have faith in their principles, would settle among them, and in the very midst of Slavery practically demonstrate the dignity of labor, the beauty of philanthropy, the moral grandeur of consistency, the practicability of duty, and the expediency of right.

ERIC CO. N. Y., "Is it not an error to say that the north had shared in the profits of slavery? Would not cotton have been cheaper without slavery? The North has sunk hundreds of millions in southern bankruptcy."

We conceive that the north has shared, alike in the profit and the guilt of slavery, and has been on the whole, (as she richly deserves to be) greatly the loser, even in a financial view of the subject. In illustration of our correspondent's assertion respecting southern bankruptcies, we will state that losses from this cause, to the amount of three millions of dollars, were sustained in NEWARK, N. J., in the year 1840.

How far this was the result of a participation in the slaveholder's guilt, we have not the means of computing. But we remember, in this connection, that a young friend of ours, a zealous abolitionist, having heard of a manufactory in that city which supplied large quantities of slave whips, visited it, examined the goods, asked many questions and received explanations how a nigger might be knocked down with the heavy end. Having purchased a few specimens, he was asked respecting the sort of plantation for which the whips were wanted. Our friend replied, that he was an abolitionist—that he had heard of the establishment, but could scarcely believe that such could exist in N. Jersey, and that he wanted these samples to exhibit.

JUAN PLACIDO.—THE CUBAN POET.*

The second event happened at Matanzas. My mistress sent me to get change of a gold doubloon at Don Juan de Torres. When I returned, she told me to put the change on a card-table, some time after she took it and put it into her pocket. As it was my business to dust all the furniture every half hour, whether it was dusty or not, when I came to this card-table, and put down one-half of it, down fell a peseta, which it seems got between the joints; at the sound of it she came from the next room, and asked me about it, I told her how it came there, she then counted her change, and missed the peseta, which she took without saying a word the rest of the day; but next day about 10 o'clock, the mayoral of the Ingenio came, who fastened my arms behind me, and ordered me to go before his horse; telling me, at the same time, that my mistress suspected that I put the peseta myself between the joints of the table on purpose to keep it. This mayoral, whose name I do not remember, stopped before a tavern, dismounted, went in, and ordered breakfast for both; untied my arms, and kindly told me to make myself easy, and not be afraid. While I was eating, he was conversing with a man, and I heard him say, "he besought of him to pity me, he had some children of his own." After breakfast he mounted his horse, and made me ride behind him on the horse. When we arrived at the Ingenio, he invited me to dine with him, and at night put me under the care of an old negro woman; I remained in this way nine days, when I was sent for by my mistress. At the period I speak of, my father was then living, and used to question me about these things, and advising me to tell always the truth, and to be honest and faithful. As this was the first time that I had been at the Ingenio, and considering the good treatment I experienced, I think it was owing to my mistress's secret instructions.

* We have been questioned respecting the truth of this narrative. We believe it to be strictly true—otherwise we should not insert it.

The second time that I was at Matanzas, there never passed a day without bringing some trouble to me; no, I cannot relate the incredible hardships of my life, a life full of sorrows! My heart sickened through sufferings, once after having received many blows on the face, and that happened almost daily, my mistress said, "I will make an end of you before you are of age;" these words left such an impression on my mind, that I asked my mother the meaning of them, who quite astonished, and after making me repeat them twice over, said, "my son, God is more powerful than the devil." She said no more about it; but this and some hints I received from the old servants of the house, began to unfold the true meaning of her expressions. On another occasion, going to be chastised, for I do not remember what trifle, a gentleman, always kind to me, interceded for me; but my mistress said to him, "mind, Senor, this boy will be one day worse than Rousseau and Voltaire, remember my words." These strange names, and the way that my mistress expressed herself, made me very anxious to know what sort of bad people they were; but when I found out that they were enemies of God, I became more uneasy, for since my infancy I was taught to love and fear God, and my trust in him was such, that I employed always part of the night praying God to lighten my sufferings, and to preserve me from mischief on the following day, and if I did anything wrong, I attributed it to my lukewarmness in prayers, or that I might have forgotten to pray; and I firmly believe that my prayers were heard, and to this I attribute the preservation of my life once, on occasion of my running away from Matanzas to Havana, as I will relate hereafter.

Although oppressed with so many sufferings, sometimes I gave way to the impulses of my naturally cheerful character. Whenever I went to Senor Estorino's house, I used to draw decorations on paper, figures on cards or pasteboard, and scenes from Chinese shades, then making frames of wild canes, for puppet shows, with a pen-knife, the puppets seemed to dance by themselves. I painted also portraits of the sons of Don Felix Llano, Don Manuel and Don Felix Puebla, Don Francisco Madruga, and many others; to see all this, there used to come several boys of the town, and on these occasions, I used to do my best to enliven these entertainments.

Some time after this, we went to Havana, where I was appointed to the service of young Don Nicolas, who esteemed me not as a slave, but as a son, notwithstanding his youth. In his company the sadness of my soul began to disappear, but soon after I contracted a disease in my chest, with a spasmodic cough, of which, with the assistance of Doctor Francisco Lubian, and with time and youth, I was perfectly cured. As I said before, I was now kindly treated, and never was without money in my pocket. My business was to take care of his wardrobe, to clean his shoes, and wait upon him: he only forbade me going out by myself, to go to the kitchen, and to have any intercourse with loose characters; and as he himself, though young, was very circumspect, so he wished every one about him to be; I never received any reprimand from him, and I loved him very much. As soon as day dawned, I used to get up, prepare his table, arm-chair, and books, and I adapted myself so well to his customs and manners, that I began to give myself up to study. From his books of rhetoric, I learnt by heart, a lesson every day, which I used to recite like a parrot, without knowing the meaning; but being tired of it, I determined to do something more useful, and that was to learn to write: but here was a difficulty. I did not know how to begin, nor did I know how to mend a pen, and I would not touch any of my master's; however, I bought ink, pens, and penknife, and some very fine paper; then taking some of the bits of written paper thrown away by my master, I put a piece of them between one of my fine sheets, and traced the characters underneath, in order to accustom my hand to make letters; with stratagem, at the end of a month I could write almost the same hand as my master's. Extremely pleased with myself, I employed the hours from five to ten every evening, exercising my hand to write, and in day-time I used to copy the inscriptions at the bottom of pictures hung in the walls; by these means, I could imitate the best hand writing. My master was told how I employed the evenings, and once he surprised me with all my writing apparatus, but he only advised me to drop that pastime, as not adapted to my situation in life, and that it would be more useful to me to employ my time in needle-work, a business that indeed at the same time I did not neglect. In vain was I forbidden to write, for when everybody went to bed, I used to light a piece of candle, and then at my leisure I copied the best verses, thinking that if I could imitate these, I would become a poet. Once, some of my sonnets fell into one of my friends' hands, and Doctor Coronado was the first to forestel, that I would be a great poet, notwithstanding all opposition; he was told how I had taught myself to write, and he encouraged me, saying, that many of the great poets began in the same way.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

"BE NOT A PARTAKER OF OTHER MEN'S SINS."—1 TIM. 5: 22.

"The articles you make use of cannot be produced without some time and labor, be the quantity what it may. Allowing the labor of a slave six or twelve years, to produce all the various slave-grown products which you may use during the course of your life, would not he who was so occupied be in effect YOUR SLAVE, during the time he was thus employed?"

Do you not receive as much benefit from his oppression, as the individual who is his nominal owner, but in fact, for that length of time, only your AGENT? Will the circumstance of this portion of labor, being divided among many persons, create any difference? By paying another for the commission of a crime which you would not dare to commit yourself, are you not, for the time that is necessary to produce the articles you consume, YOURSELF A SLAVEHOLDER.—[Communicated.]

Conclusion of the venerable THOMAS CLARKSON's speech on taking the chair as President of the General Anti-Slavery Convention, in London, 6 mo. 12, 1840.

"My dear friends, you have a most difficult task to perform; it is neither more nor less than the extirpation of slavery from the whole world. Your opponents who appear the most formidable, are the cotton and other planters in the southern parts of the United States; who, I am grieved to say, hold more than two millions of their fellow creatures in the most cruel bondage. Now, we know of these men, that they are living in the daily habits of injustice, cruelty and oppression, and may be therefore said to have no true fear of God, nor any just sense of religion. You cannot therefore, expect to have the same hold upon the consciences of these as you have upon the consciences of others. How then can you get at them so as to influence their conduct? There is one way; you must endeavor to make them feel their guilt in its consequences. You must endeavor by all justifiable means to affect their temporal interests. You must endeavor, among other things, to have the produce of free tropical labor brought into the markets of Europe, and undersell them there; and if you can do this, your victory is sure. I have only now to say, may the Supreme Ruler of all human events, at whose disposal are not only the hearts but the intellects of men, may He in his abundant mercy, guide your councils, and give His blessing upon your labors."

A SLAVEHOLDER'S VIEW OF THE TENDENCY OF SOUTHERN HABITS.

The blind pursuit of wealth, for the sake of hoarding is a species of insanity. There are spirits, and not the least worthy, who, content with a humble mediocrity, leave the field of ambition open to more active, perhaps more guilty, competitors. Nothing can be more respectable than the independence that grows out of self-denial. The man who, by abridging his wants, can find time to devote to the cultivation of his mind, or the aid of his fellow creatures, is a being far above the plodding sons of industry and gain. This a spirit of the noblest order. But what shall we say to the drone, whom society is eager to "shake from her encumbered lap?"—who lounges from place to place, and spends more time in "Adonizing" his person, even in a morning, than would serve to earn his breakfast?—who is envious in his living, a connoisseur in wines, fastidious in his cookery; but who never knew the luxury of earning a single meal? Such a creature, spunging from house to house, and always on the borow, may yet be found in Virginia.—One more generation, will I trust, put an end to them; and their posterity, if they have any, must work or steal directly.—Letter of John Randolph of Roanoke.

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, SIXTH MONTH, 14, 1834.

WILLIAM FORSTER.

In pursuing this memoir, we continue to make extracts from the Letters of Wm. Forster to Joseph John Gurney. Being limited in space and anxious to present as speedily as possible an account of the labors of his latter years, we extract sparingly, though we are sure that our readers will value the insight thus afforded into his soul's recesses, more than a mere history of those actions which, performed publicly, are to some extent already known to them.

It will be understood that there were many interesting events of his life, of which we do not attempt to make a record. This task must devolve upon those to whom the privilege peculiarly belongs. His labors as a minister of the Gospel of Christ were almost without intermission. At different periods in the course of his ministry, he visited the various meetings in England, Scotland and Ireland, and was engaged in other more extended missions, which will be referred to in due course.

He returned from his first visit to the American Continent in the sixth Month, 1825. Shortly after this, his friend having placed in Wm. Forster's hands the manuscript of his Essays on Christianity, he thus expressed his appreciation of the work:

"I think of thee with great comfort, and much sweet hope in the Lord is present with me on thy behalf, my precious friend, in the remembrance of that faithful word of promise given by our Lord to His servants, His appointed ones of every generation, in Matt. xxviii, 20—in which I trust it is given thee day by day to feel thou hast a most blessed interest. * * * The Lord is with thee—thy Saviour is thy Counselor and strength, and I doubt not He will do all things for thee. * * * Thou must allow me, in true brotherly love, to offer thee my warmest congratulations that thou hast been enabled to bring out thy Essays so much to thy relief of mind. By this term, I wish to convey something more than a mere rest from labor and perplexity, which I can easily believe must have been sufficient for the day, whilst thou wast conducting it through the press, but that it is permitted thee to enter into the rest of quietness and peace, and to rely upon the mercy and power of our Lord, for His blessing upon thy labors. I entertain a most lively and cheering hope of the usefulness of thy book: that in this cloudy and dark day, it will tend to the establishment of the wavering, to the fortifying of the feeble minded, and put to silence the cavils of many a proud and self-sufficient gainsayer. And to the anxious inquirer after the truth as it is in Jesus, I firmly believe it will be rendered peculiarly helpful and valuable. In short, I cannot but look upon it as one of those labors of love that will be made to abound 'by many thanksgivings unto God.' It would be strange if I did not feel more than a common and passing interest in the work, for I think I never found myself, upon any occasion, so much anticipated. It gives utterance to my own views and feelings in such lucid and convincing language, and withal, it solves some of my difficulties so thoroughly and satisfactorily, that it will be likely to be most valuable to me for the purpose of Christian doctrine. I long to see it in its finished state, and shall be rather impatient till thy kind present arrive."

In a subsequent letter (written when confined by indisposition and whilst the MS. Essays were still in his possession,) he says: "thy book will be good company—it is so much like thyself—and I find it so thoroughly satisfactory, and on many points so very confirming to my own sentiments and principles. * * * The farther I go into thy Elementary Essays, the more I am interested by them, and I do most sincerely thank thee for the privilege of looking them over. I have marked a few passages on which I shall enjoy to converse with thee when we meet." Again: "I shall greatly enjoy having the remainder of thy book. The more I think of it, the more I feel its importance, and the more I am satisfied that though it may be met by some few doubts and fears at first, yet, that it will ultimately settle well on the minds of Friends, both in our own particular department and every other, of the true Church."

Bradpole, 12th Mo., 17th, 1826.

My dearest Joseph,

I have been sitting alone, since Willy went off to bed, in a serious and thoughtful mind, looking over Wm. Edmundson's and John Fothergill's travels in America, as related in their respective Journals, and now, before I retire, I must, for my own satisfaction, try and write a line or two to thee, my beloved friend, which must, (as I increasingly feel all written communication does) fall very far short of expressing what I feel towards thee, and for all who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity.

"There is a certain sort of pain, (and a pleasurable pain it is,) in feeling to what great degree Christian fellowship is an inexpressible enjoyment, and how hard it is to convey to our nearest friends, even to them by whom our individual phraseology is the best understood, our religious feeling and our spiritual views. I cannot but believe that the Apostles knew something of it, but in the unity of the Spirit they found a medium of intercourse opened to them, and for all who are seeking to walk in the Light, through which they could salute each other in the name of the Lord, and rejoice over one another's faith and love and fruitfulness. Their's was a measure according to their fullness of stature: and though ours may be according to our state of infancy in the new man, our infirmities, our remaining corruptions, the smallness of our faith, and the feebleness of our love, yet, through the goodness of the Lord, we are not strangers to that oneness of Spirit which is in the Truth,—that fellowship which is with the Father and with the Son. Much of this comforting and precious enjoyment has been with me of late in thinking of thee, and during my late journey I made two attempts to write thee, but I was not able to finish my letter. I regretted it the more because though I can scarcely be said to keep up a regular correspondence with any other of my friends, yet I do aim at something of the kind with thee, and thy letters are so very much one of my greatest enjoyments, I always feel the blank if I am long without hearing from thee. * * *

"I take comfort in thinking that perhaps thou art now permitted to rest for a little while upon thy oars, and art quietly yielding thyself to the current which is bearing thee onwards to a larger and more important field of Gospel labor. I am very much of the opinion that the preparation for the work, as well as the actual accomplishment of every religious service, is of the Lord; and that of ourselves we cannot effect the one any more than the other. There is such a vast and wonderful diversity in the means which God is pleased to employ for the accomplishment of His own purposes, both as it relates to different individuals and to the same person at different times, that it is not for us to say through what dispensations he may condescend to work, to bring his servants into a state of acceptable dedication before him, or through what instrumentality such baptisms of the Spirit may be administered, as may conduce to their fitness to receive the renewings of the holy anointing, or tend to their religious usefulness among those to whom he may be pleased to send them. It is sometimes hard for us to believe that the temptations, the conflicts, the discouragements, and perplexities we have to endure, as they relate to others as well as to ourselves, can ever be so far sanctified as to be rendered instrumental to the good of those, for whom, under the influence of the love of Christ, we may be the most deeply interested. Yet so I do believe it is, and the more we are plunged into these depths, the more fully we are prepared to speak of those deliverances, and of that Redemption which constitutes the essence and is the very joy of the Gospel of Christ. And thus, whatever may be given us to bring forth from the treasury, whether they be things new or old, if it be but in the authority of His Power and Love, all will bear the evidence of the workmanship of His hand, and tend to the exaltation of His ever glorious name. It is under some such considerations as these, that I entertain a strong and cheering confidence for thee my dearest friend, that God will supply all thy need, that thy going will be in the fullness of the blessing of the Gospel of Christ, and that, whatever may be the trials of the day, the Lord will be thy strength and thy shield. I have the nearest sympathy, and the most entire unity with thee in thy prospects towards Ireland, and I cannot but believe that the time as well as the concern, will be found to be of the Lord's appointment."

2 Mo. 1st, 1827. "Whether I have a right apprehension or not of Eccl. ix. 4, 'For to him that is joined to the living there is hope,'—I not only think it a great privilege, but I can take comfort for myself in believing that I may be allowed to regard it as a token for good, that I enjoy some little capacity for sympathy with those who, baptized of the Lord for the service to which he is pleased to appoint them, are sent forth in His name to proclaim the Gospel of His Son. There is a course of discipline, and there are plunges into suffering and conflict, peculiar to such exercise of faith, and possibly it may be no very large proportion of the believers in Christ who are fully apprized of the depth and strength of these conflicts. But there are those who have seen the 'works of the Lord and his wonders in the deep,' and who have cause to bless His holy name for the support which He has vouchsafed unto them, under those dispensations in which He may have seen meet to instruct them, to an understanding of the vanity of the help of man. Thus I believe it to have been with thee my beloved brother, and my joy and consolation in the Lord is very great on thy behalf, and very much is it to my strength and confirmation that I can entertain such confidence for thee in the aboundings of the Grace of our Lord Jesus Christ towards thee, and through thee to His Church in those places to which He is about to send thee."

On another occasion, when Joseph John Gurney was about to leave home upon a religious engagement, Wm. Forster says, in a letter of Christian sympathy to his friend:

"I am often reminded of dear Priscilla's words, how she had found the gift to be distinct from herself. To them who have once known this as she knew it, and as thou hast known it, nothing can be more satisfactory than to have it renewed and confirmed on every occasion. But how little is it that those whom the Lord has set apart as vessels for his own use, are able to believe that He is effecting this work within them by their baptisms into humiliation and suffering, almost unto death, and how much we are apt, in such seasons of trial, to think the dispensations under which we are made to suffer, unlike every thing we have known in earlier days. Could we discover exactly the same features in every baptism, they might not so fully answer the purpose. In the depth of our abasement we can comprehend neither the means nor the end.—What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter. Thus it is that we are taught, first to trust, then to hope, and subsequently are made to rejoice, to give thanks, and to praise the name of our Redeemer, and to acknowledge to his mercy and truth, and power."

10 Mo. 8th, 1830. He wrote to his wife's brother:

"We had a very pleasant visit from the Chalmers' yesterday. The Doctor was very friendly and kind to me, and gave me a great deal of his mind on a variety of subjects: Nat. Theology—its bearings on Christianity—the external evidence of the Christian religion—Mechanics' Institutes, and their moral and religious tendency—the success of the forgery question, (with which he was delighted)—Brougham—Lushington—J. J. Gurney and his book, (both of which are in high favor)—Edinboro' and the University—&c., &c. I met him this morning in Town at an early breakfast; and did not fail to make the best use of my time. We had Geology and the harmlessness of the object, upon which it was quite a treat to hear him: and he opened very fully upon his favorite topic of the poor laws and the support of the poor. They seem much to have valued their intercourse with you, and their visit at Hampstead. In our intimate communication, which was in private, I had some opportunity of seeing the interior of his social mind, and I was quite delighted with his most kind feeling for his Brother—his deep-rooted humility, and thorough upright christian principle."

"I should have been glad to have a little more time in Town to get further information respecting the poor Van Diemans; but I have got things into such a train, that I shall be able to follow it up. At the office of the Van Dieman's Land Comp. in Broad street, I heard that the * Priscilla Gurney.

Government had declared Martial Law against the natives; which I suppose is a sort of license to every Settler to kill every "Black Man."

In the subject of education, both religious and literary, his interest was deep and his views were liberal and just. "I am glad," (he writes in 1825 to J. J. G.), that thou and dear Samuel were at Ackworth. I should like very much to know thy impression, as to the general state of the Institution, and how far the mode of Scripture instruction continues to answer thy wishes. The education of our young people was never a subject of deeper interest to me, and I am glad to find that Friends are so much alive to a sense of its importance. I like the idea of Latin classes at Ackworth. I have taken dearest Willy's lessons in hand, and perhaps my mind is just now quite enough engrossed in his education. I wish, at some future leisure hour, thou wouldst have the kindness to give me thy ideas on the subject of early education, both literary and religious; and I am not sure whether, if thy views on the subject, were made more public, they might not be useful among Friends. We want something of the sort for our own people."

His solicitude respecting religious training is more fully developed, in various letters written to the same valued friend,—as also his desire for a general and enlightened appreciation of the sacred record which was graciously given to man by his Creator and his God, and which certainly claims from us our reverent, diligent, and studious attention. Whilst we thankfully acknowledge that the saving doctrines of our holy religion are so clearly set forth in the Scriptures of Truth, that the simple and unlearned, reading them with the blessed aid of the Spirit of Christ, will not fail to become wise unto salvation; it appears to us as strange as it is unreasonable, that christian men should deery in the gross, all commentaries upon the Bible. As if these persons, or any persons, could, without study, and without the help of the Biblical researches of others, obtain an insight into the stores of knowledge which lie hidden in many a sacred text, as if, indeed, the Scriptures which were given to us for our learning, comprise more than it is worth our while to seek to comprehend. We spare room for but one brief extract:

3 Mo. 25th, 1828. "I am much pleased by thy report of thy literary occupations. Thy critical dissertations, so far as they are in our mother tongue, will be very much to my taste. Every object connected with Scriptural study and research, is more than ever a matter of importance and interest with me."

In the same letter he says:

"I wonder what thou wilt say if I tell thee that I am trying my hand upon one or two little matters. I have been endeavoring to put together a few remarks on SLAVERY, as connected with the doctrines and practice of the early Christians. * * * My little piece, if ever

I finish it, (and it is more adapted to the opinion and feeling of the people in Carolina, Georgia, &c., than in this country,) and thou shouldst think it fit to see the light, I intend dubbing with the title of Philemon and Onesimus. And I have thought of trying to form something small and concise on the plan of a Biographical Dictionary of the New Testament. I think rather a pleasant and useful compendium of the sort might be made, which would not be altogether unacceptable to young people."

Whether he made much progress in this interesting engagement we are not advised. His compilation of two useful little volumes, The Life of John the Baptist, and The Life of the Apostle Peter, may have been the carrying out, in part, of this plan.

We have before us evidence that William Forster, as an enlightened christian patriot, took a comprehensive view of national and local matters, to which, as affecting the interests of his countrymen, he could not be indifferent. Yet being watchful unto prayer, of a Godly circumspection, and quick of apprehension in the fear of the Lord, he was preserved from the snares and the excitement through which too many wound their own peace. The following extract from a letter written on the eve of an election in 1834, illustrates his conscientiousness.

"We shall have no contest for the County of Dorset: and our part of the Parish of Bradpole not being included within the Borough of Bridport, I have no vote for the Town,—therefore I am happy to say that I am out of the way of the excitement and strife which seem so general on every hand. But I have not been backward in declaring my determination not to vote for any candidate, who will not come under engagement, both for himself and his Committee, not to open public houses, or give any strong drink on the occasion. The practice, I am sorry to say, is so general, that if I adhere to this resolution, it is very doubtful whether I shall ever exercise my right of suffrage again. If the friends of morality and good order would adopt the same course, I do not believe it would be long before something effectual would be done towards restraining the vice and intemperance which an election is almost sure to produce."

On receiving from Joseph John Gurney a copy of his beautiful and invaluable little work on the habitual exercise of love to God as a preparation for Heaven, he thus acknowledged it, 12 Mo., 22d, 1834.

"Many thanks for thy little book. I think it very valuable, and would encourage thee to a large and cheap edition. I am glad to see that while writing on the Love of God, thou hast been enabled to hold the balance with so much of an even hand, and hast not omitted all mention of his Justice and Holiness. The last chapter pleases me much. Couldst thou have given a distinct paragraph in thy clearest, strongest language, on the guilt and hatefulness of War, I think it would have made it more to my mind. I see that the subject is hinted at in several places, but feeling as I do that we ought to leave no opportunity unemployed of entering our protest against this abomination, I should have been glad that in a work not professedly a Friends Book, it might have been made to appear that we need no other instrumentality than the application and following out of the principle of "Love to Man," as thou hast stated it, to bring to pass all the moral, social and political blessing, foreseen by the Prophets, and so decidedly spoken of by them, as constituting in part the glory of the latter days. Few subjects have lately had more of my deepest feeling and thoughtfulness; perhaps my views are crude and exaggerated—but, in thinking of it, as I often do, I am so much overwhelmed with a sense of the sinfulness of War, and its many contingencies, that it goes hard with me to reconcile myself to what appears to me the unchristian views that have been entertained by many good men on the subject. Oh! had we this love genuine from the inexhaustible Source of the Spirit's fullness, what would it not affect among us! what forbearance and perseverance in entreaty and persuasion, what forgiveness of injuries—what a carrying out of all the righteousness of the Lamb into our every day intercourse, our civil concerns, and national politics! What prayer would there be to God, that He would help us to settle our disputes without recourse to violent measures, and that he would preserve us from everything liable to interrupt the peaceable harmony of his government among men."

To be continued.

OUR GUILTY NATION.—The Infamous Nebraska Bill has become a Law. Its enactment was marked by bold wickedness on the part of some members of the National Legislature, and of cowardly wickedness on the part of others: by meanness on the part of all who supported the measure. Franklin Pierce has fully demonstrated his unworthiness of the office which he degrades. Were he and his fellow champions of human slavery, doomed to labor in the rice-swamp and the cane or cotton field, and to wear the chain, to feel the whip, to bear the scar of the branding iron—to eat the coarse and often stunted food of the bondman, and to keep within prescribed limits at the peril of being hunted by blood hounds and by "Men more savage far than they,"—

we should, (for they are human beings,) lament their cruel lot. How much more entitled to our earnest sympathy are those who through these men are held, or shall be held as chattels and things personal,—and those who, outwearied with unbearable oppression, escape from bondage only to be re-captured, in the land of freedom, in the very midst of sympathizing hearts, by men whose souls are degraded to the standard of an unrighteous law, and who can see no image or superscription but that of Caesar, upon the fellow immortal whom God created for happiness, for glory and for virtue, whom Christ, by a ransom of unapproachable value, hath made His own.

Franklin Pierce will not sleep sweetly, nor have innocent dreams. The gangrene of a deadly sin is a deeper wound than the domestic affliction which shaded the triumph of his election; and whenever he shall be driven home to his own soul, he will not find that the Son of Peace is there. The Senators and Representatives of the people who have committed this great iniquity, will go forth among their fellows, seeking to gloss over their crime. They will speak of black men as "niggers," whilst public opinion will apply to them a darker epithet. They will feel the curse of Cain heavy at their hearts. They will bear about them a moral taint. Let all christian parents shield their children from intercourse with them, lest, like them and like a prominent character in Milton's glorious Poem, they learn to say, "Evil be thou my good!"

The Magnetic Telegraph has proclaimed their infamy in every direction, and our readers have already full accounts of this transaction and of the Boston excitement, and the rendition of Burns. We can give them no information, and, we feel little ability to comment upon the disgraceful and afflicting facts. Unhappy country! whose laws, thus adverse to humanity, involve horrible guilt in their execution, and so outrage the sympathies which lean to virtue, as to play upon man's sense of right till he is provoked into violence and wrong.

Never was there greater need for Christian watchfulness than now. Never more necessity to heed the injunction,—"Be ye angry and sin not." Let anti-slavery men every where, dwell under a deep sense of the perfect sovereignty of God, and neither dare to cater to a corrupt popular sentiment, nor to cower before the wrong, nor to falter in upholding the Right, nor presume to violate any precept of the Prince of Peace, under the presumptuous notion that the All-Powerful needs such helpers. "I will," (said one who long before had vainly thought by violent deeds to do God service,) "that men pray every where,—lifting up holy hands, without wrath." Of this we may be certain, that Jehovah has purposes of infinite wisdom, which He will perfect in His own time, and that no man by "doing evil that good may come of it," can hasten that "good time coming," which "God hath reserved in His own power." Let each one then, keep his own spirit, guard his own conduct, "looking unto Jesus"—giving no aid or countenance to wicked laws, and bearing for Christ's sake, the penalty, if any there be, of non-compliance. Who can compute the force of such heroic non-compliance? Were all the northern men thus to testify against the rendition of slaves, we should need no underground railroad. The track to Canada might be in the light of day, with Telegraphs at every station, and the Mahos and Suttles might condole with one another about the locomotive tendencies of "chattels personal."

JOHN G. WHITTIER. A silly rumor being circulated during the excitement in Boston, that Whittier had proffered aid in "money or muscle," he addressed to the Editor of the Boston Times the following letter.

ASHMUN, 29th, 5th month, 1854.

In thy paper of this morning I see a paragraph stating that at a meeting of colored citizens in Boston, a document was read from me tendering aid for the liberation of the new victims of the Fugitive Slave Law. As the paragraph stands it might be inferred that I was in favor of the extreme measures said to have been proposed to the meeting, and I am sorry to find that the opportunity of saying that so far from counselling resistance, I have always and on all occasions deprecated it, and have, on the present occasion, most earnestly entreated my friends in Boston to abstain from even the appearance of it. That I feel indignant at this new outrage—that I look with horror upon the Fugitive Slave Law, and deeply sympathize with its victims I need not say. But I regard all violence as evil and self-destructive, and earnestly desire that the sons of freedom and humanity may be preserved from it, and if my voice could reach my colored friends especially, I would say: Be calm, be patient—God rules, and oppression cannot endure forever. J. G. WHITTIER.

OUR BELOVED FRIENDS OF THE ANTI-SLAVERY DEPUTATION, JOSIAH FORSTER, JOHN CANDLER, AND WILLIAM HOLMES, after a pleasant and favorable voyage of 12 days, landed at Liverpool about 5 o'clock on the afternoon of the 28th ult., where they were met, with a warm welcome and with deep emotion, by relatives and other dear friends. From several persons who were their fellow passengers on the steamer Atlantic, we learn that JOHN CANDLER gave the Ship's Company an address on the state of things in the West India Islands. It was well received, and interested the audience, which comprised several southern men, one of whom (from Louisiana) is said to claim ownership in 1500 fellow beings.

OUR BOOK TABLE.

We have been compelled to neglect this department for some months. The Report of the New York Free Produce Association of Friends, though dated 5 Mo 23d has reached us after this No. is in type.

STRUGGLES FOR LIFE; or the Autobiography of a dissenting minister, Phila. Lindsay & Blackiston, pp. 384.

We had marked passages to insert, but cannot find or make room. It is a readable good book, and we are assured that it is a true narrative, although the writer's name is suppressed.

REPORT made to the Board of Controllers of Public Schools of the first School District of Peoria, on the subject of PHONOGRAPHY, by a special Committee, &c., &c. Read April 11th, 1854.

This is an interesting and important document, from which we would be glad to extract. It demonstrates all that it attempts to prove. We commend it to the attention of all, and especially of the Youth of both sexes.

FREE LABOR MANUFACTORY.

By the liberality of a few friends of the Free labor cause, sufficient funds have been offered to purchase the requisite amount of machinery for a small experimental mill. At a meeting of the contributors, Samuel Rhoads and Richard Richardson were appointed Trustees of the Fund. A Mill-building with water power, favorably situated, has been rented for five years, a manager engaged, and the machinery ordered. Some cotton has also been ordered. It has been suggested that the fund for supplying the mill with cotton be kept separate from the machinery fund. It is desirable that those who intend aiding the enterprise, and have not yet subscribed, will do so without delay, giving authority with their subscriptions, to the Trustees, to add their contributions to the cotton fund, in case it should not be needed for the machinery. The funds applied to the purchase of cotton, will be secured by stock on hand, and six per cent interest paid to the contributors, irrespective of the profit or loss on buying and holding the cotton. The contributors to this fund, can appoint the same or other individuals as Trustees of their fund. There will be no individual liability of the contributors to either fund, beyond the amount of money they respectively furnish. A part of the money will be needed by the middle of ninth month or earlier; and probably all by the first of the tenth month. Contributors will therefore please be in readiness.

JUAN PLACIDO—THE CURAN POET.

At this time my master was near contracting an alliance with Senorita Donna Teresa de H., and I was the messenger between them, an office very productive, since I had plenty of money given to me, so much that I did not know what to do with it; I bought a handsome inkstand, a rule, and a good provision of pens, ink, and paper; the rest of my money I sent to my mother. We went to Guanajay on a visit to Conde de G., where my future young mistress resided. As the first needle-work my mistress made was dress-making, under the care of Senora Domingo, her dress-maker; I learned to make fine dresses, and I had the honor to make some dresses for my future mistress, in recompense for which I experienced all sorts of kindness; and when they were married I was their page, and as I was so punctual in attendance on them, I was treated more kindly from day to day.—But this happiness lasted only about three years, when my former mistress of Matanzas, hearing reports so favorable of me, resolved to take me into her own service again. At this time I was so punctual in attending sick people, though only eighteen years old, that whenever there was a person ill in the family, they asked permission of my mistress to let me attend upon them. One of them was Don Jose Maria P. who was very ill; I prepared for him his bath, administered the doctor's prescriptions in due time, helped him to rise from his bed, watched the whole of the night, with paper and ink before me, and put down, for the guidance of the doctor, the time that he slept, whether composedly or not, how many times he awoke, how many he coughed, if he snored, &c.; I was much praised for this by the doctors, Don Andres Terriles, Don Nicolas Gutierrez, and others. While I was attending this gentleman, my former mistress arrived, and intimated very kindly to me her intention to take me back. I listened to her sorrowfully, for my heart became oppressed at the thoughts of returning to those places so memorable and sad to me. I was obliged to follow her to her sister's, the Countess of B. where she was on a visit for a few days; she forbade me to bid farewell to my young masters, but I stole away unperceived, and went to take leave of them. Don Nicolas, who since his childhood was very partial to me, took leave of me weeping, as also his lady, both loading me with presents; the Senora gave me some Holland handkerchiefs and two gold doubloons; Don Nicolas all my clothes, including two new coats, and a gold doubloon besides. I left them so downcast and with such sad forebodings, that early next morning I ventured to ask for paper and ink, in order to advertise for a new master. This quite astonished my mistress, and saying that she took me back for my own sake, and that I had better stop with her till she made some other arrangements, and when she turned her back I was sorry for having given her this uneasiness. At dinner-time, she mentioned my boldness to her sister the Countess, and, with an angry tone, said to me before all the company, "this is the return you intend to make for all the care I took in your education; did I ever put my hands on you?" I was very near saying, yes, many a time, but thought better to say no. She then asked me if I remembered her mamma? and at my answering, yes; she said, "I occupy her place, mind that," here the conversation dropt. After prayers in the afternoon, I was sent for by the Countess and Donna Maria Pizarro, who both tried to persuade me to desist from my intention. I plainly told them, that I was afraid of my mistress's fiery temper; this conversation ended by the Countess advising me to stop with my mistress till she thought proper to give me my liberty.

Some time after this we left Matanzas, stopping at the Molino. Here they pointed out to me my new duties, and I acquitted myself so much to their satisfaction, that in a short time I was the head servant of the house. During all this time, after superintending the business of the house, and after breakfast, I used to employ myself at needlework. At the end of about two weeks after we were in town, it happened that one morning oversleeping myself, a cock found his way into my room, which was close to that of my mistress; the cock crew, I do not know how many times, I only heard him once, I started from my bed, and went about my business, and were it not for the interference of Don Thomas Gener, who, at my request, kindly interceded for me, I should not have escaped being sent to the Molino.

When I was about nineteen years of age, I had some pride in acquitting myself of my duties, so much to the satisfaction of my mistress, and never waited to be ordered twice; at this time I could not bear to be scolded at trifles; but the propensity to humble the self-love of those who are in the good graces of their masters, is a contagious disease in all rich families. Such was the case with a person, who without any cause or provocation on my part, began to treat me badly, calling me bad names, all of which I suffered, till he called my mother out of her name: then I retorted on him a similar expression, he gave me a blow, which I could not avoid, and I returned it. My mistress was out, and I was to go after her at the house of the Senora. When we returned, she was told of what happened; I excused myself, saying, that I could not suffer my mother to have a name; "So," said she, "if he repeats it again, you will not respect my house!" At the third day we went to breakfast to the Molino: meanwhile I was uneasy, I had before me all the vicissitudes of my life, and was apprehensive of what was to come.

EMERSON, N. Y., (with $5 and 20 names.)

"As I have only spoken to a part of the inhabitants, it is probable that with a little exertion the list of subscribers will be much enlarged. Those whose names are appended, are anxious to have their papers immediately, with all the back numbers of the current volume. Some friends of the cause wish the Non-Slaveholder enlarged. Others, who have previously taken no interest in the subject, say that the paper is so small and cheap that they are willing to subscribe and examine for themselves."

The same diligent Friend writes, about two weeks later, (enclosing 8 subscriptions) "Having for many years felt a deep interest in the free-labor movement, and endeavored to clear my own hands from the gain of oppression, I have often attributed the indifference of many of my acquaintances to a want of proper information on the subject. I have therefore, taken pains to circulate the Non-Slaveholder, and some who expressed antipathy to what they called fanatical papers, are willing to read and judge for themselves of the free-labor system."

MARION CO., INDIANA. "I am much pleased with the contents of the Non-Slaveholder, and have used efforts for its circulation throughout our neighborhood and Monthly Meeting, and believe that it is doing good in this country."

CANADA WEST. I send $1 for three subscriptions for the N. Slaveholder, also the postage to the lines. This is a small beginning, but I hope to do better. Hitherto the people of this country have been wrapped in apathy on the subject of slavery, feeling that they were, in great measure, clear of the sin. But the late atrocious acts of the American Congress in the Nebraska robbery, have roused the feelings of some, and already there is a strong under current of indignant feeling, which begins to manifest itself, and we want light diffused."

WESTERN NEW YORK. "The N. Slaveholder, always a welcome visitor, is additionally so since the publication of the memoir of dear W. Forster. Allow me to suggest that if the paper could be doubled in size for a few months, and the additional space devoted to this interesting and important subject, it would relieve a very justifiable impatience to see the whole history, and perhaps obviate the necessity of an abbreviation which would be a source of regret to many. It is due to Friends in this country who are concerned for the abolition of slavery, to give them all that is known of this veteran in the cause of Freedom and of our Lord and Saviour."

[We have found it advisable to give occasional extracts from letters received, and should extend this department could we afford the room. Many of our correspondents wish the N. Slaveholder enlarged. Many others wish to receive it semi-monthly. To such Friends we answer, that altho' our number of readers is large, yet the subscription price is so low that the publication involves an annual loss. If the paper were doubled in size, we might readily present a far more valuable course of reading matter, in quality not less than in quantity, but to do this, an expense of at least $400 would be incurred, and no one would wish, we presume, to add this burden to that already borne by our valued friend, the Publisher. #### DIALOGUE BETWEEN A SLAVEHOLDER AND AN ABOLITIONIST.

Slaveholder. What is your opinion in regard to slavery? I understand you are an abolitionist.

Abolitionist. You are quite correct. I have never shrunk from the open avowal of my sentiments on the subject, and I tell you plainly, I hold that the individual who deprives a human being of liberty, is guilty of the highest crime it is possible for man to commit, except it be wilfully taking the life of another.

S. Who is responsible for slavery?

A. The slaveholder of course. The voice of the whole civilized world condemns the iniquitous system.

S. What do you suppose is our motive in committing what you consider so great a sin?

A. The desire to realize large profits on the production of your staple commodities, cotton, sugar, and rice, for the sake of gain, you rob a man of himself, and if convenience requires, of his wife and children—you rob him of the fruits of his toil—blot out his intellectual existence, and reduce him to a beast of burden.

S. Who buys our cotton, sugar and rice?

A. (Hesitating) I suppose mostly, non-slaveholders.

S. Are they opposed to slavery, I would ask?

A. I have not thought of that, but of course most of them are.

S. Strange you do not see that those who purchase our goods and give us our profits, are in league with us; I have heard say, "the receiver is as bad as the thief." This is countenancing in action, what you so loudly condemn in words.

A. Well, yes, I suppose it must look a little so to you, but it is quite inconvenient to obtain free goods, and we could not now command a full supply, then the demand for such goods is so small that they cost more.

S. Have we not quite as good an excuse for slavery? Would it not be much more inconvenient for us to do without our slaves, and in many cases to reduce ourselves to actual poverty? I say slavery is an evil, and a curse, but to get rid of it involves us in a thousand fold more difficulty and sacrifice, than you could possibly feel in abstaining from the luxuries produced by slavery. As you have just bought my sugar and molasses, I hold myself on the same level with you. We both see the evil of slavery, but neither of us is willing to sacrifice money or convenience to principle. Our motives are alike. I cannot afford to give up the slaves I have inherited, and you cannot afford to give up the luxuries I produce, or to take the trouble to obtain them from free men at a little greater cost.

A. I have never thought of this before.

S. Can you not see that the slaveholder, and the consumer of slave produce stand or fall together. If you at the north, who denounce slavery as a robbery and crime, would act as you profess, we would listen to you; but what robber was ever yet convinced of his sin, by those who paid him for doing the disagreeable part of the business, and shared in the spoil? At present I consider myself only your agent. You buy and sell at the north, while I manage my plantation south, arranging every year to meet your demand. You have far less excuse for your part of slavery, than we have for ours. I have heard some who raised the loudest cry against slaveholders, say they could not afford to pay a single cent difference in favor of a yard of free cotton.

A. I have always abhorred slavery as the worst of all robbery; the greatest crime against God and man. I have raised my voice against it, even in the face of persecution and personal danger. I had thought that at least, was clear of the blood of the slave. If by refraining from the purchase of your slave-grown produce, I could in any way help to overthrow slavery, I would do it with all my heart; but as there is little probability that any considerable portion of the community—even the anti-slavery community, would do the same, I do not see that it is worth while for me to make so great a sacrifice unless it were likely to effect a greater good.

S. Exactly so, I agree with you precisely. Living as I do, in the midst of slavery, I know and feel its abominations, better than you can, for I have still a human heart not wholly hardened. Never have I ceased to cherish the sentiments of freedom and humanity taught me by my mother when a little child; but I have reasoned just as you do, I do not see that my individual example and influence would effect much: I should only reduce myself to poverty, and subject myself to persecution and ridicule. So I satisfy my conscience, which is sometimes a lit-the troublesome, by considering that I am a kind and humane master, always abstaining from cruelty, and endeavoring to do the best I can for my servants under the circumstances. You see it would be folly in me as an individual, to stem the tide of opposition, or to attempt to abolish slavery through my efforts, just as it would be folly in you to refuse to purchase my produce. An individual can do but little you know.

A. And so you are willing to go on committing sin even in the face of light and knowledge, you refuse to do your duty because others will not do theirs, and because you cannot abolish slavery, you are content to uphold it by example and influence, and rob hundreds of our fellow creatures of their rights. I

S. I am not a slaveholder by choice, but by inheritance, and to emancipate my slaves reduces me at once from affluence to poverty.

A. Is not honest poverty better than ill-gotten gain? O, why will you not be true to yourself, and at once let your example be felt on the side of freedom?

S. Ah! I see you wish to preach to me. Its easy to tell others what to do. "Easier to tell twenty the good that ought to be done, than to be one of the twenty to follow your own teaching." Hav'nt you just now acknowledged that you would not make even a small sacrifice unless every body else would do the same, and you were sure of a great good? I say I am as good as you. You cant find the difference for your life.

The long and the short of it is, we both hate slavery as far as talking goes, but when it comes to acting, we like ease, money, and convenience.

A. Well, I wonder I have not thought of this before. To be candid, there is much reason in what you say, and I think you will have to strike me off your list of customers.

To the Editor of the Non-Slaverholder.

LOUISIANA, JUNE, 4th, 1854.

Esteemed Friend,—As respects the present prices of slaves, I would state that they are, and have been quite high for several months past. A No. one field hand, young, stout and active, will command from $1400, to $1600. A good mechanic, as a carpenter or blacksmith, will bring $2000. Women do not sell so high; tho' a first rate cook may bring $1500, but $1250 is about the present price for "young and likely" women to work in the field. These prices are only paid for the "best of the lot," and they insured by the slave merchant for a limited time, generally three months. The insurance is against their having any acute or chronic disease at the time of sale, and sometimes against "vicious habits," foremost among which is reckoned the habit of running away. A slave is not unfrequently sold as sound, whom the trader knows not to be so. He is returned upon his hands, when he gives an inferior one in his place, or exacts $100 or so to boot. Thus one negro may be several times sold in the course of the season, and as frequently returned to the trader, who generally realizes from $50 to $150 by the operation. At the close of the business season, the trader wishing "to close out his stock," these unsound negroes, and any others that may be remaining on hand, are put up at public auction and sold to the highest bidder, generally without a warrantee, and the trader goes to the northern slave States to purchase another "gang." I do not know the exact number of slave markets in New Orleans. They are quite numerous: generally having a high board fence around the yard, and a large sign up, with the inscription,

SLAVES FOR SALE OR HIRE.

At the door will be three or four white men standing around, one at least having under his arm a large, heavy lashed whip, of northern manufacture. Inside of the yard is a long frame building, having a bench on each side, on one of which, dressed in their best attire, sit the women, on the other, the men who are offered for sale. As a stranger walks into the market, it is interesting to notice the anxious curiosity depicted on the countenances of its inmates. They are forming an opinion in regard to whether he will be a hard or an easy master, and in order to please their present owner, and anxious to know their fate, they assume a cheerfulness of manner to which the heart must not unfrequently, be a stranger.

I have occasionally heard it stated, (and my own observation convinces me of the truth of the statement) that at the present prices of negroes, slave labor is not generally profitable. The profit is in their increase, in the raising of slaves, either for the purpose of getting their labor on the home plantation, or in order to sell them to others. An active boy, if "good conditioned," will bring $1000 at fifteen years of age, and the expense of raising them is but little, as on many plantations they go until ten years of age without clothes in the summer, and but a coarse cotton shirt or frock in the winter. The only feasible plan (if plan it can be called) by which to abolish slavery, is to confine it within certain prescribed limits, "saying unto it, hitherto shalt thou come but no further." Destroy the demand for slaves, and the institution will finally fall from its own inherent weakness and unprofitableness. But while you continue to admit new slave territory, thus furnishing fresh lands to supply the place of those which are impoverished by the exhausting system of slave labor, thus creating an increased demand for slaves, and keeping up the present high prices for them, so long will it continue. The intelligent portion of the south are not much elated with the passage of the Nebraska bill. They fear that it will make the acquisition of Cuba more difficult, and Cuba they intend to have by fair means or by foul. They also consider it as ominously establishing the fact that compromises may be repealed. I remain, &c.

For the Non-Slaverholder.

DIALOGUE ON SLAVERY.

W. Well frised H: thou hast been residing at the South, and hast been brought into immediate contact with "the peculiar institution." Upon one point in particular, I should like to know thy testimony. The South complains that Northern papers mis-represent them, by publishing isolated cases of cruelty, and conveying the idea to the public that these are a fair representation of the whole system of Slavery. Now, I have no doubt that some of the Slaveholders treat their slaves with comparative kindness, but in addition to the fact of their reducing the image of God to a "chattel personal" (which I consider as an unwarrantable cruelty), hast thou not known of cases in which the slaves have been treated with a harshness amounting to barbarity?

H. I am sorry to say that such cases are not unfrequent. One immediately occurs to my mind, which I will relate, prefacing it by remarking that one of the greatest offences a negro can commit against his master, is that of running away. And this for obvious reasons, as it deprives his master of the income derived from his services. In the extreme Southern States, it is almost impossible for a "runaway nigger" ultimately to escape being captured.

W. Why not go to Canada?

H. Go to Canada! How could he get there? The whole country is to him as an armed camp of an enemy. If he is seen away from home he may be questioned by any white man that meets him, and if out of his immediate neighborhood, unless he has a pass, or other sufficient evidence of his master's consent, he may be lodged in the nearest jail, advertised, and if not called for in the legal time, sold to pay his jail fees. He remains out in the woods, generally in a cane-brake in the day-time, and at night goes to the plantations, (at the risk of being caught or torn by dogs), to get somewhat to eat. No ferryman would allow him to cross the river at his ferry, and any steamboat taking him on his way to freedom, though unknowingly, may be sued for damages, and the value of the negro received of the owners of the boat. Some men have what are called "nigger dogs," for the express purpose of hunting runaway negroes. One man named — living a few miles from me, had five dogs. He charged $10 per day for himself and dogs, "catch or no catch," but would not go out on a hunt unless the owner of the runaway would give permission that the dogs should "take hold" of the negro when caught. This was to keep them in "good heart." At one time, the dogs having been for several hours on the trail of a negro, finally "brought him to bay" in a pond of water about three feet deep, in which the negro was endeavoring to conceal himself by squatting down, leaving only his face above water. The owner of the dogs coming up, riding his splendid horse, and with his rifle in his hand, called to the negro to come on shore, telling him that if he did not the dogs would draw him and "if you strike one of them, I will shoot you." The negro arose from his position, and as he arose the dogs seized him, and he came wading to the shore dragging five hounds by their teeth. By this time his master had arrived, and said to him, "now take your choice, either to have the dogs hold you for five minutes, or two hundred lashes to-morrow." As we generally prefer future evil to present pain, so in order to be released from his painful situation, the negro chose the to-morrow's flogging. The dogs were tied with ropes and one by one "choked off" of their prey, and tied to neighboring saplings, still rearing and plunging to get at their human game. On the morrow, the negro was tied up and received one hundred and fifty lashes, when he fainted and was taken down: his master declaring that he "would teach him how to run away again."

W. Horrible! His master must have been a naturally cruel man.

H. No more so than many others. Such cases are but the legitimate results of a system, which leads those educated under its influences to look with indifference upon pain or suffering, when he who endures it has a skin "not coloured like their own," in other words, is "nothing but a nigger."

W. Well I feel like doing what I can to clear myself from all participation in, or upholding of such an iniquitous and blood cemented system. I shall be glad to hear further from thee on this subject at a future time. H.

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, SEVENTH MONTH, 22, 1854.

WILLIAM FORSTER.*

In a letter written 9 mo, 10th, 1833 to Joseph John Gurney, on the decease of a near relative, we find some observations which the minds of many readers will feelingly adopt in reference to the writer:

"I was, to my own apprehension, very much with you in spirit, and thought that perhaps I had some perception, however feeble it might be, of those consolations with which I could not doubt that you were abundantly comforted of God, in being enabled, for a short time, to forget yourselves and the scenes of suffering and distress of body to which you had recently been witnesses, and with reverent thanksgiving to offer spiritual worship to Him who had redeemed to Himself our beloved friend, carried her safely through all her tribulations, and at length, as a

sheek of corn fully ripe, gathered her to an everlasting chilling place in the presence of His glory. How exceedingly rich in all that constitutes the joy and excellency of our holy religion is that precious word of assurance "he shall go no more out." To those who die in the Lord we may be very sure that there is no more falling away—no more of that under which the most advanced christian is at times made to groan "being burdened;" but, delivered from the body in which we have to suffer under a sense of the evil and bitterness of sin, the children of the Lord, without intermission to their communion with Him, and without alloy to their peace and joy, are, in the Society of multitudes more numerous than man can number, happy and blessed as themselves, established before Him forever. Such glories as these from the Sun of Righteousness, seldom as it is that they break upon us in the course of our pilgrimage, may be regarded as strong and conclusive evidence of the reality and divine origin of the doctrine of the New Testament, and are, in the abounding of that grace by which we are called to eternal life through Christ Jesus our Lord, vouchsafed in moments of peculiar favor for the strengthening of our faith and ought to have the effect of quickening us to more fervent aspirations for complete purification from sin, through the power of the Holy Ghost.

What dost thou think of our projected Association for bettering the condition of the liberated or apprenticed negroes. It is an object that I have very much at heart, and could wish that I were so circumstanced as to be able to devote to it the little energy I possess. I certainly think Friends have something to do, and from that sort of feeling which seemed to prevail at the opportunities of conference at which I was present, I should be inclined to argue that they will be enabled satisfactorily to discover their path of duty, and, entering willing hearted upon the service, I trust the Society will be brought to much of that experience so richly enjoyed by the Church in early days, that it is more blessed to give than to receive."

To J. J. Gurney—(then traveling in Scotland.)

HUNTINGDON, 10mo 8th, 1836.

My dearest Joseph,

I have been so much with thee in spirit, in true brotherly christian fellowship, in the course of my solitary journey to-day, that it will be something more than mere pleasure to write thee a line or two before I retire for the night. I must, in my poor way, try to tell thee that I have inexpressible comfort and rest and peace in believing, and in being persuaded that our gracious Lord and Saviour is with thee to order all thy steps in the counsel of His wisdom, to keep thee in all thy ways, to lay thee low when, for His own purposes, He is pleased to humble thee, to empty thee that thou mayest know in whom is all thy fullness, to supply all thy need from the abundance of His overflowing and ever flowing Grace, to enlarge thy heart in His all-gathering love, and to give thee mouth and wisdom, such as even the adversaries of his blessed Truth shall not be able to gainsay or resist. * * * I trust thy dear companions in the work are sometimes brought within the skirts of those showers, with which I can well believe that you are plentifully watered from above. It is a precious word of promise, rich in the mention of the near lasting gospel of the Grace of God—"He shall come down as showers."—Oh may it be given thee thus to rejoice in the Lord day by day, and to joy in the God of thy salvation; and yet more and more to praise his glorious name, for his goodness, power and love in Christ Jesus our Redeemer."

When the same much valued correspondent was faithfully laboring in a far distant land, W. Forster wrote to him; (5 mo., 1838.) "Yearly Meeting is now nearly at hand—How I shall miss thee. But perhaps not more than I do almost every day, both at home and abroad. I never seemed so much to need thy counsel and support: for I often feel that I have scarcely a friend left in life who has, equally with thyself, an understanding of me. But I will not repine." * * * "I have been reading thy letters, and am much interested by the history of thy family visit at Philadelphia, &c. Surely our Lord and Saviour must be with thee. With what confidence may we hope that his care and love will never be withdrawn from thee?" A sentiment, the correctness of which was gloriously realized, and will be admitted by the true-hearted so long as the promise holds good: "The righteous shall be held in everlasting remembrance."

In the year 1846 William Forster was introduced into a service which, whilst calculated to stimulate him to unremitting efforts, could not fail to affect most painfully a mind so keenly sensitive to human distress. During that year, the almost total failure of the potato crop, together with a deficiency in the crop of oats, involved a loss computed at eighty millions of dollars, and reduced millions of persons to the prospect of absolute starvation. The emergency was too dreadful to be at first fully realized, and the sufferings which ensued, not only transcend our skill in description, but were far beyond the conception of those, who, daily partaking in abundance of the bounties of Providence, desired to extend across the deep a helping hand to those who were ready to perish. Our beloved friend found it to be his duty to make a journey through the distressed districts, and having conferred with his Friends, and obtained their unity he left his home, a messenger of mercy, on the 30th of 11th month, and spent an unusually inclement winter, subjected to great privations, and amidst scenes of distress, loathsomeness and horror, not to be contemplated, even after the lapse of years without a shudder. In this labor of love and of faith he was accompanied, by turns, by Joseph Crossfield, James H. Tuke, George Alexander, Wm. Dillwyn Sims, and other friends by whom from time to time reports were published, and we had marked for insertion various thrilling extracts, but we find that they would involve the occupation of more space than we can devote to the subject, and the minutiae of details would too painfully harrow the feelings of our readers. But if these scenes were too revolting to be lightly touched upon in a journal like this, let us contemplate the suffering they must have occasioned to our dear Friend, who, though his sensibilities were so exquisitely keen that his heart strings were continually and painfully vibrating, thus dwelt in the midst of these horrors, acting the part of the good Samaritan, whilst from the Heaven of Heavens, the adorable Being, who, when incarnate, "went about doing good," looked down upon His follower thus conformed unto His likeness, and recognized these noble deeds as done unto Him. Who is there that can reflect upon these passages in William Forster's personal history, without making the acknowledgement

"not like thine is crucified
The spirit of our human pride,
And at the bondsman's tale of woe,
And for the outcast and forsaken,
Not warm like thine, but cold and slow
One warmer sympathy awakes."

From the "Transactions of the Central Relief Committee of the Society of Friends" we copy the following passage.

"The Committee observed that some of the earliest and most perplexing questions that presented themselves, were how to obtain trustworthy information as to the real state of the more remote districts, and through what agency to open suitable channels of relief. From this difficulty they were in part relieved, by finding that William Forster of Norwich, intended to come to this country, believing it to be his duty to undertake a journey through the most distressed districts, with the view of obtaining accurate information respecting the nature and amount of destitution, and of devising the best means of affording relief. The distressed condition of Ireland had attracted Wm. Forster's attention before he heard of the formation of our Committee, and he had conferred with his friends in London on the subject, who fully united in his views, and encouraged him to prosecute his proposed journey. He set out on the 30th of 11 mo. 1846, and was accompanied in different parts of this route by some friends from England and of this country, with whom he visited the Counties of Roscommon, Leitrim, Fermanagh, Donegal, Sligo, Mayo, Galway, Longford, and Cavan. Most of the counties were closely inspected, and special attention was paid to the wild and desolate parts of each. It was not until the 14th of 11th mo. '47, that he completed his engagement; which had been prolonged greatly beyond the expectations at first entertained by himself and his friends, and which he prosecuted in the depth of a very inclement winter, deprived of many of the comforts to which he was accustomed, and his feelings often painfully excited by witnessing so much misery beyond his power to relieve. His examination disclosed a state of destitution and suffering far exceeding that which had been at first supposed.

The Committee believe that his visit was very useful in many respects. He stimulated the upper classes to the endeavor to relieve the distresses created by them. He encouraged those with whom he had intercourse, by the ex-formation he was able to give respecting the exertions made in other parts of the country, and by showing them that he himself sympathized with the difficulties of their position and with the sufferings of the poor. He also afforded most important help to our Committee, by opening a correspondence with individuals and local bodies in those remote districts, and thus furnished us with many efficient and trustworthy agents for the distribution of the funds confided to us, in places far removed from the residence of any members of our own religious profession. Previously to his leaving Dublin, he had been requested to undertake the immediate distribution of relief, by advances of money in all cases in the course of his journey in which there appeared to him a propriety in doing so. This discretion he from time to time exercised."

"The full value of his services," says the Norfolk News, "can scarcely be calculated. He hardly allowed himself sufficient time for rest and sleep; and no atmospheric influences, however inauspicious, were allowed to damp his ardour or relax his exertions. Younger and more robust men quailed before the amount of labor through which his unflagging zeal sustained him; but there was little doubt that he overtaxed his strength in the prosecution of his arduous though self-imposed task. He was strongly and peculiarly affected by the harrowing scenes which he was called to witness, and which far exceeded in horror any which his imagination had pictured; and with the combined effect of grief on his tender spirit, and excessive fatigue on his physical system, he returned to England, with a constitution much debilitated by the severity of the exercise through which he had passed. It may be interesting to our readers to know that the total amount of relief in money and food placed at the disposal of the Central Committee of the Society of Friends at Dublin, during the visitation of the famine, was nearly £200,000. The supplies sent from America were on a scale of unparalleled liberality."—To be Continued.

We can scarcely take up a periodical which has any pretension to respectability or moral tone without finding strong condemnation of the late iniquity of our National Legislature, in the passage of the Nebraska Bill. Yet how few of those who thus denounce it are themselves free from the guilt! The Missouri Compromise was in the first place, a weak and wicked surrender of the right, at a time when manliness and virtue might have secured the blessing which was then widely thrown away. From that time the nominal friends of Freedom, who are "as much opposed to Slavery as you are, but"—have been gradually pursuing the downward course of compromise and demoralization. We cannot pause to dwell upon the evidences of this, which saddened and disgusted us from year to year. In 1850 a crisis had arrived when public sentiment demanded an advance in the direction of Freedom, and representatives were sent to Washington to carry out the popular will. The South perceived this, expected fully to be compelled to make large concessions, and were ready, after flourish of trumpets, to do so peaceably. The time was auspicious. The safety of the Union, so far from being at hazard, was enhanced,—and a more tranquil feeling on the Slave Question,—alike at the South and at the North, was at hand. Had Henry Clay and Daniel Webster been both quietly at their homes; or, being at Washington, had they both been destitute of all hope of the Presidency, the tide of Slavery propaganda would have receded, and the infamous Fugitive Bill would never have disgraced our statute books, or even have been devised. But the South had been accustomed to gain her points by bullying the North. She verily believed that the time had come when she could do so no longer, but, it could cost little to try the experiment once more, and would only be indulging, (perhaps for the last time) in a favorite habit. So the list of the South was fiercely yet tremulously shaken in the face of the North,—and the North—false to its convictions—traitor to its trusts—recrudescent to virtue and humanity, shook in its shoes. The quick witted South took advantage of the first display of the white feather. They expected to be beaten, but they saw that they could strike a panic in the hosts of Freedom. They saw that by threatening the Union they could draw concessions from northern politicians, and they knew that if these dough faces, would, at the very moment when they might have made their own terms, yield a little "to save the Union," they could, by calling louder, scare them into conceding more. So that inhuman, base and unconstitutional Bill was presented, its passage was demanded,—and the sons of the North who were sent to do battle for Liberty, gave themselves to infamy, and

"Cowered down into Slaves when they might have stood MEN."

The degrading history of the subsequent years is lamentably fresh in our memory, and does not modify the sentiment at which we had arrived, that the most truckling people of ancient or modern time, are now to be found in the non-slaveholding States of this Union. TRUCKLING TO THE SOUTH—is the comprehensive phrase, by which we might characterize a large part of our legislation. The words afford a neat compendium of our history.

At present there seems to be something like virtuous indignation pervading the country. We would endeavour to place some reliance upon it, only that we are weary of being duped. Politicians, in this as in other matters, will be ready with promises to carry out the popular will. But when they meet the Southern phalanx face to face, like Whittier's Statesman in the "hunting of men,"—

"Doubting and fear shall prevail,

And the head of the steel take the place of the tail."

We have little heart, therefore, to chronicle the indignation meetings held in various sections, and sometimes addressed by Politicians, who, could Clay or Webster rise before them to warn them that "the Union is in danger" would leap to their embrace, as NEV rushed from the head of his troops to the arms of Napoleon, when his old master called him "the bravest of the brave."

Yet, amid the sickening evidences that a true answer to the query—"Shall he find faith on the earth?" must be a negative one,—we can at least place a guard upon our own conscience and our own example, and take heed lest we too, by the corrupting influences of sordid interest, sell our testimony and our integrity together, and become implicated in the greatest crime on Earth. And whilst it is much to keep our own conscience clear, it is by no means necessary that the results of our abstinence from Slave produce should stop here. Let all who abhor Slavery refrain from giving the motive, refuse to accept the bribe that blinds the eye, and the motive of self-interest would no longer operate in the North to the extent that it now does, to stifle the testimony, to influence the vote, to stimulate to high treason against God and Humanity. It would be a modest, unblamable mode of attack upon Slavery, and carrying with it evidences of sincerity, it would preach wordless, but convicting sermons, it would spread like a holy contagion among the honest hearted,

"And from yonder sunny valleys,
Southward in the distance lost,
Freedom yet should summon allies
Worthier than the North can boast.

With the evil by their heartstones grappling at severer cost."

SUGGESTED PRIZE ESSAY.—The Leeds (Eng.) Anti-Slavery Association proposes to raise a Fund and to offer a prize of 200 guineas for the best, and 100 guineas for the second best essay "on the Sinfulness of Slavery; the best mode of terminating it; and the benefits that would result therefrom."

Strong reasons for this movement are presented, prominent among which is placed the awakening of dormant energies, (as in the case of Clarkson), in the hands of those who compete for the prize. Immediate contributions are invited, and the following are the persons in America who are appointed to receive such subscriptions. George W. Taylor, Cor. 5th and Cherry Sts., Philada.,—Samuel J. May, Boston, James McCune Smith, M. D., New York,—Frederick Douglass, Rochester.

THE Proprietor of this Establishment would call the attention of the friends and consumers of Free Labour Produce to the prospect of having a manufactory for making a variety of Staple Cotton and mixture of Cotton and Woolen fabrics in operation early next autumn, which it is believed will remove the main difficulties, which have been experienced in maintaining a supply of such goods. He has also a confidence in securing better arrangements for regular supplies of such goods as he shall prefer getting made in England. He is now expecting daily additional stock for the autumn demand.

JUAN PLACIDO—THE CUBAN POET.

Soon after our arrival, I saw the mayoral coming towards the house; I escaped through the garden, and hid myself; in the afternoon I went to town, to the Count of G., who gave me shelter and protection; I was still uneasy, I wept bitterly when I remembered the kindness I was treated with by the other masters in Havana. Scarcely was I there five days, when, for a trifling fault, they sent for a commissary of police, who secured me with a rope, and took me to the public prison in the middle of the day; at four o'clock, there came a white man from the country, who demanded me, and I was delivered to him; he put on me the coarse linen dress, he tied my arms with a rope, and led me towards the Molino, which I desired never to see again, after having been so well treated by my former masters, being now also somewhat elated with the praises bestowed on my abilities, and a little proud of my acquaintance in the city with persons that knew how to reward services. At the Molino, Don Saturnino Carras, the mayoral at this time, examined me, I told the truth, and he sent me to work at the fields without any chastisement or fetters. I was there about nine days when my mistress coming to the Molino to breakfast, sent for me, gave me a fine suit of clothes, and took me to town again in the volante. I was known at this time under the name of the Chinito, or the little Mulatto of the Marquesa.

About this time I went to the house of a lady of Senor Apodaca, a grandee of Havana, where they were making some preparations for his reception. Senor Aparicio, a painter and decorator, was employed in painting some emblems allusive to a rose, as the name of the lady was Rosa; I helped the painter, and he gave me ten dollars for my work, and having by way of amusement painted some garlands, he saw that I might be useful to him, and asked my mistress to lend me to him, but she would not consent; at the conclusion of his work he gave me two dollars more, which money I kept with the intention to spend it at Havana. My mistress found out that the servants met together in a barn after midnight, to play at cards till the morning. The first thing she did on the following morning was to search my pockets, and finding that I had more money than she gave me, took me for an accomplice in their game; and notwithstanding my telling her how I came in possession of the money, she kept it, and sent me to the Molino, where I was received by the mayoral, and treated kindly, the same as before; at the end of three or four days my mistress sent for me, and I returned to town.

Some time past on without any novelty, when my mother died suddenly. I was made acquainted with this accident soon afterwards, when my mistress gave me three dollars to have prayers said for her. A few days after she gave me leave to go to the Molino, to see what my mother had left. The mayoral gave me the key of the house, where I only found a very large old box empty; as there was a secret in it, which I knew, I pulled the spring, and found there some trinkets of pure gold, but the most worthy were three ancient bracelets, near two inches broad and very thick, two strings of beads, one of gold, the other coral and gold; I found also a bundle of papers, in which were some accounts of debts due to us, one of 200 and odd dollars, another of 400, payable by my mistress, and some others for small sums. When I was born, my grandfather gave me a young mare, of a fine breed; she gave five colts, which my father purposed should be given to my brothers; after that she gave three more, making altogether eight colts. I returned to my mistress, and gave an account of what I found. At the end of five or six days, I asked her if she had examined the bills: she answered calmly, "not yet;" and I went to inform the Creole, Rosa Brindiz, who had the care of my sister, Maria del Rosario. Rosa was continually urging me not to lose any opportunity of asking my mistress about it, as she wanted my sister's share, to repay herself the expenses of nursing and keeping her, and as I was the eldest, it was my duty, she said, to look after the money. Teased by her, I ventured to mention it again to my mistress; but what was my astonishment, when instead of money, she said, "You are in a great hurry for your inheritance, do you not know that I am the lawful heir of my slaves? if you speak to me again about it, I will send you where you will never see the sun nor the moon again; go and clean the furniture." The following day I made Rosa acquainted with this answer, and some days after she came herself to speak to my mistress, with whom she was a long time; when she came out I gave her two of the three bracelets, and all of the beads. My mistress, who was always watching me, came near us, and intimated to Rosa, that she disliked her to have any communication with me, or any of the servants, and Rosa went away, and never came there any more.

As for me, from the moment that I lost my hopes, I ceased to be a faithful slave; from an humble, submissive being, I turned the most discontented of mankind: I wished to have wings to fly from that place, and to go to Havana; and from that day my only thoughts were in planning how to escape and run away. Some days after I sold to a silver-smith the other bracelet, and for which he gave me seven dollars, and some reals, I gave the dollars to a priest, for prayers to be said for my poor mother. It was not long before my mistress knew of it, through the priest; she asked me where I had the money from, I told her, she wanted to know the name of the silver-smith, I said I did not know; she flew into a passion, "You will know then for what you are born, you cannot dispose of any thing without my consent." She then sent me to the Molino for the third time. Don Saturnino, the mayoral, inquired what I had done, I told him, very peevishly, and weeping, for I did not care for the consequences at that moment, but he pitied me, untied my arms, and sent me to his kitchen, with orders not to stir from there. At the end of ten days, he said to me, "As your mistress is coming to-morrow to breakfast here, to save appearances, I will put on you the fetters, and send you to work; but if she inquires whether you have been whipped, you must say, yes." Next morning, about nine, she sent for me, gave me a new suit of clothes; and when I went to him to deliver the coarse ones, with an angry tone, he said to me, "Now, mind what you are about; in less than two months you have been sent to me three times, and I have treated you kindly, endeavor to do your best not to come here again, if you do, you shall be treated severely; go to your mistress, go, and beware."—To be Continued.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

WHO IS THE SLAVEHOLDER?

Suppose the readers of the Non-slaveholder should form a stock company and raise sufficient capital to purchase a plantation at the South and stock it with Slaves, and also to erect a manufactory at the North, and establish a Store at New York or Philadelphia. They employ A. to superintend the plantation and raise the cotton, B. to take charge of the manufactory, and C. the Store, the stockholders go to the Store for their supplies, and purchase and use all the goods.

After a time suppose A. B. and C. buy out the stockholders and continue to superintend and carry on the business as heretofore, and the stockholders continue to purchase and use all the goods.

We will suppose again that after some years, A. B. and C. dissolve partnership, and divide the property. A. takes the plantation and Slaves, B. the manufactory, and C. the Store, and conduct the business exactly as before, and the purchasers and consumers of the goods are the same.

Although there have been changes of ownership in the above supposed cases, the condition of the Slave remains the same. I will therefore enquire—Does the commercial change remove the sin of slaveholding from one party and place it on another? Are the original stockholders and consumers less responsible for the continuance of Slavery in the last case than the first.

While non-slaveholders continue to buy and use all the products of slave labor, can we expect Slavery to cease? Who, then is the Slaveholder? W.

FREE LABOR IN TEXAS.

A correspondent of the New York Tribune, writing from Texas, gives a most interesting account of the settlement and operations of the Germans in that State. After stating their general repugnance to slavery, he says:—"In connexion with this subject, it should be mentioned that the inhabitants of New Braunfels have begun to raise cotton by their own personal labor. The trial, as may be expected, has first been made on a very small scale. After the first success in respect to climate and soil, which has been perfect, they have formed an association for that branch of agriculture, and this year they have produced 800 bales. The German settlers of other places have done the same, with the most satisfactory results. . . . If this movement continues, you will soon see, in this country, quite a number of small German farming communities raising southern staple produce by association."

Now this is very important indeed, and well worthy of the consideration of the friends of the Free Labour movement. Who cannot see what would be the result, if a large number of these communities should plant themselves in Texas, or in any other slave State? Each would be a leavening centre and substance of freedom, besides the amount of free-labor products they would add to the stock now in market. Those Germans will soon come to you, and their influence will be felt at the ballot-box in favor of freedom. If they can live and labor in Texas, they can do the same in Georgia or South Carolina.—Bond of Brotherhood.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, EIGHTH MONTH, 12, 1854.

WILLIAM FORSTER.*

Early in the 8th month 1844, William Forster sailed for France, on a religious mission to the cities and towns of Normandy, Brittany, and some of the more northerly parts of France and Belgium, first visiting the Channel Islands. In this service he was accompanied by Edmund Richards of Guernsey, and Henry Take.

His labors were most diligent, and, as we reverently believe, blessed to many souls. On the reading, in London Yearly Meeting, in 1845, of a minute of the Meeting for sufferings which brought this work of faith and labor of love into notice, Edmund Richards gave a succinct description thereof, respecting which the London Friend preserves the following record.

"He travelled much in parts remote from the great roads, amongst villages, in forests and fastnesses, with the people, whose descendants still profess the reformed religion, fled in former times for shelter from the persecution of their Catholic neighbors. In some of these the life is not extinct, the seed still germinates and strives to burst through the incubent mass of superstition. The profession, however, appears in many places to be a dead profession, nevertheless the door is open for the Christian laborer, and our Friends found themselves led in a remarkable manner, along the open way. Besides service of a purely religious nature, when in the towns they went from house to house, amongst the civic authorities, endeavoring to engage their minds on behalf of the abolition of slavery. These opportunities, in which they were always received with much urbanity, led sometimes to discourse upon our religious principles, and that again to communications in the line of the ministry. This visit is one of great importance, and of the deepest interest. That there exists in the secluded parts of France, a number of seeking persons, ready to welcome true spiritual religion, is a very encouraging circumstance; nor must we overlook the ground which has been gained on the subject of slavery."

At London Yearly Meeting of 1845, (just referred to,) a deep feeling was entertained relating to a difference which existed among Friends in Indiana, respecting the proper mode of action in reference to slavery, which had resulted in a secession, and the establishment of an organization by the name of "Anti-Slavery Friends." A weight of religious exercise pervaded the meeting, which led to the adoption of an exhortatory address to the seceding individuals, and it was believed to be right "that it should be entrusted to a deputation from the Yearly Meeting, who should attend the next Yearly Meeting of Indiana, and afterwards proceed in disposing of the address, as in the wisdom of Truth should seem best." Our departed friend and several others signified to the committee upon the subject their willingness to yield themselves to this arduous service, and the London Friend thus records their appointment:

"The meeting was brought into tender sympathy with the dear Friends who have offered themselves to become peace-makers in the body, and the Church laid her hands upon them, under the persuasion that it was the will of the Lord that they should be separated for this service; we believe we may add that the contriving, cementing influence of His presence and love was experienced, to the admiration of the meeting."

William Forster having retained possession of the certificate granted to him for religious service on the continent, and being still impressed with a sense of duty to return thither, crossed the channel to Calais, 6 mo. 21st, 1845,—again accompanied by his friend Edmund Richards, and was joined in a few days by Edward Backhouse, Jr. He accomplished his visit to the cities of the northern departments of France, holding many meetings, making religious family visits, visiting prisons, and various establishments both Papal and Protestant, being courteously received by the authorities and by influential individuals, although at Maubert Fontain, the gendarmes made an unsuccessful attempt to prevent the distribution of Scripture books. In this tour, our Friends circulated a large number of treatises on the unlawfulness of war, anti-slavery pamphlets, Friends' Tracts, and selections from the holy Scriptures. Among the persons of note who gave them a cordial reception were the Archbishops of Rheims and of Cambray, who showed great interest in the anti-slavery question, and most politely received books and tracts illustrative of the religious views of Friends. The former expressed his desire for the total abolition of the Slave Trade and Slavery, and declared himself a man of peace, quoting the Psalmist's words: "Scatter thou the people who delight in war."

They returned to England on the 31st of seventh month, and on the 23d of 8th month, William Forster embarked at Liverpool in the steamer Great Western, to bear the olive-branch across the mighty deep. His associates in this important mission to Indiana were our beloved and honored friends, Josiah Forster, George Stacey, and John Allen, of Liskeard.

The members of this christian embassy attended Indiana Yearly meeting, which convened on the 30th of the 9th month, where they were received with cordial sympathy and unity, a committee being appointed to give them any required information or assistance. They however proceeded alone to their work, in an inclement season of the year, visiting the objects of their solicitude in their settlements, in various parts of Indiana, Ohio, Illinois, and Iowa, convening the families in places where they came, and reading to them the Yearly Meeting Epistle, and adding such remarks as appeared at the time to be suitable. They visited many at their own houses, leaving copies of the Epistle with the heads of the families, but confining the circulation entirely to those to whom it was addressed. Amidst many hardships they were sustained by a holy confidence in the arm which led them forth, knowing this, that their labor was not in vain in the Lord. Following with a single eye their Divine Guide, turning not aside at the invitation or suggestion of any, they pursued their single object of christian charity in a manner so exemplary that they have left a safe and salutary example to any who may hereafter be engaged in similar mediatorial missions. Their christian circumspection throughout this engagement, and subsequently in reference to it, plainly evinced that they had sought availingly the wisdom which cometh from above. They were abundantly convinced that the course pursued was the only one which could in wisdom have been adopted, and they returned to their native land "with a renewed and deepened persuasion of the evils of division, and of the blessed effects of that unity in which our religious Society has so largely participated." Their labors of love, and the beautiful fruits thereof, will not be forgotten.

A minute of Indiana Yearly Meeting, expressive of Christian regard, sympathy and unity, with these dear friends, also certifies that the Gospel ministry, among them, of William Forster had been sound and edifying.

In the eighth month 1846, we find him engaged in a religious tour in Scotland.

In this and the following year William Forster performed the arduous and painful services in Ireland, of which we have already given a brief and inadequate account.

In 1849 the Yearly Meeting of London was deeply impressed with a religious concern (originating we believe in the mind of W. Forster,) to address upon the subject of Slavery the rulers and people of the nations professing Christianity. This remarkable and memorable document, drafted by our dear friend, was adopted by the Yearly Meeting, "the reading of it being accompanied with feelings of lively sympathy and of christian love towards all mankind." When the question arose as to the means which should be taken to present and circulate the Address, William Forster with much feeling offered himself as the Society's messenger in Europe, which offer received the cordial unity of Friends and was accepted with thankfulness. On the 19th of 7th month he left London upon this important undertaking, accompanied by our valued friends Josiah Forster and Peter Bedford. At different times, and accompanied by different Friends, he proceeded to deliver the address to nearly all the Sovereigns and governments of Europe, it being translated into the continental languages, and widely circulated among those in authority. How diligently he laboured,—with what earnest and persuasive eloquence he pleaded with the mighty ones of Earth on behalf of the down-trodden slave,—with what favor he was received,—and how remarkably his way was made for him, could be far better related by some of those faithful disciples who were his partners in the work, and who will, we trust, make contributions towards his fitting biography.

In the Spring of 1850 a rather unusual concern rested upon his mind,—which was, to hold meetings in the love of the Gospel with the various persons connected with the London Theatres of all descriptions. Although this engagement was a trial of faith, in prospect, both to William Forster and to his friends, yet it was satisfactorily accomplished, and the meetings were well attended, and were held in the power and to the honor of Truth.

About the close of the year 1851, we find W. Forster engaged in a religious visit to the meetings composing the general meeting of Dorset and Hants, and those of the Monthly Meetings of Somerset; and in the 7th month of the ensuing year he obtained the sanction of his Monthly Meeting to visit in the love of the Gospel the descendants of the Vaudois, in the valleys and on the mountains of Piedmont. In this journey he was accompanied by his valued and faithful friend William Holmes of Alton. The service was a toilsome one, our friend sometimes riding on mules, at other times walking for miles over the rugged mountains, that he might see the simple peasants in their humble cottage homes, when the plain but clear and powerful gospel message, delivered in the earnestness of Truth, often brought tears of tenderness and contrition to his deeply interested and attentive auditory.

*Like Paul he went from house to house,
And boldly preached the Word—
And many souls accepting it
Were added to the Lord.
While from his lips and from his heart
As onward he would pass,
Fell gentle benedictions
As showers upon the grass."*

Of this journey the following interesting passages have been kindly contributed by our esteemed friend who accompanied him.

"Our late dear friend William Forster left England on the 1st of the 10th Month, 1852, proceeded by way of Paris, Sens, Lyons, Geneva, and Turin, towards the valleys of Piedmont, where the Waldenses are located. At Sens, and Lyons, Wm. Forster sought out persons connected with the small Protestant congregations, and held a religious meeting with small companies of serious persons in each of these places. At Geneva he called on many serious persons, and an opportunity was afforded for an interview with the students of the Evangelical College, most of whom were intended for the ministry; our dear friend was much interested on behalf of these young men, and addressed them in a very impressive manner on the importance of living up to the principles which they professed.

"At Lyons, Wm. Forster and his companion were joined by a Friend from the South of France, who acted as an interpreter. On the 20th of 10th month the little party left Geneva and proceeded by the pass of Mount Cervin into Italy. It was a long and painful journey, but our dear friend bore with it with much composure, although greatly tried for want of sufficient accommodation in the public conveyance in which they travelled. W. F. had provided many books for distribution which were taken possession of on our entering the dominions of the King of Sardinia, with an understanding that they would be sent to Turin; he had some difficulty in regaining them, and only by undertaking that they should not be distributed to Catholics, which proved rather a source of trial to him, his benevolent intention regarding them being in degree frustrated. After a stay of about a week at Turin, which time was much occupied in obtaining information respecting the Vallies, we proceeded to La Tour, the principal Town in the Vaudois Parishes; it contains about 3000 inhabitants, one half of whom are Protestants; here the little party engaged rooms at the Hotel. A few days were occupied in making the acquaintance of the Moderator and the Professor of the College, and in obtaining information as to the best mode of proceeding with the concern of our dear friend who was received with much openness, and on the 1st day, the 31st of 10th Month he had his first meeting among this interesting people; the use of a school-room in La Tour was kindly allowed, and was well filled: the Moderator acted as Interpreter; he performed his office faithfully, though on some points views were set forth differing from his own.—The season having pretty far advanced, it was thought best to proceed towards the most distant parishes, which are in the Valley of St. Martin. One of the Professors of the College accompanied us to Pignerol to negotiate with a person for the printing of some little books in Italian. "The Lock and Key," "Life of John the Baptist," extracted from Scripture, and a Text Book; of each of these W. F. had a large addition struck off in the hope of getting them into circulation where he felt restricted from giving those books which he had a difficulty in passing at Turin.

"There were a few of the Vaudois living in and around Pignerol with whom a meeting was obtained; they assembled to the number of about 30 in our apartment at the Hotel, which was kept by one of their members. From this place we proceeded to Perosa, and soon called on the Pastor of Pomaret, who was very kind and well disposed to assist our dear friend in the object of his visit. The next parish was distant about 4 or 5 miles; having hired a mule and mountain cart to take our baggage, we set out on foot, and reached the house of the Pastor at Clos, where we took a little refreshment and then ascended the mountain side to the parish school, where we met an interesting company of persons, and our dear friend was enabled to deliver his Gospel message to the comfort of some present—it was a solid meeting.

"The approach to this meeting house was very difficult and extremely toilsome. W. F.'s nervous fear of a precipice was so great as to render the exertion extreme, the peasants looked on with astonishment, repeatedly telling him, there was no danger, the mountain path being to them no more than the side walk to us. Our dear friend's mind felt drawn to have a meeting on the next first day at a meeting house, high up on the opposite mountain, which our kind friends did not seem to encourage; we learned afterwards that W. F.'s state of timidity made them fearful—he however seemed decided, and here commenced the custom which was invariably adopted afterwards, his companions going before to survey the road, and to judge of the possibility of W. F.'s accomplishing it. Our opinion was that he could get to this spot, and we fixed for a meeting at 3 o'clock.

"The place was reached, but only by extreme exertion. It was truly instructive to see how our dear friend toiled to fulfil the requirements of his Divine Master.

"When we arrived, almost bathed in perspiration, we found the room was extremely damp, with a mud floor, and no glass in the windows, yet hot and fatigued as we were, we were preserved from taking cold. The meeting was attended by about 100 persons to whom the Gospel message was delivered. There are four Parishes further up the valley of St. Martin, about which W. F.'s mind became much exercised; it was a trial to him to give them up, but from information obtained, it did not appear safe to attempt them, the way being extremely precipitous, almost amounting to dangerous; we therefore retraced our steps our steps to Pomaret, and fixed to have a meeting there at 3 o'clock on 3d day the 9th of the 11th mo., which was pretty well attended, and proved a good meeting. The pastor of this parish was from home, and did not return till next day, when we called upon him and had a family sitting to much satisfaction. Our dear friend had similar service in nearly all the families of the Pastors which we were in, and many of these opportunities were tendering seasons. On leaving Pomaret we bent our way to St. Germain, where we met a large congregation of nearly 300 on the evening of the 11th, many serious persons were present, and our dear friend in an impressive manner invited them to a life of devotedness to Christ.

"At this place we were at the foot of the mountain where is the parish of Promolles, very high up, said to be the highest settlement of the Vandois. We explored the road, and though long and difficult, concluded to encourage our dear friend to make the attempt to reach it, and therefore fixed with the dear old Pastor for a meeting the next evening at seven. We set out for Promettes in the morning, and after a toilsome ascent of 2½ hours, our dear friend reached the village much fatigued, but he was most kindly cared for by our host and hostess, and after some refreshment and rest was quite equal to the meeting, which was well attended. Before leaving this interesting elderly couple, he had a very touching family opportunity with them and their interesting son, and we parted from them in much tenderness of feeling, proceeding thence on the 7th day morning to Pignerole, and on to La Tour in the evening. This little town was principally our head quarters during the remainder of our stay, going out occasionally for a night or two to visit the various parishes around. By the time we had been nearly six weeks in the valleys, visits to those parishes considered accessible had been paid. He had held meetings with the inhabitants of 11 out of the 15 parishes, yet the work assigned him did not seem wholly accomplished without attempting family visits to some of the most influential of the residents in La Tour and neighborhood. Much to his relief, there was great openness manifested to receive him, and very many sittings we had with such as his mind appeared drawn to; it was remarkable to see how the way opened for this service; in almost all instances we could not have experienced greater facilities for the service, had we been amongst the members of our own society.

These visits closed this part of his engagement, but our dear friend did not leave without taking an opportunity which presented to meet a number of the Pastors of different Parishes, to express the interest he felt in the welfare of this people; he had much open conversation with them on the subject of education, and manifested great feeling in regard to their poor, contributing towards the relief of some who were expected to suffer during the approaching winter. He felt much for the orphan children, and used considerable exertion to interest the Pastors in the establishment of a home for the destitute of this description, and through his representations a sum was raised in London for this object, and it is gratifying to know that an establishment now exists for this interesting class.

"We have reason to believe that our dear friend left a savor behind him, which will not soon be lost; his labors amongst this people were on the broad principles of Christianity. He appeared concerned to impress upon them the great importance of experimental religion. It will not do, he said, to depend on what our fathers were, and how much they suffered for the truth; we are called upon to show to those by whom we are surrounded, that Christ does really reign in our hearts, and that we are guided by His Spirit.

"He took much interest in a normal class attached to the College; some of these were very poor youths under training for teachers, he invited them to take a meal at the Hotel; and after this extension of hospitality, he counselled them, and encouraged them in their praiseworthy efforts to obtain an education, and very kindly aided the poorest by a gift of clothing. They are obliged to live hard; their parents are able to afford them very little help. The Vandois have two hospitals for the sick, these also claimed a share of our friend's interest and watchful care; he extended the word of caution or encouragement as he passed through them.

"Impressed with the importance of furnishing the young people with suitable reading, much of his time towards the close of the visit, was occupied in selecting and making up packets of books for each of the District Schools, and some to add to their Parish Libraries.

"Our dear friend left the Vallies on 4th day the 15th of 12th mo: and proceeded to Turin, where he made some stay, and returned home by Genoa and the south of France, arriving in England about the middle of the 2d month.

FRUIT OF THE SYSTEM.—SLAVE PIRACY CASE.—A large demand existing for the produce of Slave labor, men of principle according to their interest of course are induced to obtain slaves. Some breed them from their own loins, and among this number rank sundry Statesmen of renown—others purchase their neighbors' children, some kidnap the free citizens of Pennsylvania, Ohio, or other States, but Captain Donald, late of the Ship Grey Eagle, furling his sails and made direct for Africa, constructed a Slave deck on his outward passage, and at an African Port called Cajada, took on board (for the accommodation of the consumers of slave grown Sugar, Cotton, &c.) 604 negroes, 250 of whom were women. Fifteen of these died on the voyage and a number of recruits were born on board. Under the protection of a bribed police they were landed on Terra Firma, (for the benefit of some of our readers,) and the crew, after having been concealed awhile in a sugar loft, were each paid $450—besides their regular wages. Captain Donald has since been subjected to a pretty severe trial of his faith and patience by some of the individuals who were zealous promoters of other modes of obtaining slaves, and (what makes his case still harder) by some of the class (i.e. slave produce consumers) whose convenience he hazarded his life and soiled his soul to advance. He has been committed, to take his trial in tenth month next. His offence is a capital one by the laws of the same body which enacted the Fugitive Bill. Consumers of Slave Produce,—lend your sympathy to a martyr in your cause! Did he brave the perils of the sea and the burning sun of Africa? It was for you he did it. Did he chastize 604 of God's children? It was for you. Did he sneak into ambush to escape detection? He did it as your representative. Did he quail before Marshals and Deputy Marshals, whose mode of catching slaves is so dissimilar? It was all for your sakes.—Will he be suspended from the gallows, as the law directs? He will hang there as your substitute, and you will read the account of his execution, with his last speech and dying confession, eased perhaps from head to foot in the conveniences which he has cheapened for you, and as you stir the sugar in your coffee, you will comment upon the laudable activity of Marshal Wynkoop and others, who exposed and brought to punishment an uncompromising sinner, who in such a wholesale manner attempted to compete with them in the business of catching negroes.

DON'T VOTE RECKLESSLY.—The time is at hand when millions of professed republicans will give their votes for men to carry on in their name the machinery of government. But there will be a few preliminaries. First, in the various localities, a few dictators of the respective parties meet in caucuses and agree upon a plan by which their private wishes may obtain a popular air and seem to be the will of the party. Then a public primary meeting is held, in a tavern, and a ticket is formed of persons who, it is thought, will run well. Run well with whom? With the quiet, orderly exemplary citizens who rarely attend these meetings? No indeed. The votes of these men are regarded as secure,—it will be easy to convince them that our ticket is not so bad as that of the other party, and that it is their duty to "choose the least of two evils." The ticket must be made up with men who will run well among the border savages who may be bought over to either party by personal influences, by hopes of patronage, or by rum. The ticket being thus formed of men unfit to wield the responsibilities of office,—as a general rule, the best men of the respective parties vote the tickets solid, and the worst men select from each ticket the men most like themselves, and the latter turn the scale.

When the election is over and the successful candidates enter upon their duties, or, rather, upon their avocations, their consideration is, not—How shall we best promote the public interests?—but,—How shall we best promote the success of our party, and our own re-election next year? And thus the perpetual aim is, to please and to enter to the class of citizens whose moral sense is the least developed.

At the coming election, the Temperance idea ought to be prominent with all patriots. It is essential to the public weal to have legislators favorable to Prohibitory Law,—Judges and Magistrates who have sense and principle enough to carry it out. Sheriffs, Constables, and other subordinate officers, ought to be right upon this subject, both in theory and in practice. The man who votes for candidates who will help to perpetuate the Rum Traffic, has no right to expect his son or his son-in-law to be a sober man, and he will pray with less unction to his Father in Heaven, for the reformation of drunkards.

LITERARY NOTICES.

MEMOIRS OF JOSEPH JOHN GURNEY, WITH SELECTIONS FROM HIS JOURNAL AND CORRESPONDENCE. EDITED BY JOSEPH BEVAN BRATHWAITE. Philadelphia, Lippincott, Grambo and Co., 2 vols.

"The memory of the just is blessed." These were the first words we ever heard from the lips of that truly great and good man, and they often recur to us when his idea is presented. It was a most extraordinary character. A man of high worldly connections with all the circumstances at hand that could give access to the fleeting glories of time and the allurements of earthly ambition, he meekly and righteously renounced the pomps and vanities of a wicked world, and chose the good part which could not be taken from him. Endowed by his Creator with high intellectual powers, he dedicated them unreservedly, to the service of his Lord. A man of high learning, and, as Lord Morpeth said of him, "authority upon any subject," he continued to the last a learner in the School of Christ: not considering himself to have apprehended, but pressing forward toward the mark, counting all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus our Lord. A man of large wealth—he trusted not in his riches—but as a good steward of the manifold gifts of God, the cause which he knew not, he searched out, he was a friend to the friendless, a father to the orphan—he made the heart of many a widow leap for joy. Honoring the Lord with his substance, and abundantly faithful in the "unrighteous mammon," he whose hand is full of blessings and who giveth gifts unto men, entrusted to him the true riches, and eminently commissioned him, as a minister of Christ, to testify the gospel of the grace of God.

Like Daniel of old, he was a "man greatly beloved," and in a large measure of the spirit of one greater than Daniel, he "went about doing good." He abounded in good works—yet, after he had done all, in the depth of humility he made the just acknowledgment that he was an unprofitable servant,—for although, like the apostle, he could do all things through Christ strengthening him, yet he knew that he had no power of his own, that all merit resides in the Saviour, to whom he ascribed all the glory of his own works, and at whose feet he laid every crown,—saying

"Take the kingdom, it is thine.
King of Kings, and Lord of Lords!"

Rarely, if ever, have we known of one whose faith was more complete, or who was more "free from the tendency of narrow minds to hold the truth in parts." It is not surprising that some with less enlightened views, whilst he was endeavoring to stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ had made him free, should unjustly charge him with being an inconsistent member of a Church, which, while it is peculiarly restricted by the limitations of Truth, affords ample scope for the full development of the christian character, and for the exercise of all those gifts which God bestows upon chosen instruments for purposes of His own glory. The spirit of Quakerism is not sectarian; sectarianism is a direct violation of it. There are sectaries however, on the list of its members, (such as, in every church organization, pervert the right way of the Lord) and some of these shot at him and sorely grieved him—but his bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong by the hands of the Mighty God of Jacob. And thus were developed the most beautiful perfections of his character. Not rendering railing for railing, but contrariwise blessing, he maintained unflinching love to those who by illogical and false criticisms of his voluminous and invaluable writings, sought to father upon him doctrinal views which he did not hold, and to deny his belief in the doctrines which were dear to his heart, and which he set forth and advocated with remarkable clearness in the demonstration of the spirit and with power. Joseph John Gurney was a sound Quaker from thorough conviction, and is recognized as such by the great body of the Society of Friends. From none of the fifteen propositions of Barclay (which comprise the whole code of our Society's belief) did he dissent, and the leading points of Quakerism he has expounded and demonstrated so ably, that a debt of gratitude is due to his Master and Inspirer for the service thus rendered to his people.

But whilst he was truly a Quaker, he was in the fullest sense, an enlightened member of the universal Church, and extended the right hand of fellowship to christians, of every denomination, who loved the Lord Jesus in sincerity.

The biography of this extraordinary man is on our table, and it is before the world. We purposely abstain at the present time from analyzing its pages—but we heartily commend it to the perusal of all our readers.

The text on the title page is one which Joseph John Gurney had himself selected as a motto for some of the earlier volumes of his Journal. Of its peculiar applicability no one can doubt, who had the privilege of his intimate acquaintance.

"Herein do I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offence toward God and toward men." Acts xiv. 16.

BURRITT'S BOND OF BROTHERHOOD.

We have often marked passages which we desired to extract from this excellent Monthly, but they have generally been crowded out. It is a periodical which we would like everybody to subscribe for and peruse, who can appreciate those things which are pure, lovely, and of good report. It is permeated with a heavenly spirit. It is dedicated to the Brotherhood of Man and the Fatherhood of God. THE BOND OF BROTHERHOOD! How suggestive is the name of ideas which we ought to take to our hearts and cherish there! In the highest and true sense, this Bond is the Peace secured by the "unity of the Spirit," among those who, are "joined unto the Lord," and who because "the love of the Father" is in them, love, with pure hearts, fervently, their brother also. "I know," said the Apostle, "that I have passed from death unto life, because I love the brethren." And when we see among religionists, schisms, divisions, jealousies, shyness, party spirit,—whatever may be the alleged pretexts or points of difference, we feel assured that the bond of brotherhood is wanting—that there is a melancholy and a culpable deficiency in love to the Father and love to the brethren. Let all who find themselves deficient in this true and essential charity, although they may give their goods to feed the poor—though they may be sound in theological faith—though they may have a redundancy of zeal which would "give the body to be burned"—betake themselves to prayer—they are yet in their sins—they have not passed from death unto life.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

"WHOSO GIVES THE MOTIVE MAKES HIS BROTHER'S SIN HIS OWN."

I wear an easy garment,
O'er it no toiling Slave
Wept tears of hopeless anguish,
On his passage to the grave.
And from its ample folds
Shall rise no cry to God,
Upon its warp and woof shall be
No stain of tears and blood.
Oh, lightly shall it press my form,
Unladen with a sigh,
I shall not mind its rustling hear,
Some sad despairing cry.
This fabric is too light to bear
The weight of bonds men's tears,
I shall not on its texture trace
The agony of years.
Too light to bear a smother'd sigh,
From some lone woman's heart,
Whose only wreath of household love
Is rudely torn apart.

Then lightly shall it press my form,
Unburden'd by a sigh;
And from its seams and folds shall rise,
No voice to pierce the sky,
And witness at the throne of God,
In language deep and strong,
That I have nerv'd Oppression's hand,
For deeds of guilt and wrong.

FRANCIS ELLEN WATKINS.

FIFTH ANNUAL REPORT

Of the Board of Managers of the Free Produce Association of Friends of Ohio Yearly Meeting.

It is not without feelings of encouragement, that the labors of our Association have not been in vain, that the Managers again bring forward their annual report. The past year has been marked by evidences of greater advancement, among honest and serious minded persons, of our testimony against the use of the products of Slavery, than many which have preceded it.

Your Board has not been idle, but has, with one exception, met monthly, as will be seen by the minutes; and labored as way opened and means were afforded, for the furtherance of correct views on the interesting objects for which we are associated; and it is with peculiar satisfaction we record, that from time to time, we have been cheered by the appearance in the field of new and earnest advocates of the cause we have felt it our duty to espouse.

The Non-Slaveholder, which we in accordance with the recommendation of the annual meeting two years ago, aided in reviving, still labours in our cause; and, although it is to be regretted that its pages are not more exclusively devoted to the objects of our Association,* yet it contains many excellent and powerful articles on the sub-

* Whether this "is to be regretted" is decided quite differently by other Judges. The N. S. has been quite as much devoted to the important and sacred object of the said Association, as its Editor ever intended, or ever gave his subscribers reason to expect. His intention was explicitly set forth in the first No. of each volume, and upon no other terms would he even have taken into con-

ject, and we rejoice to say, has obtained a respectable circulation. The Board subscribed for 40 copies, and directed them forwarded to persons in different parts of the country, where we thought they would be servicable to the cause.

We have also printed and circulated 5000 small tracts of a single leaf each, and a few cards, and have now printed for distribution 15,000 pages of tracts, which had been previously stereotyped. We are also gratified to learn, that our friends at Salem have re-printed and circulated about 5000 of our leaves. It has also been gratifying to notice, that Friends' Review, the Oberlin Evangelist, and the Columbian, of Columbus, Ohio, have each published some excellent articles in favor of abstinence from the gain of oppression, and in support of a clean and consistent testimony against Slavery. Through the Oberlin Evangelist the arguments contained on our published leaves have obtained a wide circulation, and have been responded to by the correspondents of that paper with approbation, being characterized as incontrovertible; and a determination expressed, "God being their help, never to taste or wear any more of the sugar or cotton, in the production of which Slaves have wept, groaned, and been scourged." We are cheered by the fact, that in the Oberlin Collegiate Institute this testimony has been embraced by most of the faculty and students, and will thus be disseminated throughout the land, by the most extensive, earnest, and powerful agency. We have recently received through that medium the gratifying intelligence, that a meeting has just been held in the City of New York—to consider the propriety of organizing a National Free Produce Association.—Of the result of that meeting we are not yet informed.

Several English periodicals have also been considered the request that he should edit the Journal. In every number the non-participant idea has been prominently presented, and the variety which has been blended has served to carry the principles of the Free Produce Associations to the minds of many, who would not have been readers of an exclusively one-sided paper. We are glad of the laudable efforts of our Ohio Friends to increase the circulation of the Non-Slaveholder,—simply because in so doing they have promoted the cause of Philanthropy, (our pecuniary interests have been in no sense advanced thereby) and with a subscription list more than three times as large as the N. Slaveholder ever before enjoyed, we shall continue, during the short time we may be willing to wield the editorial pen, to listen respectfully to reasonable suggestions, whilst we must retain our prerogative of an independent judgment.—Ed.

found advocating correct views on this subject, and our indefatigable advocate of Peace, Elihu Burritt, is giving it increased attention.

It is much encouragement to us, that we are not laboring alone, but that our sister Associations in Philadelphia and New York Yearly Meetings, and one within the limits of Indiana Yearly Meeting, are still actively engaged for the advancement of the same laudable object.

It is also a satisfaction to us, that Friends generally within our own Yearly Meeting, are feeling more and more interest in, and sympathy with this testimony; and throughout the very large Yearly Meeting of Indiana, embracing Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and a great part of Ohio, a very large portion of Friends are becoming deeply interested, and would be glad of an opportunity to abstain from the sin-polluted commodities, which are the fruits of unrequited toil.

On the other hand it is a matter of deep regret, that so many Friends, especially in the more Eastern States, where they are more intimately connected with the system of Slavery by commerce and manufactures, are so blinded by interest and prejudice, that they are unable to see that their orders to the Southern States for Cotton, Sugar and Rice, are only so many stimulants to the cruel and remorseless task-master, to renewed energy in extorting from the sorrowing and helpless slave, writhing under the gory lash, to produce at the lowest possible rate, the articles necessary to fill those orders.

Notwithstanding the force of custom and the power of prejudice, we find but few sincere, honest-hearted Christians, willing to acknowledge, when the subject is fairly presented and pressed home to them, that there is a direct connexion between Slavery and the proceeds of Slave labor; that an active market for the productions of the system stimulates the producers, and hence those who purchase these productions are to a greater or less extent, accountable for the existence of Slavery, and responsible for all the barbarities inseparably connected with the system.

A difficulty has heretofore been found in procuring a suitable supply of Free Labor Goods. This difficulty will doubtless, in some measure continue, as the demand for such goods is rapidly increasing, particularly in the west—but it is with peculiar satisfaction that we recur to the fact that through the instrumentality of the friends of Free Labor in Philadelphia, funds have been obtained to enable G. W. Taylor to fit up a factory, to manufacture exclusively Free Labor goods; and that it is the intention to use the machinery a part of the time, in manufacturing the finer goods made of wool and cotton, which have heretofore not been in the market.

We rejoice too that the western Free Produce manufacturing company at Cincinnati, have also machinery in operation producing the heavier articles of cotton goods.

The high tariff on foreign sugar is much in the way of producing that article at the price of the slave grown product. While it becomes the friends of free labor to endeavor to have that difficulty removed, the difference in price should by no means deter them from wholly abstaining from that which is the price of blood.

The difference in the price of the articles is a bribe offered to buy us to the side of the oppressor—"Let every honest person spurn the bribe."

We record with pleasure the abolition of Slavery in the Republic of Venezuela, by which a large portion of the population was liberated from bondage, and placed in immediate possession of the rights of citizenship. As that large and fertile country includes among its staples, coffee, cotton and Indigo, another facility is thus added to the means of supplying ourselves, with articles in daily use, upon which the markets have been mainly dependent upon countries where Slavery exists.

On the other hand it is with sorrow we refer to the repeal by the American Congress of the Act excluding Slavery from the North Western territory. This concession to the power of Slavery, made in the middle of the nineteenth century, by a nation claiming to stand in the front ranks of Christianity and civilization, is indeed cause for the deepest regret and humiliation. Yet even this deed, however sinful in itself, may, by the overruling Providence of God, be made to hasten the downfall of that system of wickedness it was designed to support and extend. Accordingly we find it has already aroused and deepened the Anti-Slavery feeling throughout the nation; even conservatism, which was formerly enlisted on the side of oppression, has by this act been thrown in opposition, and thousands of those who were for "letting Slavery alone," when they see the system extending and strengthening itself over the land consecrated to freedom, will no longer remain idle, but will unite with the tried friends of the Slave for the overthrow of Slavery, and the elevation of our colored brethren to their proper rights as citizens. Hence we see that the Legislature of Connecticut has already by a large majority granted to her colored citizens the right to be heard through the ballot-box—and a very large proportion of the political press throughout the country has spoken out boldly, and arrayed itself firmly in opposition to the extension of Slavery.

These indignant feelings are again deepened and strengthened by the workings of the Act known as the "Fugitive Slave Law." These wicked acts of our national Legislature will undoubtedly be the means of arraying hundreds of thousands, permanently on the side of Liberty and Justice to the whole human family; thereby furnishing another instance of the manner in which the Ruler of rulers, can "make the wrath of man to praise Him."

While the sad truths, that deeds of sore oppression are doing in our land, that all of suffering and degradation we would dread to share, and all we abhor in a life of tyranny and sin, continue to mark our history with such deep wrong and fearful iniquity—fall with oppressive weight upon our spirits, shall we fail to do what it is the duty of every enlightened accountable being to do, endeavoring to lessen human suffering and to advance the cause of "truth and righteousness in the earth." Were our own beloved ones, for whose happiness we cherish the most tender desires and solicitude, bound in Slavery's dread chains, should we then have any time to spend idly? Should we then be indifferent to the exercise of tyrant power, or to what may appear to be even the most humble course of action, which may have a bearing and influence upon the existence and force of that power?—But wrong whether done to those we know not, or to those of our own household or kindred band, whether perpetrated against those of a lighter or darker complexion is the same. Why then should we not be enlisted with all our powers in efforts for the amelioration of the sufferings of Africa's pleading children—how can we endure the thought of a participation in the cause of their enslavement? "There must be something wrong," while we deem we may pass along the way of life "at ease in our full possessions," without regarding the Lord's suffering poor; when our exertions are not put forth to rescue the slave from the deep pit of degradation into which he is sunk:—deprived by force of all the pleasant things of life—deprived of the Bible—of all the high privileges of intellectual enjoyment—in short of all things in which we so much delight. Let us remember it is said, "he that shutteth his ears from the cry of the poor and needy, shall cry himself, and shall not be heard."

In conclusion, let us, dear friends, exhort one another to more faithfulness; let us endeavor, if possible, to labor with clean hands—let our example correspond with our profession—let us not be a stumbling block to others, and above all, let us remember that in all our labor for down-trodden humanity, we are but unprofitable servants—but instruments which the Lord may be pleased to make use of, for the furtherance of His holy designs, and that we have no cause for uncharitable feelings towards those who do not appreciate our labors. But let us labor in the Lord's time, for it is His work, and He alone is able to bless our efforts, and enable us to labor acceptably in His vineyard.

JUAN PLACIDO—THE CUBAN POET.

I went to my mistress, and threw myself at her feet, she bade me get up, and ordered a good breakfast for me; but I could not eat anything, my heart was uneasy; Havana, with all the happy days I enjoyed there, was continually in my mind, and my only wish was to go thither. My mistress observed with wonder my not eating breakfast, particularly of some nice stew she ordered for me: the truth is, that she could not do without me for a length of time, and this was the reason that my journeys to the Molino never exceeded nine or ten days, and although she struck me so often, and degraded me, calling me always the worst of all the Creoles born in the Molino, I was still attached to her, and shall never forget the care she had taken on my education.

After this she treated me with more kindness: she allowed me to go a fishing, which was my most pleasant amusement. Next morning my mistress went to the house of the Senora Gomez, where they played at cards, and it was my duty to stand behind her chair all the time: if she was a winner I carried home the money bag, and when I delivered it to her she put her hand into it and gave me some. She was much pleased, when she saw me making myself a pair of trousers, which I learned myself; for since the idea of freedom took possession of my mind, I endeavored to learn every thing useful to me: I invented many fancy things in my leisure hours, though these were few, I took sheets of paper, and doubling them in different shapes and forms, I turned them into various shapes as flowers, pine-apples, shells, fans, epaulettes, and many more things, for which I was praised by everybody. As my mistress treated me with a little more kindness, I insensibly began to be more calm, my heart more composed, and to forget her late harsh behaviour towards me. I began to be as comfortable as ever; in a word, I thought myself already free, and waited only to be of age; this hope encouraged me to learn many useful things, so that if I should not be a slave I should earn an honest livelihood. At this time I wrote a great many sonnets. Poetry requires an object, but I had none to enflame my breast, this was the cause of my verses being nothing else than poor imitations. I was very anxious to read every book or paper that fell in my way, either at home or in the streets, and if I met with any poetry I learnt it by heart, in consequence of this, I could recite many things in poetry. Besides, when my mistress had company at dinner, and that was almost every day, she had always some poet invited who recited verses and composed sonnets extempore; I had in a corner of the room some ink in an egg-shell and a pen, and while the company applauded and filled their glasses with wine, away I went to my corner, and wrote as many verses as I could remember.

Three or four months after this, as my mistress was unwell, she was advised to go to a bathing town of Madruga to bathe; with her complaint she turned cross and peevish; she reproached my having disposed of my mother's trinkets, having five brothers, and that that was robbery, and that if I was put in possession of

of the inheritance, I soon would lose it in gambling, and she was continually threatening me with the Molino and with Don Saturnino, whose last words were imprinted on my heart, and I had no wish to pay him another visit. With the belief that if I could go to Havana I would have my liberty, I inquired the distance and was told twelve leagues, which I could not reach on foot in one night; I then dropt for the present that idea, waiting for a better opportunity. It was my custom to clean myself and change twice a week, and one day before dressing I went to bathe in a bath, thirty yards distant; while in the bath my mistress called me, in an instant I dressed myself and was before her, "What were you doing in the bath? Who gave you liberty to go? Why did you go?" were her angry inquiries, and with her fist she made my nostrils bleed profusely; all this happened at the street-door, and before all the people, but what confused me more was, that there lived a young mulatto girl, of my own age, the first who inspired me with love, a thing I did not feel before; or rather I loved her as a sister, and our intercourse was kept up by some little presents from one to another, and I told her that I was free. About ten o'clock, my mistress ordered my shoes to be taken off and my head shaved, after which I was commanded to carry water for the use of the house, with a large barrel upon my head; the brook was distant thirty yards with a declivity towards it from the side of the house; I went, filled the barrel, and with some help I put it upon my head, I was returning up the little hill, when my foot missed, and down I went upon my knee, the barrel falling a little forward came rolling down, struck against my chest, and down both tumbled in the brook. My mistress said, "that is a trick of yours to evade work," she threatened me with the Molino and Don Saturnino, which name had a magic effect upon me, and I began to think seriously about escaping to Havana. The following morning when all the people were at church, a free servant called me aside, and in a whisper said to me, "my friend, if you suffer it is your fault; you are treated worse than the meanest slave; make your escape, and present yourself before the Captain-General at Havana, state your ill treatment to him, and he will do you justice;" at the same time showing me the road to Havana.

At eleven o'clock, I saw Don Saturnino arrive at the house; from this moment my heart beat violently, my blood was agitated, and I could not rest, I trembled like a leaf, my only comfort at that moment was the solitude of my room, there I went; and there I heard the servants talking together, one was inquiring of the other the reason of the coming of Don Saturnino. "Why," said the other, "to take away Juan F." This was more than I could endure, a general trembling took possession of my limbs, and my head ached very much. I fancied myself already in the hands of Don Saturnino, leading me away tied like the greatest criminal—from this moment I determined on my escape. I left my room with this determination, when I met again the same servant, who said to me, "Man take that horse from the stable, and leave him outside, for fear that Don Saturnino may want him in the night, you will make too much noise, and will disturb your mistress—here are the spurs, take them, and there is the saddle, and so you will know where to find every thing." And then he gave me such a look as quite convinced me that, he advised me to take the opportunity, and not lose it. I was hesitating, yet I did not like to leave behind me my brothers, and then I was afraid to travel a whole night through roads unknown to me, and alone, and in danger of falling in with any commissary of police; but what was my surprise, when after supper, as I was sitting on a bench by myself, meditating about what to do, Don Saturnino came to me, and asked, "Where do you sleep?" I pointed to him the place and he went away; this entirely determined me to make my escape—he might have made the inquiry with a good intention, but I could not consider it but with great suspicion. I remembered at that moment the fate of one of my uncles, who in a case like mine, took the same determination of escaping to Havana, to Don Nicolas, Don Manuel, and the Senor Marques and was brought back again like a wild wild beast—but for all that I resolved to venture on my escape, and in case of detection, to suffer for something. I waited till twelve o'clock. That night everybody retired early, it being very cold and rainy. I saddled the horse for the first time in my life, put on the bridle, but with such trembling that I hardly knew what I was about, after that I knelt down, said a prayer, and mounted the horse. When I was going away, I heard the sound of a voice saying, "God bless you, make haste." I thought that nobody saw me, but as I knew afterwards, I was seen by several of the negroes, but nobody offered any impediment to my flight.—To be Continued.

For the Non-Slaveholder.

DIALOGUE ON SLAVERY.

W. As far as thou hast noticed, do the slaves have any religious instruction?

H. In some portions of the extreme Southern States, the planters encourage missionaries to visit their negroes. This they do, not with a particular regard to the spiritual welfare of their slaves, but under an impression that judicious missionary labor, is calculated to make them better servants, by inculcating the doctrine of obedience. And really one might suppose from the way in which this doctrine is dwelt upon, and enforced, and from the frequent allusions to the injunction, "Servants be obedient unto your masters," that it would have this tendency. The missionary, or stationed minister (as the case may be,) preaches submission to the negroes, gives them to understand that slavery is sanctioned by the book of books, and then sits down with his patron to a table groaning beneath the avails of unrequited labor; after which he goes home to enquire how his own negroes have behaved in his absence. I knew of one preacher, who was married to his third wife, from whom it was reported that he had separated. This, however, proved not to be the fact. He had not parted from his wife, but had merely quarrelled with her, about the treatment of some of her negroes. He whipped them severely, and then put pepper and salt upon their raw backs. To the latter operation she demurred, and this caused the difficulty between them.

Negroes are permitted to join the Church under the supervision of their white brethren. Upon being received into the society, it is customary for the members to give them the hand of fellowship, and on such occasions the "black brother" (or sister,) receives from most of the church members, the first and last shake of the hand, with which he is ever favored by them.

The minister to whom I have alluded, upon taking a negro into the water to baptize him, would raise his eyes towards heaven, stretch forth his arm, and with a sanctimonious tone of voice exclaim, "Ethiopia shall stretch forth her hand to God." Had he known the full force and meaning of those words, had he understood that in the dispensation of him who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, Ethiopia was even now stretching forth her hands to God, he would have paused ere he used them.—Yes—Ethiopia, down-trodden, her face in the dust, and her limbs in chains, is stretching forth her hands to God, exclaiming in agony, "How long? oh, Lord, how long?" And so surely as he is a prayer hearing God, so surely the day of her redemption draweth nigh. Human vision may not perceive it. The clouds which loom up in the horizon of freedom, may so darken the prospect, that at times the star of hope seems hid from the view; but he who led the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt, will yet break the bonds and let the oppressed go free.

AMERICAN SLAVERY, ITS CAUSE AND THE REMEDY.—No. 2.

Having in a former communication (page 12,) endeavored to show that purchasers and consumers of the productions of Slavery, are in a great measure accountable for the system on account of the demand which they create for those productions, I propose now further to examine the support thereof, and see what other classes will appear accountable.

It is generally conceded that Slavery is contrary to the principles of justice, and to the common law which is founded thereon—that it is therefore, necessarily upheld and supported by law. Hence law-makers are accountable—but who are the law-makers? "What we do by another we do ourselves." Then the sovereign people in this democratic country are the law-makers. Although we do not make the law ourselves, we make them by agents, whom we select by our votes. Hence all those who vote for Slaveholders, or for persons who use their influence in support of any law upholding Slavery, or making any distinction in regard to color, are, to a greater or lesser extent, accountable for this national crime.

But there is another power even stronger than law, which supports both Slavery and law. I allude to PUBLIC OPINION. Public opinion must generally coincide with law, or the law will become a dead letter on the statute book. This is abundantly proven by the fact, that there are many laws on our statute books that are seldom or never enforced. Public opinion indeed makes law, both by controlling the ballot-box, and by encouraging those who are chosen as Legislators. Hence public opinion is accountable for Slavery. But what makes public opinion? In a Christian community, the professors of Christianity give direction to it—in short the religion of a country forms its public opinion.

In America there are undoubtedly two millions of persons who know Slavery to be wrong, and who desire its discontinuance. This would have a great effect upon public opinion, if in all their actions they lived in opposition to Slavery, but these professed friends of freedom, whilst they are talking against Slavery, are at the same time directly giving support thereto, by purchasing and using its products—thus in a great measure neutralizing or counteracting the effect they wish, and ought to produce upon public opinion. Here we find them accountable for the continuance of Slavery, inasmuch as they fail to give proper direction to public opinion.

There are also a great number of professors, who, being accustomed to look upon Slavery in its milder forms, feel but little opposition to it—indeed, rather look upon it as a necessary evil; they have their influence in forming public opinion, and are in a great measure accountable.

There is another class of citizens to which I wish to call especial attention, as being accountable for the position of the last mentioned class, and as forming one of the strong bulwarks of Slavery, and one which is overlooked by many. I allude to the pious Slaveholders—those who treat their slaves well—many of whom are much concerned for their own and their slaves' temporal and spiritual welfare. It is, in my opinion, the example of these otherwise perhaps, pious, consistent Christians, that prevents the public opinion of community from being immediately aroused in earnest opposition to Slavery. These Slaveholders—many of whom doubtless desire to do their best, are forming a connecting link between Slavery in its worst and natural character, and liberty, in such a manner as to withdraw the attention of a large portion of the Christian community from the legitimate fruits of Slavery. If all Slaveholders were of the most wicked character, public opinion would not long tolerate Slavery in our nation.

It is just so with drunkenness—moderate drinkers encourage the drunkard, and withdraw public attention from the evil. If there were no moderate drinkers public opinion would not long tolerate the evils of drunkenness.

There is usually in a community, a portion who have to be restrained from crime by the arm of law. This law is made by public opinion. Our aim should be to set public opinion right. But these pious Slaveholders, by their example hold a veil that prevents people generally from seeing the real character of Slavery. Hence the mild—the kind—the Christian slaveholders are in a very great measure accountable for Slavery in its worst forms and most cruel practices.

The remedy then would seem to be to hold a faithful mirror before this class, that they may see the real position they occupy; and the same benevolent feeling which prompts their kindness towards the Slaves, will in due time induce them to cease to be Slaveholders. Then will the veil be withdrawn, and Slavery in her naked loathsomeness can be seen by the whole Christian community, and public opinion will tolerate it no longer in our land.

The foregoing remarks are not made with a censorious feeling—but with a sincere desire, that we may all candidly and earnestly examine which way our influence tends. Whether we are each of us doing our part in behalf of suffering humanity, and whether, in endeavoring to remove Slavery, we are directing our attention to its real supports.

ENDORSEMENTS OF SOUTHERN PAPER.

Many people who apparently mean well, seem to estimate the character of Slavery by its public approval; others from the sanction of long practice, others from its supposed promotion of their convenience and interest—others again in their estimate are governed by educational influences, and others by the law of the land. Hence the man who is robbed of his most sacred rights, and even of himself, has few advocates, as few are disposed to consider and espouse the Slave's cause on its own merits.

The odious unjust enslavement of the colored man, and his posterity in the United States, has long been deemed legal, yet this imparts not a particle of justice to the outrage, and such law entitled to no weight in favour of the system of Slavery, especially when the same government has solemnly enumerated among the inalienable rights of all men, "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," and has declared that the end and aim of the government was to establish justice, and secure the blessings of liberty—not Slavery.)

Why then should not Slavery be, by good men and Christians, spoken against and detested with the same abhorrence as if practiced contrary to law? It should—but this is far from being the case. The law is a powerful shield against the reprobation of the system. For example, suppose an American to be kidnapped by the Arabs, and when once in possession, their laws should recognize him and his posterity as their slaves—would the legality of the act, produce any abatement of its detestation by us? Not in the least! Law cannot alienate inalienable rights, and as it is impossible for the law to impair the slaves rights, so it is with public approval, custom, education, interest and the like;—however powerful,—they cannot impart the least justice to the act, and with the impartial these things cannot tend to give the system countenance or support.

The law tolerating Slavery in many respects, has had a binding influence upon the moral perception of the People—for, in a legal point of view, Slavery cannot be called man-stealing, robbery, invasion of rights, oppression, tyranny, &c. These acts in the eye of the law are criminal, and to them severe penalties are attached. Were the system placed on our statute books in its appropriate category, in agreement with its hideous character, the name, even, would be repulsive to the feelings of most people:—but the system has been denominated "Slavery," and over this dress has recently been thrown the less offensive term, "peculiar institution." These expressions, only indicate to many minds, the existence of a system of legalized servitude, of a certain class or race of men, very much suited to their condition, and ignorance, which will only be removed when this adaptation shall cease to exist from their improved condition. Thus we see the base act of chattelizing a man, and treating him as a beast of burden, is considered as only one of the imperfections of society, and demanding no more notice, if as much, as any little infringement upon the political or property rights of any of the white inhabitants. Let the claim of property in man be stripped of the false coloring, and clothing, with which it is invested by popularity, pride, prejudice, covetousness, and the government, and who would be willing to stoop so low as to give countenance or aid, to an act clearly seen to be worse than highway robbery? Certainly, not the humane, good, and wise. And it may be remarked, that these false colorings, have least influence upon those, in whose hearts the elements of goodness and wisdom least exist.

The Slave's claim to liberty is a valid one, at all times and places—consequently his Master's claim upon him is spurious. Now, does not the man, who knowingly, without necessity, purchases directly, or indirectly of the Master, the produce of his slave's labor, make the most practical and valid endorsement of the Master's right to his slave? And who has a capacity to estimate the sum of these endorsements, and their amount of countenance and aid given to Slavery, even by those who would despise the idea of holding a slave.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, NINTH MONTH, 19, 1854.

WILLIAM FORSTER.—Continued.

There have been few persons, perhaps, more remarkable than William Forster for remembering those in bonds as bound with them. His anti-slavery feeling was both deep and abiding. It was not the result of popular agitation, but of a heartfelt recognition of the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man. As Channing said of the highest angelic intelligences, so we may say of him: he "recognized his own nature, his own rights, in the humblest human being." Nay, more than this,—he recognized in the most down-trodden bondman, one for whom the blood of the covenant was shed—one for whose soul a ransom has been paid of such amazing and unspeakable magnitude, that love and sympathy for such was a necessary result of his fidelity and adoring love to his Divine Redeemer who purchased him also, and washed him in His blood, and made him meet for an inheritance with the saints of light. His testimony against Slavery was a Christian, a consistent, a continual testimony,—and borne as it was with faithfulness and humility, it was much more felt than seen. Those who worked with him on committees and in conventions, knew how ready he was to undergo arduous labor for the cause sake, and to yield to others the post of prominence when popular eclat was to be attained. Of this, the records of the World's Convention in 1840 afford an illustration.

We omitted to mention, in the order of time, that in 1833 he was one of many delegates who went to London to press upon the ministers of the Crown the passage of the Emancipation Act. These delegates prepared a noble and powerful address,* which was adopted at a meeting in Exeter Hall and read, with great effect before the ministers, by Samuel Gurney; and which ended with a declaration that they would not cease to use all legitimate means for the accomplishment of their great object, until it should be fully attained. The appearance of this august delegation, in Exeter Hall and in Downing Street, was more impressive than our American readers will readily appreciate.—Through them the moral and religious influence of the kingdom was brought to bear, and, in a moral sense, the measure might be said to be forced upon a Government which does not move in the direction of Mercy in advance of popular demand. Nor was his work in behalf of the Slaves confined to those efforts which can be seen by men. He bore their wrongs upon his heart. He carried them to the place of prayer, and spread them before the Judge of all the Earth—and

*It was written by J. J. Gurney,

"When for the sighing of the poor
And for the needy, God had risen,
And chains were breaking, and a door
Was opened for the souls in prison,"

not the enfranchized slave himself, when standing in triumph upon the banks of deliverance, could send Heavenward a gush of purer thanksgiving than did this steadfast lover of mankind.

At the Yearly Meeting of London following the successful issue of the struggle for the abolition of the Apprenticeship System in the West Indies, William Forster, in a very weighty and impressive manner, proposed that the meeting should settle down in solemn quiet, in order that, if it might be permitted them, a feeling of reverent thankfulness might arise to the All-Wise Disposer of events, that he had been pleased to bless the efforts which had been employed for this end.

The meeting at once settled down, under a remarkably solemn, tendering, contrit feeling, which spread from mind to mind, and continued for a considerable period.

On the 18th of 5th month, 1853, commenced the last session of the London Yearly Meeting which our beloved friend attended. In the first sitting, the editor of the London Friend records that: "William Forster offered up a solemn supplication for all present, concluding with,—and above all, that we may all know our sins to be forgiven us, and our iniquities to be blotted out, for the sake of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ." On the 20th, Josiah Forster having called the attention of the Yearly Meeting to the "importance of what he might call the distinguishing principle of our religious Society, our belief in the immediate and perceptible influences of the Holy Spirit,"

William Forster near the close of this sitting, recurred most impressively to this subject in connection with some remarks on the position of those of our members whose lot was cast far from any meeting of their Friends, to whom the advantages of Christian fellowship were comparatively unknown, and who felt the privation deeply on their own account, and still more deeply, on account of their beloved children. He had recently been himself much separated from his brethren, and in wandering up and down in a foreign country, he thought he had been peculiarly prepared to sympathize with those to whom he had referred. And in mingling with those whose profession was far different from ours, some of whom, though being in countries where superstition was darkest, were yet alive to what true godliness consisted in, he had often felt, and had often been constrained to communicate the feeling that they sustained great loss from being strangers practically to the principle which induced us to sit down in silence together, and without depending upon human ministry, to wait upon the Lord. He desired that we

ers. They are chiefly worked by Slaves, "and the mortality of the mines is very great."

"The present superintendent of the mines has a high character for humanity and kindness. Still, we have the startling fact before us, that Englishmen are slaveholders, and work their slaves in unhealthy mines for the paltry love of gold; they obtain 10 per cent. per annum and often much more, for the capital they employ; but the sinews of their servants are in the mean time shrinking, their bodily powers decay, and a fearful rate of mortality goes on! Had the slaves whom the Company now hold been purchased by it since the passing of Lord Brougham's Act, in 1843, instead of before that period, every individual slaveholder, we presume, might be looked upon by law as a felon, and be liable to a prosecution in our criminal courts. But every slaveholder is a slaveholder now; and if slaveholding be a crime, where is the difference, in fact, between having slaves purchased before a given date, or after it? The subject is a national reproach: and all who possess a share in the capital of the Company may adopt the language of Scripture,—"We are verily guilty concerning our brother."

Our friends in various instances evinced their fidelity and efficiency. Having heard in England of some English boys reduced in Brazil to a state of semi-slavery, they investigated the matter. "The minister for Foreign Affairs, at Rio, as soon as the complaint was made, issued a commission of inquiry, and on the proofs adduced of harsh treatment to these poor boys, ordered instant reparation."

The favorable reception of our friends by those whose interests were arrayed against the mission, and by the various functionaries is a good token of their fitness for this labor of love. On leaving Rio for Bahia they had the satisfaction that their passports of leaving, which were liable to a fee of $60, were sent to them free of charge.

At Bahia, an opportunity presented of witnessing the superstition of the negroes.

"In walking the street on one of the Saints' days, we saw rockets in the air and heard the sound of loud crackers. We asked what the rejoicing meant: 'The feast is held up in the church, and the people outside send up the rockets to let the Saint know, and to beg his prayers.' A short time since, after a long period of dry weather, the people began to be uneasy, and asked the priests what they could do to obtain rain. After serious consultation, it was agreed that there should be an exchange of Saints: the images of two of the churches should be removed and take each other's places; and there should be music, and rockets, and a long procession. The day came: men and women of every class, in holiday attire, attended by priests in their paraphernalia, with long black gowns, and broad black hats, moved slowly along from one church to the other, to assist in the ceremonies. The work was accomplished; rain fell, and priests and people proclaimed a miracle of Grace! 'And do you really think,' said our friend Baines, to an intelligent priest, 'that the changing of these images has brought these showers?' 'Indeed I do,' was his reply; as soon as the work was done, it began to rain: what else could it be? With a religion of this sort, and with occasional holidays of mirth, the poor slaves are taught to believe that they may become happy here and hereafter. The letters, however, that find the limbs of some of them are full of grief, even in the cities. The newspapers abound in advertisements of runaway servants, with offers of large rewards for their apprehension. They are sold by public auction, with other chattels, and are separated from their families, and sent under slave-drivers to be sold to the plantations. The lot of the slaves in Bahia is alleviated by their concentration and immense number, and the bold front they exhibit of strong forms and physical power, which silently says to their masters, 'It is better to treat us well;' but still, slavery is, and must be, a bitter draught, even in that city; and though many are made to drink of it, it is not the less bitter on that account."

We propose to finish our notice of this narrative in our next number.

Passages from our Correspondence.

It has been some time since we have afforded space for this department.

A beloved correspondent, in a letter not intended for publication, after speaking of a recent journey, writes as follows:

9 month 19th, 1853

It took something from the buoyancy of our pleasant feelings on reaching home, to learn that dear friends, and you of the number, had been to visit us during our absence. "Iron sharpeneth iron, so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend." Engaged in a common moral conflict, with much (even from very friends) to enter us in our up-hill reformatory work, we need this brightening to make the path of duty joyous. As we journied onward we sat down to splendidly furnished tables, where, with the sacrifices made to luxury, were doubtless mingled, in the eye of true philosophy, the blood of our fellow men. Enough remained to us, not so commixed, for health and enjoyment. When, my friend, shall the time be, that, rightly regulating "our daily bread," we shall see a blow struck at Slavery greater than all declamation, however eloquent, can wield? It would be painful to believe that, in the increase of the government of the Prince of Peace, that time shall not arrive, when the products of all violence done to God's image shall by pure christianism be held to be forbidden fruits: and it would be difficult to suppose that, in that happier era, their use, when such violence has the infliction of death as its frequent companion, will be regarded as much short of the crime of the Pejee Islander.

We had one morning among our stage companions, a politician of the "Silver Gray Stripe," who without being called to it by any remark of others, volunteered a defence of the Fugitive Slave Law, and the social and personal duty of enforcing it. This led to an hour's debate, in which our politician averred that he would himself drive back to his master "the panting fugitive" at the point of the bayonet, should occasion require. I remarked that I would pay him the compliment to disbelieve his assertion. Rather did I suppose he would imitate "Senator Borr," or, failing to secure the escape of the fugitive, would say, "come, neighbors, let us raise a purse, and save this our brother from the wretched doom which awaits him." But he had to be informed who "Senator Borr" was, and had yet to read the admirable story of Uncle Tom's Cabin! Driven by the argument into a close corner, where a cute down-Easter helped to put him, he made his escape from the obligations which the higher law of Heaven imposed, by affirming that all religion was priestcraft. A sick Clergyman, till then a silent listener, raised himself from his reclining position, and feebly yet earnestly remarked: "Did you ever see, Sir, a vindicator of Slavery, whose views at bottom were not tinged by Infidelity?"

Not to inflict our diary on thee,—in returning homeward we fell in with a gentleman whose fine personal appearance at once prepossessed us in his favor ere a word had been exchanged with him. ***

He announced himself as ——— the rescuer from a twelve year's Slavery of Solomon Northup, a free and intelligent colored man, seduced at Saratoga Springs into the temporary employ of two men going to Washington City, and where, being drugged, he was put whilst insensible, into a Slave pen, in that representative city of our nation's glory, and thence transferred as a slave to the Bayou Boeuf, Louisiana.

Referring me to the published account of Solomon's capture, bondage and escape—the accuracy of which he held to be unquestionable, and the interest in reading which he thought would in my view be next absorbing to "Mrs. Stowe's work," he gave me an affecting statement of a visit to a slave pen in Washington City, and other incidents of Slavery which had come under his own observation since commencing the work of effecting Solomon's liberation; confirmatory of all that is spoken of as evil in the vile system, and involving in their terrible influences women as fair and beautiful, and having minds probably as feeling, as any lady in the saloon of the steam boat then carrying us. The favorable impression which the narrator had made on my mind, lost none of its force in his telling me of a recent visit to the man of Peterboro, and enthusiastically describing him as one of God's noblemen. On my arrival at Philadelphia, I had to make, ere proceeding further homeward, a detour from my direct course, to get the book spoken of. Having promptly read it, and with no abatement of the expected interest, I must say to every friend of the Slave, to every one who for any cause feels an interest in knowing what Slavery is:—Go, and buy, and read, without delay, the "Narrative of Solomon Northup, a citizen of New York, kidnapped in Washington City in 1841, and rescued in 1853 from a cotton plantation near the Red river in Louisiana."

Another correspondent says:

I have read with exquisite delight the poem now publishing in successive parts in thy journal: ("An appeal for the headwoman") and I feel impelled to invite to it the especial attention of all lovers of fine poetry. There are some of the finest chords in the soul's lyre which are not to be moved by argument, but will vibrate to such touches as those of E. L. Jr.
And notwithstanding the sentiment of Dr. Johnson, which thou hast half endorsed, (page 72) that "there half of his kindred and his fellows, his adoption of Patrick Henry's watchword—"Give me liberty or give me death"—should be judged of by the same rules which we would apply to a Brutus, a Washington, a Cromwell, or a Bolivar.

The sequel of his career we give in Whittier's words, which we extract from "The Stranger in Lowell."

"The disastrous result of the late insurrection of the slaves in Cuba is well known. Betrayed, and driven into premature collision with their oppressors, the wronged and maddened bondmen were speedily crushed into subjection. Placido was arrested, and after a long hearing, was condemned to be executed, and consigned to the 'Chapel of the condemned.'"

How far Placido was implicated in the insurrectionary movement, it is now perhaps impossible to ascertain. The popular voice at Havana pronounced him its leader and projector; and as such he was condemned. His own bitter wrongs; the terrible recollections of his life of servitude; the sad condition of his relatives and race, exposed to scorn, contumely, and the heavy hand of violence; the impunity with which the most dreadful outrages upon the persons of slaves were inflicted,—acting upon a mind fully capable of appreciating the beauty and dignity of Freedom, furnished abundant incentives to an effort for the redemption of his race, and the humiliation of his oppressors. The Heraldo, of Madrid, speaks of him as "the celebrated poet, a man of great natural genius, and beloved and appreciated by the most respectable young men of Havana." It accuses him of wild and ambitious projects, and states that he was intended to be the chief of the black race after they had thrown off the yoke of bondage.

He was executed at Havana in the 7th month, 1844.—According to the custom in Cuba with condemned criminals, he was conducted from prison to the "Chapel of the Doomed." He passed thither with singular composure, amidst a great concourse of people, gracefully saluting his numerous acquaintances. The chapel was hung with black cloth, dimly lighted. Placido was seated beside his coffin. Priests in long black robes stood around him, chanting in sepulchral voices the service of the dead. It is an ordeal under which the stoutest-hearted and most resolute have been found to sink. After enduring it for twenty-four hours he was led out to execution. Placido came forth calm and undismayed; holding a crucifix in his hand, he recited in a loud, clear voice a solemn prayer in verse, which he had composed amidst the horrors of the "Chapel." It thrilled upon the hearts of all who heard it. I am indebted to a friend for assistance in rendering this remarkable prayer into English verse:

PRAYER OF PLACIDO.

God of unbounded love and power eternal!
To Thee I turn in darkness and despair,
Stretch forth Thine arm, and from the brow infernal
Of Calumny the veil of Justice tear!
And from the forehead of my honest fame
Pluck the world's brand of infamy and shame!
O King of kings!—my father's God—who only
Art strong to save, by whom is all controlled,
Who giv'st the sea its waves, the dark and lonely
Abyss of heaven its light, the North its cold,
The air its currents, the warm sun its beams,
Life to the flowers, and motion to the streams;
All things obey Thee; dying or reviving
As thou commandest; all, apart from Thee,
From Thee alone their power and life deriving,
Sink and are lost in vast eternity!
Yet doth the void obey Thee; since from nought
This marvellous being by Thy hand was wrought.
O merciful God!—I cannot shun Thy presence,
For through its veil of flesh Thy piercing eye
Looketh upon my spirit's unadorned essence,
As through the pure transparency of the sky;
Let not the oppressor clap his bloody hands,
As o'er my prostrate innocence he stands!

But, if alas, it seemeth good unto Thee
That I should perish as the guilty die,
That a cold mangled corpse, my foes should view me
With hateful malice and exulting eyes,
Speak Thou the word, and bid them shed my blood,
Fully in me Thy will be done: O, God!

On arriving at the fatal spot, he sat down as ordered, on a bench with his back to the soldiers. The multitude recollected, that in some affecting lines, written by the conspirator in prison, he had said that it would be useless to seek to kill him by shooting his body—that his heart must be pierced ere it would cease its throbings. At the last moment, just as the soldiers were about to fire, he rose up and gazed for an instant around and above him, on the beautiful capital of his native land, and its surrounding mountains in the distance, and the sky glorious with the summer sunshine. "Adios mundo!" (Farewell world!) he said calmly, and sat down. The word was given, and five balls entered his body. Then it was, that amidst the groans and murmurs of the horror-stricken spectators, he rose up once more and turned his head to the shuddering soldiers, his face wearing an expression of superhuman courage. "Will no one pity me?" he said, laying his hand over his heart. "Here lies here!" While he yet spoke, two balls entered his heart and he fell dead. Thus perished the hero poet of Cuba. He has not fallen in vain. His genius, and his heroic death, will doubtless be regarded by his race as precious legacies. To the great names of L'Ouverture and Pétion the colored man can now add that of Juan Placido.

Of his Poetical writings, we regret that we have only room for a few passages, which we offer as fair specimens of his verse. From the following passage in his Apostrophe to DEATH, we infer that he was a married man and happy in his connection.

"I only beg thou wilt not ask of me
This gift of life which God was pleased to give,
While passion's spell is on my heart—nor yet
While angry feelings rattle in my breast,
Nor when remembrance ever is beset
With wrongs that men despair to see redressed.
Oh, yet not while I feel this bosom rise
With tender transports, when the partner dear
Of all my cares, with bright and beaming eyes
Smiles in my face—and Eden's joys seem here.
But tell me when thou dost see me yield,
Give my whole heart and soul to God above;
To him who gave me life, my more, revealed
The truths of life eternal and of love!"

What the Bard of Amesbury declares to be his "best and noblest production," having "all the grandeur and stateliness of the old Spanish muse," is an ode "To Cuba," written on the departure of Dr. Madden from that Slavery cursed Isle, thus majestically commencing:

"Cuba!—of what avail that thou art fair!
Pearl of the Seas!—The pride of the Antilles!
If thy poor souls have still to see thee share
The pangs of bondage and its thousand ills?
Of what avail the verdure of thy hills?
The purple bloom thy coffee plain displays?
The cane's luxuriant growth, whose culture fills
More graves than laurel, or the sword finds ways
To glut with victims calmly as it slays?"

Of what avail that thy clear streams abound
With precious ore, if wealth there's none to buy
Thy children's rights, and not one grain is found
For Learning's shrine, or for the altar high
Of poor, forsaken, downcast Liberty?
Of what avail the riches of thy port,
Forests of masts, and ships from every sea,
If Trade alone is free, and man, the sport
And spoil of Trade, bears wrongs of every sort!

Cuba! O Cuba!—when men call thee fair,
And rich, and beautiful, the Queen of Isles,
Star of the West, and Ocean's gem most rare,
O, say to those who mock thee with such wiles:
Take off these flowers, and view the lifeless spoils
Which wait the worm, behold their hues beneath
The pale, cold cheek; and seek for living smiles
Where Beauty lies not in the arms of Death,
And Bondage taints not with its poison breath!"

An Ode on RELIGION, is not only fraught with devotional feeling, but is finely poetic. It opens in an elevated strain, which is well sustained throughout.

Yes, tho' in gloom and sadness I may rise,
One blessed strain can soothe my troubled mind,
No sooner wakened than with streaming eyes,
Upward I look, and there I seek my goal.
Searing in spirit o'er the things of earth,
The spark imprisoned bursts its bonds of clay,
I feel delight above all human birth,
And wrap in love, I live but then to pray:
To thee, dear Father!—mighty and supreme!
Immense! eternal! infinite! and blest!
Oh, how the grandeur of the theme doth seem
To enlarge my thoughts, and to inflame my breast.

Alluding to the early Christian Martyrs, subjected to tyranny

"That fitting agent of a spirit's aim, Inducible ever to the God of Love,"

he says,

"Thousands of martyrs fell beneath its sway:
Still in that cradle purpled with their blood
The infant faith waxed stronger day by day."

Some passages in this poem evince a degree of appreciation of the Divine legacy which is given "not as the world gives:"

"Oh when the mantle of thy peace descends,
How the soul then exults in her attire!
The garb of Grace to every thought extends,
And wraps reflection in seraphic fire."

With the concluding passages of this Ode we close our memoir, trusting that the space it has filled has not been inappropriately occupied, as it demonstrates the wickedness of slavery, the unfitness of man to be trusted with irresponsible power, and the high capabilities which may lie dormant in a despised, maltreated, chattelized bondman.

"In thee, I find all purity and peace,
All truth and goodness, wisdom far above
All worldly wisdom, might beyond increase,
And yet surpassing these, unbounded love.
Oh, that its light were shed on those whose deeds
Belie the doctrines of the church they claim;
Whose impious tongues profane their fathers' creeds,
And sanction wrong, even in religion's name."

Oh, God of mercy, throned in glory high,
O'er earth and all its miseries, look down!
Behold the wretched, hear the captive's cry,
And call thy exiled children round thy throne!
There would I lain in contemplation gaze,
On thy eternal beauty, and would make
Of love one lasting canticle of praise,
And every theme but that, henceforth forsake."—[Ed.]

For the Non-Slaveholder.

T. Shillitoe in speaking on the subject of Temperance, says,— "So far as we are deficient in using our influence and authority to remedy these and other evils that abound, we become parties thereto in the Divine sight."

* Trds Library, vol. 3, p. 128.

Is not Slavery one of the "other evils"? and are we using our best endeavors to do away with that iniquitous system, while we are constantly demanding fresh supplies of Slave grown articles, to yield which, in sufficient quantities, the slaveholder resorts to extreme severity, in order to exact the greatest amount of labor from his helpless victims? Who is the cause of this suffering? those who produce, or those who will consume these blood-stained articles? C.

THE CHRISTIAN BRAVE.

We had the pleasure, some months since, of introducing to our readers, under the above title, a true peace hero. Many will, we think, recall with lively interest the narrative which we presented of the devoted and self-denying labours of this good man among the Pawnee Indians; his journey of 1,700 miles, performed on foot, to the far-west; his residence among the tribe; and the hardships he endured in sustaining his self-appointed mission and his own existence by the labours of his own hands. It will be remembered that his faithful maintenance of the principles of Christian non resistance exposed him, at first, to great difficulty and obloquy with his Indian neighbors, who, regarding a refusal to fight as indicative only of cowardice, gave him the name of "Woman," as the most contemptuous epithet they could bestow upon a man.—When, however, the enemy approached, and the white man alone appeared unperturbed and without alarm, going with his spade to his daily labour, unmoved by the warnings of danger, and the entreaties to hide if he would not fight, contempt was changed into admiration, and the Pawnees ever afterward distinguished their white friend and benefactor by the highest title of honour bestowed upon their heroes—he was called "A BRAVE!"

It is now our privilege to number this good man among our personal friends, and we are sure that our readers will gladly trace with us some farther and recent scenes in his useful and adventurous career. His life presents a most remarkable instance of the true apostolic spirit.—Feeling himself called to labour in distant parts of the globe, he has travelled, in simple, trustful faith, and with earnest singleness of purpose, over a large extent of the North American continent and Southern Europe, laboring always without fee or reward, sometimes accepting the hospitality of friends, but ever ready to work at the roughest manual employment to support himself. He entered our office in London some months since. A remarkably tall man, somewhat stooping, indeed, from overgrowth; dressed in a suit of snuff-brown home-spun cloth; his clothes cut after the primitive fashion; wearing no neckcloth, but with the collar of his shirt buttoned closely and neatly round his neck. He wore a somewhat broad-brimmed hat, and, but for the collar to his coat, would have been taken for a "ministering Friend," come up from some remote country district to attend yearly meeting.

The countenance was a true index of the man, and the tones of his voice were modulated by a heart full of love and gentleness. As we took that large hand into our own, felt its quiet, fraternal grasp, looked up at the giant frame that stood before us, and towered above us, and then then listened to the child-like gentleness of the stranger's greeting, we felt that we were in the presence of no ordinary character, of one whom it would be safe to love and trust at first sight.

He told us many interesting particulars of his experience in his native country; of his efforts to instruct and evangelize the Indians; following their occupations, living, and at times almost starving, as they do; and of the love they bore him for his service among them; then of his mission to California; of his sympathy for the sick and dying who were overtaken by the pestilence upon the Isthmus of Panama, among whom he halted for some months, acting as nurse and pastor to hundreds of poor, deserted, or friendless emigrants, stopped on their way to the gold regions. We must not pause to recount his career among the diggers; his labours to suppress gambling and intemperance, nor of his success in procuring the erection of a hospital in San Francisco, by which the life of many a friendless, fever-stricken stranger was saved, and the sufferings of the sick immigrants greatly alleviated. Our immediate purpose is to speak of his present mission in Europe, and to notice the remarkable leadings of Providence by which his footsteps have been directed to the East, and a way opened for him through difficulties and obstacles which, humanly speaking, were of the most hopeless and insurmountable character.

Imagine our friend sitting in his lonely, humble lodging in New York; his heart full of grateful remembrances connected with his recent travels, and the blessing which had been permitted to attend his labors. And now a new call of duty arises in his heart; he has dealt with varied phases of sin and suffering and heathenism in his own country; but a drawing sympathy begins to develop itself for those who are the victims of ignorance and superstition in the Papal States of Europe. He has read of the once imperial Rome, and of the present abject and humiliating condition of her people. The thought takes possession of his soul, that if a poor laboring man like himself could get to Rome, and were to make his dwelling among the Roman poor, learning their language, joining with them in their daily labour, finding his way, as opportunities offered, to the sick and suffering, and sorrowful, winning, by patient acts of kindness, forbearance, and good will, their confidence and affection, that then he might present to many hearts, in a quiet conversational manner, the pure simple truths of the Gospel. It was not his purpose to denounce Popery, but to breathe, as it were, a New Testament influence upon all to whom he could gain access. Amongst those who knew and loved him, of his kindred and friends, there was not one to approve or encourage this new enterprise. Its difficulties and dangers were patent to all. Every one was ready to warn and deter, but no one could muster the courage or the faith to say—"If it must be so now, do this, and the Almighty give thee mercy before the man." Our friend, however, was not to be daunted; human sympathy he greatly valued and enjoyed when it came, but his dependence was never placed upon it. He sought counsel and encouragement at a higher source, and walked in the guidance of a wisdom which he had learned to trust with implicit and child-like faith.

He labored hard as a woodcutter, and saved a few dollars—enough to pay his passage to England. With these he took a steerage berth, and made his way to our shores, landing an entire stranger in Great Britain, without a spare sovereign for his maintenance, and with very slight introductions to procure him a personal welcome. That welcome, however, he found with a humble minister, actively engaged in ministering to the spiritual necessities of a poor, but very populous outskirts of London; and here, as our friend expressed it, he soon found that the Lord had some work for him to do. The guest at once became the invaluable helper, not as a preacher, for he modestly disclaimed all qualifications for the public ministry; but in many a garret home, and by many a sick bedside, he was a welcome visitor, ever ready to pour in the consolations of the Gospel. He loved to act as a wayside missionary, and was fond of joining groups of street-loiterers; and his kind words of counsel and invitation, or his proffered tract, generally met with a respectful acceptance, for his manner, and the very tones of his voice, seemed peculiarly adapted to please and conciliate the hardest and most rugged natures. He was a constant visitor, too, at the schools, where his genial, pleasant talk was a source of great joy to the children. His zeal in the temperance cause was great, and he labored successfully to win converts to the practice of total abstinence.

In the midst of these varied and useful labors, which extended over several months, he never lost sight of the great object of his voyage to the old world. His heart was ever set to go to Rome, whenever the Lord should seem to prepare a path for his feet. He talked with us frequently of his hopes and plans. He also made known his prospects at the office of the British and Foreign Bible Society, and of one or two of the leading missionary societies. The authorities there listened kindly to his statements, but could not venture to encourage what seemed so hopeless an undertaking. They represented, in the strongest colors, the difficulties and dangers of such a mission:—the jealous vigilance of the Papal authorities, their dread of popular instruction, the terror of their dungeons, and, possibly, even the peril of life itself. The simple reply to this was—"I have nothing to do with consequences. If I counted liberty or life in the matter, I should not have been thus far on my way. To Rome I intend to go!"

"And how do you propose to travel? What funds have you for the journey?"

"None. I intend to walk."

"But how shall you subsist by the way?"

"My heavenly Father has never yet withheld my daily bread, and I can trust Him still."

At this juncture it occurred to a friend to make inquiry for some vessel bound for one of the Italian ports, and to ascertain on what terms a passage could be secured. On application to the Messrs. Fox at Falmouth, the case was met in the kindest and most generous spirit, and a free passage was proffered to Leghorn in a schooner, bound from one of the Cornish ports with a cargo of fish. This unexpected opening, together with a free railway journey to the west, kindly furnished by one or two friends unknown to the recipient, removed all obstacles, and within eight hours from the receipt of the summons, the traveller was in the mail-train, on his way to Plymouth. A note of introduction procured him a cordial and truly fraternal greeting from a friend in that town, by whom he was passed on to the small port of Mevagissey, in Cornwall. Here he found a schooner chartered by Messrs. Fox, commanded by a good, kind-hearted Christian man (Captain Fishwick), who had most generously consented to convey him to Leghorn free of all expense, but who now speaks as though he were the obliged party in having such a passenger.—The voyage was a season of mutual satisfaction and spiritual enjoyment to both, the only drawback that occurred being the protracted suffering of our friend from sea-sickness. Notwithstanding this, however, he endeared himself greatly to all on board by the interest which he manifested in their spiritual welfare, and his happy and affectionate manner in imparting religious instruction. His counsel appeared to be specially blessed to the mind of the captain's son, who was serving as mate on board. Arrived at Leghorn, the friends were in no haste to part, and an ample field of labor was at once presented among the shipping in that great port. It is interesting to hear Captain Fishwick speak of the labors of his guest at this period. From ship to ship he made his way; at first shunned and repulsed, but never disheartened; overcoming by degrees all opposition, and winning at last the confidence and warm affection of the various crews by which they were surrounded. They would gather round him in groups, on the deck, or down in the fore-castle of their ships, listening eagerly as he read to them the Holy Scriptures, and expounded to them the living truths of Christianity. Religion, taught by such an exemplar, melted many a stubborn heart; and the captain of a large American ship, who had been a most profane character, acknowledged to Captain Fishwick, with tearful emotion, that it was a blessed day for him which laid the schooner alongside his ship, and brought such a visitor on board. The Bethel Flag flew frequently from the schooner's masthead; prayer meetings were held, and Captain Fishwick himself preached regularly every Sabbath-day.—(To be Continued.)

For the Non-Slaveholder. A WORD TO ABOLITIONISTS.

Can we sincerely share the gains of Oppression?

What good will it do? is a question often proposed to the advocates of Free Produce. "If all would abstain something might be done, but what can individuals accomplish in this way against the giant sin of slavery?" It is probable that multitudes of slaveholders theoretically opposed to slavery, reason in the same manner, and with quite as good grounds. We would answer you, as we answer them, even if you can see no direct or immediate good it will do, wash your own hands of all voluntary participation in the sin you condemn. Let your action be consistent if you would have your influence felt; and because you cannot do all, do not refuse to do all you have power to do. Anti-slavery men have often quoted the noble sentiment, "Actions are ours, events are God's," they have never admitted that we were free to refuse to do any duty, till we had stipulated that a reward should be given in the success of our works.

But we believe it would be impossible to estimate the amount of good resulting to the cause of liberty in this country and throughout the world, by a consistent course of action in this respect on the part of the anti-slavery community. It would at once place us on a high moral elevation from which we could command a clear view of slavery. It would give immense force to professions, the sincerity of which might otherwise be justly questioned. It would promote anti-slavery feeling, by constantly reminding us of the actual existence of slavery. It would lead to much enquiry—and enquiry on the side of truth and right is ever productive of good. It would be an appeal to the heart of the slaveholder of great moral power. It would strike at the root of slavery. It would cause the oppressor to tremble, and be an earnest to the crushed and sorrowing bondmen that the day of his redemption drew nigh.

BAGGING WIDOWS' MITES AT THE TREASURY.—The true-hearted devotion of the poor widow in Scripture, who cast into the treasury her whole substance, made her two-mite gift a richer donation in the Saviour's eyes than the ostentatious offerings which the rich Pharisees poured in from their stores. There are thousands of poor widows and orphans in this country, who, with hearts full of faith and love, bring their little money-mites to the Lord's treasury, to contribute to the spread of His Gospel of grace and salvation in pagan regions, and in dark places at home. And there is the richest Government in the world, that, with a bag under its cloak containing twenty millions of dollars of surplus revenue, and a hooked excise knife in its right hand, follows these widows and orphans stealthily to the altar of their loving sacrifice, and cuts their mite-offering in two, dropping the largest halves into his own treasures, to chink feebly between its solid ingots of gold. What a charge! Prove it if you can. We will, by two or three simple facts. A short time ago, a poor missionary among the pagan tribes of Africa, labouring, like his Master, with hardly a place to lay his head, and living on the food of almost savages, sent across the sea a packet of letters directed to different friends in America. It reached New York via England, charged with Five Dollars and Seventy-five Cents postage (£1 4s.1). Of course, "The American Missionary Association," to whose care it was directed, paid this charge, and took it from the office; for they recognized the handwriting of a faithful laborer. But this heavy postage was to be paid out of the little gifts dropped into the treasury of this Christian mission. Here are three items that helped to make up the amount. A poor young woman, in the State of Massachusetts, sent a pair of silver sleeve-buttons, left by her grandfather, who had worn them sixty years or so. These were the only two mites of the remnant of his fortune, and she thought it would be his wish in heaven that they should go for the Gospel to the heathen. The goldsmith valued them at twenty-five cents. (1s.) The second gift was a dollar from an old man above ninety years of age, in Vermont, who sent it as the last offering he could ever make on earth. Then an afflicted woman in Maine, who had been confined to her couch for years, sent the proceeds of her needlework, at which her lean fingers had plied for twelve months, in the uncertain moments of less acute suffering. And these amounted to three dollars—a gift which it gladdened her heart with gratitude to bestow on the cause she loved. Here, then, there were four dollars and twenty-five cents, contributed in a spirit which the Saviour saw and commended in the widow's donation of two mites. How precious in His sight must have been the thousand thoughts of love and faith associated with these three contributions! The whole sum came almost within a dollar of paying the postage which a Government, with a bag of twenty millions of dollars surplus revenue under its cloak, and a hooked excise-knife in its right hand, charged upon the letters of the shoeless missionary of the Gospel in Africa to his friends in America!!! Perhaps some decrepid old woman, with dim eyes and palsied hands, pared and dried apples, or collected mustard seed, enough to make up the full amount demanded at the post-office for the little packet he sent across the sea. The American Board for Foreign Missions pay nearly three thousand dollars a year for ocean postage on their correspondence with various missionary stations and persons abroad. Think how many hundreds of little gifts, like to those described, are yearly swallowed up by this heavy postal charge on missionary intelligence. Let every one, then, who loves the cause of missions, ask for an Ocean Penny Postage.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, TENTH MONTH, 19. 1854.

WILLIAM FORSTER.—The conclusion of our notice of this beloved Friend is crowded out of the present number.

PROSPECTIVE CHANGE.—We are gratified in announcing an expected change in the Editor, in the name, and in the size of this Journal; a change so complete, that our readers may be ready to conclude that there will be no identity left. But the objects will still be retained, and we trust the subscribers also, with large addition. "BURRITT'S CITIZEN OF THE WORLD," the Prospectus of which will be found on another page, ought to have an extensive circulation, and a hearty welcome to the home of every philanthropist. When, about two years ago, it was believed to be necessary to resuscitate the Non-Slaveholder, we yielded to the request of our friends, reluctantly, and because there was a duty to perform which we saw no one else prepared to undertake. But now we learn that the beloved ELIHU BURRITT, with his great heart and vast mind, is willing to become once more an American Editor, and it is with no ordinary glow of satisfaction that we rise to proffer him our chair, and to pass over into such hands the advocacy of the Free Labor doctrines, confident that these and other principles which we have endeavored to promote, will be more ably advocated by him. The first number of the "Citizen of the World" will be issued at the beginning of the year 1855, and we invite our friends, for the love of truth and humanity, to make themselves acquainted with the terms, to constitute themselves voluntary agents, and at an early date to send in to the Publisher lists of subscribers, always remembering the necessity of pre-payment.

We are assured that the testimony against the use of the products of Slave Labor will be continually and prominently upheld, whilst the variety of other matter, and the great ability of the distinguished Editor, will carry a presentation of this important principle to numbers of persons who would not be likely to see a paper which was chiefly restricted to that one subject.

COTTON FUND AND FREE LABOR FACTORY.—We are pleased and encouraged by the fact that the machinery is now in course of delivery and fitting up in the new Mill. A few more contributions to the Free Labor Cotton Fund are now really wanted. Why should there be any supineness respecting this effort? In every cotton growing state there are many producers of the free article, and these are regarded with contempt and scorn of their influence for good, in consequence of their working with their own hands to "provide things honest in the sight of all men." Extend, then, the Free cotton effort.

Seek out these honest producers. Show to their haughty neighbors that they are persons of some importance. Go to them, through your agents, money in hand, and talk to them, not of slavery or of abolition, but of FREE CROPS COTTON. Let Commerce be the missionary of liberty—let her preach the anti-slavery evangel. As you purchase your cotton, you will show to the Southerners that you believe in your principles. This will set them to thinking over their own private creed, and they will find that they believe them too.

FREE LABOR IN THE MIST OF SLAVERY.—A correspondent of the A. S. Standard, during a tour in Virginia, visited an agriculturist, with whom, and with his wife and son, he had free converse respecting the "peculiar institution." They agreed in the testimony which we have from many witnesses, "that poor people in the state are looked down upon by the slaveocracy as if they belonged to an inferior race;"—and the old farmer assured him "that the majority of the non-human-property-holders of Virginia are secret abolitionists." That this is the case in other slave states we have not a doubt. The idea that one human being can be the property of another human being, is not one which suggests itself to the instinct or to the reason of man. There is no rational being who does not possess light enough to reject such idea the moment that the tables should be turned and he himself claimed as a "chattel and thing personal." The small farmers and the whole industrial class of the south, must regard with disfavor, a system which not only outrages humanity in the persons of the slaves, but also makes them in a certain sense its victims, causing them to be despised for that which, next to religion, is the highest dignity of man, which at once keeps him out of satan's service, and renders him useful to his species—to wit, honest productive labor.

Upon which of the two classes in Virginia, would God and the angels look down with most approval,—the large planter of thousands of acres, worked by unrequited bondmen, or the honest but poor farmer who has a claim against the whole world to the product of his own labor? "The highest intelligences," says Channing, "recognize their own nature, their own rights, in the humblest human being," and wherever, in all infinity, God's Kingdom is perfected, and purity reigns, the former of these two classes would be regarded with profound displeasure, and the latter, so far as this question is concerned, with approval. Could we suppose, for the presentation of our argument, that the holy angels should become incarnate, and have material wants, can any one believe that they would satisfy those wants by accepting the results of the coerced and unrequited toil, and the iniquitous oppression of the children of their own glorious Father? And if these holy intelligences have attained to perfection, are not we, equally with them, called to be perfect? Ought not our standard to be as high and pure as theirs? Ought not our love for the slave, and for his oppressor, and our filial allegiance to the God and father of them both, to induce us to withhold the motive for the one to sin against the other?

The state of sentiment in the South which is indicated by the old Farmer's testimony, suggests various considerations. There is a large production in the Slave States, of articles unobtainable (or nearly so,) by Slave labor, and a systemized effort might select and bring it into the market, and thus depress the system of slavery, elevate the laboring class, correct, in measure, the unhealthful prejudice against labor, and plant successfully a testimony against slavery in the monster's most impregnable strong holds. This the anti-slavery people might do, and a responsibility rests upon them for neglecting it. By such a course, Non-Slaveholders would be rapidly elevated into influence, and in those states where they already form a majority, would soon show, in their election returns, in their Educational establishments, in the elevated tone of general public sentiment, that virtuous liberty is the parent of prosperity, and that to "cease to do evil" is to secure the favor and the blessing of Deity. We may reflect too, that the haughty blusterers at Washington, at whose feet Daniel Webster and a majority of our northern representatives ignominiously, like whipped spaniels, laid down manliness, consistency, and honor, by no means represent the principles of the entire South, but that there is a vast population whose interests are violated by slavery, and who cannot sympathize with the threats of disunion for its support.

In fact, we may learn, and it is "devoutly to be wished" that we may learn, that it is a policy as mistaken as it is unmanly and wrong, to concede sacred truth and right from a fear of agitation and excitement. The North has lost much, and has gained nothing, by every concession she has made, and we fully believe that in all cases, the sacrifice of principle involves the sacrifice of interest. A manly, firm, conscientious maintenance of the right, is the best specific against the aggressions of the wrong,—and the philosophy of pusillanimity is the surest prelude to defeat and disgrace—to the contempt of adversaries and the loss of self-respect.

INDIANA YEARLY MEETING.—By the report addressed to this Yearly Meeting on the 30th ult by its "committee on the concerns of the people of color," we are pleased to notice that from all the quarterly meetings, save one exhibits had been received of their labors for the benefit of the colored people in their respective limits. Twenty Schools for children of these people have been sustained during the past year, in which a large number have received instruction. "In most of these School all the common branches of an English Education have been taught, and in nearly all of them by colored persons, some quite competent and efficient teachers. A considerable number of children have received instruction in the Schools of Friends, where they have not been in settlements so that Schools of their own could be had." It also appears that the christian care of Friends has extended to advising and assisting the poor and destitute of the colored population. Attention is called to the superior advantages which they possess in country situations, where they more frequently become useful and moral citizens than in cities and villages.

TEMPERANCE AND PROHIBITORY MOVEMENT IN ENGLAND.—A very deep interest upon the Temperance question pervades the moralists of Great Britain, and our favorite project of a Prohibitory Liquor Law is in high favor among England's best and wisest men. It is no unimportant illustration of this, that The Edinburgh Review, in a long and able article, strenuously vindicates the Maine Law. Among about half a million petitioners to the House of Commons during its last session, asking for the closing of public houses on the first day of the week, were many ministers of religion, and attached to one of the petitions presented in 6th month last we notice the names of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, Archdeacon Sinclair, &c. An advance step has been taken in the Beer Act which evinces that a concession to public sentiment was found to be necessary. On the great "Licensing day" in last month, many licenses were prevented by the remonstrances presented to the several Courts. Among the petitioners, we are happy to state, were many Episcopal Clergymen. At ASHTON, Lancashire, five ministers of the Church of England, six dissenting ministers, and 272 superintendents and teachers in Sabbath Schools, successfully protested against the granting of any new licenses. At BRADFORD, Yorkshire, 27 ministers of the gospel, the Vicar of the place, 3 Bakers, 200 Burgesses, &c., petitioned, and though 25 applications for license were made, only two were granted. At LEEDS ten Episcopal Clergymen, including the vicar Dr. Hook, a large number of dissenting ministers, and 105 other respectable inhabitants petitioned against an increase of public houses. We might considerably add to our list of cases illustrative of the same feeling. Punch in view of the absurd plea of the necessity of intoxicating liquor for the accommodation of the travelling community thus defines the word Traveller: "Any person who wants anything to drink." Our English Exchanges give numerous and revolting cases of crime and misery resulting from drunkenness. But, alas,—we need not import transatlantic testimony to prove the necessity for Prohibitory Law.

MORE GUILTY THAN THIEVES AND BURGLARS.—The "HON Wm. JAY" speaking of the Nebraska and Kansas law, says: "The northern members of Congress who voted for that law, in my opinion incurred in the sight of God a deeper moral guilt than that of most of the thieves and burglars in our penitentiaries, for they sinned against clearer light and more abundant knowledge, and with a more deliberate contempt for truth, justice, liberty and human happiness than their imprisoned fellow criminals." This is plain but truthful and temperate language, and the sentiment of Wm. Jay carries weight.

THE LATE GOVERNOR BIGLER.—It gives us satisfaction to announce that William Bigler is soon to be relieved from responsibilities for the discharge of which he had not the requisite virtue. A dissatisfaction on the part of the people with his pro-slavery servility, is understood to have been a prominent cause of his defeat at the late election. So may all who insult the majesty of Heaven by violating the rights of our common Father's sable children, be removed from those official stations which ought always to be occupied by true men.

The present number has been kept back by a disappointment in the expected supply of paper.

BURRITT'S CITIZEN OF THE WORLD.

A Magazine of 16 pages of about the size of CHAMBERS' EDINBURGH JOURNAL,* will be published monthly, by George W. Taylor, Philadelphia, commencing with First Month, (Jan.) 1855, under the title of the "CITIZEN OF THE WORLD," edited by ELIhu BURRITT. Terms FIFTY CENTS per annum, to be paid invariably in advance.

"The Citizen of the World" will endeavor to merit its designation, by viewing from the elevated standpoint of human brotherhood, all principles, policies, events, institutions and enterprises which affect the peace, prosperity, social intercourse and common welfare of the nations as a family, and the rights, duty and dignity of man as an individual being. Whilst it regards these with an impartial eye and records them with an impartial pen, it will glean and present all hopeful signs of progress; all honest homage to truth, right duty and Christian charity; and all the onward steps of governments and communities in the path prescribed by a righteous policy and the precepts of the Christian religion. With all this variety of topics, the "Citizen of the World" it is confidently believed, will be a welcome and useful visitor to the different members of every family that admits it to its social circle. Its pages will be filled with articles from the editor's pen, giving his personal observations and experiences in Europe, and with communications from correspondents in different parts of the world. For the young it will serve up many a little truthful story, and teaching illustration of the law of kindness and Christian love. For the Sabbath, it will have its page of religious instruction, selected by paragraphs from the most eminent Christian writers of different countries. For every occupation, and for every age, it will seek to present something interesting and useful.

All communications relating to the "Citizen of the World," should be addressed, post paid, to GEORGE W. TAYLOR, Box 777, Philadelphia.

VOL. II.—NEW SERIES.]

PHILADELPHIA, ELEVENTH MONTH, 1854.

[No. 11.]

To Sovereigns and those in authority in the Nations of Europe, and in other parts of the World where the Christian Religion is professed.

From the Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends of Great Britain and Ireland, held in London, 1849.

It having pleased the Lord to bring our fathers to a sense of the cruelty and wickedness of the African Slave Trade, and of the injustice of holding their fellow men in Slavery, they were strengthened to act upon the conviction wrought on their minds: they set at liberty those they held in bondage, and in their faithfulness they enjoyed the answer of a good conscience towards God. In that love which comes from Him, their hearts were enlarged in love to their neighbor, and they could not rest without endeavoring to bring others to that sense of justice and mercy to which the Lord had brought them. From that time to the present day we have felt it to be laid upon us as a church to bear a testimony against the sin of Slavery.

We have believed it to be our Christian duty to represent the wrongs inflicted upon the people of Africa, and repeatedly to plead the cause of the Slave in addresses to our own Government. We rejoice and are thankful at the progress which has been made in this country and in other nations in this cause of righteousness. Hundreds of thousands of slaves have been restored to liberty, and many of the nations of the civilized world are now, to a large extent, delivered from the guilt of the African Slave Trade,—a trade which the Congress of Vienna, in 1815, pronounced to be "a scourge which desolates Africa, degrades Europe and afflicts humanity," and for the suppression of which laws have been enacted. But our hearts are sorrowful in the consideration that this traffic is still carried on to a large extent, and that a vast amount of the population of the western world is still subject to the cruelty and the wrong of Slavery. We desire to cherish this sympathy, and that we may behold the increase of it amongst all men everywhere.

One God is the Creator of us all, his eyes are in every place beholding the evil and the good. He will bring every work to judgment, and every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil. The families of the earth are all of one blood; all partakers of the same corrupt nature consequent upon the fall of man; all are alike subject to infirmity, disease, and death, and all amenable to the same judgment after death. In the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ there is no respect for persons; He tasted death for every man; all distinctions of country, tongue and color are merged in the immensity of that love in which the Father has sent his son to be the Saviour of the world. Wherever the religion of the Gospel of Christ obtains its proper place within us, it softens our hearts; it brings man into fellow-feeling with his fellow man; it brings him to regard every man as a brother, and to look upon the nations of the earth as all of one family. Amongst the millions of mankind there is not one beneath the notice of our Father who is in Heaven; if we be partakers of his love, it leads us into pity for the forlorn, the helpless and the oppressed; and it constrains us to do what we can to mitigate the pain and to assuage the sorrows of those who are in suffering; to befriend the friendless, and to labor for the improvement of the condition of the most degraded of our race.

We are now assembled in our Yearly Meeting for the promotion of charity and godliness amongst ourselves, and, according to our measure, for the spreading of truth and righteousness upon the earth. The condition of the natives of Africa, as affected by the continuance of the Slave Trade, and that of the Slaves in North and South America, and on the islands adjacent to that continent, have again awakened our sympathy. We submit to the consideration of all those in authority in the nations which take upon them the name of Christ, the utter incompatibility of Slavery with the divine law. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you do ye even so to them;" these were the precepts of our Lord. He spoke as never man spoke, and of his words He declared, "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away;" they are the law of God's righteousness to all generations. We submit whether, without breaking this law, it be possible for man to hold or claim a right to property in the person of his fellow man: whether, admitting the supreme authority of this law, man can buy or sell his brother: whether he can withhold from those who labour for him that which is just and equal; whether the forced and uncompensated labor of the Negro slave be not the breaking of this law; in short, whether any man or any of the nations of men can, in any one of these things, violate the law of the Lord and be guiltless.

For the space of three hundred years, the trade in slaves has been carried on from Africa to the opposite shores of the Atlantic; and this traffic in the persons of men is still prosecuted with unrelenting and unmitigated cruelty; year by year countless multitudes are torn from all that they hold dear in life, to pass their days in toil and misery. Men are still to be found so hardened in heart, so bent upon the gain of oppression, and so devoid of all that we deem the common feelings of humanity, as to spend their time and talents in pursuit of this criminal commerce. We forbear to enter in detail upon the large variety of human suffering, inseparable from this complicated iniquity. But we trust we do not take too much upon ourselves, in asking those whom we now address, to open their ears to the groaning of the oppressed, and to give themselves to sympathy with their sufferings; to think upon the war, the rapine, and bloodshed, attendant upon the capture of slaves in the interior of Africa—upon what they are made to endure in their transit to the coast and in their passage across the ocean; and not to shrink from making themselves acquainted with the horrors and loathsomeness of the Slave-ship, to follow the poor, helpless, unoffending Negro, if he survives the suffering of the voyage, and to think upon his condition when landed upon a foreign shore, and entered upon a life of hard and hopeless servitude—it may be—to be worked to death in his early manhood, or to live to behold his children subjected to the same degradation and oppression as himself.

Blessed is the man that considereth the poor. The blessing of the Lord resteth upon him, who, knowing the evil which attends his neighbor's lot in life, is stretching forth his hand for the relief of his poverty and distress, and his blessing is upon those who, like the Patriarch of old, are inquiring into the sorrows and hardship of the poor, the fatherless, and those that have none to help them: "The cause which I knew not, I searched out."

Our sympathies are awakened, not for the native African alone, and the victims of the African Slave Trade, but we feel for those who are living and laboring in a state of Slavery, who were born in Slavery, and possibly may die subject to its privation and its hardships. In those countries in which this system is upheld by law, man is degraded to the condition of a beast of burthen, and regarded as an article of merchandise. The slave has nothing in life that he can call his own; his physical powers, the limbs of his body, belong to another; it can scarcely be said that the faculties of his mind are his own. All that distinguishes him as a rational creature is, by the law of the State, treated as the property of another. He may be a man fearing God, and desiring to approve himself a disciple of Christ—we believe that there are such. Whatever the consistency of his character as a Christian, and however advanced in the cultivation of his mind, all avails him nothing, he is still a slave, and the law allows him nothing to look to in life but hopeless, helpless, friendless Slavery. Endowed by his Maker with capacity for enjoyment like other men, he has his social affections, he may be honorably married, and in married life surrounded by offspring dear to him as his own flesh; but he knows not the day nor the hour in which he may be torn from his wife, or in which his children, at their tender age, may be snatched away, sold to the man-trader, and carried into far distant captivity. So long as Slavery is upheld by law we can have no security for the extinction of a trade in slaves. Such are the contingencies of the system under every modification of which it is capable, that until slavery be abolished, men, women and children will, we fear, be imported from Africa, and be bought and sold like the cattle of the field, and the barbarities of the Slave-market will continue to pollute the towns and villages of those islands in the West Indies in which Slavery exists, and in the Slave-holding countries of America.

The subject is so vast and of such manifold atrocity, we think, that even the history of the whole world does not furnish a parallel to its crime. We deem it scarcely possible for a man of the most comprehensive mind fully to possess himself of the extent of the evil. The Lord alone doth know: none but the Infinite Mind can comprehend the individual and the aggregate sufferings of those subjected to these enormities. God alone can reach the heart and awaken the conscience. It is our strong desire,—we speak with reverence and fear,—it is our prayer, that He may bring every one to a sense of his own share in the guilt, and that, ceasing from his iniquity, the condemnation resting upon the man-stealer, and upon those who trade in the persons of men, may no longer attach itself to any one bearing the name of Christian; and that the Slave-holder, whether he be more or less involved in the sin of oppression, may be brought to act in obedience to the law of impartial and uncompromising equity, and, without hesitation and without delay, restore to immediate and unconditional freedom every slave he holds in bondage.

The Gospel of Christ is precious to us. Through the mercy of God to our souls we trust we are prepared in some degree, to appreciate the means which, in his wisdom and love, He has provided for the redemption of the world, and the reconciling of man to Himself. In the word of ancient prophecy, Christ was promised that in Him all the families of the earth might be blessed. We cannot but entertain the opinion that the enlightenment of multitudes of the inhabitants of Africa, and their participation in the privileges and the consolation of the Christian Religion, have been much retarded by the evil deeds of many who have gone among them; and especially that the cruelty and wickedness of the Slave-Trade have done much to keep them in ignorance of Him who died for them. In that love which extends over sea and land, and seeks the happiness of the whole human race, we make our appeal to those with whom it lies, and respectfully press upon them to take their part, in accordance with the peaceable religion of Christ, in removing every impediment out of the way, that, through the grace of God, the African, of every tribe and every tongue, may be brought to the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus.

May it please the Lord Almighty to bless those who reign, and those who are in authority, in every nation in which Christianity is acknowledged. May his wisdom preside in all their councils, and the law of his righteousness be the rule of their actions. May the Prince of Peace, Christ Jesus our Saviour, be honored wherever his name is known. May his holy religion obtain its rightful influence in the earth, and the people become prepared to offer praise to God in the language uttered by the Heavenly Host—"Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will towards men."

THE CHRISTIAN BRAVE.

It was impossible that labours so devoted and successful should pass without observation and remark, especially in a country where spiritual light and knowledge are regarded as the greatest elements of danger to the powers that be. The Papal authorities were speedily in possession of the alarming fact, that a simple-hearted Christian man, without ecclesiastical authority, without fee or reward, influenced solely by the love which he bore for the ignorant and the perishing, was at work in their city; that he was gladly and gratefully welcomed by those among whom he labored; and that many were beginning to inquire the way of salvation.

The alarm of the Leghorn judicials and priests, and their difficulty in dealing with this dangerous innovator, would have been greatly mitigated, if the weapons of his spiritual warfare had been those of ordinary mould and temper. Had he laboured to detach men as sedulously from creeds as from sin; had he included Satan and the Pope in the same breath of denunciation; had he evinced an aggressive determination to make men proselytes, instead of simply inviting them to become Christians, he would easily have been disposed of as a violator of the law, and might have caused no greater trouble, perhaps, than a consular remonstrance, and an early removal from the country. The heavenly armour however, in which he went about "doing good," left him invulnerable in the midst of enemies who watched with ceaseless vigilance his every movement, but sought in vain an occasion of offence against "the meek and quiet spirit" of the Christian Brave.

True, they confined his operations almost exclusively to the shipping in the port; drawing around the quays and wharves of Leghorn a cordon of police inspection, which never permitted him to enter the dwelling of a Invenese without the company of a priest or a policeman. Although he continued thus strictly watched during his stay in the city, no complaint could be fastened upon him either by the civil or ecclesiastical authorities. They were not ignorant of the influence he succeeded in establishing over the minds of the sailors, but their authority did not extend to the decks of English and American vessels, and they were obliged to content themselves with damming off from the minds of their own countrymen any possible streamlet of truth that might flow to them through the lips of an apostolic stranger.

The time at length arrived when our friend felt that his long-cherished prospect of visiting Rome must be carried into effect, and the parting scene on board the little schooner which had borne him to the shores of Italy, was one of deep and touching interest. At his request, the Captain assembled all the crew, with his own family, in the cabin, where their beloved guest read to them the twentieth chapter of the Acts, and when he came to the three concluding verses all hearts were melted; and the language which so vividly portrays the separation of Paul from his friends, became precisely descriptive of what took place, for "when he had thus spoken, he kneeled down, and prayed with them all. And they all wept sore, sorrowing most of all for the words which he spake, that they should see his face no more."

And now, his services in Leghorn closed, his last friendly words of Christian sympathy exchanged, the last farewell uttered, he set out on his solitary way, among a people with whose language he was yet unfamiliar, and whose habits, prejudices, and principles were all strange to him. We may well conceive the sense of utter loneliness which would at times steal over his soul, and which would assuredly have daunted any heart less truly brave, or less reliant upon that "perfect love which casteth out fear;" and with what emotion must he have gazed, for the first time, from some mountain path, upon the seven hilled city, towards which his loving, yearning sympathies had been so long directed. Here was the great seat and centre of that spiritual darkness and corruption over whose unhappy fruits he had so long mourned. The ignorance, the superstition, the prostration of the Roman people, with all their physical suffering and social degradation, he was now to encounter face to face; and he had come from his transatlantic home with the hope and purpose that a way might be opened up for him to introduce, if it might be but a ray of pure simple Gospel truth and love, among those whom he longed to enlighten and to cheer.

How often had the streets of imperial Rome witnessed the entry of brave men—the mightiest conquerors on the page of history—when, amid the tumult of popular applause, they came bearing with them the triumphs and spoils of Roman victory; but never had the Coliseum and the Capitol looked down upon a truer hero than the pilgrim stranger whose feet now trod the ways where once walked the Caesars. He was not insensible to the difficulty and danger of his task; he knew that the authorities of Rome had been advised of his coming, and would be little disposed to tolerate his mission; but he came willing to risk all in the service of the Master whom he loved.

He was not left long in suspense as to the light in which his character was viewed. He was at once placed under the strictest surveillance of the police, and was never allowed to quit his lodging without having a soldier or a priest at his elbow. He remained for more than a month a sort of prisoner at large; his patience and gentleness preserving him from giving any occasion of arrest, but an effectual barrier being put to his contemplated sphere of labor. Finding that it was hopeless to attempt any direct access to the minds of the Italian people, it occurred to him that he might, perhaps, indirectly scatter the seeds of truth, by stationing himself at some port, under British rule, where he could visit and talk with Italian sailors; and for this purpose he found that the island of Malta was peculiarly adapted, the intercourse between Valetta and the various Italian ports being more frequent than any other station in the Mediterranean. To Malta accordingly he repaired, leaving behind him the following characteristic note, addressed to the tribunal of Roman police; a document which, for its honesty and fearlessness, has probably few parallels in archives of that body:—

"To the Roman Police."

"Sirs,—I have now been in Rome forty days, and I have not spoken to the people, nor troubled any one. The people have been civil and kind, therefore the blessing of the Lord is with the people; but the priests, police, and soldiers have annoyed me much from day to day. Your priests are proselyting in the United States with perfect freedom, yet I have not done so here; and why do you imagine evil against me? Let him that is without sin first cast a stone. You may say, our craft is in danger, and great is Diana of the Ephesians; but I say, God is greater, and there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men—the man Christ Jesus; and other foundation can no man lay than that is laid. Verily, there is a fault among you that there are so many beggars in the streets. Let them be taken out of the streets, and let work be provided for them—there are uncultivated lands enough for them all; and break off your sins by showing mercy to the poor; and the priests, to avoid fornication, let them marry. To the soldiers I say, do violence to no man; and follow peace with all men, and holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord. The kingdom of Christ consists in righteousness, peace, and true holiness, not a wicked soldiery to defend it. Your trust should be in God, and not in soldiers and ceremonies. My prayer to God for you is, that you may look to God for grace to guide you in all your affairs; that the blessing of God may be with you, and God be glorified in you.

"My best wishes to you, and much love to the people."

A. ROBERTS."

We had requested our friend when he left London to write to us occasionally, that we might know how he was prospering. He told us that he was no great penman, and could not promise much in that way. However, he found time to write us a few lines from Malta, so characteristic of the man, that we append them to this short narrative, merely adding, that intelligence has reached us, through a mutual friend, that Mr. Robert's services in Malta were eminently valuable and successful. He became endeared to many Christian people there, and so highly were his services among the sailors appreciated by some of the leading merchants, that very liberal offers were made to him to settle down as a sailors' missionary for the port. Every offer, however, of remuneration was respectfully declined. He felt that having freely received of the grace of God, freely he must impart it; and he continued, therefore, a voluntary in his Saviour's service. After some months' active labour, he resolved to visit Constantinople, believing that the Lord would have work for him to do among the scenes of suffering and violence incident upon the outbreak of war. Our last accounts left him at Constantinople; and we can readily imagine that among the dead and dying, on the battle-field, in the camp, the hospital, and the bivouac, those hands will minister to the wants of the wounded, and that voice will whisper hope and consolation to many who may be led to cry, in the agony of impending death, "What must I do to be saved?"

May He who was with Peter in his dungeon, and with Paul in all his journeyings, direct the path and prosper the work of the Christian Brave.

Malta, May 23d, 1853.

"Dear Friend,—To you grace, mercy, and peace be multiplied. When I left you I promised you nothing, so if I send you only a few words you will not be much disappointed. I had a very good passage to Leghorn, and found Captain Fishwick a warm-hearted Christian. I remained on board his vessel nearly two months after our arrival at Leghorn, employing my time in distributing the Scriptures and tracts amongst English and American seamen, and visiting the sick at the hospital. A goodly number became abstainers from the use of intoxicating drinks, and some began to pray. Here I was closely watched by the police, while drunkards could go with liberty.

"I arrived at Rome on the 21st of December. Here also I was beset on all sides by priests and police, but I let them alone forty days, and then asked for my passport, and wrote a letter to the police, stating to them the treatment which I had received. A copy of the letter I send you. Popery is cruel, and its days are numbered.—Since my arrival at Malta, I have been engaged in distributing the Scriptures amongst Italian seamen; I find no people more ready to receive the Word than they.

"The blessing of God has attended me; goodness and mercy have followed me. My wants have been supplied. I do not forget the kindness of those friends that helped me in England. I thank God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, for all his mercies, and why was this grace given to me in such abundance? To God be all the glory, Amen.

From Burritt's Bond of Brotherhood. A SLAVE MOTHER.

Slavery has no line of limitation in North America, except the St. Lawrence. It goes wheresoever it listeth, with its sleuth-hounds and its shackles. The slave-mother, with her child folded to her breast, threaded the dismal swamps, where the snakes hissed at her, as she came near the nests where their slimy young lay coiled, and where the tangled bushes tore her flesh; and she toiled through the mazes of the forest, where the cougar glared at her as she passed, till at last she reached the town of Ripley, on the borders of Lake Erie. But the town of Ripley offered her neither rest nor refuge.—The hunters of her race were close upon her, and they seized her on the very brink of the water which lay between her and Canadian shore. The Roman father saved his daughter from slavery (which comprehends every imaginable outrage to womanhood) by slaying her; this American mother, raised above herself by her maternal instincts, no sooner found herself a slave again, than she threw her infant on the ground and refused to own it. When taken before a magistrate, and presented with her babe, she shut her eyes and turned away her head from it. "That is not my child," she exclaimed, "I have no child; that child belongs to freedom, not to me."

"And to whom do you belong?" said the magistrate, his lips trembling with emotion as he spoke.

"To me," said one of the captors; "she belongs to me."

"Where is your title to her?" said the Northern justice sternly.

The slaveholder fumbled in his pockets, and in his portemonnaie, but could find no record of his ownership and the girl's bondage. "Let the woman go," said the magistrate. "Who dares to hold her here without a warrant?"

With a scream of delight the young mother sprang towards her child, and laid it once more on her bosom. With a wild shout of triumph, the stout boatmen of Ripley carried her and her child to the lake, and four stout rowers bent to their oars with right good will, and sent the impatient shallop over the water to Canada. The baffled slaveholders begged, threatened, and offered bribes of gold to the men on shore, if they would unmoor their skiffs and carry them in pursuit; but the seamen whistled in their faces and smiled, and stoutly refused to touch either helm or oar. The heroic slave-mother was saved.

If I could write an epic, like some of the bards of old, I would not choose a soldier for my hero, I would glorify my song with the deeds of this great-souled mother, who preferred to make her maternal breast desolate rather than allow her child to become a slave.

AN OLIVE LEAF FOR THE PEOPLE.

BY ELIHU BURRITT.

The Safety of Arbitration.—Perhaps you plead the uncertainties of arbitration. But are these to be compared with the evils inseparable from war? Is the latter more certain in its results than the former? Should you draw the sword, can you after all be sure of gaining your point? Well does an able writer say, "We can scarcely anticipate any future national difference which it would not be more safe and prudent to submit to arbitration than to the chances of war. However just may be our cause, however united our people, we cannot foresee the issue of the conflict, nor tell what new enemies we may be called to encounter, what sacrifices to bear, what concessions to make." But do you doubt whether such pledges of mutual reference would be kept by nations? "It is readily admitted," says a worthy son of the immortal Jay, "that if the only guarantee for their faithful performance consisted in the virtue and integrity of statesmen and politicians, the confidence to be reposed in them would be but faint. Happily, however, we have a far stronger guarantee in national interest, and in public opinion. Every Government that felt disposed to violate such a treaty, would be conscious that, by doing so, it would be sacrificing substantial interests for precarious advantages, exchanging the blessings of continused peace for the hazards and calamities of war. It would, indeed, require some very powerful temptation to induce a people to forego the peace, security, and exemptions from military burdens, conferred by such a treaty. Public opinion, moreover, would unite with self-interest in preserving these treaties inviolate. A Government, who for the purpose of avoiding war had pledged its faith to abide by the award of umpires, would, by going to war in defiance of that award, and in palpable violation of its solemn engagements, shock the moral sense of mankind, and would probably disgust even its own subjects. At the present day, all Governments are more or less controlled by public opinion; and the progress of education, and the power of the press enable every individual to sit in judgment on the conduct of his rulers. Such a war would be odious, because it would be felt by all to be unjust and dishonorable. It would also be repudiated by the umpires whose decisions would thus be contemned, and by every nation which had entered into a similar treaty. It ought, also, to be remembered, that each new treaty would tend to secure the observance of all the preceding ones, as each nation would feel that the value of its own treaty would greatly depend on the faithful performance of all the others; since, if one were violated with impunity, the power of the others to preserve peace would necessarily be weakened.

AN IMPORTANT CAUTION.

The close connection and intimate intercourse which are maintained between the different sections of our common country, may, unless we are very watchful, blunt our sensibilities to the cruelties of slavery, and diminish our abhorrence of its injustice.—Minute of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends.

THE NON-SLAVEHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, ELEVENTH MONTH, 25, 1834.

VALUABLE TESTIMONY.—The American Bible Society have issued a work entitled "Testimony of Distinguished Laymen to the Value of the Sacred Scriptures," containing the opinions of such men as Groves, Newton, Erskine, Clay, Webster, Everett, Silliman, and others.—Ledger.

In our view, the practical evidence given by the sincere life of one converted soul, is a far more valuable testimony to the value of the Holy Scriptures, and the wondrous mercy of Him of whom they testify, than the "opinions" of a host of great men, who, like Clay and Webster, denied in their deeds the truths to which their lips and their intellects assented. God does not need such witnesses to vindicate his name, and, if they be summoned, they should not be ranged with Christians such as Newton, Groves, and Silliman, whose pious sayings are worthy to be preserved as "apples of gold in baskets of silver," but rather with that man who in the Capernaum Synagogue confessed per-force "I know thee who thou art—the Holy One of God!" Such confession must eventually be uttered by every soul in the Universe, and the record may serve a purpose,—but our Lord plants a better testimony in the heart and in the mouth of the simple and unlearned, but sincere and obedient Christian. Again and again, when we have heard the "opinions" of the Marshfield propagandist of a policy which he knew to be unholy adduced as important auxiliaries to the pure doctrines of the blessed Redeemer, we have recurred to the spectacle we once beheld, of a poor, aged, unlettered, blind negro, who, being asked to describe the gift of Divine Grace, turned upwards his sightless orbs, and, with an extatic delight, exclaimed, or rather shouted, "Oh sir, its unspeakable and full of glory—it lightens all de mind widin!"

We would not derogate from the just fame of Daniel Webster. His mighty intellect, (no merit of his own but a God given endowment,) has scarcely been surpassed among men. But for the verity of Christian truth we want a better evidence than that of a perverted understanding which may be right upon that point,—and, thanks be to God for his unspeakable gift, he has not left us without a far more conclusive witness. "The Word is very nigh thee, even in thy heart and in thy mouth." Every one who will come to Jesus Christ in faith, may have a testimony in himself, accordant with that of Holy Scripture and of all converted souls, and will not need, for the expounding of the saints' faith, the "opinions" of compromising Lawyers and Statesmen who have converted the free North into a human hunting ground. "He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?" We have not seen the book referred to, but the above announcement suggests the query,—Why is the testimony of such men in this case of value?—Because of their great talents?—What then shall we do with the "opinions" of equally great men, whose theology was more defective, but whose lives were truer?—Is it not unwise and unsafe to plead the "opinions" of "distinguished laymen" to prove the value of that Book which bears to the sincere soul its own evidence, the Spirit of its glorious Author co-operating with the written word to make the reader wise unto salvation. We believe the sacred volume, not because of the testimony of Clay and Webster, but notwithstanding their "opinions."

FAITH SHOWN BY WORKS.—Henry G. Chapman, a Boston Merchant who died in 1842, at the age of 38, lived long enough upon Earth to leave an example worth more to posterity than munificent subscriptions to popular charities.—At the cost of offence to his College companions, he refrained from wine for conscience sake when such abstinence was singular. He avowed himself an anti-slavery man in the days which tried mens' souls, at the cost of loss of fashionable friendships, and, subsequently, of persecution. When the gentlemen's mob was organized in 1835, a brother merchant threatened to advise his Southern customers that he, [Chapman] was foremost among the fanatics. "I thank you," said he, "for your friendly intentions, but your intimations of loss of business come too late to be of use to me. One of the first things I did when I became an Abolitionist, was to give up my trade in cotton."

"Men of clean hands" are the fitting agents of moral reformation, the appropriate advocates of the right and true. When the understanding is clear and the heart is right, causes will be followed by legitimate effects.—The early convert to the true faith would say, "I am a Christian, and therefore I cannot fight"—and no one questioned his logic. Henry G. Chapman was an abolitionist, and therefore he could not trade in slave grown Cotton. This moral hero has left the busy haunts in which his form was once

"A common sight to every common eye," but his name must not be forgotten—it should be cherished as that of one who by the faithfulness of his conduct "set to his seal that God is true."

"He is dead, but his memory still liveth—

He is gone, his example is here—
And the lustre and fragrance it giveth
Shall linger for many a year."

NON-PARTICIPANCY.—We do not remember to have heard the abstraction denied,

"That whoso gives the motive, makes
His brother's sin his own,"

but we often hear doubts of the force and value of the testimony against slavery borne by a non-use of its products. Had every merchant of the single city of Boston who aspired to the character of an upright man, declined, simultaneously with Chapman, to trade in slave-grown cotton, and adopted in practice the principle of our motto, Slavery would ere this day have shrunk into a diminished territory, instead of extending her area. The voice of Massachusetts would have spoken in clearer and stronger tones against oppression. Webster, the creature of the merchants, would have given his influence persistently for Freedom. The abominable falsity embodied in the Fugitive Bill would never have been uttered, nor the Nebraska-Kansas iniquity conceived.

Had all earnest Anti-Slavery people, from 1835, when Chapman made his noble stand, to this day, abstained as far as practicable from giving the motive to the Slaveholder through the cotton merchants, yankee enterprise would long ago have supplied the market abundantly with Free grown cotton, at a price not greater than that of the tainted article. Another most desirable result would have ensued, worth much more than all the quarrelling of Abolitionists with one another. In Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, Texas, Arkansas, and doubtless in other States, an impetus would have been given to the culture of cotton by free hands,—and those who now raise it thus, would have greatly increased in number and in importance as regards their home influence. The many have great faith in Byron's assertion that "cash is a virtue," and as these persons amassed wealth they would have gained social and political influence, and perhaps by this time have outvoted in some neighborhoods the slave interest. The actual holders of slaves are very far from being the entire south. Let the Non-Slaveholders of Southern States harmonize with one another, and aim for the right, and results would soon be apparent. By the course above indicated we might have planted a testimony in the South, which in time could not fail to leaven the whole lump. It would have been a peaceable testimony. What State would close her ports against us when we went, money in hand to purchase her cotton? No planter could find fault with us, for purchasing of the producer who offered us the best inducements. Most especially we should have convinced Slaveholders of our sincerity, and by doing so we should have set thousands of them upon a train of wholesome thinking.

BURRITT'S CITIZEN OF THE WORLD.

We trust that our friends are already obtaining subscribers for this desirable Journal. The terms are—for one copy 50 cents.

For eight copies, $3.00

"fifteen copies, 5.00, invariably in advance. Names and payments should be promptly sent to our friend George W. Taylor, Box 777, Philadelphia. See prospectus on the last page of this number.

We have given some valuable extracts from Burritt's Bond of Brotherhood, that our readers may form an estimate of the quality of the mental food which the Editor will be likely to present in the new Journal, which we are anxious to see established on a permanent basis.

THE CHRISTIAN BRAVE.—We wish all our friends to peruse this instructive and interesting article which is brought to a conclusion in the present number. Although the narrative is not directly connected with the Free Produce movement, we do not see how any sincere person can read it without being made a better abolitionist, a better Philanthropist, and stimulated to be a more faithful Christian. It conveys the lesson so needed by us all to be faithful, and to walk by faith. It instills the Abrahamic example of believing God. It is fraught with the spirit of Saul of Tarsus, who "counted not his own life dear unto himself, so that he might finish his course with joy and the ministry which he had received of the Lord Jesus to testify the gospel of the grace of God." We would gladly trace the subsequent career of Roberts, and we hope that when Elihu Burritt comes he will be able to tell us more about him in the Citizen of the World.

WILLIAM FORSTER.—As so much space is devoted this month to the excellent address to Sovereigns, &c., of which he was the bearer, we must defer to next number the conclusion of our Editorial memoir.

COMMISSIONER INGRAHAM.—"Tread lightly on the ashes of the dead"—is good poetry and a good sentiment, which we never without sadness depart from. Of this individual we had no personal knowledge, nor are we advised of the state of mind in which he met the pale commissioner who delivered him over to the Judge of all the Earth—that Judge to whom belonged by right of ransom, every negro whom Ingraham adjudged to be the property of southern men—that Judge who, that he might proclaim liberty to the captive, himself assumed a servant's form, and suffered ignominious death for all men, bond and free. We cannot read with complacency, newspaper eulogiums upon one who willingly lent himself to the vilest service that ever an unlawful law exacted from its tools. May God pardon and save him! We judge him not.

"Mercy is for the merciful—if thou Hast been of such, 'twill be accorded now."

And yet we should think that no man could succeed him in his office, without shuddering at the reflection that its hateful functions had been performed before by one who has been summoned to give an account to Him who regards as done unto Himself, every act of cruelty or of mercy.

When such a life is brought to a close, it is to the interest of mankind, that a truthful lesson should be deduced, and that every survivor should make haste to cleanse himself from iniquity, that, whether he attain to a better hope or not, he may at least leave behind him a fairer fame.

HARD-HEARTEDNESS OF ANTI-SLAVERY FOLK.—The Southern Editors might well say to the Abolitionists—"We have mourned unto you and ye have not lamented." A South Carolina paper, the Charleston Times, thus wails over the wild grapes of the Nebraska vine,—and lo—the Anti-Slavery Journals, instead of lamenting in concert, published it with every appearance of cheerful content.

"There never was a completer, more disastrous miscarriage than the Nebraska bill. It has not only blasted every expectation that was originally formed of it, but has proved to its authors a positive and unmitigated curse. Instead of strengthening the harmony of the country it has given rise to the intensest resentment and discord,—instead of giving effect and confirmation to the compromise of 1850, it has blasted that compromise into nothingness. Instead of securing two additional Slave States to the Union, it has secured two additional free States. And instead of putting an end to the free soil doctrine, it has given that doctrine a power and a respectability which it never possessed before, and which, we believe, it could never have attained through any other medium than that opened by this bill."

This is almost as cruel as the conduct of Whittier, who, when Joseph Mead of Leesburg, Loudon County, Virginia, was in sore tribulation about the loco-motive proclivities of seven chattels personal, appraised at nearly $3,000,—coolly sent him word:—

"We are happy to have it in our power to offer some consolation to the bereaved gentleman. We saw a family which answered very well to his graphic description, a short time since, in this city. They were just preparing to make the fashionable tour of the Canadas, and they did not seem to realize, in the slightest degree, the fact that they were 'running away from happiness.' It will be gratifying to their late 'owner' to learn that they were furnished, in this city, with a good store of warm clothing for their Northern journey; and that they really seemed as happy a family as ever were gathered under a hospitable roof."

A SIGNIFICANT REBUKE.—Myron H. Clark, the Temperance champion in the last legislature of N. York, drafted the Prohibitory Bill which was passed by both houses, but vetoed by Gov. Seymour. The people took the conduct of these two persons into consideration and elected the former to fill the gubernatorial chair, of which the latter had shown himself to be unworthy. Tell Horatio Seymour that "Honesty is the best policy," but that a sensible yankee woman says, "It takes an honest man to find it out."

BURRITT'S CITIZEN OF THE WORLD.

A Magazine of 16 pages of about the size of CHAMBERS' EDINBURGH JOURNAL,* will be published monthly, by George W. Taylor, Philadelphia, commencing with First Month, (Jan.) 1855, under the title of the "CITIZEN OF THE WORLD," edited by ELIHU BURRITT. Terms FIFTY CENTS per annum, for one copy—$3.00 for eight copies, and $5.00 for fifteen copies to be paid invariably in advance.

"The Citizen of the World" will endeavor to merit its designation, by viewing from the elevated stand point of human brotherhood, all principles, policies, events, institutions and enterprises which affect the peace, prosperity, social intercourse and common welfare of the nations as a family, and the rights, duty and dignity of man as an individual being. Whilst it regards these with an impartial eye and records them with an impartial pen, it will glean and present all hopeful signs of progress; all honest homage to truth, right duty and Christian charity; and all the onward steps of governments and communities in the path prescribed by a righteous policy and the precepts of the Christian religion. With all this variety of topics, the "Citizen of the World," it is confidently believed, will be a welcome and useful visitor to the different members of every family that admits it to its social circle. Its pages will be filled with articles from the editor's pen, giving his personal observations and experiences in Europe, and with communications from correspondents in different parts of the world. For the young it will serve up many a little truthful story, and teaching illustration of the law of kindness and Christian love. For the Sabbath, it will have its page of religious instruction, selected by paragraphs from the most eminent Christian writers of different countries. For every occupation, and for every age, it will seek to present something interesting and useful.

All communications relating to the "Citizen of the World," should be addressed, post paid, to GEORGE W. TAYLOR, Box 777, Philadelphia.

The first number of the The Citizen of the World has come to hand, and fully answers our expectation. It is got up with the neatness and taste which characterize the Publisher, and of the contents, it is high praise to say that they are worthy of the gifted Editor. We make the following extract.—Ed.

THE FREE LABOR MOVEMENT.—If our life be spared, we intend to devote a considerable portion of our time and strength hereafter to this important department of anti-slavery effort. Perhaps many of our readers will have been made acquainted, before these lines reach them, of the plan of offering a series of premiums for the largest quantities of cotton grown by Free Labor in the United States. The more we dwell upon the operation of this stimulus, the more fully we are convinced that it will take effect.

sensibly this very year, upon many a cotton grower in the Southern States. Perhaps the important problem may be solved next summer whether or not cotton can be grown profitably by hired free labor. Although, perhaps, 50,000 bales are annually produced by free, we are not sure that one is grown by hired labor; as those who thus cultivate it are generally very poor, and employ in its production only the hands which their own respective families can muster. Now it will be a very important result, if the premiums proposed induce even one person of more competent means to hire three or four white or free colored men to assist him and his family in growing, say, 25 bales the first year on his farm. If his balance sheet shall show a satisfactory profit on their labor, in producing this quantity, great gain to the cause will be won; which cannot fail to excite much interest in this system of agriculture. The second year's trial must be more successful still, if a greater number of persons should be encouraged to enter upon the cultivation of cotton in this way. Perhaps the first premium of $500 for 50 bales will be carried off this very year by the Germans in Texas. They are flocking into that state very rapidly, and many of them are already engaged in growing cotton by free labor. If the Germans can live and labor comfortably in Texas, they may do the same in Georgia, Alabama, or Mississippi. Emigrants from different parts of Europe are finding their way into all the slave States, and who can tell how many of them may be induced to adopt cotton growing on this system by the stimulus proposed? We hope, also, that the merchants, manufacturers and philanthropists of England will adopt a similar method, and offer a series of generous premiums for the largest quantities of cotton grown in any of the British Colonies in Asia, Africa, America, and Australia. We have prepared a paper upon this proposition, and have applied for permission to read it before the Manchester Chamber of Commerce. We are now awaiting their answer, but if they do not adopt the plan, we intend to press it upon the consideration of other parties, and believe it may be carried into effect simultaneously with that in the United States. It would be a capital thing to raise the flag of Free Labor at once, over every acre of that cotton growing belt of territory that surrounds the globe. This will be done, if this premium system be adopted simultaneously in Great Britain and the United States. In our next number, we hope to be able to state something definite, which shall be very encouraging to all our readers. As another instrumentality for making an interest in behalf of this cause, we have undertaken to edit "The Slave," a little monthly sheet, which has been hitherto conducted by Mr. and Mrs. Henry Richardson, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, with great ability. It will hereafter be issued from the Free Labor Cotton Depot, in London, and we intend to make a vigorous effort to extend its circulation, which is now about 3000 copies. "The Bond of Brotherhood," which we have edited for more than eight years in England, has a circulation of about 4,500, and in every number we bring the Free Labor question before a large circle of readers. With these various instrumentalities and operations, we hope much progress may be made in the cause, on both sides of the Atlantic, during the present year. — Citizen of the World.

A NON-PARTICIPANT SONNET.

BY SMUTHEY—A. D. 1795.

Oh, he is worn with toil! the big drops run
Down his dark cheek; hold—hold thy merciless hand,
Pale tyrant! for beneath thy hard command
Overwearied nature sinks. The scorching sun,
As pitiless as proud Prosperity,
Darts on him his full beams; grasping he lies
Arraigning with his looks the patient skies,
While that laborer drives his life on high
The mangling scourge. O ye who at your ease Sip the blood-sweetened beverage, thoughts like these Haply ye scorn: I thank thee, gracious God,
That I do feel upon my cheek the glow
Of indignation, when beneath the mid
A sable brother writhes in silent woe.

TO CHARLES SUMNER.

BY JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER.

If I have seemed more prompt to censure wrong
Than praise the right; if, seldom to thine ear
My voice hath mingled with the exultant cheer,
Born upon all our Northern winds along;
If I have failed to join the noble throng
In wide-eyed wonder, that thou standest strong
In victory, surprised in time to find Brougham's swelling power with Canby's grace combined;
That be for whom the ninefold Muses sang,
From their twined arms a giant athlete sprang,
Barbing the arrows of his native tongue
With the swift shafts Latona's archer flung,
To smite the Python of his land and time,
Fell as the monster horn of Cerberus' slime,
Like the blind bard who in Castilian springs
Tempered the steel that clove the great oakings,
And on the shrine of England's freedom laid
The gifts of Cume and of Delphi's shade—
Small need hast thou of words of praise from me.
Thou knowest my heart, dear friend, and well canst guess
That, even though silent, I have not the less Rejoiced to see thy actual life agree
With the large future which I dreamed for thee.
When, years ago, beside the summer sea,
White in the moon, we saw the long wayward
Battal and broken from the rocky wall,
That, to the menace of the brewing flood,
Opposed alone its massive quietude,
Calm as a fate; with not a leaf our vine
Nor birch spray trembling in the still moonshine,

Crowning it like God's peace. I sometimes think
That night scene by the sea prophetic—
(For nature speaks in symbols and in signs,
And through her pictures human fate discerns)—
That rock wherefrom we saw the billows sink
In storming rout, uprising clear and tall
In the white light of heaven, the type of one
Who momentarily Error's host assailed;
Stands strong as Truth, in graves of granite mailed,
And, tranquil-fronted, listening over all
The tumult, hears the angels say, Well done!

THINK OF THE SLAVE.

BY E. M. CHANDLER.

Think of the slave, in your hours of glee,
Ye who are treading life's flowery way;
Nought but its creaking thorns has he,
Nought but the gloom of its wintry day.
Think of the slave, in your hours of woe—
What are your sorrows, to that he hears?
Quenching the light of his bosom's glow,
With a lifelong stain of gushing tears.
Think of the slave, in your hours of prayer,
When worldly thoughts in your hearts are dim,
Offer your thanks for the bliss ye share,
But pray for a brighter lot for him.

THE NON-SLAVERHOLDER.

PHILADELPHIA, TWELFTH MONTH, 25, 1854.

In giving to the Printer the manuscripts for the present number, we relinquish our Editorial duties, which we assumed two years ago at the request of valued friends, and which we have performed in addition to cares and engrossments which were more than sufficient to occupy our time. We relinquish them with a sense of relief, which deepens into glad satisfaction in the prospect that the great object of our Journal will still be attended to, and that by a much abler hand, and under circumstances which will admit of far greater efficiency.

"We need," says Professor Henry, "a class of men, whose lives and powers shall be exclusively given to exploring the higher spheres of knowledge, opening new sources of Truth and Beauty, increasing the amount, and extending the domain of Science. We need an order of men who may be free to leave the mists and the vapors that settle upon the low grounds of the Earth, and getting themselves up into the mountain tops, may dwell there in a serene and lofty seclusion, alike from the goading of life's cares, and from the feverish stir and strife of its coarse and beggarly elements, and in the clear air beholding with pure and tranquil heart 'the bright countenance of Truth,' may catch and reflect its divine spirit to all times."

To a man of such an order, and withal to a large hearted lover of mankind, we wish to introduce all our subscribers and all our readers, in the Editor of the Citizen of the World. We have no fear of the contrast between the two periodicals, which our readers will make. It is because we expect it to be greatly superior to our own paper, that we are anxious to commend it to the attention and to the patronage of all whom we can influence. We have no personal ends whatever to serve by aiding its circulation. Yet there is no object which we have so much at heart, in preparing our final issue, as this one—to invite every one to subscribe for, to pay for, to read and to circulate, Elihu Burritt's Citizen of the World, the prospectus of which will be found at the beginning of this number. We invite persons to become volunteer agents for it as a labor of love—to subscribe, if they are able, for copies at club prices, and give them away—to procure the insertion in local newspapers of accredited extracts from it, and thus aid in diffusing its benefits, and in bringing it prominently into notice.

It is perhaps right to say, that we do not make this request at the instigation, or with the knowledge either of E. Burritt, or of his publisher, but from our own sense of right, and that each of our readers has as large a stake in the prosperity of the Citizen as we have.

WILLIAM FORSTER.

(Concluded.)

We gladly interrupt the regular course of the Memoir, to give place to the following letter.

THE LATE WILLIAM FORSTER.

To the Editor of the Non-Slaverholder.

Your Editorial Memoir of this distinguished person has interested me very much, and recalled to my mind my acquaintance with him in England, during the summer of 1843. In June, of that year, I was invited to accompany several anti-slavery friends, (W. F. being one of them) to Downing street, where, by previous appointment, they had an interview with Lord Aberdeen, then Secretary for the Home Department, and at present Prime Minister of England. After the delegation had despatched the business, which occupied their minds, and as they were withdrawing, William Forster lingered behind. I remained with him, as we were to visit some other place together. In the most respectful and tender manner he solicited the attention of Lord A. to a few parting words. As nearly as I can recollect they were as follows:

"I cannot take leave of Lord Aberdeen without expressing the deep concern on my mind in relation to the responsible and arduous post he occupies, and the earnest desire I feel that he may so discharge its duties, and meet its responsibilities, as to retain a consciousness of having faithfully served his Sovereign and country, and meet the approving smile of that great Being before whom in the course of nature, he must soon appear, to give an account of the deeds done in the body. Lord Aberdeen needs not any assurance that it is my heart's desire and prayer to God, that his labors may be productive of great good, and that in the day of final account he may receive admission into the mansions prepared for those who love and serve the Lord."

During the delivery of these words, uttered with indelible pathos, the tears were coursing down the cheeks of William Forster, and Lord Aberdeen seemed to be deeply moved. At the conclusion, his Lordship took an affectionate leave of the good man. It was a scene I shall never forget.

LEWIS TAPPAN.

Brooklyn, N. Y., Dec. 24, 1854.

Our dear friend, William Forster, and his co-workers, after a good, but rough and stormy passage, arrived at Boston on sixth-day, the 15th of 9th month, 1853, where they were cordially received by a number of their brethren who had been appointed by the "Meetings for sufferings" of the Yearly Meetings of New England and N. York, to render this interesting delegation proper attention. Next day Josiah and William Forster went to the house of Dr. S. B. Tobey, at Providence, John Chandler and Wm. Holmes proceeding with our late beloved friend Mahlon Day, to N. Y. Wm. Forster feeling religiously drawn to attend a small meeting of Friends at Smithfield, (distant from Providence five miles) remarked,—"It is an early entrance on the little field of labor which I have long believed to be opened for me in this country, and I shall be thankful if it prove a good beginning." He was accompanied thither by his host and by Robert I. Murray, the former of whom kindly writes us:—"In the meeting he was instructively and sweetly engaged in the ministry. He spoke first of our condition as men—of our need of a Saviour, and of the glorious provision made for our redemption and salvation through Jesus Christ—setting forth, briefly, but very forcibly, the whole gospel plan. He then referred to those in former time, unto whom God had granted their request, but sent leanness into their souls—dwelling at length on the necessity of practical righteousness. In conclusion, he expressed to the little company that he believed it was right for him to have been with them, feeling that there was a little legacy of love due from him to them. During the ride to and from meeting, he was very social and free in conversation. We talked upon various subjects connected with the interests of our religious Society, and especially upon the vital importance of sound faith, and that it should be expressed in sound words. * * * * *

"In the afternoon of First-day he was not able to attend meeting. In the evening many Friends came in to see him, and his conversation was animated and instructive. On Second day he left for New York, and we parted to meet no more on earth."

After a brief tarryance in the City of N. York, on the ensuing Third-day they arrived at Burlington, N. J., where many Friends who sincerely loved them, rejoiced to mingle in sympathy with them, to see their faces, to partake of their society, and to bid them God speed, on a mission of such dignity and moral beauty. The four days spent here, notwithstanding William Forster suffered from indisposition, were to him days of rest and renewing, and of sweet communion of spirit, not only with his beloved hostess, whose house he called his American home, but also with other disciples, between whom and himself christian fellowship and love had been long maintained, which only deepened and strengthened as years lapsed, as kindred spirits one by one went home to their "house not made with hands," and as others who ran well for a while turned into devious ways and walked no more with them.

The next First-day, William Forster attended

Abington Meeting (Pa.) where his ministry is represented to have been most acceptable, and signally attended with the evidence of Divine anointing. On Third-day our friends reached Baltimore, and gave to the correspondents of that Yearly Meeting, a full presentation of the object of their mission, receiving from them christian unity and encouragement.

The great work was now fully entered upon, in faith, in love, in dedication, in christian meekness, yet christian boldness, and in the wisdom from above, which inspired the service, and which alone could profitably direct. Their brethren in religious profession sympathized with them, and were ready to aid them,—but, whilst they reciprocated the love which offered assistance, they rightly judged that they must go alone to the work which the Holy Spirit had assigned to them, and for which they had been set apart by the Church.

No men could better have discerned the line of conduct proper for them to pursue. They visited the Rulers of the land as Ambassadors for Christ, and their high sense of honor, the nice intuition which we often had occasion to admire in them, would not have permitted them to make these private interviews a matter of gossip, or even to detail them to their friends. If, in any case they were enabled to plant a good seed,—they could in faith leave it to the care of the good Husbandman who is able to give the increase. With such an example in view, it becomes not us to pry into the mode of their reception by the dignitaries whom they officially visited, nor to make any attempt to spread before our readers the substance of the conversations which ensued. Whatever detail it may be proper to publish, will, we trust, be given in due season, by those upon whose rightful province we have been careful not to encroach.

Their first visit was to President Pierce, on the 1st of 10th month. His reception of them was courteous, affable, and appreciative. He seemed at once to comprehend both their object and their motives, and so far from obstructing their way, he rather, as we believe, promoted their safe and comfortable procedure. The policy and language of Franklin Pierce on the Slavery question, as our readers are aware, meet our unqualified disapproval and condemnation. We are glad however, to acknowledge that his bearing to our beloved friends was such as became the Chief Magistrate of a great nation, and a gentleman. William Forster subsequently made a visit of religious sympathy to the President's wife, to which she afterward very feelingly alluded in conversation with our late dear friend Mahlon Day.

Leaving Washington, they entered upon a course of travel, the extent and laboriousness of which will not be readily appreciated by our transatlantic readers, even by those who trace their course upon the map. The magnitude of the distances, the indirectness of many routes, the state of roads in new countries, and especially in the southern states, where the "peculiar institution" represses enterprise and stays improvement, must all be experienced to be understood. They visited the Governors of Virginia, Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, and Illinois, all of whom acted towards them in a manner becoming gentlemen, and some of them with apparently Christian feeling. Our dear friends were permitted to read their address to them and to plead freely for the oppressed,—and the subject was discussed with candor and openness. At Mount Pleasant, Ohio, they attended the First-day meeting of Friends, where William Forster preached Christ most impressively, dwelling solemnly upon the shortness and uncertainty of time. Again, in the evening, to a select circle, he spoke with heavenly unction, and in a similar manner to a large company the next day, so that it was remarked with much emphasis that "he seemed too ripe for heaven to stay long here."

At Cincinnati, which was made a point of divergence, a number of days were spent. By an arduous stage route they rode 84 miles to Frankfort, Ky., and thence by railway to Lexington, returning to Cincinnati, where, at a First-day meeting, he labored faithfully as a minister of Christ, being engaged to testify against a worldly spirit, in which some become so immersed that it clings to them to the end, the ultimate consequences of which were set forth in striking language. At this place they attended Monthly meeting, where the reading of William Forster's certificates was felt to be peculiarly solemn and touching. At Richmond, and at Bloomfield they attended the public meeting of Friends, and at both places his ministry was awakening and encouraging. At Springfield, Illinois, they had a most satisfactory religious meeting with the Portuguese Protestant Refugees from Madeira, a sincere minded people, about 120 of whom were in attendance, some of whom resided in Trinidad when our benevolent friend John Candler was there, four years previous to this time. After an interview with the Governor of Illinois at Joliet, who engaged to submit their memorial to the State Legislature, they visited the Gov. of Wisconsin at his private residence 7 miles north of Madison. He informed them that he had already urged upon the Legislature of his state the duty of petitioning Congress for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law. William Forster found it to be his duty to hold a public meeting for worship with the inhabitants of Madison city, for which purpose the use of the Congregational Meeting-House was kindly allowed. Reaching St. Louis about the middle of the eleventh month, they set out on a most toilsome journey, by land, of 136 miles, to Jefferson, in the centre of Missouri. The roads were bad, the stage-drivers were profane and drunken, and they met with many vicissitudes, till at length our beloved friend Wm. Forster became unable to proceed, and returned to St. Louis, accompanied by his faithful friend Wm. Holmes. Josiah Forster and John Candler went forward, had a lengthened interview with the Governor, and although their return to St. Louis was not accomplished without much fatigue, they had reason to rejoice in the retrospect, that they did not shrink from encountering difficulties in the way of duty.

From St. Louis they went down the Mississippi to BATON ROUGE, thence up the river to VICKSBURG, across the country to JACKSON, and by stage, a toilsome travel to MOBILE, thence to MILLEDGEVILLE, and to COLUMBUS (S. C.) and thence a long journey, chiefly by railway, to NASHVILLE, having interviews successively with the Governors of Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, S. Carolina, and Tennessee. In each case they were kindly and respectfully received, and patiently attended to. Upon the veteran Apostle who is the subject of this notice, devolved the introducing of the mission, and the conducting of it for the most part rested with him, and the task was well performed. Words of ours could not convey any adequate sense of the tenderness and force of his pleadings.

After the interview with Gov. Johnson, at Nashville, our friends pursued their way to Lowden, towards the East end of Tennessee, and the new year opened upon them among friends of Lost Creek Quarterly Meeting. On First-day, the 8th of 1st month, 1854, they attended a small and recently settled meeting at Hickory Valley, and a larger one the next day at Friendsville, at both of which William Forster preached with tenderness and Christian love, to his own relief and very acceptably to the audience. The meeting at Friendsville (Newberry Meeting) was indeed a memorable one, both as regards the eminent value of the testimony which he bore therein, and as being the last which he ever attended. A friend has furnished us with the following note of a verbal statement made by one of his audience on this deeply interesting occasion, and taken down from memory some time afterward.

"This last public testimony was at a meeting in Friendsville, Tennessee, wherein he was largely and solemnly engaged in proclaiming the unsearchable riches of Christ, a theme on which he had always delighted to dwell, and especially so when the shadows of evening were gathering around him. In his vivid description of the life of a dedicated Christian, it seemed as if he might have been involuntarily drawing a picture of himself—first, beautifully setting forth the fruits of early dedication, the blest results arising from a full surrender of the whole man, body, soul, and spirit, to the tendering, sanctifying power of Divine Grace, in the very morning of the day, before the heart is seared and hardened by the cares of the world or the love of other things;—tracing the course of such, from one degree of religious attainment to another, gradually mellowing under the bright beams of the Son of Righteousness, till finally the ripe fruit is brought forth to perfection. In describing the winding up of the earthly course of the perfect man in Christ Jesus, and the crown of glory which awaited him, it seemed as if he almost opened heaven before us, and a little glimpse was given of those blessed realities which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive, but which God hath laid up in store for all those who love and serve Him. At the close of the meeting, he walked round the grave yard with a friend, spoke of its being pleasantly located, expressed his satisfaction in having been with Friends of that neighborhood, and said, that little meeting had been much upon his mind before he left England."

On the following day, the third of the week, they rode about 8 miles, to the Ferry-House of Samuel Lowe, a respectable farmer on the bank of the Holston river, where they lodged, and next morning set off for Knoxville, on the way to Lost Creek meeting. William Forster was suffering much with pain in his side before starting, and the symptoms becoming aggravated, they returned to the house of their kind host. His disease was an attack of pleurisy from which he never recovered.

"During his illness he was remarkably calm and quiet, like one waiting for the coming of his Lord. On one occasion he observed, it would have been a comfort to him to have seen his beloved family again, 'but,' said he, 'it is better to depart and be with Christ.' A few days before the close, one of his companions proposed reading a portion of Pilgrim's Progress, to which he cheerfully assented, and repeated with touching emphasis the words of Hopeful, 'Be of good cheer, my brother; I feel the bottom, and it is good,' remarking he had often thought of that. On the ninth day, a state of unconsciousness came on, from which he never rallied, and having served his generation according to the will of God, this veteran in the army of the Lamb, sweetly and gently fell asleep in Jesus."

The funeral of our honored Friend took place on the ensuing First day, a large public meeting being held on the occasion at Friendsville, which was a time of unusual solemnity, and great sympathy was felt and evinced by the people of the vicinity.

William Forster, having expressed, some months before, a wish to have his friend Dr. Joseph W. Taylor, of Burlington, with him in case of his being ill, that Friend, on learning his critical situation hastened to join him. But although in a direct line the distance was only about 650 miles, such was the condition of the country that the speediest route of travel involved a journey of more than twice that extent, and in hand as an anti-slavery instrumentality, the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society would be also prepared to take action, and send a deputation to attend a public meeting.

L. A. C. proceeded to discuss the position of American Churches, and, after remarks from others, the subjoined resolution was adopted.

Mr. Chamerovzow having given an outline of operations contemplated by the Committee of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, and embracing the following points; namely, 1st. The securing of a reform in the Government of India as a means of promoting the cultivation of free-labor cotton in that country; and, 2ndly, The calling of public attention, but especially that of the various religious denominations in Great Britain, to the position of the American Churches on the question of Slavery, in order to evoke, on the part of the former, a moral testimony against the shortcomings of their co-religionists in the United States with regard to this enormous iniquity; this meeting desires to express its cordial approval of this special course of action, and resolves to promote the success of the same by every means in its power."

SUIT FOR DAMAGES.—One Johnson has sued the owner of a western Steamer for the value of his negro boy, who, by order of the mate, was piling wood, when by a mis-step he fell overboard and was drowned. Damages laid at $1000.

FLAX IN AMERICA.—An important, interesting and elaborate series of Essays upon this subject, is in course of publication in FRIENDS REVIEW. We designed attempting a condensation, but have concluded to refer the readers to the Essays in full. The subject has an important bearing upon our agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests, but a still more important one upon the FREE LABOR question, since it opens a prospect of a supply of linen goods, more durable, and at less cost than those made from cotton.

PENNSYLVANIA A. S. SOC.—Henry Grew, at the late anniversary of this Society, introduced a resolution affirming the apathy which exists respecting the use of Slave Produce to be inconsistent with the avowed principles of abolitionists;

"and that their requisition of the slaveholder to make great sacrifices for the cause of freedom and humanity, demands that they should make the smaller sacrifice of labor and expense, in procuring the products of re-quittued toil, so far as is practicable."

In the ensuing discussion, some objected to the sentiment, others to the wording of the part which we have quoted. It was intimated that some make this the "all in all" of the anti-Slavery cause. (An error indeed, if there be any such.) The subject was deferred to another meeting. Our friend Grew follows up the subject in the Freeman, in an Essay in which he happily maintains his position.

DEFERRED.—A valued communication from H. Grew is in type, but crowded out of this number.

GILDERSLEEVE'S LETTER.—This person, on whose affidavit the slave catchers were arrested, has written to Robt. C. Grier a letter, the manly dignity of which he would do well to emulate. Appended is J. L. Butler's deposition taken before and certified by Justice Burrows, that Judge Grier requested said Butler "to tell Mr. Gildersleeve that if he, Gildersleeve, should ever be brought before him, he would hang him." The high character of Burrows "as a citizen, a magistrate, and a Christian," is certified by two Presbyterian ministers, the cashier of the Bank, a Justice of the Peace, a Democratic Congressman, and a Whig Ex-Congressman. Gildersleeve's letter ends thus.

"The outrage at Wilkesbarre, and the indecent and arrogant zeal of a man who fills the high and honorable station of a Judge of the Supreme Court of the U. States, will do something to increase the intense odium with which the Fugitive Slave Act is viewed by the better class of the community. May that odium continue to expand and gather force until it shall finally render it impossible to execute this execrable act. If this be treason, you are at liberty to make the most of it."

IT IS THE SYSTEM.—P. Bremer in her "Homes of the New World," noticing the apathy, the total indifference with which really amiable people in Slave States witness the brutal maltreatment of negroes of both sexes, exclaims, "It is the system! it is the system which produces all this!" From that system, Reader, withdraw thy support. Be separate from it, and bear the eloquent testimony of a blameless example not so much against Slaveholders as against Slaveholding.

OUR TENTH NUMBER.—We have run almost entirely out of number 10. Our Publisher fears that his Packer has inadvertently sent No. 10 in place of No. 11, to a portion of our subscribers. If any have duplicates of No. 10 please send them back, as we are much in want of them. If any have received it a second time, in place of No. 11, such will please send it back addressed to "Non-Slaveholder, Philadelphia," taking care that the name of the person returning should be on each copy, that we may send No. 11 instead.

OUR NEXT VOLUME is to appear with an enlarged page. By widening and lengthening the columns we propose to give more reading matter.

Passages from our Correspondence.

MANCHESTER, N. J., 10 Mo., 14th.—Yesterday I was at the Crystal Palace. Whilst gazing upon the vast collection, bewildering in its variety, I met with our friend T. D. W., and shall remember the warmth of our greeting when much that I say will be forgotten. We spoke of the Anti-Slavery mission to the South,* prompted and prosecuted under deep religious feeling. In this connection I referred to the touching notice, in John Woolman's Life, of his visit to some of the Southern Colonies. Under a solemn conviction that he ought not to receive the gains of oppression, he distributed to the Slaves, either directly or through their masters, sums of money which he thought equivalent to the value of his entertainment. Who could have harmed this meek disciple, prostrated himself into the dust at his humiliating service, yet not daring to shrink from the divine requiring?

T. D. W. said it reminded him of a circumstance which occurred in Virginia. At the meeting of a Presbytery, its members were the invited guests of a wealthy slaveholding minister. One morning, one of the members took an early walk, and, happening by the Slaves' quarters, went in and saw their apartments and the miserable meal of which they were partaking. Returning to the house deeply oppressed in spirit, he sat down to the plentiful breakfast of his host,—but he could not eat. On his declining the various delicacies which were successively proffered him, inquiry was made as to the cause; when, overcome by his feelings, he burst into tears, and simply related the observations of the morning. So deep was the effect produced upon his auditors, that the repast was uneaten. They went into the Presbytery, where he resigned the pastorate of his congregation. He removed to a free State, and remained there till his death.

A private letter, in the midst of some valuable remarks, has the following passage.

In many of the reports issued by Free Produce Associations, complaints of apathy occupy a conspicuous place. It may be that this apathy exists;—it is equally true that such apathy being felt as a burden, is an indication of life somewhere. The impression still resting upon my mind is, that the declared friends of the Free Labor movement, including the Yearly Meeting of N. Y., of which I am a member, have not endorsed a delusive theory, in committing themselves on the side of Free Labor.

BALTIMORE.—A valued Friend referring to the favorable result of the efforts, at the late election, of the Friends of Prohibitory Law, says:

There was no compromise in the matter.—It was a clear understanding that the candidates if elected, were to labor for free-trade. The Sheriff, who is a resolute and able man, is elected for two years. The balance of the wards swell our majority to near one thousand. With such an example from a large commercial city, surely our counties will now take up the matter.

I am much hindered but must tell thee of a case of the power of conscience. I met one of our wholesale merchants on the day of election who has heavy consignments of country produce, especially of whiskey. I asked if he had voted. He said,—Yes, and for the Maine Law. It may seem strange," he continued, "for me to do so, as my commissions on Whiskey are $1000 a year, but my conscience bid me do what I knew was right, even though beggary to me should be the result." Hundreds voted secretly for the law.

But beggary won't be the result! We have not seen such men, nor their seed, begging bread. That man would make "a whole team," if hitched on to the Anti-Slavery Car. And if he were once to appreciate the principle of Non-Slaveholding as we seek to expound it, we do not think he would long hesitate to sacrifice luxury, and the slight pecuniary interest involved, at the shrine of principle. For aught we know, he may be one, who, adopting the views prevailing around him, would regard our Anti-Slavery yearnings and pleadings as fanatical;—he that as it may—we honor him, for he yields to manifested Duty, and such men may rise up in the judgment against many who yield their assent but not their obedience to the Right.

A PLEA FOR THE SLAVE.

For him who is not kinsman to the Slave,—
To whom some other God existence gave,—
To whom the eternal snowy-pinioned Dove
Hath never stooped on embassy of love,—
Of whom the God of Heaven is not the Sire,—
To whom the Holy Spirit hath not spoken,—
For him we speak not, nor awake our lyre,
We seek not from that soul an answering token.
But, to each soul who claims a Sire in Heaven,
To each for whom a Saviour's life was given,
In fervent love we send our voice abroad,
Beseeching, "Be thou reconciled to God."

Stupendous work! to make thy peace with Heaven!
To appease a God what offerings shall be given?
How wilt thou minister to His delight,
Or find oblation grateful in His sight?
How wilt thou reach Him in His bowers above
Save through His own blest medium!—God is Love
And love is the fulfilling of the law,
The sovereign tribute which he deigns to draw;
And love to Him, evinced through love to man,
Comprise the Gospel Law and Prophet's plan.
Pay to His almoners the tribute due!

In each down-trodden bondsman thou may'st view
Thy God rejected, outraged, and oppressed,
Of thy allegiance and thy love a test.
If to his misery thou hast steel'd thy heart,
If to his need thou would'st not aid impart,
Or from the fugitive hast turned away,
Nor lent him shelter on his weary way,
Thou hast denied thy Maker before men,
And holy angels marked thy treason then.

Open thine eyes, and in each brother see
The representative of Deity!
With yearning love behold the meanest child,
Whose soul was ransomed by the undeliled.
Weep if oppression thrill his soul or limb!
Weep if Sin's worse domain hath fettered him!

Two harrowing spectacles our view arrest!
The man oppressor, and the man oppressed!
The plundered bondsman, when his race is run,
May hear from Heaven's high throne the words, Well done!

And he who sits thereon, may wipe his eyes;
While ambient glory thrills with glad surprise!
And he may range that living stream beside,
Whose waters from the throne like crystal glide,
Mirrored within its breast that tree revealing,
Whose verdant leaves are for the nation's healing.
There shall be no more curse,* to sadden him, and directed with our hands, copies of the Address, to each member of the House of Peers, and the Chamber of Deputies, to the Counsellors of State and some of the Merchants, and left a number of them with some English friends at Lisbon, to be forwarded to Oporto, to the University of Coimbra, and other places. What is better than all, and for which we are truly thankful, we received a promise from almost all the members of the Government, that they will, in good faith, accelerate the passage, through the Cortes, of a law, declaring all children who may be born hereafter entirely free, and declaring also, that every slave from other countries who touches the soil of Portugal in any of her colonies, shall ipso facto, become free. I say, every slave, yet some slight exceptions, specified by law, will be permitted, but these exceptions will serve to strengthen the law itself. Portugal has, on the coasts of Africa, and in the Cape de Verd Islands, and in Asia, 270,000 slaves. The extinction of slavery in the Portuguese dominions is likely to be gradual. This is the first step, and others may follow. All slaves are to be registered, in order that the provisions of the law may be faithfully carried into effect, and no evasion permitted. Before we left Lisbon, we received hospitalities of no common kind. At the dinner table of the Minister of the State, we met the President of the Chamber of Deputies, and many persons connected with the Administration. Our conversation was in French and English. We dined also with the British Ambassador and the attache of the Legation, where we met with individuals whom we were glad to see, and among them, the Viscount Sa Bardevia, an early, long tried, and faithful abolitionist. Having expressed our intention, to a Portuguese merchant, to visit the town of St. Ubes, about 20 miles from Lisbon—a sea port containing 20,000 inhabitants, he said very kindly,—“You must not go to a tavern. My brother has a country house near the town, which is at your service: you must lodge there,” and this individual, to whom we were quite strangers, not only placed this house at our disposal, but sent two of his men-servants to provide for us. For three days, my friend R. W. Fox, his daughter and niece, who accompanied him and myself, were lodged and entertained at this mansion without cost, and allowed the privilege of walking in its magnificent orange groves, and the gathering of its golden fruit as much as we pleased! The English merchants at Lisbon, were also very kind to us. How strange it seems, that “Friends,” whose manners are so different from those of other people, should meet with such a cordial reception everywhere. But Count Lavaradio, who knew Wm. Allen, Elizabeth Fry, and perhaps Stephen Grellet, and who had met them abroad, explained the mystery. “I feel attached to your friends: I love their simplicity.” May it be our concern so to live in the divine fear, that we may let none of our christian testimonies fall to the ground, and we need not doubt that way will be made for us in the prosecution of every duty.

I must not forget to tell thee that Portugal is a lovely country.

“It is, indeed, a goodly sight to see

What Heaven hath done for this delicious land.”

Whilst our address was in the hands of the printer, and our work had some intermission, we went to Cintra to visit that far famed region. The Cintra hills are wonderful for variety and beauty, and the prospects from them extensive. The scenery has not the rich tropical warmth of the West Indies, but is very fine. Mounted on Donkeys, we ascended the mountains and rode through the glen, and could say with devout admiration, in the language of Cowper, “My father made them all.” It was quite a refreshment to us to leave Lisbon for a day or two to breathe such an atmosphere, and to see such sights. * * * Thy affectionate friend,

JOHN CANDLEE.

George W. Taylor, our publisher, has on hand and for sale a few sets of the Non-Slaveholder, Vol. 1 and 2 of the series now brought to a conclusion, at the low price of $1.00 for the two volumes in one, neatly bound in boards. Vol. 2 contains an original Memoir (not elsewhere obtainable) of Amelia Opie—also the Biographical Sketches of William Forster and Juan Placido, —with other articles valuable for future reference.

We propose to hand over to the Citizen for his judgment favors from Correspondents which have reached us since this No. was in form. One important communication remained for weeks in possession of the person thro’ whom it was sent.

ACT OUT YOUR PRINCIPLES.—As a parting word to such of our readers, as have given their assent to the doctrines of the Non-Slaveholder, we wish to remind them that the value of a principle consists in its application, and that correct thinking should bear fruit in correct acting. At the Free Produce Store in Philadelphia, you can be supplied with a variety of Free Dry Goods and Groceries, and as the new Factory will in a few days be in operation, and as our friend Geo. W. Taylor has completed better arrangements in England for the manufacture of the finer fabrics, his Spring supply is likely to be attractive. Merchants and others at a distance can be supplied either by mail or by express with samples and patterns. Those who are in the vicinity, will, we trust, make it a matter of duty to patronize an establishment so important. To submit to a little inconvenience for the sake of making your purchases at this Store of all articles obtainable there, is a small sacrifice at the shrine of Principle. To do so, would exhibit a fidelity creditable to the individual, and highly beneficial to the Free Labor Cause.
